This development did not spell the end of religious knowledge (and its ascendancy today in some circles is partly due to the failure of secular knowledge to live up to its own quasi-utopian claims) but rather its transference to epistemological terrain where demonstrable worth to human society, not sound transmission, has become the leading criterion of true knowledge. This has had the effect of greatly expanding the scope of religious knowledge. In traditional form, it is limited to select domains of life, notably ritual and moral affairs that correspond to the information transmitted from the Prophet. Since, however, the veracity of knowledge now depends largely on its demonstrable worth to society, it has become necessary to show that religious knowledge applies to all aspects of human society, including economic and political affairs. Only then, it is thought, can it continue to enjoy the status of truth.

The traditional conceptualization of religious knowledge continues to hold strong, but an alternative form, unbounded by a chain of transmission, now exists alongside it. Religious knowledge is therefore not limited to a traditional sphere but competes in all spheres of life. Indeed, some see it as source of solutions for all questions, political and economic no less then ritual and moral. The association of religious knowledge with secular criteria for determining truth has led reformists, seeking to maintain the veracity of religious knowledge in a secular age, to turn traditionally nonreligious branches of knowledge into religious knowledge, notably economics and politics. Religious knowledge is now presented as a total system of life (economics and politics as well as rituals and morals), requiring the Islamization of all knowledge. As a result, the testing ground for religious knowledge is not only the scholarly domain but also the political one.

Defining the Scope of Religious Knowledge

This "modernist" trend can result in the loss of the sacred whereby religious knowledge is judged according to its secular comprehensibility rather than as divine decree. One example is the Iranian intellectual Abdolkarim Soroush (b. 1945). Soroush challenges the political claims of Shi'i authorities as custodians of religious knowledge. By arguing for the ever-changing nature of religious knowledge, Soroush is able to contend that those trained in traditional forms of religious knowledge have no monopoly over religious knowledge and thus no special privilege to rule. This casts considerable ambiguity on the nature of religious knowledge, however, making it difficult to distinguish it from secular knowledge. A second example is Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), the revolutionary voice of Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood. He, like Soroush, views religious and secular knowledge through a single lens. The difference is that Qutb makes the Qur'an a litmus test for all knowledge, whereas Soroush subjects all knowledge, including religious knowledge, to historical (i.e., secular) processes. Qutb thus makes God's voice the exclusive agent of political life no less than ritual life. These modernist trends, whether secularizing or Islamizing, have had enormous impact on Muslim views of religious knowledge, but traditional approaches continue to be re-created. For example, Mohammed Shabestari (b. 1936) of Iran rejects a secular conceptualization of religious knowledge, as implied by Soroush, in order to preserve its sacred character, but in contrast to Qutb, he acknowledges the traditional limits of religious knowledge. Religious knowledge, as revealed by God, is necessary for humans to be "in relation" with God, but it is not the ideal material from which to build a political system.

A range of terms in Islam refer to knowledge and the varied methods of accessing it, but 'ilm has its widest scope in signifiying the concept of "knowledge." The Qur'an is clear that all knowledge comes from God (e.g., 2:32), but this does not make knowledge a simple phenomenon, since God's signs are apparent in creation as well as in revealed verses. Indeed, God bestows knowledge by both scripture and wisdom (e.g., Q. 2:251, 4:113, 5:110). The Qur'anic term for "wisdom" (hikma) would eventually be identified with philosophy, making it possible to integrate nonrevealed forms of knowledge into the arena of religion. Indeed, the intimate relation of secular and religious knowledge has arguably been the driver of Islam as a civilization, both past and present. As a well-known saying of the Prophet puts it, wisdom is the lost possession of the believer, who can claim it wherever he finds it.

Traditionally, religious knowledge is silent on the constitution of rule. While Islam deals with matters related to both religion (dīn) and the world (dunyā), its knowledge does not extend to the state (dawla). The idea that Islam refers to both religion and state (dīn wa-dawla) is a new construction. Traditionally, rule, even if necessary to the purposes of religion, was not seen as essential to religion (although for the Shi'a, communal leadership, imāma, which has sometimes been conceived in terms of political power, is essential to religion). Thus even if Islam has much to say about public behavior, the structures and methods of governance have not been determined in advance by God.

Still, the political sphere is often the site for the intersection of religious and secular knowledge. The Qur'an calls for justice and prosperity as opposed to corruption on Earth but does not specify the means for achieving righteous rule in this world. The Prophet Muhammad acted not only as messenger of God and lawgiver but also as a governor in Medina who arbitrated local disputes, offering a precedent for rule in Islam (and perhaps even for rule by Islam). But the decision to develop institutions of governance under a central authority came from communal consensus and not revealed decree.

However, some, such as Farid al-Ansari (1960–2009) of Morocco, argued that while Islam never defined the state, its well-being does depend on the existence of a political system to enforce its teachings. That is, God's decrees as set out in shari'a in relation to certain crimes (e.g., adultery, alcohol consumption, slander, theft, and brigandage), family affairs (e.g., marriage, divorce, and inheritance), or commercial and financial matters (e.g., prohibition of usury and deceptive business practices) assume the backing of a state. Rule, even if not essentially religious, is still necessary to bring about a society in which God's decrees prevail.

In contrast to this traditional outlook, some (but by no means all) intellectuals associated with Islamism do make rule on Earth a part of the revealed order. For example, Mawdudi (d. 1979), a pioneer of Islamism, conflated God's rulings (aḥkām, i.e., a legal phenomenon) with the executive branch of government (ḥukāma, i.e., a political phenomenon) in a formula known as divine sovereignty (ḥākimiyya). Others, such as Qutb and Ayatollah Khomeini (d. 1989), inspired in part by Mawdudi, offered their own versions of religious rule. To define rule as a specifically religious entity, figures such as Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932) of the Sudan, building on Mawdudi's concept of theodemocracy, associated shari'a procedures (i.e., jurisprudential concepts) such as interpretation (ijtihād) and consensus (ijmā') with the democratic concepts of voting and popular will, respectively.

In general, however, Islam does not classify rule as part of religious knowledge. Those in power, rulers, are expected to be politically astute, using human wisdom and secular means (e.g., tax collection, security forces, public works, military organization, and diplomatic relations with foreign powers) to preserve the worldly interests of Muslims. While not religious authorities themselves, rulers are expected to support the religious institutions that help Muslims achieve their heavenly interests by teaching them the ritual and moral obligations owed to God and to others—and exhorting them to undertake them. In turn, this ethical formation of individuals and communities is seen to contribute to the well-being of the polity, making religion a pillar of prosperous rule, as argued by Mawardi (d. 1058) in his various ethical treatises. Thus rule in Islam is seen as a worldly entity that is dependent on secular knowledge for its proper functioning while indirectly supporting the goals of religious knowledge insofar as it establishes the sociopolitical conditions necessary for them to be lived out. The well-known adage that rule and religion are twins epitomizes this. That is, even if they are not the same, they go together, working in complementary fashion for the well-being of the umma (community of believers).

Traditional recognition of the limited nature of religious knowledge has meant that secular forms of knowledge have a place in the political heritage of Islam. This is not to suggest religious affirmation of secularism as a total way of life but rather religious appreciation of worldly wisdom in securing just and prosperous rule. A tenth-century work by Qudama b. Ja'far (d. 948), a high-ranking servitor in the administrative corps of the Abbasid caliphate, shows the range of knowledge that informed Islam's views of governance: Muslims did not hesitate to adopt standards of rule from their imperial predecessors, both Sasanian (r. 3rd to 7th century) and Byzantine (r. 4th to 15th century). Indeed, in this work, governance (siyāsa) constitutes its own branch of knowledge, weaving together Persian notions of strong rule, Greco-Hellenistic theories of a political community and philosophical-based ideas about the ethics of the ruler (akhlāq al-malik), and a system of bureaucratic institutions consciously built on the Sasanian and Byzantine past as well as the historical experiences of Muslims as rulers of vast domains stretching from Andalusia to Central Asia. This hardly implies dynastic neglect of shari'a. Qudama not only assumes it in general but also mentions it as a source of knowledge for determining some matters of governmental importance—for example, penalties for certain crimes and principles for assessing the land tax (based in theory on the manner in which land was conquered by the first Muslims, i.e., by force or by peaceful capitulation).

This "religio-secular" character of rule in Islam, blurring the lines between religious and secular knowledge, marks the thinking of a major figure of classical Islam, Mawardi. In the diverse genres in which he wrote—jurisprudence, rule and public administration, and political advice—he combines religious and secular sources of knowledge into a single framework of rule. Indeed, for Mawardi, three sets of "rules" are at work in the formation of Muslim society: divine law, public law, and natural law. Divine law refers to the revealed rules of shari'a that regulate the moral life of Muslim society; public law refers to the administrative rules that regulate its governing institutions and the relations between rulers and ruled; and natural law refers to the rules that explain why political communities naturally come into existence in the first place. All are needed to fulfill the Qur'anic exhortation to pursue prosperity (salāh) over corruption (fasād).

Appreciation for the complex nature of rule in Islam, based on multiple sources of knowledge, continues in diverse ways in contemporary Islam. Morocco's Party of Justice and Development (PJD), for example, considers the common good to be a divine mandate but also believes that the means to achieve it cannot be gleaned from specific religious knowledge. Rather, a just and prosperous administration requires careful policy planning based on exact study of the country's actual conditions: The party's 2007 electoral program contained no religious sloganeering whatsoever, in contrast to the well-known motto of the Muslim Brotherhood that "Islam is the solution." Rather, the PJD limited itself to technical proposals aimed at developing national prosperity.

The PJD emerged from a leading Islamist movement in Morocco, Monotheism and Reform (Harakat al-Tawhid wa-l-Islah), a group that has periodically reassessed its place in a nation marked by diversity of religious sentiment even if officially committed to Malikism, a single branch of Sunni Islam. The king is known as the Commander of the Faithful and has final authority over the nation's religious arena, which he manages through a ministry of religious affairs. Extending from this ministry is a network of councils of religious knowledge (majālis al-'ilm) that handle the administrative documentation of such personal affairs as marriage and divorce. Monotheism and Reform, along with its political wing (PJD), recognizes the religious authority of the king (although one of its leading figures, Ahmad al-Raysuni, challenged the monarchy's monopoly over issuing fatwas [religious opinions]). Thus, in contrast to the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, this group has no need to seek to establish a religious polity, which is fulfilled in the person of the king who is both head of state and, as descendant of the Prophet, head of the religion. However, Monotheism and Reform works to fill a gap in society left by the transformation of traditional religious authorities into state bureaucrats. Its declared aim is to preserve the religious and moral character of Moroccan society in the face of secularizing forces.

The goal, then, is to establish religion (iqāmat al-dīn) in society in the sense of civilization (and not simply doctrines, etc.). At the same time, Monotheism and Reform acknowledges that a simple appeal to tradition is ineffective in today's world. Thus, as articulated by a leading member, Muhammad al-Hamdawi (b. 1957), its message is one of service (khidma) to society. It does work through various channels, missionary and educational (da'wa wa-tarbiya) as well as electoral politics, but it is hardly totalitarian. Religious knowledge is to be represented on all levels of society. It has moral import, giving it worth to society. The touchstone of its worth, however, is not a predetermined set of rulings traceable to a prophetic origin but rather its ability to be of service to society in the face of the many challenges of modern life. Islam in this sense is as much about a national future as a national past. Here, religious knowledge anchors the ethical reform of society as the key element of its overall health as a civilization.

Another nuance on Islam's view of secular power is found in Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), a leading Sunni authority in both the Arab and European contexts. He is unfavorably disposed to secularism but, in contrast to al-Qaeda, refuses to condemn rule that does not fully implement what God has revealed as shari'a. This is signaled in his willingness to refer to kings and presidents, in other words, secular rulers, not as agents of idolatry (tawāghūt), which is how al-Qaeda defines them, but as sultans, a traditional category defining potentates whose rule is not religiously perfect in its application of shari'a but who do not "wage war" against Muslim society, for example by preventing believers from performing their duties to God. Such rulers would be subject to removal as obstacle to the umma's fulfillment of its covenant with God.

A final example involves the shape of law in many Arab nations that were once part of the Ottoman Empire, such as Egypt, Jordan, and Syria. The laws of these nations have developed in response to colonial and postcolonial realities, but they also retain considerable material from the Hanafi branch of Islam once dominant under Ottoman rule. The figure who made this possible is 'Abd al-Razzaq al-Sanhuri (d. 1971), architect of the 1949 Egyptian Civil Code (as well as other Arab constitutions), who worked to harmonize Egyptian laws with both Islam and international standards of justice. Indeed, many countries in the contemporary Middle East have constitutions that recognize both secular norms of rule (e.g., parliamentarianism) and shari'a as source of national legislation. In Egypt, which is governed by a presidential system, shari'a is enshrined in the nation's constitution as the chief source of legislation, and a high constitutional court has the task of ensuring that no law is made that contradicts shari'a.

The Religious Value of Secular Reality

Key to the relation of Islam to modern society is the religious evaluation of secular knowledge. Is it, too, part of God's plan? One can speak of two trends here: one that sees religious knowledge as the singular source of communal identity, setting Islam apart from the world, and another that sees religious knowledge as the platform for positive religious engagement with the world. The first case is illustrated by ascendant forms of Islam in South Asia such as Deobandism and Tablighism (as well as the Taliban, a more militant brand of Deobandism).

These trends are by no means the sole representatives of Islam in South Asia, where devotion to past saints as intercessory figures continues to feature alongside devotion to living saints as spiritual guides and even mediators of divine favor. However, partly in response to British rule that categorized its Indian subjects according to religion, powerful reformist movements emerged in the 19th and 20th centuries that elevated the importance of religious identity in opposition to secularism, associated first with British rule and then with the nascent Indian nation-state, which, even if independent, would be dominated by the Hindu majority. In both cases, Islam's way of life was left without rule to back it.

Loss of political power thus contributed to a Muslim sense of being strangers in Indian society, leading them to dismiss the worth of secular ways that were not identifiable with rule by Islam. If a clear identity was not spelled out for Muslim life, the cultural ways of India, it was felt, would adulterate the pristine body of religious knowledge defining true religion. Indeed, the appearance of innovations (bidāʿ) would jeopardize the purity of religious knowledge that specified actions pleasing to God. Mawdudi was a key player here. He had deep anxieties about secularism and felt the only way to defend Islam against it was through some type of political autonomy for Muslims to establish shariʿa. As a first step, he founded in 1941, already before the partition of British India in 1947, a group for the purposes of religious activism, called Jamaʿat-i Islami (The Islamic Group). The goal was to restore the status of Islam that in his view had been humiliated by secular powers. His group worked to animate the religious consciousness of Muslims, but with the establishment of Pakistan, it turned its attention to politics, advancing its view of Pakistan as a nation under divine sovereignty. Its success at the polls was limited, but it exerted considerable influence behind the scenes and did much to create expectations of rule in the image of God. This contributed to the blurring of lines in Pakistan between religion and power, indeed military power. Mawdudi's group was closely associated with the dictatorship of Zia-ul-Haq (r. 1977–88) and his Islamizing policies. The presence of Jamaʿat-i Islami throughout South Asia has varied from one country to the next. In Pakistan it has oscillated between political participation as means to power and withdrawal from democratic processes to preserve its religious integrity from being compromised by secular ways. It strongly condemned the nation's failure to implement shariʿa fully as an offense to religion.

Other groups also tend to think of religious knowledge in terms of communal identity but do not concern themselves with politics. Deobandism, with a network of madrasas (Muslim schools) across South Asia, does recognize traditional religious authorities as keepers of shariʿa but looks askance at political power that does not outwardly conform to Islam, seeking instead to form alternative societies circumscribed by religious knowledge. Deobandism is locked in a polemical discourse with another reformist movement, Barelwism, which also operates a network of madrasas (rooted, like Deobandism, in the Hanafi branch of Sunni Islam) but diverges from Deobandism in its commitment to saints, both living and dead, without whom the ordinary believer would not enjoy full access to God. For Deobandism, divine favor is earned not by the mediation of human figures, no matter how saintly, but by a body of knowledge set apart from the tarnish of secular thought—namely, the corpus of reports that describe the life of the Prophet, who was undeniably pleasing to God. By modeling their actions after his, believers at large can also be assured of leading lives pleasing to God. Deobandism does acknowledge saintly figures, whose example can be ethically edifying for others, but rejects the idea that devotion to a saint is necessary to maintain one's religious integrity.

By emphasizing a closed corpus of religious knowledge as singular source of communal identity, Deobandism illustrates how Islam can assume a hostile stance toward local culture. The Taliban, after all, represent one of its offshoots. In its desire to protect a religious identity against "secularizing" influences, Deobandism encouraged communal identity through the study of prophetic reports, reducing Islam to a separate culture based exclusively on shariʿa. This can also be seen in the devotional movement associated with Deobandism, known as Tablighi Jamaʿat (TJ), with a global mission dedicated to the revival of religious identity at a popular level. It is "modern" in the sense of encouraging all believers to take responsibility for Islam but "antimodern" in its disdain for secular reality. Spiritual charisma is embodied in the devotional group as a whole rather than a single saintly individual. TJ thus democratizes spiritual authority but adheres to the teachings of traditional religious authorities when it comes to shariʿa rulings. It encourages devotion to the ritual practices of Islam while cultivating an inward-looking ethical character focused on the particulars of the Muslim way of life. Its central activity is collective reading of common texts that focus on the lives of the first Muslims. As a result, the virtues it cultivates in believers make sense only when manifestly conforming to the reported behavior of the Companions of the Prophet. TJ does not look to a chain of saints that extends the narrative of Islam to subsequent generations. As a result, its religious narrative is historically limited to the time of the Prophet and his Companions. This fosters a sense of existential separation from the contemporary world. The goal of religion, according to TJ, is not to serve the world but rather to promote religious identity. For this reason, conduct that imitates the minute details of the first Muslims—how they ate, laughed, bathed—is greatly esteemed. Islam is restored to the world not by political but by ritual means (i.e., by imitation of a sacred past, not by the establishment of a religious state). The goal is to accumulate heavenly merit through religiously identifiable acts, not sociopolitical ones.

TJ's negative view of this world recalls jihadism, but TJ aspires to the rule of God in the next world and does not seek to inaugurate it in this one. The intense focus on heavenly reward is not always satisfying: TJ-inspired experience can lead to jihadist activity when individuals seek a more political expression of TJ-inspired otherworldliness. But the official TJ view of jihad is missionary activity, not fighting. Its members go on tours, locally and globally, with no concern for concepts of nationhood, using the world's mosques as entry points into the ritual lives of Muslims. While the world's secular identity has made it displeasing to God, attacking it is not the way to restore Islam and assert its supremacy over the world. The goal, rather, is to separate from it through a group experience that allows one to live in a time, the time of the Prophet, when religion prevailed over worldliness, in order to ensure a favorable place in the hereafter. Having turned its back on the political heritage of Islam, TJ shares al-Qaeda's antipolitical stance but rejects the idea of religious action for worldly objectives. It aims to revive Islam by enlivening the religious identity of Muslim youth, not by sending them to death in battle against infidels.

TJ's disinterest in the world can indirectly encourage secularism, since it holds that the world is essentially worthless and can therefore be left to its own devices without the need to Islamize it. However, TJ still has concerns for ethical character, even if formulated in narrowly religious categories. It is passively supportive of shari'a-based politics, as is true of Deobandism from which it derives. The literature of Deobandism indicates favorable attitudes to shari'a-based politics as the best form of rule but does not identify politics as essentially religious. It therefore eschews the label of party, defining itself simply as the people of the sunna (ahl al-sunna), but this does not mean it has no position on the political struggles of the age, even if it does not actively participate in them. Its literature recalls the movement's support for India's drive to independence and also for the caliphate in Istanbul. It is partial to causes that call for the defense of Muslims against hostile forces—such as the West or Hinduism—but it also appreciates the political rights of all peoples. Islam here, in general, is not a political project but a shari'a-oriented life exclusive of "popular" customs. Thus, under certain conditions, it can indirectly play into shari'a-exclusive rule, as the Taliban demonstrates. Still, by refusing to make politics essential to Islam, Deobandism, Tablighism, and Barelwism diverge fundamentally from the Islamism of Jama'at-i Islami. As a result, the many millions of Muslims who look to these groups for piety have extraordinarily diverse views on politics and non-Muslim life. Some may have Islamist associations, but the belief system is more reflective of traditional Islam, where scholarly, devotional, and spiritual networks make up the way to God.

In contrast, the movement led by Fethullah Gülen of Turkey seeks to engage the world and serve human society whether identifiably Muslim or not. Its members are socially diverse and morally conservative, and they have played a key role in the renewal of civil society in Turkey by creating networks of relations based on the ethics of Islam rather than the secular ideology of the state. They adhere to the particulars of Islam, but religion here is a means to cultivate universal virtues (honesty, humility, generosity, kindness) that allow for engagement with the wider world while implicitly witnessing to the ethical efficacy of Islam. This Turkish-based global movement, numbering in the millions, has interests in education, business, and the mass media. Its activities are international in scope, with top schools in Central Asia and interfaith initiatives in the West. Indeed, the Gülen movement has become the face of Turkey to the world as much as the Turkish state. Gülen has not always been successful in his attempts to accommodate the Kemalist state whose secularist ideology has dominated the Turkish Republic since its founding by Atatürk (1881–1938). He is a deeply spiritual figure heavily immersed in the heritage of Sufism, although his movement is not structured according to its traditional hierarchies. He is committed to the secular state but also to the teachings of Islam, working to create a new framework for Turkish society that does not threaten the secular constitution of the state but does marginalize its ideology as partisan interest of the state elite.

The fact that the Turkish state has control of official religious institutions is not inconsistent with the Ottoman past. The difference, of course, is that the modern state defines itself in secular categories, leading it to refashion Islam in the image of its secularizing policies. For example, the religious curriculum of state schools is much more geared to the glorification of the Turkish nation than to the beliefs and practices of Islam alone. However, since the founding of the republic in 1923, Sufi orders that continue to exist on the ground even if banned by law have nurtured forms of Islam apart from state supervision. A key group has been the Naqshbandis, a group whose affiliates have pursued diverse approaches to state and society in Kemalist Turkey. For example, some rebelled against the secularizing policies of the nascent Turkish state, founded on the materialist ideology of Kemalism that rejected the public legitimacy of spiritual authority and viewed religion as essentially backward. But others actually executed the state's decision to eliminate Sufism as a social institution by closing down its centers. Later, some affiliates of the Naqshbandis struck an Islamist tone, such as the poet Necip Fazil Kisakürek (d. 1983), who supported the idea of a national system under divine sovereignty. Others made alliances with secular parties, entering government ministries and even the military, the bastion of Kemalism. Still others combined Islam with notions of political liberty, creating an intellectual framework for Muslim democracy, and many have been employed in the state-controlled ministry of religion while still looking to the Naqshabandi spiritual heritage as ultimate authority.

Sufi brotherhoods in contemporary Turkey exist ambiguously as cultural or charitable foundations, not as religious institutions, but nevertheless do not seek to overturn the official ban on Sufism. Sufism is a religiosity that does not depend on state recognition or even social visibility—in contrast to shari'a, which defines the externals of people's lives (e.g., what they wear and how they act). As such, Sufism can exist in climates highly antagonistic to Islam, operating through spiritual networks that climax in a shaykh who, as spiritual successor to the Prophet, is ultimate guarantor of the religious integrity of the umma (or at least the part that acknowledges his authority).

A common theme marks the varied expressions of the Naqshbandis in Turkey: Islam as alternative to Kemalism, not in the sense of political challenge but rather in the sense of a spiritual life that Kemalism cannot control. This heritage has offered pious Turks a way to live the spiritual realities of Islam apart from state definitions of religious knowledge (e.g., in the national religious curriculum as noted earlier) but still within a public order defined by Kemalism. Eventually, this alternative vision would have political consequences. A key leader of the Naqshbandis was Mehmet Zahit Kotku (d. 1980), who encouraged his followers to engage the political arena first by allying with non-Kemalist secular parties and then by creating religious-oriented parties. Three prime ministers were all influenced by him in one way or another: Turgut Özal (d. 1993), Necmettin Erbakan (leader of the Islamist movement in Turkey known as Milli Görüş), and Recep Tayyip Erdoğan (leader of the Justice and Development Party, or AK Party, now at the head of Turkey's government). The speeches of Kotku's successor, Esad Coşan (d. 2001), sometimes castigated the West as source of the anti-religious secularism he associated with Kemalism. He would call for greater freedom for Islam but not for all (e.g., religious minorities, atheists, gays). And yet he was a great proponent of free markets, seeing economic vitality as a way to protect the nation from foreign influence. Still, despite the variety, it has been this form of Islam, articulated chiefly by the Naqshbandis, that has offered a counter-narrative to Kemalism, depicting spiritual and not solely material realities as shapers of the nation's character. Not only pious believers but also nonobservant Muslims appreciate this counternarrative, even if religiously framed, as a more effective guarantor of freedom than Kemalism. This is not to say that the Kemalist state is unthinkingly authoritarian. It did permit a democratic process that brought the AK Party to power, but it has vigorously sought to program the nation to believe that secular modernization is the purpose of life.

It is from this background that the Gülen movement emerged not as a spiritual brotherhood but as a socioreligious force that helped pave the way for the transformation of Turkish politics, a transformation symbolized in a religiously oriented party ruling a Muslim nation on behalf of a secularist state. This is not to suggest a formal relation between the movement and the party, but Gülen set the conditions for the AK Party to navigate between the hammer of Kemalism and the anvil of Islamism as represented by Erbakan. The stage was set in 1997 when the state removed Erbakan as prime minister. Islam in Turkey had been a force for economic liberalization, but 1997 marked a turning point that would make Islam a force for political liberalization, too—human rights, democracy, civil liberties, things that had previously been viewed negatively as products of the West. Kemalist repression of alternative expressions of Islam helped create the link between Islam and freedom. Long before 1997, the nation as a whole aspired to greater freedom from the state, but the chances of realizing it became greater when the forces of Islam assumed it as a necessary precondition for the well-being of Islam.

The emergence of Islam as proponent of civil society in Turkey cannot be explained wholly as a response to state action. Political liberalization, to make religious sense, would have to be captured in religious language, including the liberalization of religious attitudes toward nonreligious life: a religious message of tolerance and love for all without undermining the uniqueness of Islam. Gülen symbolizes this vision of Islam, articulating national harmony through a religious lens—not as a state policy but as an independent shaper of the character of society. His followers in general turned away from Erbakan's antagonistic style but enthusiastically support the AK Party, especially its goal of freeing society from state ideology. The leadership of the AK Party actually drew on Gülen's ideas to forge its approach to national politics: religiosity that is dynamically Muslim but also positively engaged with secular realities that are themselves worthy of reverence as part of God's created order. The aim of Islam, then, is primarily ethical, not political: to restore the character of a nation disfigured by the materialist ideology of the state. However, renewal of national character is not reducible to philosophical abstracts but depends on a message that speaks to the cultural particularities and ethical loyalties of the people, including Islam, while also resonating with the national and global whole. Gülen is not so much in dialogue with Kemalism as he is with Turkish society at large (and indeed the entire world), defining a new framework for the nation in which a dynamic concept of religious knowledge is freely at play.

Gülen was a disciple of Sa'id Nursi (d. 1960), once affiliated with the Naqshbandis, who broke with institutional Sufism but drew on its intellectual heritage to defend faith in the face of the highly secularizing trends of modern Turkish history. His voluminous commentary on the Qur'an, Risale-yi Nur (Epistle of light), widely studied in Turkey and widely available on the Internet in multiple languages, weaves together questions of modern science with a spiritual vision of the cosmos, leaving the impression that secularism is itself part of the sacred narrative of Islam. Gülen in turn added civic activism to Nursi's legacy, inspiring his followers to bring piety to life in the form of service to the nation. Indeed, the movement refers to itself as "service" (hizmet). Its promotion of piety operates not by preaching (teblig) for the sake of a religious identity but by representing (temsil) the ethics of Islam in the service of the common good: a panoply of virtues that others would recognize as part of human civilization but that here is identified with Islam. Islam still has its particular norms, and Gülen is committed to them, but more profoundly he represents a belief system that encourages not only harmonious coexistence with secular life and its various branches of knowledge but also constructive interaction with it.

The Political Demands of Religious Knowledge

Religious knowledge does make demands on society, but the nature of these demands depends on a number of factors, including the way in which the relation of religious to political authority is envisioned. In general, in echo of the Qur'anic depiction of the prophets, who did not rule but counseled rulers to fear God, the role of religious authorities has traditionally been that of advice givers (nasiha). Those who are learned in religion do engage rule—and thus give it a measure of religious legitimacy—but from a distance, where they can advise or admonish, depending on the circumstances. One sees this in contemporary Morocco, where the leader of the Butshishiyya, Sidi Hamza, has supported the monarchy, counseling the nation to support it as protector of national harmony, while 'Abd al-Salam Yasin, leader of the banned Jama'at al-'Adl wa-l-Ihsan (Group of Justice and Charity), drawing from the same spiritual heritage as Hamza, denounces it as source of political injustice. Neither figure, however, is a force for democracy per se. Both affirm the hierarchical nature of religious and political authority but diverge in their assessment of whether the monarchy in place, holder of worldly power in Morocco, adequately preserves the interests of the country's citizen-subjects. Today, as in the past, religious authority can affirm or deny the legitimacy of rule.

For others, religious knowledge demands more than counseling rulers or even the nation as a whole. Instead, it holds out hope of a perfect society free of the tarnish of sin, making the subordination of God's decrees to worldly considerations a threat to the community's standing before God. In early Islam, the movement known as Kharijism took shape in response to the Battle of Siffin in the year 657, exactly 25 years after the death of the Prophet. At the head of the opposing armies were two of the Prophet's Companions: 'Ali b. Abi Talib and Mu'awiyya. When no clear victor emerged, the two sides agreed to resolve the dispute through arbitration by the book of God, but the process was soon manipulated in favor of Mu'awiyya, whereupon the proto-Kharijis denounced the worldliness of the process with the declaration of "no rule but God's rule." What exactly upset them is unclear. The earliest reports suggest that it involved the use of writing in the arbitration process (perhaps as a way to "authorize" the results), which would imply that "a book" (kitāb) other than the book of God might "govern" the affairs of the community. Indeed, in its earliest form, Kharijism identified the leader (imām) of the umma as the book of God exclusively.

Thus, particular cultural attitudes about the power of writing as a source of authoritative knowledge were at play in early Kharijism: religious knowledge, revealed by divine communiqué, had been "polluted" by human rule, which in this case implied a humanly composed rather than divinely revealed form of writing. At the same time, worldly considerations and tribal loyalties also featured prominently. A number of the partisans of Kharijism belonged to the tribe of Tamim, and others were warriors who had participated in the battles to spread Islam, known as "the conquests" (al-futūhāt), with the expectation of a full share in the spoils. The decision by 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44) to put conquered lands under central control, to be taxed with the revenue going to the public treasury, did not provoke a hostile reaction, but the partisan way in which 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56) distributed communal sources of wealth in favor of his Umayyad tribal relations did. This led to his assassination at the hands of forerunners to Kharijism, who claimed that he had deviated from the Prophet's way of governing, introducing innovations into the religion and sowing corruption on Earth. Kharijism, its destructiveness notwithstanding, did much to stimulate Muslim thinking about the ambiguous relation of religious knowledge to the exercise of power and, indeed, about the religious status of "politics" in general.

The basic conviction of Kharijism—that secular considerations are not to prevail over God's decrees—still exists. One example is jihadism, which differs from Kharijism in many respects but shares its strong resistance to rule that is religiously ambiguous even if politically effective. Al-Qaeda adjudicates political realities wholly through a scripturally informed narrative where the forces of God do battle against the agents of idolatry (tawāghīt). Qutb especially gave shape to this narrative, overturning centuries of Muslim appreciation of secular processes in the workings of governance. His dismissal of nonrevealed explanations of human existence (such as sociological ones) was partly an overreaction to the increasingly secularizing character of his age when national authorities no longer were merely to govern society, as their dynastic forebears, but also came to claim jurisdiction over its moral character, traditionally the preserve of those learned in religious knowledge. The resulting narrative now inspiring jihadist groups ignores long-standing reservations about demanding religious perfection from rulers. In the mentality of al-Qaeda, the failure to incarnate religious knowledge as rule casts suspicion on its veracity. And this, in turn, makes it necessary to "stage" the truth of revelation by enacting the divinely revealed victory of belief over unbelief on the global stage, pitting a righteous remnant against worldly powers (now redefined as God's enemies in accordance with the jihadist script).

According to this outlook, there can be no compromise between divine sovereignty and worldly powers that place secular considerations above the literal wordings of divine speech. Thus the preference for secular systems, such as capitalism or socialism, raises questions about the veracity of religious knowledge. Its truth is suspect if it is not effectively guiding the entire globe. In an odd twist of logic, al-Qaeda makes divine speech the sole criterion of action in the world. Claims of tyranny do feature in its rhetoric, but the rulers of the world are judged not so much for their political shortcomings but for "humiliating" the religious integrity of the umma by leading it away from the clear knowledge of divine speech in favor of interpretations of it that only serve to mask knowledge that is actually worldly in nature and not heavenly. The jihadist reading of politics through the lens of a revealed narrative makes it necessary to "save" Islam from the political ambiguities that religiously imperfect rule casts on the certainty of religious knowledge. Jihadism is not merely a religious form of violent protest against global and local injustices but more so a battle for the supremacy of religious knowledge over secular processes. By linking the efficacy of religious knowledge to political supremacy, al-Qaeda limits the expression of piety to fighting until victory (i.e., God's word prevails over the world) or death in the way of God (i.e., martyrdom) as a noble way of exiting from a wayward world.

However, in both past and present, Muslims generally have been wary of calls for religiously perfect rule. Perfection (kamāl) is the affair of the hidden realm, a spiritual quest that ennobles one's character but is not achievable by political means. Figures claiming to be the Mahdi, the figure who will deliver the world from injustice at the end of time, occasionally appear, especially when Islam is seen to be in peril, holding out the hope of quasi-divine rule. But Mahdism has limited effectiveness and often causes more harm than good. The deeper reason behind Muslim wariness of religious rule is that governance has no revealed status. Those learned in religion, such as Mawardi, discussed earlier, did write on governance (siyāsa), but they never made it integral to shari'a (i.e., as a recognized branch of fiqh literature). This did not mean that there were no standards for rule. The preservation of the worldly interests of the umma (e.g., protection of life and property, suppression of rebels and brigands) were foremost among the expectations of rule in Islam. A genre known as "counsel-for-rulers" served as a premodern form of political constitution, but this genre, as noted earlier, drew on multiple sources of knowledge. Because governance was never a recognized part of religious knowledge, Muslims, in general, suspend (or postpone) judgment when faced with rule that fails to conform fully to God's decrees. The exercise of power is judged against worldly standards (i.e., preservation of public order), and this may include the promotion of religious knowledge as a public good, but rule, in the end, is not evaluated in terms of religious knowledge exclusively.

This position, long held in Sunni Islam, is partly traceable to the so-called people of postponement (al-murji'a), who refused to judge the religious status of 'Ali or Mu'awiya on the basis of their governance of the umma. The Shi'a, too, while making leadership integral to religion, would also adopt a position of political accommodation. Following the Battle of Siffin, the proto-Shi'a responded to Kharijism by awarding religious authority (wilāya) to 'Ali as leader of the community. This idea, that a specially endowed human figure had a privileged role in ensuring the religious integrity of the community, eventually translated into the expectation that in the presence of the imam, religious knowledge is not limited, making all things, including politics, religiously legitimate or illegitimate depending on the extent of its conformity to the command of the infallible leader. He could issue religious rulings for all affairs, including those in flux (economics, politics, warfare) as they arose with the confidence that it represented God's will and not only an approximation of it.

The absence of the imam (at least for the main branch of Shi'ism), beginning in the ninth century, did not mean that the Shi'a were bereft of religious knowledge but only that its scope was limited to those areas, such as rituals and morals, where God's rulings do not change, in contrast to politics, which is always in flux. As a result, political affairs cannot be religiously determined in the absence of the imam. This encouraged Shi'i authorities, like their Sunni counterparts, to refrain from making decisive judgments about political action in the name of Islam, since religious knowledge in the imam's absence was limited and offered no clear indications for the ever-changing affairs of governance. For this reason the rise of constitutionalism in Muslim lands, beginning in the late 19th century, caused a good deal of confusion. Was it religiously legitimate? The traditional indifference to the nature of rule, so long as it served its purpose (i.e., the preservation of order), meant that Sunni and Shi'i authorities would take a wide range of positions on democracy, provided it did not threaten the integrity of religious knowledge as guidance for society.

However, modernity's challenge to the truth of religious knowledge, even in its limited domains, made it necessary to rethink the relation of religious knowledge to politics. In the past, the political order, sultans and shahs, posed no essential threat to religious knowledge. Dynasts were happy to patronize religion in exchange for recognition. Islam has generally respected the autonomy of secular knowledge in its own spheres, such as astronomy, geography, and medicine (i.e., outside the realm of rituals and morals; there has also been a long heritage of humanistic ethics alongside shari'a rulings). Leading scholars, notably Ghazali (d. 1111), sought to harmonize the philosophical life of the mind with the otherworldly orientation of religion. But the modernist claim that only secular knowledge has a claim on truth posed a profound challenge to Islam in public life. In reaction, some religious figures claimed that religious knowledge had relevance for all areas of life, including those not traditionally included within the scope of religious knowledge, such as economics and politics.

There have been many attempts to extend religious knowledge more assertively into the political domain. One way has been via "the goals of religion" (maqāṣid al-dīn). This approach, which seeks to cull the overall purpose of shari'a from amid its voluminous and sometimes contradictory precedents, works to bring a religious perspective to areas of life for which no explicit ruling, based on a clear precedent, exists. In this fashion, religious authorities are able to extend their voices to emergent domains not previously treated in shari'a. For example, Qaradawi takes this position, leaving it to the judgment of the leader (ra'y al-imām) to determine the public interest in areas where religious knowledge is silent but requiring him to do so in light of maqāṣid al-dīn that only religious scholars can verify. Abu Yusuf (d. 798), one of the early shari'a masters, also recognized the authority of the leader's judgment, but he did not qualify it as Qaradawi does, simply leaving it to the ruler to do what he sees best for Muslims so long as his command does not contradict the clear rulings of God.

It is true that past scholars, such as Ghazali and also his teacher, Juwayni (d. 1085), would define public interest (maṣlaha) in terms of shari'a considerations. In contrast to Qaradawi, however, this emerged not from a desire to link political affairs wholly to religious knowledge (or at least its broader intentions) but rather out of a concern for the corruption of religious learning. The perception that few could claim mastery of religious knowledge in all its details caused profound concern for the likes of Ghazali and Juwayni. How could one be certain that the umma is still guided by truth? The two figures realized that for religious knowledge to be preserved intact, one could no longer count on religious scholars. It would be necessary to construct a "rational" system where the essence of shari'a, defined as "the universal interests" (al-maṣāliḥ al-kulliyya) of Muslim society, could be known and preserved in spite of the decline of religious expertise. The point, then, is that such premodern attempts to define public interests in terms of maqāṣid al-dīn were motivated by scholarly anxieties and not the desire to construct a political system out of religious knowledge as in the modern context.

The Politics of Religious Diversity

The fact that premodern scholars had different motives than those of today is not to suggest that Muslim thinkers of the past did not think systematically about the relation of religious knowledge to politics, only that they did so for different reasons than those motivating Islamism today. There has always been tension between the truths of religious knowledge and the political realities that are ideally to embody these truths but fail to do so. This tension can be compounded by competing definitions of Islam, a confessional pluralism that sometimes lends itself to communal conflict and even political strife. How are doubts about religious knowledge to be repelled when not all believers have the same understanding of religious knowledge? One way is violent attack against those who do not espouse one's own understanding of religious knowledge. Another is to reconsider the demands of religious knowledge within wider philosophical and theological categories.

The philosopher Farabi (d. 950) was one of the first to move in this direction. His political works should not be seen simply as Greek thought in Arabic but rather as cogent response to the sectarian fragmentation of Islam. He formulated a metacommunal conception of truth that can embrace multiple confessions. In this way, political legitimacy is not based on a simple implementation of religious knowledge in literal form. The particular wordings of religion, in other words, the specific beliefs and laws of a community (milla), while important for day-to-day life, are only the imitation of higher truths of a philosophical kind. They are not true in themselves since truth is determinable only by demonstrable proof via philosophical method. Religion cannot be so defended since it is composed of images (e.g., fires of hell, rivers of paradise) that are rhetorical and so cannot attain the rank of certain knowledge. Thus the particular wordings of religion are true insofar as they are consistent with demonstrably proven truths (e.g., happiness as the ultimate goal of life). Thus community-specific knowledge, such as shari'a, while valuable for its role in holding the milla together, is relative next to allegedly higher forms of knowledge that only the philosophical elite can attain, making it futile to fight and spill blood on behalf of religiocommunal knowledge, which, again, is not truth but only the imitation of it.

Another philosopher of the period, Abu al-Hasan al-'Amiri (d. 992), argued for the priority of religiocommunal knowledge (milla) over philosophical knowledge (ḥikma). Because milla provides norms for the details of human life, it effectively holds a polity together more so than ḥikma, which offers only abstract truths. Still, even if revealed knowledge stands above its nonrevealed counterpart, the former still exists for a rational goal—namely, the political good. Thus the particular wordings of milla are to be applied only in light of the greater interests of the polity. Thus, in the words of 'Amiri, the intellect is God's caliph on Earth. The idea that the law of God exists for a rationally identifiable purpose—namely, for the common good of Muslim society—rather than simply as a test of the believer's obedience would climax in the thought of Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi (d. 1388), a jurist of the Maliki branch of Islam, who would draw on the various intellectual streams of Islam in advancing a rational understanding of shari'a at the service of the human needs of Muslim society.

Contrast this, for example, with the Muslim Brotherhood, a transnational group that in Egypt is known to set the religiocommunal specifics of Islam above national harmony. 'Amiri places religiocommunal knowledge, at least as far as its public role is concerned, at the service of political ends, whereas the Muslim Brotherhood reverses this, identifying political ends more closely with religiocommunal knowledge. The Muslim Brotherhood sees political empowerment (tamkīn) as the logical consequence of the religious mission (da'wa). The Muslim Brotherhood, it should be added, does not see violence as a means to power. Its approach to power is gradualist through political mobilization, not warfare, but unlike 'Amiri, it would identify the constitution of the polity with shari'a rather than a secular good in which Muslims can enact their religiocommunal obligations.

A final example in this regard is Ghazali, who sought to systematize all branches of knowledge, both religious and secular, by orienting them to a common goal—namely, awareness of the other world (ākhira, i.e., the world beyond this one). He also sought to defend the truth of religious knowledge in a confessionally divided community where various groups with different interpretations of religious knowledge competed for social dominance. Ghazali was less sanguine about a political solution for the religious dilemma than his teacher, Juwayni, who proposed in his political treatise, Ghiyath al-Umam (Salvation of the nations), that Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092), the celebrated Seljuq vizier, enforce public conformity to the truths of religious knowledge by the sword if necessary. In this, Juwayni hoped to eliminate the doctrinal contradictions from one Muslim group to another that confounded all claims to truth.

Despite his misgivings about the political defense of religious truth, Ghazali was no esotericist. He refused to reduce religiocommunal knowledge to philosophical categories. He was committed to the particular wordings of religious knowledge as well as political interests that the intellect might determine. He shared his teacher's concern that religious knowledge be visibly represented even if worldly powers could not be counted on to do so. In turning to the idea of brotherhood (ukhuwwa)—in other words, spiritual brotherhood—he did not intend to uproot Muslims from the realities of the world but to create a space apart where they could live as a brotherhood in God and, in turn, more perfectly witness the life of Islam to the world around them. The idea of religious brotherhood is Qur'anic (e.g., 3:103), and spiritual companionship (suḥba) was prominent in Islam before Ghazali, but he deployed such concepts as a way to show the efficacy of religious knowledge in Islam when it was no longer unambiguously effective in the political domain.

Rather than seeking "proof" of the truth of Islam in a strongman who would back it, Ghazali looked to religious brotherhood as a way to present the truth of Islam to society, as suggested by his inclusion of a section in his magnum opus (The Revivification of the Religious Sciences) on "The Ethics of Harmony, Brotherhood, Companionship, and Affection." In his view, religious brotherhood demonstrates that the religious integrity of the umma—and thus the efficacy of its religiocommunal knowledge—remained intact even amid the corruption of the age and shortcomings of Islam's political and religious leadership.

Religious Knowledge and the Modern State

The battle for the enduring relevance of religious knowledge marks every age of Islam. In the modern context, it is as much a political endeavor as a scholarly one. In this sense, it is no longer clear where religious knowledge begins and political authority ends. One example is the work of Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (executed by Saddam Hussein in 1980). Faced with a political context that assumed secular knowledge as the exclusive guide to life, Sadr countered with the claim that religion could define all aspects of life, including those areas that religious life traditionally does not define. Sadr referred to those areas as "the empty region" (manṭiqat al-farāgh)—that is, the legislative void that results from the imam's absence.

He first made reference to the idea of filling the void in a work on Islamic economics published in 1961, Our Economics. But the idea continued to occupy his attention and was featured in Islam Leads Life, a treatise he wrote shortly after the Iranian Revolution of 1979 that would leave its mark on the constitution of the Islamic Republic. His thinking differs from that of the Muslim Brotherhood. He does not view rule as a simple means to safeguard religion. Rather, knowledge in Islam consists not only of specific rulings (ahkām; e.g., no interest, no deceptive business practices) but also of concepts (mafāhīm) that inform all areas of Muslim life, even those that pertain to society as a whole.

For example, in addition to rulings that forbid interest and deception, Islam also contains a narrative: God created the world and entrusted it to humans, who are to care for it and make it prosper, justly and righteously. The Qur'an encourages humans to enjoy the fruit of God's creation but discourages the hoarding of wealth. For Sadr, this worldview embodies principles that can be applied to economic matters: consumption, production, capital, labor, and so on. Indeed, the religious heritage—both revealed texts and scholarly treatises—contains a wealth of principles applicable to contemporary life. The void (again, the legislative void that results from the imam's absence) could thus be filled and the Shi'a could once again live Islam to its full as if the imam were present. They would not have to succumb to Western systems of life simply for want of a total system of knowledge of their own making.

It is left to those in command (ulā al-amr, a highly exploited Qur'anic phrase) to issue rulings pertinent to the governance of society. These rulings are not fixed and permanent, as if revealed by God, since new situations arise, but they could not be left to the interests of the elite. For Sadr, the gross shortcomings of worldly systems, capitalism and communism, only demonstrated the need for a divinely ordained system of governance to ensure justice and brotherly relations based on devotion to God. Islam has a philosophy of its own, embedded in the religious heritage; its concepts—equity and liberation from exploitation, ignorance, and tyranny—could dynamically engage the nation's affairs entirely. In other words, Islam could engender a religious polity.

Such a polity, governed by the principles of Islam, requires not merely rule by Islam but the involvement of the jurist (faqīh), who alone possesses the qualifications to guarantee the process. The exact role that the faqīh is to play in the polity is a matter of tremendous debate. Khomeini, for his part, claimed that the faqīh is to hold the reins of power, but how is such a figure to be checked when he is the imam's representative? Such concerns were less compelling to Sadr than the need to restore society on the basis of monotheism, where people would be free of oppression, harmonious, and productive. But he also acknowledged that such a project did not depend on legislation alone. The citizens needed to be educated in the virtues of Islam in order to be willingly ruled by its principles. Sadr was favorably disposed to democracy but cautioned against its manipulation by partisan interests; democracy needed to be "corrected" by Islam. The parliament would thus need the oversight of the faqīh.

Sadr sought to bring ethical standards to areas of life that in the modern age were the cause of great concern, especially economics and politics. By greatly expanding the boundaries of religious knowledge, however, Sadr unintentionally opened the door to the politics of religious supremacy. In his view, since Islam was a total system, Muslims could only be Muslim if ruled by Islam. Religiously undetermined areas of life could now become religiously determined by virtue of the concepts alongside the precedents of the religious heritage.

All of this has created a troubled legacy for Shi'ism, and various figures have tried to nuance or deflate Khomeini's idea of governance by the faqīh. However, while this idea has been significantly undermined, Sadr's notion of filling the legislative void in Islam in the absence of the imam has had lasting influence on such groups as Hizbullah. One can debate whether the supreme leader in Iran is fully qualified to fill the void, but it is more difficult to argue that life in all its aspects should not be guided by some measure of truth. Is it all relative? Are the world's resources simply up for grabs for the powerful to take all? Intense discussions on the nature of truth in Iran have important political implications. Those who say that heaven should rule can look to Sadr for inspiration: if not addressed, the void will be exploited by the powerful, and society will be governed by the law of the jungle, where might is right. Truth must be brought to bear on the void, and where else to find truth than in God's revelation, and only the faqīh fully comprehends what God has revealed. In this sense, politics becomes quasi-apocalyptic, as was the case with Khomeini. It was also the case with President Mahmoud Ahmedinejad, who was not a shari'a scholar but claimed to implement the truths of Islam, obviating the voice of the people. Long the preserve of scholarly circles, religious authority is now also a function of worldly criteria, political astuteness and the willingness to use force to bring about rule by religion. Religion is unbound, making economics and politics, and ultimately power, integral to divine favor since religion now applies to those areas no less than to rituals and morals.

Religious Knowledge as Guidance for Society

Despite the ascendancy of Islamism, many Muslims, even within Islamist circles, no longer define the state in terms of divine sovereignty but rather as "the civil state" (al-dawla al-madaniyya), where religious and secular knowledge are equally at play (religio-secular knowledge) in determining what is best for the polity. This shift in terminology comes from the conclusion—reached after a sometimes painful learning process—that the notion of a religious state is actually contrary to the teachings of Islam (and can justify the abuse of power in the name of religion): no individual can pretend to represent divine sovereignty.

If religious knowledge is, then, a question not only of prestige and power but also of truth, it is worth asking what this truth is in a secular age. The response will vary according to sociopolitical circumstances, but the truth of religious knowledge is not simply a matter of historical contingency. The knowledge that Islam offers to society can be described as a tightly regulated economy of rights (huqūq) owed to others, both to God and to fellow humans, and even to oneself. God has the right to be worshipped, as embodied in various ritual duties, but has also revealed sanctions against theft, adultery (and false accusation of adultery), alcohol consumption, and pillaging. Believers who commit such crimes will have to pay the penalty either in this world or the next. There is also the possibility that God will "cover over" (satr) people's sins in His mercy (raḥma). The Prophet Muhammad is thought to have embodied this "godly" character as a model ruler. He ensured justice and righteousness but was also known for a willingness to forgo retribution for a greater moral purpose—namely, peace in society. Members of society also have duties to one another, and God has forbidden Muslims from transgressing the life, property, and dignity of others unless there is just cause (e.g., if the person is a murderer and is judged to deserve death or is an unrepentant blasphemer who wages war against religion). Spouses have duties to one another and to their children. Society as a whole has a duty to care for the weak and poor, and relations between individuals are to be guided by justice; in other words, everyone gets his or her due, especially when it comes to commercial relations. Islam therefore places great emphasis on keeping promises and fulfilling contracts. When obligations are not met, justice can be sought, but there is also the possibility of acting mercifully toward others in imitation of the Prophet. Rulers are to be obeyed so long as they do not transgress the rights of God and of His slaves (i.e., humans). This could imply just rule or rule that does not offend the morality of Islam or, at a minimum, rule that does not prevent believers from performing their ritual duties (i.e., praying or fasting).

How, then, is such religious knowledge relevant to modern society? The case of Syria is illustrative. Few concepts have greater resonance in Syria—and throughout Arab society—than ḥaqq, a complex term meaning "right" in the sense of something owed to others (in the plural, it can refer to human rights, or ḥuqūq al-insān). In Syria, it features especially in commerce and, in principle, is the measure of virtually all relations. Syria has its poor, but it is acknowledged that they have their ḥaqq (i.e., a morsel of food is owed to them). To be sure, ḥaqq is not always realized and can be ignored, for example, by some entrepreneurs who exploit the dismal job market by arbitrarily deciding how much to pay employees at the end of the month.

Still, it is always a point of reference: "the ḥaqq is on you" (al-ḥaqq ʿalayka, i.e., you owe something); "it's her ḥaqq to do so" (ḥaqqhā taʿmal hayk); "he has no ḥaqq in the matter" (mā ilhu ḥaqq fil-amr). It is sometimes defined as just treatment of others. An entire segment of a talk show might be devoted to the ḥaqq of the wife in marriage. As a concept, it guides all commercial activity. Someone may have to pay a bribe to achieve an objective but can preserve his or her moral integrity by declaring it to be without ḥaqq. Some associate the concept with democracy, but it is not a precise match. It is not about everyone having an equal say in policy making (although it is not opposed to the idea) but about preserving a just balance in society. People make decisions in accordance with their interests (as well as their hope for familial and societal acceptance) but are limited by the framework of ḥaqq—what is owed to them and what they owe others. They may forgo what is owed them, but this must be by choice and not forced, as an act of magnanimity, generosity, charity, or simply a desire to please God. This is commonly called forbearance (tasāmuh). Those who have offended others might ask for this forbearance.

The point is that moral life in Syria (and elsewhere) is still guided by a framework that is ultimately based on religious knowledge, despite the ascendancy of secular politics. The point is not to enthrone the voice of God as national sovereign, although that remains a goal of some Islamists in Syria. Religion works with or without the state. That is, Islam need not be politically supreme, but beliefs are not suspended outside the mosque. They are present in the public sphere, not necessarily in explicitly religious categories but as universal values, justice and mercy, which in Syria (and elsewhere) are channeled by religious knowledge. Religious knowledge, encoding ethical standards, thus remains vital for the moral coherency of society, especially but not only when the state and its institutions show little commitment to these standards.

In this sense, those with traditional expertise in religious knowledge continue to play a central role in the dissemination of values that hold society together, but the means of doing so differ from one community to another. For example, residents in a district of Damascus known as Rukn al-Din show appreciation for religious figures who are not only learned in shariʿa but also graced with a holy character. The devotion to them is not a slight on the monotheism of Islam but comes from the realization that these figures make piety and morality available to others by modeling it in their own persons. They are key agents in the process of making the community pleasing to God. Some may look to them in this sense as intercessional figures, caring for the community on behalf of the Prophet. This type of piety is noticeable in religious ceremonies that combine dhikr (i.e., group recollection of the names of God), public readings of hadiths, and collective chanting in praise of the Prophet. Such ceremonies are often "sponsored" by one of these revered figures, to whom obeisance, such as hand kissing, is sometimes shown. His presence grants the ceremony its aura, making him focal point and agent of ethical solidarity and communal harmony as well as piety. This kind of religiosity, partly classifiable as Sufism, is integral to Syrian piety in particular and to Islam in general. Damascenes are proud of their "saints," which the heritage refers to as God's confederates (awliyā' Allāh). They, not the state, guarantee the religion and mediate its ethically productive knowledge, even long-dead figures such as Shaykh Arslan, the 12th-century holy man and patron saint of Damascus who continues to be remembered as "the protector of piety in Syria" (ḥāmī al-birr bi-l-shām).

In another section of Damascus, Maydan, there is similar appreciation for traditional religion, although with less emphasis on saintly intercessors and more on the preservation of the values of Islam against the encroachment of secularism. The custodians of religious knowledge in Maydan are known for a highly conservative piety unaffected by the ways of the world. They may harbor greater hostility toward the secular state than their counterparts in Rukn al-Din, but they too do not expect the state to be the guarantor of religion. What disturbs them is the spread of immorality and irreligion, which they attribute to the state as the prime seller of vice. This may make them more favorable toward Islamism, but it does not lead them to tie the validity of religious knowledge to its political implementation: The "rights of God" can be respected within communities of piety apart from state enforcement of them. Rather, they feel that the preservation of public decency requires greater acknowledgment of Islam as guide of the nation, and they would like the state to provide this acknowledgment. In particular, in addition to justice, they would like to see greater support of a public morality associated with the rulings of shari'a, such as a ban on alcohol consumption, punishment for sexual crime (i.e., adultery), and strict regulation of gender relations.

Mediators of traditional religious knowledge, whether in Rukn al-Din, Maydan, or elsewhere, also play a role at "secular" ceremonies, such as weddings and funerals, where their presence is seen as a blessing and a reminder of the higher purpose of life. This role, along with teaching and preaching (and also counseling troubled marriages), is seen as part of the work of reforming society (iṣlāḥ al-mujtamā'), which proceeds irrespective of the character or policies of the state. Here, then, the religiomoral character of society is guaranteed by the traditional custodians of religious knowledge, not the state.

At the same time, it should not be thought that such "traditional" figures are against Islamism. Islamist and non-Islamist sentiment can and does overlap within a single religious milieu. Purveyors of traditional forms of piety, the shaykhs are united with Islamists against secularism. They too are not happy with rule by 'Alawi "heretics," but the shaykhs are able to coexist with an authoritarian and ideologically secular state in a way Islamism cannot. Moreover, as promoters of a religiosity that does not depend on political power for its success, the shaykhs also temper the "urgency" of the Islamist call. True to traditional Islam, the shaykhs offer the state passive support in exchange for freedom to promulgate religious knowledge on their own terms (in contrast to the state-defined version of Islam as taught in the national schools that tends to feed into a glorification of Pan-Arabism). They are confident that the morals of Islam will prevail over state ideology, and so they prefer teaching, preaching, and guiding to political confrontation, which, they maintain, only hurts the cause of Islam.

The shaykhs generally agree that Islam can effectively pursue its ends apart from party politics—and may be better off by avoiding it. They would support the Muslim Brotherhood if it came to power through free and fair elections but not if it took the power by force. This posture is not simply political caution. It comes from the widely recognized belief that piety is worthless if coerced and that such top-down attempts to coerce piety inevitably lead to strife (fitna), producing more harm than good for Muslim society. Their commitment to Islam as a guide to society is not simplistic but is qualified by the means used to pursue the goal: teaching and preaching that seeks to refine both individual souls and society as a whole in the virtues of religion. A state also guided by Islam, in their view, will help achieve the purpose of politics (i.e., the common good) but rule by Islam cannot be pursued at the cost of the common good itself, and, moreover, care must be taken to protect the religion itself from too close an association with worldly power.

There is, then, a broad consensus in this multipolar religious milieu that religious knowledge has a role in society. This, however, does not necessarily translate into a call for a political party to represent Islam. Sunni authorities in parliament have called occasionally and discretely for Islam-based but not Islamist political parties. This is not for the sake of Islamist ends but rather to preserve the moral integrity of Islam that, these members of parliament argue, is at risk when political actors, untrained in Islam, call for the overthrow of the state in the name of religion, reducing Islam to militancy. Religious knowledge is represented in public as a moral voice, not as a political party, since allowing parties to form in the name of Islam would only lead to its fragmentation into partisan interests. The Ba'thist state, amid its own crisis of legitimacy, is encouraging this type of religiosity: a vibrant Sunnism, active in educational and cultural spheres, teaching Islam for the sake of morals but not as a political project.

Religion has flourished in early 21st-century Syria. People are familiar with the writings of respected scholars, such as Muhammad Sa'id Ramadan al-Buti and Wahba al-Zuhayli, who defend traditional religious knowledge in terms that are understandable to all and not only to religious specialists. Pious literature exists in many forms—from scholarly treatises to popular stories of the prophets—and is the most widely read genre of literature in Syria. Modernist voices, such as Ratib al-Nablusi and Muhammad al-Habash, promote an "updated" version of Islam in harmony with science, pluralism, and human rights. The shari'a faculty at the University of Damascus trains the future religious establishment, and virtually all students there are taught that Sufism is an integral part of religious knowledge. Religious personalities from outside Syria, such as Qaradawi and Yemeni spiritual entrepreneur Habib 'Ali al-Jafri, have visited Syria. Some shaykhs have websites, from the more Sufi-oriented site of 'Abd al-Hadi Kharsa, an eloquent defender of Sufism against Wahhabism, to that of 'Ala al-Din al-Za'tari, a member of the state ministry of religious affairs who has brought a religious viewpoint to a wide range of ethical issues, from economics to hypocrisy.

But is this religious knowledge any more than a way to preserve the prestige of the traditional religious establishment? In the early 2000s, Damascus, to focus on one city, was known, among many things, as a regional center for sex tourism. Employment opportunities were limited. Prices were on the rise, partly due to the influx of Iraqi refugees but also as a result of immigration from Syrian villages. The state sought to extract revenues from all economic activity, and its institutions were hives of corruption, which state leaders tried to combat, at least rhetorically, to defend themselves from being implicated in it. The economic woes heightened concern for self-preservation, and urbanization encouraged the erosion of clan ties and neighborly solidarity (although social relations remained strong in principle). Caution, if not mistrust, was increasingly the norm in interpersonal relations. There is a creeping individualism, not in the sense of people doing as they please in public but in reduced expectations of support from others in society. Many religious leaders privately blamed the rampant vice they observed on the state's introduction of secular ways, which they saw as a pollutant to the city's reputation for piety and honesty—"honorable Damascus," long known for attracting both religious scholars and merchants. They concluded that the economic misery was due to the loss of morality that followed the abandonment of "the dear principles of Islam."

In such a context, where the state is clearly not the moral leader and nongovernmental organizations do not exist, the values of religion become all the more important for the sake of moral coherence in society. Despite the realities, religion was alive and well, maintaining standards of ethics that allowed society to function and, indeed, to exist. For example, a sandwich shop in the Halbuni section of Damascus displayed a hadith in full view of its clients that speaks of God's protection and provision, making the point that one should be satisfied and respond gratefully by fulfilling duties to God. Across from the main entrance to the University of Damascus, recitation of the Qur'an resounded from a newspaper kiosk, offering perspective, and perhaps a moral reminder, at a highly congested intersection. Down the road a bit, beyond the Baramika traffic circle, a motor-oil store displayed a banner referring to the Prophet as a mercy for the universe. A 15-minute walk from there, in a mosque named after 'Ammar b. Yasir, Companion of the Prophet, in a middle-class neighborhood called Bikhtiyar, children sat in groups at the feet of middle-aged volunteer mentors, memorizing the Qur'an and imbibing the values of Islam. Just a bit farther, at a mosque at the Kafarsusa Circle, children were dropped off throughout the day for religious instruction.

The Sunni community in Damascus, then, and throughout Syria, as well as other communities in their own way, have cultivated something of a parallel society, alongside and in interaction with state institutions and categories. Allegiance to the nation is not undermined by religious commitments (and Ba'thists, members of the state party, are not necessarily atheists). There is, however, a concern to preserve the Sunni identity of Damascus through the deployment of religious symbols in the urban setting along with religious instruction in mosques. The prestige of the Sunni community in the face of the Ba'thist challenge is at stake, and this can spill over into politics. More significant than control of "politics" (in the sense of state institutions—including national legislation), however, is the claim to moral custodianship of urban life, in Damascus and elsewhere. Alongside the communal interests of Sunnism, then, there is aspiration, particularly acute in the current conditions described earlier, for righteousness in society.

This is the point; the place of religious knowledge in society is not simply about prestige and power. The details given from the particular example of Syria illustrate a deeper trend in Muslim society that modern scholarship has tended to explain in terms of structures of control. Religious knowledge exists to ensure a moral life that is traceable to prophetic origins and has demonstrable worth for the well-being of society; it is this twofold nature of religious knowledge that makes it a credible source of true information for guiding life. The truth of religious knowledge today may be less oriented to its sound transmission and more to its demonstrable worth for society, but even by this "modern" criterion, the facts on the ground suggest that religious knowledge remains a strong contender for the mantle of truth.

See also authority; education; shari'a; traditional political thought

Further Reading

Farid al-Ansari, al-Bayan al-Da'wi wa-Zahirat al-Tadakhkhum al-Siyasi, 2003; Dale F. Eickelman, Knowledge and Power in Morocco: The Education of a Twentieth-Century Notable, 1985; Wael Hallaq, "Caliphs, Jurists, and the Saljuqs in the Political Thought of Juwayni," Muslim World 74, no. 1 (1984); Muhammad Al-Hamdawi, al-Risaliyya fi al-'Amal al-Islami, 2008; Paul L. Heck, "Doubts about the Religious Community (Milla) in al-Farabi and the Brethren of Purity," in In the Age of al-Farabi: Arabic Philosophy in the 4th/10th Century, edited by P. Adamson, 2008; Idem, "Eschatological Scripturalism and the End of Community: The Case of Early Kharijism," Archiv für Religionswissenschaft 7 (2005); Kai Kress, Philosophizing in Mombasa: Knowledge, Islam, and Intellectual Practice on the Swahili Coast, 2007; Brinkley Messick, The Calligraphic State: Textual Domination and History in a Muslim Society, 1993; Barbara Daly Metcalf, Islamic Revival in British India: Deoband, 1860–1900, 1982; Felicitas Opwis, "Maslaha in Contemporary Legal Theory," Islamic Law and Society 12, no. 2 (2005); Paulo Pinto, "Sufism and the Political Economy of Morality in Syria," in Sufism and Politics: The Power of Spirituality, edited by Paul L. Heck, 2006; Franz Rosenthal, Knowledge Triumphant: The Concept of Knowledge in Medieval Islam, 1970; Yoginder Singh Sikand, The Origins and Development of Tablighi Jama'at (1920–2000): A Cross-Country Comparative Study, 2002; Thierry Zarcone, La Turquie moderne et l'islam, 2004.

PAUL L. HECK

leadership

Leadership in Islamic societies is firmly tied to two concepts, imāma and khilāfa. Imāma indicates the religious guidance a leader is expected to provide the Muslim community, deriving first and foremost from his ability to lead the community in prayer. Khilāfa refers broadly to the temporal aspects of leadership, central to which is maintaining the unity and internal harmony of the community. Implicit in both terms is the recognition that leadership in Islamic societies is subordinate to the dictates of the shari'a. The standard exposition of leadership is found in the Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government) of Mawardi (d. 1058). This well-known treatise on governance provides the locus classicus for the Sunni doctrine of leadership, a principal feature of which is the obligation to establish a single leader of the Muslim community. Views that allow for more than one claimant to the position of supreme leadership over the Muslim community, or that would authorize more than one leader of the community on the basis of extreme distance or separation by sea, are characterized as heterodox.

Qualifications for leadership of the Prophet Muhammad community include descent from the tribe of the Prophet Muhammad (nasab), knowledge of the law ('ilm), moral probity ('adāla), majority (rushd), and ability to carry out the duties of the office (qudra). This latter qualification encompasses such responsibilities as enforcing the law and settling disputes; dispensing legal punishments; maintaining peace in the lands under Islamic rule; conducting jihad to expand the realm of the faith; receiving alms, taxes, and war booty; and appointing trustworthy men ('udūl) to positions of authority and administration. Of equal importance is the duty of the leader to command the right and forbid the wrong and to protect the Muslim community from errant belief, a point that has proved particularly contentious in Islamic history and has at several turns placed the unity of Muslims in jeopardy.

Attaining leadership of the community is carried out through either designation by a predecessor ('ahd) or selection by a group of electors (ikhtiyār). The body of electors is commonly referred to as ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd (those who loosen and bind), a designation with origins in early Arabian rituals accompanying the conclusion of pacts, truces, and agreements, and is typically composed of the prominent members of the community ('ayān) considered fit to choose a leader by virtue of their discernment and moral integrity. The number of electors that constitute this body varies, but it is widely held that their decision is binding on the community as a whole. The choice made by these notables results in the "most virtuous" figure (al-afḍal) assuming leadership; it has been conceded, however, that a "lesser" individual (al-mafḍūl) may be chosen if qualified. This distinction corresponds historically with the changing nature of leadership of the Muslim community from the time of the Prophet and the Rightly Guided Caliphs (632–61), held up as exemplary leaders beyond reproach, and their successors, the character of whose rule more closely approximated worldly kingship (mulk) and was often despotic in practice.

Notables took an oath of enduring loyalty (bay'a) in support of the newly chosen leader. Considerable importance was attached to public ceremonies surrounding the pledging of the oath, and this tradition survives in Morocco, where the pledging of loyalty to the monarch is attended with great pomp and ceremony. This act of near indissoluble fealty to the leader of the Muslim community can in theory be rescinded only if the leader suffers mental or physical incapacitation or, in the opinion of certain groups (the Kharijis most notably), if he is found guilty of immorality, oppressive rule, or errant belief. There is general agreement concerning the obligation of the community to remove an unjust leader, but the precise mechanism for doing so has never been fully articulated, and it is commonly held that the oath pledged to a leader is forfeit only upon death.

The khilāfa was effectively dismantled in 1924, and much thinking since then has centered on the means for restoring and adapting the institution to the modern world. The institution of shūrā, or a government run by consultation modeled on the pattern of the Rightly Guided Caliphs, has also been set forth as an acceptable form of leadership in the absence of the khilāfa.

See also authority; caliph, caliphate

Further Reading

Thomas Arnold, The Caliphate, 1924; Patricia Crone, God's Rule, 2004; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph, 1986; Hamilton A. R. Gibb, "Some Considerations on the Sunni Theory of the Caliphate," in Archives du Droit Oriental 3 (1939); Abu al-Hasan al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government, 1996; E. A. Salem, Political Theory and Institutions of the Khawārij, 1956; Émile Tyan, Institutions du droit public musulman, 1956.

RUSSELL HOPLEY

Lebanon

Lebanon is an Arab country on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, bordering on Syria to the north and east and Israel to the south. The etymology of the name is a matter of dispute, like almost every other aspect of Lebanon's history and culture: it is usually linked to the color white in reference to the snowy mountains of Lebanon. The country is a modern creation, although ultra-Lebanese nationalists insist that the country extends far back in history to the times of the Phoenicians. The founding myth of Lebanon was devised early in the 20th century by Lebanese Maronite intellectuals with close ties to the French government and to the Maronite patriarchate, which wanted to separate its constituency from its Arab/Muslim surroundings after the demise of the Ottoman Empire. The country was created as an attempt to replicate the Jewish state in Palestine, but the French (the rulers of the area after World War I) decided that the viability of Lebanon as a political entity required the addition of territories outside of Mount Lebanon (the historic "homeland" of the Maronites). Those territories (including the greater Beirut area, the south, the north, and the Beqaa Valley) increased the number of Muslims in the new political entity and prevented the creation of an outright Christian republic—which was the demand of the Maronite patriarch at the peace conference in Paris. Thus the French created the Republic of Lebanon after World War I, putting an end to four centuries of Ottoman control over the Levant.

From the inception, the Lebanese split along sectarian and political lines over the identity and foreign policy of the new country: many Muslim Lebanese wanted unity with Syria (and later with other Arab countries during the heyday of Arab nationalism), and many Christians wanted a distinct entity with Western links. The constitution of Lebanon in 1926 recognized that sectarianism was at the heart of the Lebanese political system and society, and the state recognized citizens on the basis of their membership in the juridically recognized sects.

During the era of the French Mandate, when France ruled over Lebanon in association with a reliable political elite, a census was arranged to ensure the political dominance of the Maronites: other sects in the country were treated as secondary in public offices and posts. The political elite produced the unwritten "National Pact" in 1943 to achieve a modicum of understanding between the Sunni and Maronite elites. It reserved the top posts of government for the Maronites, and the prime ministership was awarded to the Sunnis (while the weaker post of speaker of parliament was given to the Shi'is, who would become the largest single sect in the country by 1975).

The arrival of Palestinian refugees into Lebanon after 1948 added an important factor that would radicalize the Lebanese body politic. Furthermore, tensions increased after Lebanon's independence in 1943. Many Muslims resented the National Pact, especially as their percentage in the population increased substantially, while secular Lebanese resented the sectarian basis of the political system and the domineering role of the clerics of all sects. The civil war of 1958 was a rehearsal for the major, protracted civil war that erupted in 1975 and continued until 1989, when Lebanese politicians produced the Ta'if Accords, which redistributed political power in the country in favor of the Council of Ministers, limiting the powers of the Maronite president. It took into consideration the new demographics and the military results of the civil war, which were not in favor of Christian militias. Lebanon entered an era of relative calm in the 1990s, but the assassination of Sunni prime minister Rafiq Hariri in 2005 and the Israeli war on Lebanon in 2006 increased tensions, even among the Muslims themselves.

In its contemporary history, Lebanon has suffered from Syrian political and military intervention and from successive Israeli invasions and occupations of Lebanese territories. Lebanon has a relatively open press and political system compared to those of neighboring Arab countries. It has survived a century of existence as a political entity, but its future remains uncertain.

See also colonialism; Hizbullah

Further Reading

Michael Hudson, The Precarious Republic, 1968; As'ad AbuKhalil, Historical Dictionary of Lebanon, 1998; Usamah Maqdisi, The Culture of Sectarianism, 2000; Augustus Richard Norton, Hezbollah: A Short History, 2007; Kamal Salibi, A House of Many Mansions, 1990; Fawwaz Traboulsi, A History of Modern Lebanon, 2007.

AS'AD ABUKHALIL

liberalism

Islamic liberalism grew out of the Islamic modernist movement of the 19th century. While modernism claimed that Islamic faith was compatible with a wide variety of European institutions, including technologies and administrative apparatuses, liberalism focused on a narrower set of norms relating to the Western liberal tradition, especially democracy, human rights, gender equality, and intercommunal harmony. Not every Muslim liberal adopted the entire package of Western liberalism, and many resented the term "liberal," which they associated with the hypocrisies of European imperialism. Nonetheless, the label of liberalism encapsulates a coherent and ongoing segment of Islamic political thought.

The first phase of liberal Islamic thought, from the middle of the 19th century to the first decades of the 20th century, treated liberal ideals as divinely revealed requirements. One of the most common liberal Islamic justifications for democratic reforms, the Qur'anic verse "and seek their counsel in the matter" (3:159) was pioneered at this time by Ottoman reformer Namık Kemal (1840–88). Early victories of these movements included constitutional documents in Egypt (1860, 1882), Tunisia (1861), and the Ottoman Empire (1876). These constitutional structures offered limited avenues for democratic political participation, even by the standards of restricted suffrage then in force in Western Europe. Only in the early 20th century did liberal Islamic movements manage to institute more meaningful democratic reforms. Tatar and Turkish modernists participated in the Russian revolution of 1905, which led to the first parliamentary elections in the Russian empire. Iranians followed with the Mashrutiyyat, or Constitutional Revolution, of 1906, and Ottomans with the İkinci Meşrütiyet, or Second Constitutional Revolution, in 1908. In each of these cases, the prerogatives of the monarch were circumscribed by elected representatives, though suffrage was still strictly limited. Parallel movements arose but failed to take power in several other Muslim-majority states, including Afghanistan, Bukhara, and Khiva. Like the earlier constitutional experiments, these semidemocratic interludes were soon undermined. However, their legacy of political institutions and aspirations was adopted by authoritarian modernizing elites, as well as by anticolonial movements with modernist ideals.

Beginning in the 1920s, as Islamic modernism splintered into hostile camps, Islamic liberalism took shape as an independent movement seeking to reconcile Islamic faith and modern liberal norms such as democracy and human rights. This decolonization phase pioneered a new form of liberal Islamic reasoning, exemplified by the Egyptian ʿAlī ʿAbd al-Raziq (1888–1966), who argued in the 1920s that Islamic sources left methods of governance for humans to devise. The Prophet Muhammad "was not a king nor the founder of a state, nor did he seek to rule," wrote ʿAbd al-Raziq, and by extension no other Muslims could claim an Islamic mandate for their form of government. Over the following decades, liberal Islamic movements engaged in similar arguments during the constitutional debates following decolonization. Liberal Islamic movements succeeded in creating partially democratic postcolonial states in several countries, including Indonesia and Pakistan, where competitive elections were held and civil legal systems were instituted. By the end of the 1970s, however, liberal Islamic politics had been suppressed by authoritarian governments in many Muslim societies. In Indonesia and Pakistan, for example, democratic experiments were overturned by military coups d'état.

In the 1980s, even as Islamic revivalism captured headlines, liberal Islamic movements began to revive as well, with a new liberal Islamic approach emerging simultaneously and independently in numerous Muslim societies at this time. According to this reasoning, all interpretations of the sacred sources, including one's own, are viewed as partial and fallible. In the words of Abdolkarim Soroush, a leading Iranian intellectual, "Religion is divine, but its interpretation is thoroughly human and this-worldly." Soroush's writings were among the inspirations for the Iranian reform movement, which won landslides in Iran's 1997 presidential election, as well as parliamentary elections in 1998 and elections for city councils in 1999, before being suppressed by illiberal factions. Elsewhere, too, liberal Islamic thought was linked with democratic and social reform. In Turkey, the Welfare Party reorganized itself as a liberal Islamic movement, committing itself to democratic procedures and pressing for membership in the European Union, recognition of Kurdish minority identities, and human rights limitations on the military. In Indonesia, liberal Islamic movements actively engaged in democratic political competition after the return of democracy in 1999, criticizing other Islamic parties for their failure to stand up to communal violence. In Malaysia, former fans of the Iranian revolution such as Anwar Ibrahim, a leading Islamic politician, helped to organize the Reformasi movement, the first Internet campaign for civil liberties in a Muslim society, which drew hundreds of thousands of hits from the well-wired Malay middle classes. In Egypt and several other Arab countries, the Muslim Brotherhood and its offshoots embraced pluralistic norms with more or less clarity and force.

Liberalism's opponents have long denounced it as un-Islamic. Derviş Vahdeti (1870–1909), founder of an Islamist movement in the Ottoman Empire, denounced liberals in 1909 as "cucumber people": "To expect religion from those who don't know their religion and have no Islamic training is like extracting oil from a cucumber." Almost a century later, in 2005, the Indonesian Ulama Council declared "liberal Islam" to be harām (religiously impermissible), and Salih al-Fawzan, a senior Islamic scholar in Saudi Arabia, issued a fatwa against liberal Islam in 2007: "He who says, 'I am a liberal Muslim,' contradicts himself." Those who advocate such a position "should repent unto God in order to become truly Muslim." Notwithstanding these critiques, Muslims frequently view Islamic piety as consistent with liberal ideals. Surveys in the early 21st century consistently found large majorities of Muslims favoring democracy. Where a variety of Islamic movements have been permitted to contest elections, as in Indonesia and Kuwait, liberal Islamic candidates consistently outpolled more militant Islamists. Calls for revolutionary violence as a duty incumbent upon every individual Muslim have fallen on deaf ears, hence the minuscule portion of the world's billion Muslims who have engaged in such acts.

See also freedom; modernism; modernity

Further Reading

Michaelle L. Browers, Democracy and Civil Society in Arab Political Thought, 2006; Mehran Kamrava, ed., The New Voices of Islam: Rethinking Politics and Modernity: A Reader, 2006; Charles Kurzman, ed., Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook, 1998; Abdolkarim Soroush, Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam: Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush, translated by Mahmoud Sadri and Ahmad Sadri, 2000.

CHARLES KURZMAN

liberation theology

Liberation theology privileges the perspective of the poor and considers transformation of social orders the central theological task. It stresses human liberation from all forms of oppression: social, political, economic, religious, racial, and environmental. Latin American liberation theology focuses on social, political, and economic oppression; South African liberation theology focuses on racism; and Asian liberation theology focuses on issues surrounding religious pluralism. According to Gustavo Gutiérrez (b. 1928), a key theorist, theology is a second act; praxis and contemplation are the first. Liberation theology is a new method of theology that transcends mere exposition and emerges from a context of lived oppression.

Vatican II (1962 onward) and the 1968 Medellin Conference in Colombia formalized liberation theology, reflecting a trend in Catholic social teaching that began with Rerum Novarum, an encyclical issued by Leo XIII in 1891 on the "Condition of Labour," and continued with landmark papal encyclicals in the 1960s. These encyclicals emphasized social justice, church and state as liberating forces for the poor and the oppressed, and workers' rights. They also affirmed the responsibilities of richer nations for the welfare of poorer ones and denounced unbridled capitalism. In 1967, a group of bishops from Latin America, Asia, and Africa wrote "A Letter to the Peoples of the Third World," which declared that revolution was a legitimate means to combat injustice and pointed fingers at the wealthy as instigators of violence. The Medellin Conference focused squarely on the church's role in the sociopolitics of Latin America and gave birth to the central tenet of liberation theology: "a preferential option for the poor." "The poor" was a broad term that included races and ethnicities suffering racism and women doubly exploited for being poor and for being women. Christian Base Communities appeared in the 1970s as the base of grassroots political action for faith as a liberating force. Since the 1990s, new perspectives have moved the discourse beyond economics and sociology. Women, indigenous peoples, and blacks speak of the broader "option for the excluded" and address topics of racism, culture, indigenous non-Christian spirituality, and nonpatriarchal ecclesiology. Other nontraditional subjects include ecology and interreligious dialogue.

Muslim theologians have only recently adopted the explicit terminology of liberation theology developed in Christian contexts. However, theologians like Shabbir Akhtar (b. 1960) and Asghar Ali Engineer (b. 1939) argue that the Qur'anic approach is fundamentally one of liberation, and they take inspiration from the Prophet Muhammad and his community as exemplifying struggle against injustice. Akhtar declares liberation theology an "Islamization of Christianity." Arguing the necessity for political religion, he claims that the political dimension of Islam was present from the inception of Muhammad's career. Akhtar argues that religion must engage with political power because of a moral responsibility to do so and because it is a natural human pursuit that should be regulated rather than wished away. He contrasts the "effective passivity [of Christianity] in the face of gross injustice" to the Qur'an's "morally constrained political action." He criticizes Christian thinkers for acknowledging the social dimensions of individual evil while proposing solutions only at the individual level, in contrast to Muslim thinkers, who address evil at a structural level. Engineer argues that Muhammad's movement stressed liberation from ignorance, superstition, and injustice through the power of reason and the pursuit of knowledge but that the Qur'anic spirit was lost once these ideas became merely subjects for theological reflection. Engineer emphasizes compassion as a central Qur'anic value and argues that warfare is legitimate only if fought on compassionate grounds to protect the rights of the oppressed and exploited. He identifies Sufi theology, with its focus on spiritual praxis, as closer to the heart of the people.

Irfan Omar argues that 19th- and 20th-century Muslim revivalist movements, which began as anticolonial struggles for economic and political liberation and self-determination, can be viewed through the lens of liberation theology. For example, Afghani (d. 1897), like many contemporary liberation theologians, divided the world into two categories: oppressor and oppressed. While anticolonial movements attempted to revive the political authority of Islam, postcolonial movements call for liberation from dependency on the West and resist Western military hegemony and adventurism, nationalism, cultural globalization, and economic liberalism. In an essay in Miguel A. De La Torre's The Hope of Liberation in World Religions, Omar argues that many of these movements can be counted as theologies because they "acknowledge the divine dispensation in how and what they set out to achieve." They include Palestinian theologies of liberation in the nonviolent intifada of the 1980s, as well as the more recent stand taken by African and Asian Muslims against globalization. They can also include the "Islamization of knowledge" movement, which integrates Qur'anically based epistemologies and ethical constraints into secular Western intellectual tools, categories, and modes of analysis.

These same movements also seek the liberation of Muslims from within by using Qur'an-based reasoning to analyze Muslim societies. 'Ali Shari'ati (1933–77) embraced socialist trends within the Qur'anic message and posited tawhid (unity of God) as a perfect means to implement this, while Hizbullah's Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah (1935–2010) criticized metaphysical discussions of justice that ignored realities like unjust rulers. Transnational groups include the Abu Dharr Collective, which articulates a theology of social justice, and the Muslim Peace Fellowship, which is devoted to the theory and practice of Islamic nonviolence. Akin to the Christian tradition, the insights of liberation theology have been applied much more broadly to issues of race, gender, and religious pluralism, equally influenced by Muhammad's example. The South African Farid Esack (b. 1959) seeks an Islam committed to contemporary progressive values and, more particularly, a South African Islam committed to the disempowered. His theology is founded on an alternative hermeneutical approach to the Qur'an that emphasizes praxis as the ultimate source of doctrinal orientation and stresses the historicity of and human experience behind the text while maintaining its universality and relevance for contemporary Muslims. Esack infuses his "horizon" as a South African Muslim under apartheid into the "Qur'anic horizon" to rediscover the text's identification with the oppressed and its embrace of pluralism. Hamid Dabashi argues for a postcivilizational period in global conflict and explores post-Islamist responses to these new configurations of power. He articulates liberation theology as an attempt by those who have been denied a say in politics to democratize their voice, and he explores alternative resources for a politics of liberation, which include artistic movements like Iranian cinema and the ta'ziya, a Shi'i passion play, as a central performance of Islam as protest religion. Inspired by Malcolm X (1925–65), Dabashi stresses that an effective Islamic liberation theodicy must offer a solution to the disenfranchised in the heart of the "empire" (the United States) beyond an offer of conversion to Islam. Sherman Jackson, professor and scholar of law and Afro-American studies and a leading theological voice among American Muslims, addresses racial dimensions by seeking Qur'anic foundations for the protest agenda of black religion. Critiquing scholarship on the black American experience that denies the oppressor-oppressed paradigm, he explores the theological debate on black suffering through the lens of the Sunni tradition and argues that this tradition grants human beings agency in improving their condition. The Muslim feminist scholar Amina Wadud argues that women can be liberated through the Qur'anic text itself; though the prior texts of predominantly male Qur'an interpreters excluded women's experience, revisiting the text from a woman's perspective opens vast possibilities for nuanced approaches to gender. Another Muslim feminist scholar, Kecia Ali, rethinks Islamic sexual ethics to accommodate values of meaningful consent and mutuality, which she posits as crucial for a just ethics of sexuality, and gives precedence to wider Qur'anic principles of justice rather than specific "time-bound" commands.

See also apartheid; Malcolm X (1925–65); nonviolence

Further Reading

Shabbir Akhtar, The Final Imperative: An Islamic Theology of Liberation, 1991; Kecia Ali, Sexual Ethics and Islam, 2006; Hamid Dabashi, Islamic Liberation Theology: Resisting the Empire, 2008; Miguel A. De La Torre, The Hope of Liberation in World Religions, 2008; Asghar Ali Engineer, Islam and Liberation Theology: Essays on Liberative Elements in Islam, 1990; Farid Esack, Quran, Liberation and Pluralism: An Islamic Perspective of Interreligious Solidarity against Oppression, 1997; Sherman Jackson, Islam and the Problem of Black Suffering, 2009; Amina Wadud, Quran and Woman: Rereading the Sacred Text from a Woman's Perspective, 1999.

HOMAYRA ZIAD

libertarianism

Libertarianism is a tradition in Western political philosophy that emphasizes choice and political freedom from state coercion over other values such as equality. In one variant, libertarian thought approaches anarcho-syndicalism, promoting social organization that eliminates the state altogether. Another variant, minarchism, emphasizes a necessary minimal role for the state, such as the protection of basic rights and collective defense. Minarchist libertarianism, defined as the idea that the political authority of the central state apparatus should be constrained to certain necessary functions for preserving social choice, has notable parallels in Islamic tradition.

Minarchism and libertarianism are not labels that are widely associated with Islamic political thought. The word "libertarianism" evokes acceptance of social behaviors unfettered by common standards of decency or morality. Yet minarchist libertarianism's resonance with Islamic tradition comes from its emphasis on preserving the moral autonomy of the individual and collective grouping and protecting society from tyrannies and coercion by the state as well as nonstate actors.

A key Qur'anic injunction regarding religious choice reads, "Let there be no compulsion in religion" (Q. 2:256), which suggests that individuals cannot be coerced into religious observance. Choosing Islam, or submitting to the will of God, requires the opportunity to choose otherwise. State coercion can remove that choice and thus reduce the possibility of genuine submission by those in society. Numerous injunctions against spying, and a high bar for proving guilt in serious infractions of religious law, provide significant scope for individual choice without state interference.

Islamic law arguably developed in conscious opposition to the state as prominent scholarly authorities cultivated distance from political power. This is encapsulated in the failed Abbasid attempt to impose a Mu'tazili hegemony on Islamic interpretation. Furthermore, fiqh, the attempt to understand shari'a (Islamic law), has produced often-divergent rulings. The plurality of Islamic fiqh positions suggests that no single approach can be codified into public law without detracting from other approaches. This is represented by the traditional closing line in the fatwa (religious opinion) literature, "And God knows best," suggesting that the author does not presume to speak for God but rather offers a fallible opinion on an interpretative matter.

Particular claims to what constitutes an "Islamic" approach to state-society relations, despite the hegemonic aspirations of advocates, have been unsuccessful in gaining unanimous or high-majority support. There is no equivalent of the Roman Catholic pope (and the institutional structure provided by bishops), who can claim to definitively pronounce judgment on religious matters in most Islamic communities. The universal clerisy assumed in the Islamic context, as well as the normative practice that represents juristic legal opinions as fallible, suggests that respect for plural interpretation is built into Islamic tradition. Minarchist libertarianism offers a vision of a state that tries to safeguard such plurality through nonendorsement of specific doctrines. Ironically, the effort to assert a pluralism-respecting central state can itself be a totalizing claim about what state-society relations are most "Islamic."

Much of contemporary Islamic political activism seems inclined toward the statist direction, in which the Islamic state is presumed to endorse a comprehensive doctrinal position codifying Islamic guidance into public law. This is notable in the platforms of Hizb ut Tahrir al-Islami (Islamic Liberation Party), the Jama'at-i Islami of Pakistan, and some branches of the Muslim Brotherhood. The opposite position—that the role of the central state should be restricted as much as possible—appears to have few takers, and there are relatively few self-proclaimed Islamic libertarians.

In practice, some approaches carrying the libertarian label are difficult to distinguish from liberal perspectives. One element that separates the two is that libertarian polities can potentially incorporate large numbers of illiberal constituents. This is partly because the libertarian approach is better placed to recognize the rights of plural social groupings as well as the rights of individuals. While a neat solution to the problem of reconciling individual and collective rights has not emerged, traditional norms of respect for interpretative choice suggest that plural groupings may coexist in an Islamic context.

See also collective obligations; freedom; jurisprudence; pluralism and tolerance

Further Reading

Saba Mahmood, "Is Liberalism Islam's Only Answer?" in Islam and the Challenge to Democracy, edited by J. Cohen and D. Chasman, 2004; Anas Malik, "Challenging Dominance: Symbols, Institutions, and Vulnerabilities in Minarchist Political Islam," The Muslim World 98, no. 4 (2008).

ANAS MALIK

loyalty

Loyalty is sustaining one's obligations toward friends, allies, patrons, clients, rulers, and groups. Various Arabic terms translate to "loyalty" or "fealty," reflecting a range of possible objects: God; other human beings; political and religious groups; and those higher, lower, or equal in the social hierarchy.

One such term is walāya (allegiance), from the verb wālā (also tawallā), meaning to affiliate with or declare loyalty to someone. In early Islamic sources, the implications of allegiance to an imam (e.g., Ibn al-Zubayr's allegiance to 'Uthman's party) are not merely political but eschatological. Early Islamic walāya thus differs from the walā' or ḥilf (covenant or alliance, frequently by oath) of pre-Islamic Arabia. One of the hallmarks of the early Islamic polity was the redirection of loyalty from individuals or kin groups toward the community of believers (the umma): people whom one might not know personally but with whom one nonetheless shared ties that transcended blood or politics. The muhājirūn of the early Islamic period or the supporters of 'Ali b. Abi Talib (Shi'at 'Ali) similarly shared this kind of ideologically based group solidarity; this was later famously described by Ibn Khaldun as 'aṣabiyya (loyalty to the group).

Classical Islamic sources refer to both formal and informal loyalties, and the difference between the two is historically significant. Eighth-century jurists theorized walā', which means patronage or clientele (the term itself being Janus-faced, literally meaning "proximity"), to be a formal, legal relationship that allowed non-Arabs to become Muslim by attaching themselves to an Arab-Muslim patron. This became the main mechanism of conversion and manumission during the Umayyad period. In principle, walā' was contracted between the individual who had converted and the Muslim patron who had converted him, but in practice, it entailed loyalty to the entire community of believers; as a social instrument, it thus staked out a middle ground between group solidarity (and its corollary, separatism) and reciprocity, making new social alliances possible and enabling increasing numbers of people to join the umma.

But one of the main effects of the Abbasid revolution was to extend the privileges formerly reserved for Arabs to non-Arab Muslims. Those privileges included a role in politics and at court. Walā' thus became unnecessary as a legal arrangement, and in the early Abbasid era, its legal obligations and prerogatives metamorphosed into a loose arrangement of patronage instead. The Abbasid house came to rely on its own clients—in the formal sense (those whom they had personally manumitted) and in the informal sense (those whose careers they had fostered through favors and benefactions)—for administration (the imperial bureaucracy), security (the palace guard and other military), and ideological legitimacy (supporters throughout the realm, often styled as mawlā amīr al-mu'minīn, or "client of the Commander of the Faithful," though it is difficult to know at what point this was no longer meant in the technical legal sense). In the ninth century, clients of the caliphal household came to hold governorships and other high-ranking positions and to form a distinct group at court, and eventually, entire armies came into being through walā'—the origins of the slave-soldier institution that dominated the Near East until the 19th century.

Uses of the terms walā' and mawlā, and the loyalties they represented, ramified as court culture, trade, and commerce burgeoned. The sources reflect the kinds of reciprocal exchanges that constituted political loyalty but also a pervasive consciousness of the obligatory nature of loyalty; its component parts were spelled out clearly only in moments when it risked severance. (Severance of ties of loyalty is often indicated with the noun barā'a, meaning "disavowal," or the verb tabarra'a min, meaning "declaring oneself free of.")

Another term related to loyalty is birr, which in the Qur'an means piety or devotion to God (2:177). In later sources, it comes to mean benefaction or reverence and thus to indicate two separate sides of human relationships of loyalty. Terms such as 'ahd (pact, covenant, obligation, commitment) and dhimām (patronage), in literary and documentary texts from the post-Qur'anic period, likewise reflect the pervasiveness of loyalty and breaches of loyalty in politics and social relations. One also finds covenantal imagery invoked by 'ahd (also 'aqd, or contract) applied to people nearly equal in station, while dhimām reflects hierarchical relations. Similarly, ni'ma in the Qur'an is a divine benefaction for which thanks and loyalty are due but later expands its semantic range to human relationships, in which it describes a favor granted by a patron. As God requires thanks and piety for benefactions, so, too, is loyalty to human benefactors an obligation understood to be imposed through ni'ma.

Formal and informal or individual and group loyalty were not, in practice, always separately conceived. The Mamluks, for instance, were procured, educated, and emancipated by an ustādh (master) to whom they remained affectively loyal and to whom they were also formally attached via walā', and the Mamluks' individual bonds of loyalty produced group solidarity, described as khushdāshiyya.

See also civil war; family; obedience; tribalism

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought (God's Rule), 2004; Eadem, Roman, Provincial and Islamic Law: The Origins of the Islamic Patronate, 1987; Roy Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society, [1980] 2001.

MARINA RUSTOW

M

madrasa

The term "madrasa" derives from an Arabic verb meaning "to learn" or "to study." In modern Arabic, madrasa means simply "school," although in Muslim communities throughout the world, it has recently been used to indicate institutions often established and run by revivalist and politicized organizations and offering a religious curriculum distinct from and in competition with those associated with government schools. In classical usage, however, The term "madrasa" had a more precise meaning, indicating schools devoted to instruction in the Islamic religious sciences, especially fiqh, or Islamic law.

The madrasa was a specifically Islamic institution and had no direct relationship with pre-Islamic religious or educational establishments in the Middle East (although one theory has suggested that the earliest madrasas in Khurasan and Central Asia may have been modeled on the Buddhist vihara [monastery]). Consequently, the madrasa was a product of, rather than a contributor to, the fully formed Islamic tradition.

Education in Early Islam

Two developments in particular were preconditions to the appearance of the madrasa. The first was the emergence of the 'ulama', the self-conscious community of scholars devoted both personally and, in some sense, professionally to the transmission of the Islamic religious sciences. Like Judaism, Islam is a religion of the book and of learning, and the 'ulama' function within Islam in a manner not dissimilar to that of the Jewish rabbis. Religious knowledge in Islam is known as 'ilm and consists of interlocking discursive traditions preserving and interpreting the scriptural foundations of the faith, specifically the Qur'an and the hadith (accounts of the words and deeds of the Prophet Muhammad and his Companions). The emergence of the 'ulama' and of the intellectual traditions that lie at the root of their identity have not yet been systematically traced but had begun to develop by the end of the seventh century at the latest. By the ninth century, those traditions were firmly in place, and the 'ulama' had emerged as a prominent social group. The second development was the coalescence of the principal schools (madhāhib, sing. madhhab) of Sunni law between the eighth and tenth centuries—"school" here designating a community of intellectual discourse rather than an institution. With this development, law emerged as the most important of the Islamic religious sciences.

The premadrasa history of Islamic education has not yet been fully documented. Preliminary study of the Qur'an and the Arabic language took place either in the home or in primary schools (maktab, kuttab). At more advanced levels, instruction generally occurred in mosques, where scholars sat with their students for lectures, directed reading, and structured discussions and disputations of academic questions. In some mosques, particularly larger and more prominent ones and especially in Baghdad, the capital of the Islamic empire from the mid-eighth century, scholars might receive formal teaching appointments from the caliphs. Individual mosques might also benefit from endowments established by individuals as acts of charity, the income from which might be used to support instruction and learning. But absent a formal structure of educational institutions, the transmission of religious knowledge remained a fundamentally informal affair, regulated by personal relationships between teachers and pupils and networks of scholars in the various religious disciplines. That personal and informal character remained a hallmark of Islamic religious and legal education even after the advent of the madrasa.

Emergence and Development of the Madrasa

The madrasa as a distinctive institution, supported by endowments and devoted to instruction in Islamic law, first appeared in Khurasan in the tenth century. During the following centuries, the madrasa spread westward into Iran, Iraq, and Syria and became one of the most common institutions in the cities of the medieval Islamic world. Many madrasas, and virtually all the largest and most famous, were built and endowed by sultans or other leading political figures. Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092), for example, the vizier to several Seljuq sultans, established madrasas that bore his name in Nishapur and other cities, including the particularly large Nizamiyya Madrasa in Baghdad, which was completed in 1067. Sultans Nur al-Din b. Zangi (d. 1174) and Salah al-Din Yusuf al-Ayyubi (Saladin, d. 1193) subsequently constructed many madrasas in the territories under their control as a part of their campaign to revitalize the Sunni world in the face of threats from militant Shi'ism and European Crusaders. Under the Mamluks, who ruled over Egypt and Syria from the mid-13th to the early 16th century, the spread of madrasas continued. By the 15th century, for example, the city of Cairo had more than 100 such institutions. Timur Lang (commonly known as Tamerlane; d. 1405) and his successors in Central Asia, the Ottomans in Anatolia and the Balkans, and the various Muslim dynasties that ruled over North India from the 13th century on also built and endowed madrasas to support instruction in the Islamic religious sciences.

There was considerable variety in the physical and institutional form of the madrasa. The term "madrasa" has been translated as "college," but that is a bit misleading, as madrasas were nothing like the medieval European institutions that evolved into modern universities. The madrasa itself was simply a building providing space for lessons, as well as accommodations for students and sometimes also for their professors. More important was the endowment (waqf) that supported the madrasa's activities. Typically, the endowment would fund salaries for one or more professors and stipends for students, as well as funds to support a diverse array of support staff, including cooks, cleaners, and guards, among others. Since many madrasas also functioned as mosques and were, in fact, often indistinguishable from them, the staff hired through the madrasa's endowment might also include prayer leaders, preachers, muezzins, and Qu'ran readers who served the spiritual needs of students as well as of others who used it as a place of worship. The classical madrasa was devoted to the study of law according to one of the four madhhabs: the Hanafi, Maliki, Shafi'i, and Hanbali schools of law. However, in 1234, the caliph al-Mustansir (r. 1226–42) founded a madrasa in Baghdad that provided support for professors and students in all four madhhabs, as well as classes in the Qur'an and hadith, and this became a common pattern, at least among the larger madrasas founded thereafter. As Sufism spread among the 'ulama' during the later Middle Ages, mystical devotions also became routine in the madrasas of the Middle East, and Sufi convents (variously known as khānaqāhs, ribāts, or zāwiyas) began to offer courses in subjects such as law—in other words, to function as madrasas.

As George Makdisi, the pioneering modern historian of the madrasa, has pointed out, the madrasa was fundamentally a private institution. A madrasa was created as the result of an individual act of charity; it was not in any sense a public or "official" institution. Nonetheless, most madrasas were founded by sultans and other members of the ruling elite, if only because they had greater access to the large concentrations of wealth necessary to build and endow a school. Consequently, the spread of madrasas in the Middle Ages had important political dimensions. For example, the Ghazanvid sultans who ruled over the area of modern Afghanistan founded a series of madrasas as part of their campaign to Islamize the mountainous region of Ghur, the population of which resisted conversion into the tenth century. More generally, the foundation of institutions devoted to the transmission of Islamic religious knowledge offered rulers an opportunity to cultivate better relations with the 'ulama'. This was important, since most of the regimes that dominated much of the Middle East and South Asia in the medieval period were suspect according to the terms of Islamic law. The various sultans exercised authority that rightfully belonged to the caliph, and many of them came to power by violent means. Moreover, the predominantly Turkish warriors who formed the ruling elites in Egypt, Syria, India, and elsewhere frequently behaved in decidedly un-Islamic ways. The construction of madrasas offered these soldiers and sultans a chance to legitimate their rule in the eyes of the principal guardians of the Islamic tradition.

At first, the spread of madrasas had little impact on the curriculum or the procedures of Islamic education. The personal model, in which individual scholars supervised, evaluated, and attested to the accomplishments of their students, remained in place. Student mastery of a text or subject was guaranteed by the ijāza, the personal certification of an individual teacher, rather than by any system of institutional degrees. The proliferation of endowed institutions of education did, however, have major consequences for the social organization and authority of the 'ulama'. By providing stipends for students, the madrasa may have expanded the social reach of education by making it possible for larger pools of students to devote themselves to the transmission of Islamic learning. The increased number of paid professorships also solidified the social power of the leading religious scholars. An individual scholar might acquire appointments to several professorial "chairs" at the same time and appoint his friends, students, or relatives to substitute for him; he might also ensure that his own sons inherited the positions once he had died. Consequently, competition for these posts was often intense.

Modern Developments

Eventually, with the rise of more centralized governments in the early modern period, the madrasa was drawn more fully into the nexus of state power. Under the Ottomans, while madrasas were still created as acts of individual charity, they came to be controlled more tightly by political authorities. Professors and others became, in fact, employees of the Ottoman state, the institutions in which they taught were arranged in a hierarchical structure, and appointment to them was systematized and supervised by the sultan rather than left to the will of the individual founder or his heirs. Under the Ottomans, too, there was some regularization of the curriculum of the madrasas. That development was extended further by developments in India in the 18th and 19th centuries. Scholars at a center of learning in Lucknow (the Farangi Mahall) developed a clearly defined curriculum known as the Dars-i Nizami, and its prestige led it to be widely adopted by madrasas throughout India. Indeed, it had a broader influence throughout the Sunni Muslim world.

Later developments have separated modern madrasas even more from their medieval predecessors. Scholars at a madrasa at Deoband in India deliberately rejected the informal and personal model of classical Islamic education and developed a tightly defined organization and curriculum focusing especially on hadith. The Deoband madrasa became the model for thousands of others that were established throughout South Asia. Scholars belonging to the Deobandi network have seen themselves as playing a role in regularizing and homogenizing the religious life of Muslims. They include many teachers in madrasas that, in the late 20th and early 21st centuries, proliferated in Pakistan and elsewhere and have allegedly become a recruiting ground for radical Islamists—although it would be a serious mistake to see the Deobandi network as a whole as radical and politicized. The spread of Deobandi madrasas occurred at a moment of sharp decline of Muslim political power in India. Consequently, the Deobandi organization has been largely independent of the state. As such it stands in contrast to institutions of religious education in territories that formerly formed part of the Ottoman Empire—for example, Azhar University in Cairo—where the legacy of state control of the religious establishment has been more persistent.

See also Azhar University; Deobandis; education; endowment; jurisprudence; knowledge; mosque; Nizamiyya; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Jonathan Berkey, "Madrasas Medieval and Modern: Politics, Education, and the Problem of Muslim Identity," in Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, ed. Robert W. Hefner and Muhammad Qasim Zaman, 2006; Idem, The Transmission of Knowledge in Medieval Cairo: A Social History of Islamic Education, 1992; Michael Chamberlain, Knowledge and Social Practice in Damascus, 1190–1350, 1994; Daphna Ephrat, A Learned Society in Transition: The Sunni 'Ulama' of Eleventh-Century Baghdad, 2000; George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges: Institutions of Learning in Islam and the West, 1981; Barbara Daly Metcalf, Islamic Revival in British India: Deoband, 1860–1900, 1982.

JONATHAN P. BERKEY

Mahdi

The Mahdi, also known as Qa'im (mainly among Shi'is), is the Muslim messianic figure, and his title means "the one who is guided (rightly)." Although the title does not appear in the Qur'an and most of the traditions (hadith) concerning the Mahdi do not appear in the major canonical Sunni collections, there is no doubt of his significance for both Sunnis and Shi'is from the middle seventh century, when the title first appeared. There are, in effect, two Mahdis: (1) the idealized figure described in the hadith and apocalyptic traditions and (2) the political and historical figure who is usually the leader of a revolutionary group or sect.

Apocalyptic traditions concerning the Mahdi usually start out with the basis for his appeal, which is the idea that he will "fill the Earth with justice and righteousness, just as it has been filled with injustice and unrighteousness." Other qualities associated with the Mahdi are—in addition to justice—generosity, eloquence, ability to judge between non-Muslim groups by means of their own holy books, and military conquest.

Early in Islamic history, questions concerning the Mahdi essentially grew out of the struggle between various branches of the Quraysh for supremacy (including the Umayyads, the Abbasids, and the 'Alids). All these families emphasized or debated their relationship to the Prophet Muhammad as the basis for their legitimacy. Much of this discussion was projected into the question of who would be the Mahdi. In the end, the winners were the 'Alids, who had the best genealogical claim, although it was contested strongly by the Abbasids, and ultimately either Sunni or Shi'i Muslims came to see the former family as the rulers in the messianic future. There was a divide, however, between the Prophet's two grandsons, Hasan (d. 669) and Husayn (d. 680). Those who would ultimately become Shi'is (either Twelvers or Isma'ilis) held to Husayn's descendents, while by default the family of Hasan (eventually becoming the hereditary Sharifs of Mecca) were supported by the Sunnis. The Twelver Shi'i candidate for the role of the Mahdi disappeared into occultation in 873, and it is said that he will reveal himself at the end of the world and establish the messianic kingdom.

A minority strand of Sunni opinion held to the Mahdi not as a genealogical descendent of the Prophet Muhammad but as the best possible Muslim. This more egalitarian trend contributes to the appearance of Mahdi claimants throughout the non-Arab Muslim world even in the 21st century. The Mahdi claimants that have garnered the broadest support, however, have usually been Arab.

Most of the traditions concerning the Mahdi center on two further problems: his personal appearance, or how to identify him, and the location of his emergence as Mahdi. Both Sunni and Shi'i literature contain numerous detailed descriptions of the Mahdi. Naturally, that of the Sunnis is more varied and raises the question of whether the descriptions were of actual people. Presumably in order to weed out undesirable candidates, a series of portents, including heavenly communications, were added to these descriptions.

As for the location of his appearance, there are two irreconcilable families of traditions: Meccan-Medinan and Khurasan. The Meccan-Medinan family is probably dependent on the historical appearance of 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr—though he did not claim to be a Mahdi—in 683 and also probably on the revolt of Muhammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya in 762. In both cases, the messianic figure is made to take refuge in Mecca from an invading army, usually Syrian, and during this utter extremity God intervenes, leads the army to be swallowed up in the desert, and causes the Mahdi to be proclaimed. In other versions, the Mahdi simply proclaims himself from Mecca, usually at the Ka'ba, and then gathers an army with which he defeats all of his enemies.

The Khurasan family of traditions date to the Abbasid revolution (742–47) in which the Abbasid family used their support in the distant region of Khurasan—now eastern Iran, adjacent parts of Central Asia, and Afghanistan—to foment a revolution against the Umayyad dynasty ruling in Syria. As actually occurred in the revolution, the Mahdi's army is said to originate from this region, but it will not meet the messianic figure until the army has conquered the East and has arrived in Iraq.

A great many Muslim rulers or dynasties have either claimed as their founder a messianic figure or have used messianic titles and propaganda to strengthen the legitimacy of the dynasty. The earliest known "messianic figure" was apparently Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya (a son of 'Ali b. Abi Talib [d. 661] whose mother was not Fatima, the Prophet Muhammad's daughter), who was proclaimed by al-Mukhtar b. Abi 'Ubayd al-Thaqafi, a proto-Shi'i rebel in Kufa in 683 to 685. Ibn al-Hanafiyya did not necessarily push his own claims; they were made in his name, and there is no way of knowing what precisely the term madhi meant at this early date.

The Abbasids (747–1258) were apparently the first successful dynasty to use messianic titles (Mansur, Mahdi, etc.) for its rulers, at least for the first 50 years of the dynasty. As a result of this development, the founders of many other dynasties also took titles such as Mahdi, or if they were Shi'is, Qa'im. Examples include the Fatimids in North Africa (910–1171) and the founder of the Mahdawis (Almohads), Ibn Tumart (ca. 1080–1130). In India, the Mahdawiyya, founded by Sayyid Muhammad Jaunpuri (d. 1505), was an attempt to create a mass movement prior to 1591, and it survives to this day.

Many Mahdi figures are associated with purification movements in the Muslim world during the 18th and 19th centuries or with anticolonialist jihads. The best example of this type of Mahdi was the Sudanese Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdi, who revealed himself in 1881 and conquered Khartoum in 1885, founding a state that lasted until 1898. Some of these Mahdis were directed at Christian missionaries such as Ghulam Ahmad of India (d. 1908), who used messianic credentials to bolster his authority in anti-Christian polemic. Ultimately, Ghulam Ahmad's claims led to the Ahmadis being declared beyond the pale of Islam.

Shi'ism has had comparatively fewer claimants to be the Mahdi or Twelfth Imam, if for the reason that this figure is generally assumed to be in occultation. The Babi movement of the 1840s, however, resulted from messianic agitation at the 1,000-year anniversary of the Twelfth Imam's occultation and, as with the Ahmadis, led to the Babis (or Baha'is) leaving Islam altogether (Amanat, 1989).

Mahdi traditions have not been a major focus of contemporary Sunni apocalyptic literature. Since the Islamic revolution in Iran in 1979, however, Shi'is have increasingly highlighted the Mahdi (the Twelfth Imam), especially through his shrine located at Jamkaran, outside the holy city of Qum. Recently, Jamkaran and the foundations associated with it have generated a large number of publications detailing the messianic state and defending the belief that the Mahdi will soon appear. On the Sunni side, in order to avoid the political issues that stem from the Mahdi traditions, contemporary Sunnis have often focused on traditions that state that Jesus is the Mahdi.

Contemporary Mahdi claimants have usually been local rebels and have not generated much outside attention with the exception of the occupation of the Holy Mosque in Mecca in 1979 by the Saudi radical Juhayman al-'Utaybi and the somewhat mysterious Maitaisine movement in northern Nigeria the same year. The messianic impulse, however, stands behind a great deal of contemporary radical Muslim rhetoric.

See also messianism; revival and reform

Further Reading

Abbas Amanat, Resurrection and Renewal: The Making of the Babi Movement in Iran 1844–50, 1989; David Cook, Contemporary Muslim Apocalyptic Literature, 2005; Idem, Studies in Muslim Apocalyptic, 2002; Mercedes Garcia-Arenal, Messianism and Puritanical Reform: Mahdis of the Muslim West, 2006; J. Ketchichan, "Islamic Revivalism in Saudi Arabia," Muslim World 80 (1990).

DAVID COOK

Mahdi of the Sudan (1844–85)

Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdi (1844–85) was a Sudanese holy man who led a successful revolt from 1882 to 1885 against the Turco-Egyptian forces that had been occupying the Nilotic Sudan since 1821.

Muhammad Ahmad was born in the northern Sudanese province of Dongola in 1844 to parents who both claimed to be ashrāf, or descendants of the Prophet Muhammad. At a young age, he studied the Qur'an, followed by Islamic jurispradence, then Islamic mysticism, or Sufism, under the grandson of the founder of the Sammani order, Shaykh Muhammad Sharif Nur al-Da'im. In 1861, he requested the shaykh's permission to become one of his disciples and, his request granted, devoted himself to prayer and asceticism for seven years, after which the shaykh gave his disciple the license of shaykh of the Sammani order. This license gave him the opportunity to travel and engage in missionary work for the order and to return to his family in Khartoum and marry.

In 1871, Muhammad Ahmad emigrated to Aba Island in the White Nile and built a mosque and a school for the study of the Qur'an. His reputation for piety and asceticism became widespread, and many of the inhabitants of the island pledged allegiance to him and became his disciples. His former shaykh, Muhammad Sharif, visited Aba Island and ultimately settled in a village near the island. Shortly thereafter, however, the cordial relationship between the two men turned to one of animosity. As a result, Muhammad Ahmad professed allegiance to another important shaykh of the Sammani, Shaykh al-Qurashi b. al-Zayn. Qurashi's religious authority was at least on par with and perhaps even surpassed that of Muhammad Sharif. Meanwhile, the reputation of Muhammad Ahmad for piety and asceticism grew to such an extent that people from throughout the country traveled to Aba Island to seek his blessings and to request permission to join the ranks of his disciples.

Upon Qurashi's death in 1880, a majority of the adherents of the order agreed that Muhammad Ahmad should succeed the shaykh as leader. Muhammad Ahmad began traveling with his disciples to the western provinces of the Sudan, calling the people to remain steadfast in their adherence to the Qur'an and sunna of the Prophet Muhammad. During these travels he witnessed firsthand the discontent of the Sudanese masses with the Egyptian occupation, a discontent so great that many people asked Muhammad Ahmad if he was indeed al-mahdī al-muntaẓar (the anticipated deliverer) that would deliver them from the oppression of the Turco-Egyptian rule.

This rule, in the view of many Sudanese at the time, posed an economic threat because of the taxes levied against the populace as well as the abolition of the slave trade. The Mahdi, however, viewed the Turco-Egyptian occupation as a threat to the very sanctity of Islam in the Sudan. He was angered by what he viewed as a regression into unbelief and the preponderance of bid'a, innovations that he believed were brought by the Turco-Egyptian occupation to Islam. He called for a revivification of the faith and the expulsion of the occupying forces from the Sudan.

On August 12, 1881, the Turco-Egyptian administration in Khartoum dispatched a steamer with two companies of troops to Aba Island to arrest Muhammad Ahmad, but a battle ensued that set the stage for the Mahdist Revolt. Muhammad Ahmad succeeded in defeating the Turco-Egyptian forces in this battle, and by December 9, 1881, he had defeated all the Turco-Egyptian forces sent to apprehend him. Thereafter, he no longer hesitated to refer to himself as the Mahdi and took up the title khalīfat rasūl Allāh, "the Successor of God's Messenger." Furthermore, Muhammad Ahmad dispatched letters to several tribal shaykhs, summoning them to join him, proclaiming his victories and identifying the purpose of his mission as ending the Turkish occupation and establishing an Islamic state modeled after the nascent state in Medina during the time of the Prophet Muhammad. By early June 1883, the Mahdi had consolidated his power over all of southern Kordofan, defeating the Turco-Egyptian forces, and on January 26, 1885, his forces conquered Khartoum, the capital, spelling the end of Turco-Egyptian imperial presence in the Sudan. The Mahdi, however, did not live to see his vision of an Islamic state come to fruition: he died of typhus on June 22, 1885. Nonetheless, his vision of an Islamic state manifested itself under the leadership of his second-in-command and eventual successor, the Khalifa Abdallah al-Ta'ayishi.

The Mahdist state, founded in 1885, ended in 1898, when the British conquered the Sudan and established the Anglo-Egyptian condominium.

See also Mahdi; Sudan

Further Reading

Peter M. Holt, Mahdist State in the Sudan: A Study of its Origins, Development and Overthrow, 1958; Kim Searcy, The Formation of the Sudanese Mahdist State: Ceremony and Symbols of Authority, 1882–1898, 2010; A. B. Theobold, The Mahdiyya: A History of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, 1881–1899, 1965; Francis R. Wingate, Ten Years in the Mahdi's Camp: 1882–1892, 1895.

KIM SEARCY

Malaysia

Muslim political thought in Malaysia bears the unmistakable imprint of the country's turbulent ethnic politics. The Pangkor Treaty, signed in 1874, gave responsibility for the colony's foreign and political-economic affairs to the British but left control of "Malay religion and custom" to Muslim sultans. The colonial policy of noninterference in native cultural affairs greatly expanded the Malay sultans' religious authority and provided a strong precedent for the native administration's extensive intervention in Islamic affairs. Since Malaysian independence in 1957, that intervention included efforts to deepen the practice of Islam among Muslims and to convert nearly half of the country's non-Muslim population.

Until independence, Malay society remained largely rural and traditionalist. To provide labor for the colony's mines and plantations, the British imported tens of thousands of Indian and Chinese workers. By 1920, Malays accounted for just 50 percent of the colony's population and only 10 percent of its urban population. Ethnic competition, the neotraditionalist authority of the sultans, and the agrarian nature of Malay society all insured that Muslim political thought in the colonial period was more conservative and deferential to native elites than its Indonesian counterpart.

In postwar Malaysia, ethnic competition between Malays and non-Malays shaped Muslim political thought even further. Although in 1946 the British proposed to extend full citizenship rights to Chinese and Indian immigrants, the Malay leadership objected and successfully presented an alternative plan that maintained the authority of Malay rulers, made Malay the national language, and recognized Islam as the religion of state, albeit while granting formal religious freedoms to all citizens. The agreement also reserved the largest portion of civil service posts for Malays.

The United Malays National Organisation (UMNO), which remained the dominant party in the ruling coalition, emerged from these circumstances as the champion of Malay-Muslim interests. During its first years, the party leadership was dominated by British-educated aristocrats who had little interest in religious affairs. The first prime minister, Tunku Abdul Rahman, stated openly that Islam could not solve the country's problems. However, the rivalry between UMNO and its main Malay opponent, the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS, Parti Islam Se-Malaysia), gradually forced the UMNO leadership to change course and develop programs for state-supported Islamization. The administration of Mahathir Mohamed (r. 1981–2003) launched ambitious Islamization programs in law, banking, and higher education.

Founded in 1951, PAS long presented UMNO with its most serious challenge. During its early years, the PAS leadership pursued a largely ethnonationalist program. In 1963, however, the party called for the establishment of an Islamic state. The tension in the party between Islamic and ethnic appeals continued until 1982, when a young faction, dominated by Malay graduates of Middle Eastern colleges, ousted the senior PAS leadership. The new leadership spoke warmly of the Iranian Revolution and introduced policies to insure 'ulama' dominance in party affairs.

In 1982, Mahathir also responded to the PAS challenge by recruiting the most prominent of the student Islamists, Anwar Ibrahim (b. 1947), and assigning him responsibility for the government's Islamization initiatives. By the late 1990s, the charismatic Anwar had modified his views and become a spokesperson for a pluralist Muslim politics; he also seemed poised to succeed Mahathir as prime minister. However, during 1997–98, Anwar fell out with Mahathir and was imprisoned. The displeasure of Malay citizens at Anwar's harsh treatment led to significant electoral gains by the PAS-led opposition in December 1999 and March 2008.

In 2004 the new prime minister, Abdullah Ahmad Badawi (b. 1939), assumed the UMNO helm. The Badawi government made what it called "civilizational Islam" (Islām hadārī) a central element in its domestic and international platform. Borrowing a phrase from the medieval Arab historian Ibn Khaldun, Badawi's concept emphasized the need for Muslim moderation and forward-mindedness; it also underscored the necessity of collaboration across cultures rather than a clash of civilizations.

Islamic political thought in Malaysia long tended to display a more staid face than its Indonesian counterpart. But the country also suffered little of the paramilitarism or sectarian violence of its unsteady neighbor. Although theologically conservative, the PAS opposition abided by the rules of constitutional politics. In the early 21st century, there were signs that a new generation of Malaysian Muslim intellectuals was poised to play a more prominent role in global Muslim affairs.

See also Indonesia; Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS); Southeast Asia

Further Reading

Mona Abaza, Debates on Islam and Knowledge in Malaysia and Egypt, 2002; Virginia Hooker and Norani Othman, eds., Malaysia: Islam, Society and Politics, 2003; Hussin Mutalib, Islam and Ethnicity in Malay Politics, 1990; Farish A. Noor, Islam Embedded: The Historical Development of the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party PAS (1951–2003), 2004; Michael G. Peletz, Islamic Modern: Religious Courts and Cultural Politics in Malaysia, 2002; William R. Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 1994.

ROBERT W. HEFNER

Malcolm X (1925–65)

Malcolm X, born Malcolm Little on May 19, 1925, in Omaha, Nebraska, was the fourth child of Earl and Louise Norton Little. Both of his parents were ardent supporters of the Pan-African leader Marcus Garvey (1887–1940). Although Malcolm was probably too young to understand the deeper nuances and implications of Garvey's message, its major themes—African unity and liberation, commitment to the African "fatherland," and black economic self-sufficiency—would dominate Malcolm's career as both a religious leader and a political activist.

Assessing the public career of Malcolm X requires an examination of his segregationist, Nation of Islam period and his post-hajj period from April 1964 until his assassination a year later. Certain themes appear in both periods, such as his perception of a pervasive white supremacy that defined American race relations and caused the injustices faced by African Americans and his unwavering commitment to black liberation and self-sufficiency. His advocacy of black separatism and his demonizing of all whites as inherently evil "devils" are unique to the Nation of Islam period. His expressed humanism, symbolized by his reframing the race problem in America as a human rights problem, is unique to the post-hajj period.

The post-hajj period of Malcolm's life, from April 1964 to February 1965, was characterized by a dynamic interaction of ideas, leading many groups, ranging from socialists to black nationalists, to justifiably claim him as an embodiment of their particular ideas and agendas. The role that Islam played in defining his political thought in this period is neglected in scholarship. We know that Malcolm was devout and that a good portion of his second trip to the Middle East and Africa, from July to November 1964, was spent studying Islam at Egypt's Azhar University. Malcolm's evolving commitment to Sunni orthodoxy was expressed in the shaping of his Islamic organization Muslim Mosque Incorporated, founded a few days after his departure from Nation of Islam in March 1964, to advance the cause of Sunni Islam among African Americans.

Although Malcolm's orthodoxy did not affect his commitment to black liberation, it appears to have played a part in broadening his liberationist paradigm and his cooperation with a wide array of groups, many of which he had stridently condemned during his Nation of Islam phase. This development is evident in the attention he gave to building the secular Organization of Afro-American Unity in June 1964, shortly after his return from his pilgrimage to Mecca and travels in Africa. Islamic orthodoxy also led Malcolm to begin substantiating his political ideas with arguments rooted in the Qur'an. This empowered Malcolm against both his Nation of Islam adversaries and his new circle of assimilationist Sunni Muslim acquaintances, many of whom viewed Malcolm as a potential ambassador to white America. During this last period of his life, Malcolm would often situate his advocacy for African Americans and his militancy in the context of Islamic teachings. He would emphasize, for example, that the Qur'an calls for "fighting those that fight against you" (Q. 2:190).

Malcolm understood the importance of spirituality as a basis for social action, and in Islam he felt he had found the strong spiritual foundation necessary to overcome the abuses of power he vehemently critiqued. He would remark that Islam had solved his personal problem but also that his personal solution was inadequate as long as the problem of his people's oppression was unresolved.

At the end of his life, Malcolm had an identifiable political philosophy. It was a liberationist philosophy that emphasized justice, fairness, and equality in human relations. It also called for active struggle, even armed struggle if necessary, to achieve its ends. This philosophy was influenced by Marcus Garvey's movement, a life among the struggling African American masses, his longtime involvement in the black liberation struggle, his exposure to the ideas and key personalities of an emerging "Third World" anti-imperialist movement, and his deepening Islamic orthodoxy. Malcolm did not live long enough, however, to translate that philosophy into a detailed political program, so it would not be accurate to affix to that philosophy a particular label—nationalist, socialist, Islamic, or otherwise.

See also liberation theology; Muhammad, Elijah (1897–1975); Nation of Islam

Further Reading

George Breitman, The Last Year of Malcolm X: The Evolution of a Revolutionary, 1984; Jan Carew, Ghosts in Our Blood: With Malcolm X in Africa, England, and the Caribbean, 1994; Louis A. Decaro Jr., On the Side of My People: A Religious Life of Malcolm X, 1997; Benjamin Karim, Remembering Malcolm, 1992; Y. N. Kly, The Black Book: The True Political Philosophy of Malcolm X, 4th ed., 1990; Malcolm X, The Autobiography of Malcolm X: As Told to Alex Haley, 1965.

ZAID SHAKIR

Malik b. Anas (712–95)

Malik b. Anas is the founder and eponym of the Maliki school of law in Islam and the compiler and organizer of the earliest Muslim legal text, al-Muwatta' (The trodden path), the oldest surviving large collection of traditions from the Prophet Muhammad (hadith). Because of the scantiness of contemporary biographical information about him and because of his importance as a foundational figure in Islam, there is considerable scholarly controversy about his history, despite the great mass of material about him.

Malik lived his entire life in his native city of Medina, which had been a political backwater since the beginning of the Umayyad dynasty in 661, but nevertheless remained a center for normative Muslim practice as the city of the Prophet Muhammad. Because of the pilgrimage requirement, important Muslims passed through the city on their way to Mecca at some point. While at Medina, they took the opportunity to learn more about Islam in the city of its original and authentic practice. For their part, the Medinans, including Malik, could take comfort from the fact that, despite their lack of political power, their city remained the center of Muslim traditional religious authority.

Malik strove to stay politically neutral during his life. There is no information about his relations with the Umayyads. After the new and insecure Abbasid dynasty came to power in 750, however, he received from the caliph Abu Ja'far al-Mansur (r. 754–75) in 761 some financial benefit confiscated from the property of a suspected opponent of the dynasty, 'Abdallah b. al-Hasan, a descendant of the fourth caliph 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661). This may indicate that Malik was thought to be unfavorable to 'Alid political claims, which then greatly threatened the Abbasids' legitimacy, and therefore the Abbasids sought to gain his favor. Nevertheless, in 762, when 'Abdallah's son Muhammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya (d. 762) proclaimed his revolt against Mansur in Medina, Malik issued a fatwa invalidating the oath of allegiance to Mansur on the grounds that it was coerced. By so doing, Malik freed the Medinans to join the revolt, but instead of actively participating in it like his fellow scholar 'Abdallah b. Yazid b. Hurmuz (d. 765), Malik himself stayed in his house. After the failure of the revolt, Malik was severely beaten for his defection in 763 by the governor of Medina and possibly also was put under house arrest.

Malik's passive attitude eventually made possible a later reconciliation with the Abbasid dynasty, when in 777 Mansur's son Muhammad al-Mahdi (ruled 775–85) consulted him about making alterations to the Ka'ba. When Malik expressed his opposition to that idea, Mahdi heeded his advice. Much later, during the pilgrimage of 795 near the end of Malik's life, Mahdi's son Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809) paid his respects to him when he passed through Medina and even visited him, although Malik had turned down a summons to come to the caliph. This is all that is known about Malik's direct relations with political authorities. Other stories told about his dissuading either Mansur or Mahdi from promulgating his book, al-Muwatta', as the law of the land appear to be apocryphal.

Malik's relatively few overt contacts with the Abbasid political authorities do not clearly describe his political stances. His general avoidance of them, however, demonstrates the orientation of the rising class of religious scholars that helped to set the tone for them through the centuries. Malik's own views are believed to be represented by the two Maliki law books, al-Muwatta' and al-Mudawwana (The compendium). Al-Muwatta' is entirely attributed to Malik but exists in various recensions, while al-Mudawwana, a larger compilation by the Tunisian Maliki scholar Sahnun (777–854), contains the reports of others beside Malik. Despite some uncertainty about the extent to which these works represent Malik himself, they clearly draw a specific image of him that has been received by the Muslims and that probably describes his views in general. Both works display an aversion to politics and, in particular, to the rulers of the time. Malik's aversion emerges not so much from direct statements as from silence: the state and its officials are infrequently mentioned, usually with vague terms such as imam, sultan, wālī, amir, without specification of particular offices or institutions. The individual rulers in office, the Abbasid caliphs, and their dynasty never receive a single mention, nor do the defunct Umayyads and their latter-day successors in Spain. The audience for these works can hardly have been the rulers, and indeed their continued transmission and cultivation by scholars make it clear that they were addressed mainly to scholars.

By their general lack of reference to government, the works may be seen as demonstrating that Islam can be established and practiced almost without reference to the state. Thus, for example, rather than being asked whether rulers have the right to organize, regulate, and lead public worship, Malik is asked whether it is permissible to perform public worship with "these rulers" (hā'ulā' al-wulāt)—a somewhat disparaging way to refer to the Abbasids. He replies in the affirmative, as long as the rulers do not display heresy.

One of the few areas where the state seems definitely to be necessary is war. Yet, even here, there is very little mention of the state or any chain of command, apart from the commander's power to give orders, including his power to allot the spoils, for example. In one of the few instances where rulers are mentioned, Malik is said to have been asked whether it was permissible to participate in a military campaign against the Byzantines with "these rulers." Malik is said originally to have regarded such participation as not permissible, but he changed his mind because of the notorious Byzantine attack on the Muslim city of Mar'ash in 778—an event that shook the caliph Mahdi himself. The reason Malik gave for his change of view was that not to allow participation in military campaigns, even if under "these rulers," would cause harm to the people of Islam in general. Such discourses show little regard for caliphs, match Malik's other history, and foreshadow the tendency of the 'ulama' to avoid close contact with the rulers that became standard through most of Islamic history down to the present.

On the other hand, Malik does assign to rulers the collection of mandatory alms (zakat) and the administration of hudūd punishments, which are major punishments mentioned or implied in the Qur'an, thus showing that he accepts the necessity of a ruler for some purposes. He also draws an important contrast between just and unjust rulers: while the former must be obeyed, the latter should not be obeyed when they issue unjust commands.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); jurisprudence; Mecca and Medina; shari'a

Further Reading

Malik b. Anas, al-Mudawwana al-Kubra, edited by Ahmad 'Abd al-Salam, 1994; Idem, al-Muwatta, translated by "A'isha 'Abdarahman at-Tarjumana [Bewley] and Ya'qub Johnson, 1982; Yasin Dutton, The Origins of Islamic Law: The Qur'ān, the Muwaṭṭa', and the Madinan 'Amal, 2nd ed., 2002; Mansour H. Mansour, The Maliki School of Law: Spread and Domination in North and West Africa 8th to 14th Centuries c.e., 1995; Joseph Schacht, "Mālik b. Anas," Encyclopedia of Islam, 2nd ed., 1954–2005.

KHALID YAHYA BLANKINSHIP

Mamluks (1250–1517)

The Mamluk dynasty ruled in Egypt from 1250 to 1517. The term "mamluk" means "owned"; the Mamluk rulers were slaves by origin. The employment of slave soldiers in Muslim armies began with the Turkic guard regiment of slaves in Samarra under the Abbasid caliph Mu'tasim (r. 833–42) and lasted until the massacre of the last mamluks by Muhammad 'Ali, the reform-minded governor of Egypt, in 1811. The Mamluk regime is the only example of a state in which slaves ruled on their own instead of merely serving their masters.

Sources commonly divide Mamluk history into two phases: the Bahri phase, in which rulers were drawn from the corps garrisoned on the Nile (al-bahr, also known as the Turkic phase, because the mamluks in question came from the Qipchaq steppe in Central Asia), and the Burji phase, in which the rulers were drawn from those stationed in the Citadel (al-burj, also known as the Circassian phase, because the mamluks were by then drawn from the Caucasus).

The Mamluk period produced a considerable amount of literature on political theory. Ibn Taymiyya's al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya fi Islah al-Ra'i wa al-Ra'iyya (The book of governance according to the shari'a) focuses on public policy, while Ibn Jama'a's Tahrir al-Ahkam fi Tadbir Ahl al-Islam (Summary of the rules to govern the people of Islam) and Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya's al-Turuq al-Hukmiyya fi al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (Ways of governing and policy making) articulate the concept of the "Islamic state." Various authors offered advice on running the state's affairs or tried to justify the Mamluks' rejection of dynastic rule by referring to Islamic jurisprudence regarding the right to govern. Such writings deal with issues of governance under the shari'a, placing political thought within the framework of Sunni discourse on rules and administrative matters. The truly distinct political principles behind the Mamluk regime, however, may be gleaned from the reality of the Mamluks' pragmatic approach to governing.

In theory, the Mamluk sultanate was an oligarchy in which the assembled amirs would elect the most powerful person as ruler. In practice, however, once elected, many a sultan installed his son as successor, either by direct appointment or by an "election" by his own faction. Insofar as hereditary rule never gained consensus, it was always threatened by factional maneuvering. The resulting succession crises throughout Mamluk history underscore the tensions between the principle of hereditary monarchy, inherited from the Ayyubids, and the rival view of the Mamluk state as a crowned republic in which the throne was passed by election or usurpation.

The crisis of political legitimation began with the state's inception, which was itself the outcome of a rebellion in which the mamluks of Salih Ayyub fought to preserve their position as a faction. The assassination of the sultan Qutuz (r. 1259–60) crystallized the "law of the Turks" in the maxim "he who kills the ruler will be ruler himself." Baybars (r. 1260–77), the regicide, was declared sultan. The restoration of the Abbasid caliphate in Cairo and the shadow caliph's bestowal of powers on Baybars not only enhanced his claims to rule but also bolstered the Mamluks' legitimacy vis-à-vis the Ayyubids, their former lords. A combination of residual dynasticism and the political convenience of the oligarchy would become a recurrent theme in Mamluk history.

Baybars nominated his sons as joint sultans, but the last son was installed on behalf of Qalawun, a fellow amir, allowing him to usurp the throne. The prolonged rule of the Qalawunids (1279–1382)—Mansur Qalawun, his sons Ashraf Khalil and Nasir Muhammad, and Nasir's sons and grandsons—illustrates the Mamluks' perennial fluctuation between dynastic rule and military oligarchy. After Nasir's death, the system that had supported factional integration collapsed. Ultimately a consultative council was established whose members agreed to recognize the supremacy of one among them (al-amīr al-kabīr) who would act as ruler, while the sultan was stripped of real power. All but one of Nasir's sons and grandsons were "elected" when they were teenagers, and they were governed by Nasiri amirs who served as mentors (atābak), viceroys, and viziers. When the Qalawunid dynasty was eventually removed at the hands of Barquq, a Circassian atābak, the elective principle was reenforced so that the throne was once again awarded to the victorious faction.

Zahir Barquq's (r. 1382–92) usurpation ushered in the Burji period, which saw continuous factionalism and dynastic/elective maneuvering, with some new features. Nearly every sultan endeavored to will the sultanate to his son, fully aware that his wishes would certainly be violated. Some mutual understanding seems to have existed between the sultan and his faction whereby the sultan's will created an interregnum after his death, during which his mamluks could elect one of their own to the throne. Gradually, the motto "kingship has no progeny" gained currency. By the end of the 15th century, the succession of a son, instead of a genuine first-generation mamluk, was generally regarded as illegitimate. Succession was passed along the line of the household, composed of both the heirs and the mamluks of the group's founder. The household founded by Qaytbay (r. 1468–96) produced six sultans—his son and five mamluks—and reigned until the coming of the Ottomans.

See also Ayyubids (1160–1250); Ibn Jama'a (1241–1333); military; slavery

Further Reading

David Ayalon, The Mamlūk Military Society, 1979; Idem, Studies on the Mamlūks of Egypt (1250–1517), 1977; Patricia Crone, Slaves on Horses: The Evolution of the Islamic Polity, 1980; P. M. Holt, "The Position and Power of the Mamlūk Sultan," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 38 (1975); Idem, "The Structure of Government in the Mamluk Sultanate," in The Eastern Mediterranean Lands in the Period of the Crusades, edited by P. M. Holt, 1977; Idem, "The Sultan as Ideal Ruler: Ayyubid and Mamluk Prototypes," in Süleyman the Magnificent and His Age: The Ottoman Empire in the Early Modern World, 1995; Carl Petry, Protectors or Praetorians? The Last Mamlūk Sultans and Egypt's Waning as a Great Power, 1994.

LI GUO

Ma'mun (786–833)

The seventh caliph of the Abbasid dynasty, 'Abdallah al-Ma'mun was appointed governor of the province of Khurasan by his father, Harun al-Rashid (d. 809). He led a successful revolt against the reigning caliph, his half-brother Muhammad al-Amin (r. 809–13), who was killed in the siege of Baghdad. To justify the coup d'état, Ma'mun claimed for himself the title of Imam al-Huda, the "rightly guided (and rightly guiding) leader." This designation implied that he had privileged insight into matters of faith and practice and was therefore best qualified to head the Muslim community. He described his movement as "the second call to allegiance," suggesting legitimate descent from the first "call": the Abbasid revolution of 749–50.

In 817, he named as his successor 'Ali b. Musa, a prominent member of the rival house of 'Ali b. Abi Talib. He gave him the title al-Rida, or "the one acceptable to all," a title that the original Abbasid revolutionaries had used to refer to the descendant of the Prophet whom they hoped to bring to power. Ma'mun's choice may have been motivated by a desire to placate the 'Alids, who had risen in Yemen and in Kufa. It may also have been motivated by messianic expectations associated with his being the seventh caliph and with the passing of the second Islamic century (816). Perhaps, too, he had no choice but to appoint an 'Alid, having severed his ties with his Abbasid relatives. In any event, the new heir apparent died soon after being appointed, giving rise to speculation that he was murdered to pave the way for reconciliation with the Abbasids. Today, Rida is revered as the eighth imam by Twelver Shi'is, who generally hold Ma'mun responsible for killing him.

During the latter part of his reign, Ma'mun adopted a series of measures intended to enforce general recognition of his authority in matters of belief and practice. His most powerful opponents were the Sunnis, who sought guidance from the hadith rather than from the Abbasid caliphs, whom they regarded as usurpers. In 827, Ma'mun proclaimed that 'Ali (r. 656–61) was the greatest of the caliphs and that the Qur'an was created (i.e., produced by God), as opposed to being a part of Him and therefore eternal. These proclamations were a deliberate affront to Sunnis, who believed that Mu'awiya, who declared himself caliph in 661 upon the death of 'Ali, was justified in doing so and that the Qur'an, being God's speech, was uncreated (or that the subject should not be discussed at all). Shortly before his death in 833, Ma'mun asked judges, teachers of hadith, and others suspected of Sunni sympathies to affirm that the Qur'an was created. Threatened with death, nearly all did as they were told, the most famous exception being the hadith scholar Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855). The so-called inquisition (mihna) was pursued halfheartedly by Ma'mun's successor, Abu Ishaq al-Mu'tasim (r. 833–42), but revived with gusto by Abu Ja'far al-Wathiq (r. 842–47). It was brought to an end by Abu al-Fadl al-Mutawakkil (r. 847–61), who banned theological disputation and extended official patronage to Sunni scholars of hadith.

Ma'mun's claim to authority in matters of faith and practice may have been a deliberate revival of the archaic caliphate, which appears to have been a religious office. His designation of himself as an instrument of divine guidance manifested itself in his vigorous campaigns against the Byzantines and perhaps also in his interest in the so-called ancient sciences. His sponsorship of translations from Greek and Middle Persian, seemingly undertaken to strengthen the rationalists against the literalist hadith scholars, left an indelible mark on Arabic literature and science. Beginning in the 19th century, his patronage of science and his encouragement of debate between representatives of different schools of thought have served reformers and apologists as evidence that free and rational inquiry is compatible with Islam. Historically, however, the most important part of his legacy may be his inadvertent contribution to the development of Sunnism. Despite his claim to be an "imam of right guidance," he failed to curb the power of the literalist hadith scholars, who emerged from their confrontation with the state stronger than ever before.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); inquisition

Further Reading

Michael Cooperson, Al-Ma'mun, 2005; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam: Six Centuries of Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph: Religious Authority in the First Centuries of Islam, 1986.

MICHAEL COOPERSON

martyrdom

The term shahīd, used almost exclusively in later literature to refer to a martyr, military or otherwise, does not have the same meaning in the Qur'an. Shahīd and its cognate shāhid refer in the Qur'an only to a legal witness or eyewitness and are applied both to God and to humans in appropriate contexts (e.g., Q. 3:98; 6:19; 41:53). Qur'anic locutions commonly understood to refer to the military martyr include "those who are slain in the path of God" (man qutila fī sabīl allāh/alladhīna qutilū fī sabīl allāh: Q. 2:154; 3:169) and variations thereof. Only in later, extra-Qur'anic literature, including sīra (life of the Prophet), tafsīr (Qur'anic exegesis), and the hadith (prophetic tradition), does shahīd—and its plural shuhadā'—acquire the specific meaning of "one who bears witness for the faith," particularly by laying down his or her life. Some scholars attribute the semantic transformation of these terms to extraneous, particularly Christian, influence. Another concept of selling or bartering one's self or the life of this world for the hereafter (Q. 4:74; 9:111) has been connected to the notion of martyrdom.

In the exegetical literature, however, these Qur'anic locutions have been predominantly understood as endorsing the concept of earning martyrdom by dying on the battlefield, even if the terms shahīd or shuhadā' are not always used in these contexts. Some exegetes indicate that debates concerning the more meritorious manner of dying—dying naturally or being slain in the path of God—were robust and persistent in scholarly circles. Thus the 13th-century Andalusian commentator Abu 'Abdallah al-Qurtubi (d. 1273) affirms that Qur'an 22:58 clearly states that both types of death are equally meritorious in the case of a pious believer and earn the same reward in the hereafter, but certain jurists nevertheless came to advocate a superior status for the military martyr.

A number of early hadith compilations preserve reports that assign a broad range of meanings to the term shahīd. One such report, related by Masruq b. al-Ajda', declares that there are four types of martyrdom: dying from the plague, by giving birth, by drowning, and from a stomach ailment. Hadiths and other reports that preserve these early expansive meanings of martyrdom are also contained in early treatises on jihad (broadly, struggle, striving for the sake of God and, more narrowly, fighting for the sake of God), such as in Ibn al-Mubarak's Kitab al-Jihad (The book of warfare). In comparison with these earlier works, certain hadiths recorded in the Sahih (The sound collection) of Muhammad b. Isma'il al-Bukhari clearly assign a more privileged status to military martyrs, with special rewards in the hereafter reserved for them alone. A hadith on the authority of Samura b. Jundub states that "the abode of martyrs" (dār al-shuhadā') is the best abode in the hereafter. Some hadiths warn, however, that the exalted status of the warrior should not lead to the deliberate courting of martyrdom on the part of the faithful by seeking to confront the enemy. The progressively higher valuation of military martyrdom becomes more blatant and pervasive in later popular fadā'il al-jihād (excellences of jihad) works, especially those composed during the Mamluk period. One such work is the Mashari' al-Ashwaq ila Masari' al-'Ushshaq fi al-Jihad wa-Fada'ilih (The wellsprings of longing), composed by the anti-Crusader warrior Ahmad b. Ibrahim b. al-Nahhas (d. 1411), which promises exaggerated posthumous rewards to the military martyr.

The juridical literature came to reflect this evolving greater reverence for the military martyr, primarily in connection with preparation of his corpse for burial. Against the procedure followed in normal burials, the body of the martyr was not to be washed, following the precedent said to have been set by Muhammad after the Battle of Uhud in 625. If the martyr was wounded on the battlefield and died later in his home, then his body was to be washed. Martyrs were to be buried in the clothes they fought in, but their weapons were to be removed. Most jurists were of the opinion that there was no need to say the funerary prayers over the martyr's body, the assumption being that all his sins had been forgiven and that he would ascend to heaven right away.

Because of the trajectory of Shi'i history, "redemptive suffering" and martyrdom loom large in Shi'i consciousness and find ample reflection in their literature. Twelver Shi'is maintain that 11 of their 12 imams were martyred. The events at Karbala (680) led to enhanced reverence for martyrdom among Shi'is, especially the martyrdom of members of the Prophet's family (ahl al-bayt) and more broadly that of believers who were oppressed and killed unjustly. During the Occultation of the Twelfth Imam, however, military jihad fell into abeyance for the majority of Twelver Shi'is. After the Islamic Revolution in Iran in 1979 and during the Iran-Iraq War in the 1980s, the notion of military martyrdom was revived and used to mobilize populations on both sides against the national enemy.

In the context of European colonization of a broad swath of the Muslim world starting in the 18th century, jihad as a defensive war against foreign aggressors made a dramatic revival among Muslim scholars and jurists. Nevertheless, death and the attainment of martyrdom were usually not glorified in such colonial discourses. In the colonial and postcolonial periods, the South Asian Islamist Abul al-A'la Mawdudi (d. 1979) and the fiery Egyptian activist Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966) wrote about waging revolutionary jihad against "illegitimate" governments in Muslim-majority societies, but they did not exhort believers to seek death through this kind of relentless military activity.

Contemporary suicide bombers in the Palestinian Occupied Territories, Lebanon, Afghanistan, Iraq, and elsewhere, who consider their actions "martyrdom operations" ('amaliyyāt istishhādiyya) and who legitimate their targeting of noncombatants under the rubric of jihad, have considerably deviated from premodern legal constructions of martyrdom. Mainstream scholars, such as the Syrian hadith scholar Nasir al-Din al-Albani (d. 1999), the Saudi jurist Muhammad b. Salih al-'Uthaymin (d. 2001), and Muhammad Tahir-ul Qadri of Pakistan, have criticized their positions as morally and legally indefensible.

See also fundamentalism; jihad; military; suicide

Further Reading

Asma Afsaruddin, Jihad and Martyrdom in Islamic Thought and Praxis, 2012, forthcoming; Talal Asad, On Suicide Bombing, 2007; Michael Bonner, Jihad in Islam: Doctrines and Practice, 2006; David Cook, Martyrdom in Islam, 2007; Robert Pape, Dying to Win: The Strategic Logic of Suicide Terrorism, 2005; Rudolph Peters, Islam and Colonialism: The Doctrine of Jihad in Modern History, 1979.

ASMA AFSARUDDIN

masses

A number of Arabic words may be translated as "masses," especially al-'āmma (commoners, general populace), al-jumhūr (public, multitude), and al-sha'b (folk, populace). More pejorative examples, usually translated as the rabble, riffraff, or mob, include dahmā', ra'ā', ghawghā', and taghām. The term unmistakably and consistently evokes class and hierarchy. The masses are the lower classes and the great majority of people, the common folk, usually workers and peasants, and sometimes soldiers and bureaucrats as well. The opposite of these terms is al-khāṣṣa, the elite, which was sometimes limited to the highest ranking political figures such as the sultan or amirs, and at others included their retinues and other important officials, judges, and religious leaders. The literal meaning of the two words is telling: al-'āmma is "the general, undifferentiated, or common," while al-khāṣṣa is "the distinguished, particular, or with distinction." It is in this sense that Ira M. Lapidus describes the indistinct masses in negative terms in his book Muslim Cities in the Later Middle Ages: al-'āmma did not hold office, have an education, or possess wealth. Other groups tend to be distinguished in between these two classes, such as al-a'yān or notables, the 'ulama' or scholars, and local leaders who acted as intermediaries between the elite and the masses.

Philosophers, theologians, and mystics of various political and sectarian commitments generally agreed on the proper value and role of the masses in Islamic societies: the masses were sharply distinguished from the elite by their ignorance; they were decidedly inferior to the elite; and the masses were intended to be led, guided, and controlled by them. Although Imamism is a complex and variegated system of belief, one of its key features is the gulf between the imam and his followers. The divinely inspired imam has knowledge that no ordinary human being can possess, and in turn, the gulf between the imam and the Imamis is replayed between the Imamis and other Muslims. In the words of Muhammad b. 'Ali al-Baqir (d. 743), as reported by Imami scholar Muhhammad b. al-Hasan al-Tusi (d. 1067) in al-Amali, the non-Imami masses were "created from the stinking mud of Hell."

Muslim philosophers also maintained a distinction inherited from Neoplatonism between the erudite elite and the ignorant masses. This division, which intertwined piety with epistemological, moral, and political rank, suggested that the many were deficient by nature. Unlike the prophet-philosopher figure and the privileged classes under him who know esoteric (bāṭin) truths, the many lack reason and revelation. They can only comprehend representations of the truth transmitted in parables. Because of their lower placement along the spectrum of reason, they can only recognize the exoteric (ẓāhir) or surface meanings. With this distinction and along similar lines to those found in Islamic mystical thought, philosophers like Farabi (d. 950) suggested that religion imitates philosophy; it is instruction for the masses while philosophy is instruction for the elite. Law is necessary for the masses; members of the rational elite do not need this form of regulation. Likewise, Ghazali (d. 1111) also maintains the distinction between the elite and the masses. The masses are furthest from true knowledge and lack perception and understanding of God, as opposed to elites, who are marked by keen sight. The masses' level of understanding prevents them from benefiting from what rulers and scholars know. Their beliefs are determined by preachers. Ghazali casts them in typical fashion as the objects of instruction, to be taught restraint and good manners.

Nevertheless, it would be incorrect to say that the medieval Islamic view of the masses was utterly derogatory. While Ghazali maintains the masses-elite opposition, he derides others for casting themselves as elites on illegitimate grounds. When he lists the eight types of people who are mistakenly attracted to bāṭiniyya or esoteric doctrines, they include the stupid, the domineering, and, most relevant here, "those who seek to be part of an elite so as to distinguish themselves from the masses." Although Ghazali is not defending the masses, he calls attention to the falseness of such self-aggrandizing differentiations. In his analysis of metaphors, the literary theorist 'Abd al-Qahir al-Jurjani (d. 1078) notes that the aphorism "Food is not right without salt" signifies that the goodness and well-being of the masses, as represented by food, requires the elite, as represented by salt. Jurjani's explanation reflects the elites' ideological position, for he overlooks that salt (the elite) is in some sense dependent on—and at its base even less necessary than—food (the masses).

Overall, these visions of the masses took their status and deficiencies for granted. The vast majority of Muslim political thinkers in the medieval period, like their Western counterparts, treated the hierarchy as proper, rigid, and ordained by both God and nature, taking the people's position in it as a given and then maneuvering from within it.

Sawsan El-Messiri notes in her study of Egyptian urban masses or folk (awlād al-balad) that the term encompasses a wide range of types, from shopkeepers and artisans to outlaws and mobs, and that the general category may be divided based on ethnicity, religion, and occupation. In his book Mass Culture and Modernism in Egypt, Walter Armbrust shows how the figure of ibn al-balad (son of the country) was used to represent the masses. The term does not appear often in pre-19th-century sources but thereafter signifies both the buffoon's idiocy and the worker's culturally authentic machismo. In the 20th century, this "diamond in the rough" was placed in a highly conventional model of the pedagogical state, wherein social reformism would educate and raise ibn al-balad from his ignorance, maintaining his better characteristics while removing the bad. The term is opposed to ibn al-dhawāt, or the aristocrat, linked to cultural inauthenticity and effeminacy. Ibn al-balad, like the term sha'bī (popular), has nationalist overtones, and generally designates those who stand in staunch opposition to inauthentic cultural practices, foreign political agendas, exploitation, and bad character. While the modern position maintains the opposition between the elite and the masses, a key difference is the belief in the common people's capacity to change, which lends them a different role in legitimating the political order. Typical of this modernist sentiment are proclamations that the elite would polish the masses' language, sometimes coupled with the claim that the elite would also adapt the commoners' sincerity and flexibility. An intermediary role is played by the intellectual, who serves to bridge the gap between the elite and the masses. Such a transformation should be understood in the context of the forces of nationalism and postcolonialism, the emergence of modern populism, the modern state's reliance on the concept of the masses, and its attendant construction of national culture. Indeed, it is typical for modern governments to invest in projects, centers, and ministries aimed at making the common people a source of their cultural and political authenticity.

See also Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); government; modernism; philosophy; socialism

Further Reading

Walter Armbrust, Mass Culture and Modernism in Egypt, 1996; Patricia Crone, God's Rule, 2003; Abu Nasr al-Farabi, Mabādi' ārā' ahl al-madīnat al-fādīlah (On the Perfect State), translated by Richard Walzer, 1998; Ira Marvin Lapidus, Muslim Cities in the Later Middle Ages, 1984; Sawsan El-Messiri, Ibn Al-Balad, 1998.

MURAD IDRIS

Mawardi (974–1058)

Abu al-Hasan 'Ali b. Muhammad b. Habib Mawardi was a Shafi'i jurist, chief judge, political theorist, and political advisor to two Abbasid caliphs: Qadir bi-Illah (r. 991–1031) and Qa'im bi-Amr Allah (r. 1031–74). Born in Basra, he later moved to Baghdad but studied in both cities, after which he was appointed as a judge in various localities of the empire, including in Ustawa, near Nishapur, and in Baghdad. In Baghdad he was able to rise within the ranks of the judiciary and became the chief judge (qādī al-quḍāt) during Qadir's reign. When Qadir requested a manual on Islamic law (fiqh) from each of the representatives of the four Sunni schools of law, Mawardi wrote al-Iqnā' (The conviction) on behalf of the Shafi'i school, which put him at the highest level of authority in Islamic jurisprudence. During Qa'im's reign, Mawardi gained more prominence in the political realm and carried out diplomatic missions on behalf of the caliph, traveling to the Buyid amirs (in 1032 and 1037) and to the Seljuq ruler Tugril Bey (in 1043). In 1038 Qa'im elevated him to an unprecedented position and gave him the title aqḍā al-quḍāt (the best judge among the judges). After decades of active presence at the caliphal court, Mawardi's involvement in politics diminished during the influential vizierate of Abu al-Qasim 'Ali b. al-Husayn, who is better known as Ibn al-Muslima (r. 1045–58). Mawardi spent the last years of his life engaged primarily in scholarly activities. He died in Baghdad in 1058.

Mawardi is best known for his seminal work al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya wa-l-Wilayat al-Diniyya (The ordinances of government and religious positions). The Ahkam is one of the earliest examples of its kind in Islamic law, which systematically delineates the functions, rights, and duties of various government offices; defines their relationships to one another; and lays out the conditions of appointment and removal of individuals to and from these offices. Thus the main topics of inquiry in the Ahkam are the contract of the caliphate; the requirements and procedures of conferral to the caliphal office; the duties of the caliph; the appointment of viziers and amirs; the jurisdiction of judges and the office of complaints (maẓālim); the status and rules of the chancery (dīwān); and the distribution of booty, taxation, land grants, and market supervision. As Mawardi states in the introduction to the Ahkam, all of these topics are systematically examined from a juridical perspective so that the caliph could "familiarize himself with the views of the jurists (fuqahā') regarding his rights . . . and duties."

The Ahkam received considerable attention immediately upon the publication of its critical edition by Max Enger in 1853 and since the mid-19th century became one of the foundational texts for the study of Islamic political thought in scholarly literature in the West. The comprehensive nature of the work, the systematic treatment of its subject matter, and its early date of composition within the Islamic legal tradition gave it an exceptional, if controversial, status in scholarly debate. A number of scholars of the early Orientalist tradition considered the Ahkam the most authoritative work on the Sunni theory of the caliphate, emphasizing its theoretical nature and considering it as the earliest and most prominent example of public law, in particular constitutional law, in Islamic political thought.

Two articles written in the late 1930s by the renowned orientalist H.A.R. Gibb (1895–1971) expressed a different opinion of the Ahkam, which became the prevailing perspective in recent scholarship. Challenging the other approach, Gibb and a group of scholars who followed his perspective emphasized the importance of the book's historical context, asserting that the political concerns of the time played a significant role in the construction of Mawardi's theory. Gibb stated, in his article titled "Some Considerations on the Sunni Theory of the Caliphate," that the Ahkam did not seek to "codif[y] the orthodox Sunni doctrine on the subject of the caliphate" but rather attempted to rationalize and justify the authority of the Abbasid caliphate, which had become repressed under the Buyid amirs. In short, the Ahkam was meant to reassert and restore the power of the Abbasids, and thus it served as an apologia within the contemporary political situation. For example, Mawardi's acceptance of emirate by usurpation (istīlā') legitimized the status of the amirs who came to power by force, as long as they acknowledged the authority of the caliphs and the supremacy of Islamic law. To this view, this indicated Mawardi's chief interest in effecting political change in the environment of his time.

Despite its usefulness for understanding the Ahkam, this prevailing view in effect reduces Mawardi's role as a jurist to a level at which the juridical enterprise serves only to legitimize emerging power groups and thus plays down the motivation that lies behind Mawardi's juridical writing. Mawardi, as a sensible jurist, is conscious of the paradigms that exist in his society, but he also depicts a more comprehensive and systematic order that defines power relationships from a legal perspective and attempts to limit any arbitrary exercise of power. The Ahkam thus indeed offers a legal remedy for the political system at a time of crisis. But in it, too, Mawardi draws up one of the earliest examples of a political legal text of its kind, is consistent in following methods of Islamic jurisprudence, and demonstrates a sense of contractual logic commonly applied in legal deduction.

In the Islamic sphere, the Ahkam quickly became a model for legal works on governance, as is clear from Ibn Jama'a's (d. 1333) Tahrir al-Ahkam (Amendment of "The Ordinances"). An earlier scholar and a contemporary of Mawardi, Abu Ya'la b. al-Farra' (d. 1066), in fact composed a book on Islamic governance and gave it the same basic title as Mawardi's work: al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government). The book significantly resembles Mawardi's book in organization, structure, and content, as was profusely demonstrated by Muhammad 'Abd al-Qadir Abu Faris in his doctoral work published in 1980. Being a Hanbali, though, Abu Ya'la expresses in his Ahkam opinions on governance that agree with positions of the Hanbali school of law.

Mawardi wrote other important, surviving works on politics and governance that have not received as much attention in Western scholarship, such as his Qawanin al-Wizara wa-Siyasat al-Mulk (The laws of the vizierate and the management of rule) and Tashil al-Nazar wa-Ta'jil al-Zafar (Aiding examination and quickening success). Two other political works, Nasihat al-Muluk (Advice to kings) and al-Tuhfa al-Mulukiyya fi al-Adab al-Siyasiyya (The royal gem regarding political decorum), are ascribed to Mawardi, but their authorship has been called into question. Mawardi's other important work, Adab al-Dunya wa-l-Din (Good behavior in this world and religion), focuses on religious ethics and has become popular over the centuries.

See also Sunnism; traditional political thought

Further Reading

Muhammad 'Abd al-Qadir Abu Faris, Al-Qadi Abu Ya'la al-Farra' wa Kitabuhu al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya, 1980; H.A.R. Gibb, "Al-Mawardi's Theory of the Caliphate," Islamic Culture 11, no. 3 (1937), reprinted in Studies on the Civilization of Islam, edited by S. J. Shaw and W. R. Polk, 1962; Idem, "Some Considerations on the Sunni Theory of the Caliphate," Archives d'Histoire du Droit Oriental 3 (1939), reprinted in Studies on the Civilization of Islam, edited by S. J. Shaw and W. R. Polk, 1962; D. P. Little, "A New Look at al-Ahkām al-Sulṭāniyya," The Muslim World 64, no. 1 (1974); Mawardi, Al-Ahkam as-Sultaniyyah: The Laws of Islamic Governance, translated by Asadullah Yate, 2005; Idem, The Ordinances of Government: A Translation of Al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyya wa al-Wilāyāt al-Dīniyya, translated by Wafaa Hassan Wahba, 1996.

MEHMETCAN AKPINAR

Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79)

On July 14, 2003, the British magazine New Statesman published a list of "12 great thinkers of our time." Abu al-A'la Mawdudi was the only Muslim thinker on the list because, according to the publishers, "so influential are Mawdudi's ideas, and so profound has been his impact on Osama bin Laden and al-Qaeda as well as moderate Muslims, that we included him even though he died in 1979." This judgment, it seems, is heavily informed by the momentous events of September 11, 2001. Mawdudi's salience is much more complex and varied.

Mawdudi was a key ideologue of Islamism during the interwar period, and his legacy goes far beyond the putative divide, exemplified in most mainstream journalistic accounts in the West as well as in the Muslim world, between "radical" and "moderate." Of his several contributions, which stemmed from the vagaries of colonial Indian social formations but later transcended the frontiers of South Asia to affect collective actions in the Middle East and beyond, two stand out as the most important. The first is that he is, arguably, the first modern Islamic thinker to define Islam as a comprehensive, all-encompassing "system" (nizām). The second is that the state is theologically indispensible to Islam. To this end, Mawdudi cast Islam in a modern language, a language distinctively inspired by Western philosophy, to which most "traditional" 'ulama' (people of knowledge) were nonreceptive, if not hostile. His initial appeal was greater among the young, modern-educated, urban Muslims than among those schooled in traditional Islamic centers of learning and residing in villages. It was this modern, politicized (re)presentation of Islam by Mawdudi—in writings, speeches, and activism alike—that became the source of inspiration for a significant number of Muslims.

Early Life

Mawdudi was born in a Sayyid family in 1903 at Aurangabad in colonial India. His forefathers had association with Mughal royalty in Delhi, as well as with the princely state of Hyderabad, the Nizams. Mawdudi's paternal grandmother was related to Sayyid Ahmad Khan (d. 1898), founder of the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental (MAO) College, which later became the Aligarh Muslim University (AMU), in Aligarh. Against the wishes of Mawdudi's grandfather, Khan persuaded Mawdudi's father, Ahmad Hasan (d. 1920), to study at MAO College. However, Mawdudi's grandfather recalled Hasan from the college because he was "wearing kafir dress and playing cricket" there. Indeed, his father was, to quote Mawdudi, overwhelmed by "Western thought and life style." Hasan later renounced "Westernism" (firangiyat) and turned to religion. Given this newfound religiosity, he resolved not to give his son a Western education, but he did not want him to study in a madrasa either. Until the age of nine, Mawdudi received his education in Urdu, Persian, Arabic, law, and hadith through private tutors. At the age of 11, he went to study at Aurangabad's Madrasa Fawqaniyya Mashriqiyya (Oriental High School), an institution founded specifically to synthesize Islam and modernity. Shibli Nomani (d. 1914), a key figure among 'ulama' and founder of the Islamic academy, Darul-Musannifin, in Azamgarh, and his disciple Hamiduddin Farahi (d. 1930) had designed its curriculum, and both men had been influenced by Sayyid Ahmad Khan's modernism and had learned Western philosophy at AMU, particularly from Thomas Arnold. The school's curriculum thus included natural sciences, English, and mathematics—subjects that Mawdudi learned and later acknowledged as having broadened his intellectual horizon. Meanwhile, Mawdudi's father moved to Hyderabad, where Mawdudi enrolled in Darul Uloom, an Islamic college inspired by the modern philosophy of education whose principal was Farahi. He could not continue his formal education thereafter as he had to rush to Bhopal, where his father was getting medical treatment. There, Mawdudi became friends with Niaz Fatehpuri, an Urdu litterateur known for his heretical views. Fatehpuri encouraged Mawdudi to pursue a career in writing.

In 1919, Mawdudi left for Delhi, where he read the works of Sayyid Ahmad Khan. He learned English and studied German. According to Abdul Haq Ansari, an ideologue of the Indian Jama'at, he "turned to Western thought, and devoted a full five years to the study of major works in philosophy, political science, history and sociology." He wondered why 'ulama' in the past did not endeavor to discover the causes of Europe's rise, and he offered a long list of philosophers whose scholarship had made Europe a world power: Fichte, Hegel, Comte, Mill, Turgot, Adam Smith, Malthus, Rousseau, Voltaire, Montesquieu, Darwin, Goethe, and Herder, among others. Comparing their contribution to that of Muslims, he concluded that the latter's did not reach even 1 percent. Mawdudi's call to Muslims became, thus, to master the Western sciences. In many ways, he admired the Turkish writer Halide Edip (a judgment he later revised), who visited India in the mid-1930s. He criticized the Turkish 'ulama' for their indifference to Western sciences and stressed the need for independent legal reasoning (ijtihād). Mawdudi was also drawn to Marxist intellectuals such as Abdul Sattar Khairi, and in Hyderabad he became close to Josh Malihabadi, "the poet of revolution."

Such associations informed not only Mawdudi's ideas but also his quotidian life. Until 1936, he remained clean-shaven. Later, when he grew a beard, it was so short that it appeared more fashionable than religious. In 1938, when Manzoor Nomani (1905–97), a Deobandi scholar ('ālim), first met Mawdudi in Delhi, he was jolted to see that Mawdudi had too short a beard. He was also surprised at his "Western (angrēzī) hair." During the early 1930s, Mawdudi also watched films and attended a program of music and singing. Notably, he married Mahmuda Begum, who was educated in Delhi's Queen Mary's School. She was quite a modern woman; she rode a bicycle and barely observed the purdah (veil).

Colonial Formations and Politics of Islamism

Early in his career, Mawdudi became attracted to the Jam'iat Ulama-i Hind (JUH), an organization of 'ulama' founded in 1919. At the young age of 23, he became the editor of its newspaper, Muslim (later Al-Jam'iyat), which he edited until 1928. Mawdudi participated in the Khilafat and Non-Cooperation movements led by Mohandas Gandhi (d. 1948), worked to involve Muslims in the Indian National Congress, and wrote favorable biographies of Gandhi and Pandit Madanmohan Malaviya (1861–1946), a key leader of the congress and well-known for his contribution to Hindu nationalist ideology. Mawdudi grew disenchanted, however, with the congress's nationalism that led to the marginalization of Muslims. Another reason for his distrust of nationalism stemmed from the breakup of the Ottoman Empire along nationalist lines. Dismayed, Mawdudi quit the JUH–congress alliance. In 1928, he left Delhi for Hyderabad, where he devoted himself to studying Islam. From his reading of Islam and his witnessing of the precarious fate of the Nizams, Mawdudi concluded that the reason for Muslims' decline lay in the corruption of "pure" Islam. To recover and propagate pure Islam, he launched in 1932 an Urdu journal, Tarjumanul Qur'an. His early writings in Tarjuman were published under the title Tanqihat (Inquiries).

The major turning points in Mawdudi's career were the elections of 1937 and the subsequent formation of provincial ministries by the congress. It was then that Mawdudi's Islamism fully evolved.

He equated the policy of the ministries (1937–39) with heralding a "Hindu raj." He criticized the congress ministries not only for marginalizing Muslims and their culture but also for gradually making them Hindu. After the elections of 1937, both Mawdudi and the Muslim League, a party of the landed magnates founded in 1906 to protect Muslim interests, thus opposed the congress. This did not make them friends, however. Indeed, as the possibility of Pakistan's creation intensified, so did Mawdudi's critique of the League. He saw no difference between the congress and the League; both desired a secular state. He called the League a "party of the pagans." Since the League had no agenda for a shari'a state, Mawdudi described the future Pakistan as an "infidel state of Muslims." It was for this reason that in 1941 he formed the Jama'at-i Islami and set its goal as ḥukūmat-i ilāhiyya, "Allah's Government" or "Islamic State." To this end, Mawdudi argued that a state based on shari'a was not only desirable but also central to Muslims' very belief in monotheism. In Qur'an ki Char Bunyadi Istelahen (Four fundamental concepts of the Qur'an), he reinterpreted words such as ilāh (God), rabb (Lord), 'ibādat (worship), and dīn (religion) to argue that the Qur'an obliged Muslims to establish a state based on divine sovereignty and simultaneously reject, or rather dethrone, jāhiliyyat, the embodiment of human sovereignty. This approach also informs Mawdudi's multivolume commentary on the Qur'an, Tafhimul Qur'an (begun in 1942 and completed in 1972), which finds a coveted space on the bookshelves of many Muslims who are not Islamists.

Mawdudi used the metaphor of the inseparability of the organs of human body from each other to define Islam as a complete system. The soul of the organic system was the state. Like Islam, jāhiliyyat was an indivisible organic system as well, and both could never coexist. Under the influence of Hegel and Marx, he also offered a new approach to read history as a perennial battle between ḥaqq (truth) and bāṭil (falsehood), or Islam and jāhiliyyat. For Mawdudi, secular democracy was the ultimate expression of jāhiliyyat. He argued that it was forbidden (ḥarām) to vote for or contest the elections for a secular, democratic state. He also did not appreciate modern colleges established by Muslims. He described institutions such as AMU as "slaughterhouses."

The Nascent State of Pakistan and Mawdudi

After the partition of India in 1947, Mawdudi moved to Pakistan. Until 1949, he regarded the Pakistani state as a sign of jāhiliyyat because it based itself on popular, as opposed to divine, sovereignty. In 1948, the Punjab government made it mandatory for its employees to pledge an oath to the state. Mawdudi forbade his party members to take this oath until the state became Islamic. In March 1949, Pakistan's Constituent Assembly passed the Objectives Resolution acknowledging the sovereignty of God, after which Mawdudi no longer regarded contesting elections or joining the Pakistani army as ḥarām. In line with Mawdudi's ideology, his followers in India continued to boycott elections until mid-1980s and all key institutions of the state, including the AMU (until late 1950s).

Mawdudi's career in the nascent state of Pakistan began in the midst of controversies. Because of his refusal to endorse the war (in 1948) against India by the Pakistani state as jihad, he was charged with sedition and put in jail. That did not deter him from participating in politics. In the 1951 Punjab provincial elections, only one candidate he supported won. However, in 1953, he was sentenced to death (later annulled) for his role in the anti-Ahmadi agitation. Such measures by the state only enhanced his stature domestically as well as internationally. The regime under General Ayub Khan (1958–69) regarded Mawdudi's Islamism as a nuisance to its modernist goals. In the 1960s, he was imprisoned twice. So opposed was Mawdudi to the regime that he supported a woman (justified on the Islamic logic of necessity, or ḍarūra), Fatimah Jinnah, against Ayub Khan for the presidency of Pakistan. The result, however, went against Mawdudi. The outcome of the national elections of 1970 was not favorable to Mawdudi either: only four of his comrades managed to win. In the war of 1971, Mawdudi's sympathy clearly lay with the army as he stood against the independence of Bangladesh. Following the dismemberment of Pakistan, Mawdudi battled against Zulfikar Ali Bhutto's (d. 1979) socialist populism, including his land reforms. As an alternative, Mawdudi intensified the movement for the installation of niẓām-i muṣṭafā (Prophetic Order). So effective did the slogan of niẓām-i muṣṭafā become that, after the 1977 military coup, General Zia-ul-Haq (d. 1988) made it the cornerstone of his regime. General Zia's endorsement of niẓām-i muṣṭafā was perhaps the pinnacle of Mawdudi's political life, which ended in the United States in 1979. More than a million people participated in his funeral. He was buried in Lahore.

Mawdudi left behind a contested, varied, and complex legacy. Translated into nearly every influential language, his writings and public life have had an impact on Muslims the world over. While many in South Asia and elsewhere use his ideas to mobilize for militant-radical politics, for others the figure of Mawdudi has a significantly different valence. As an example of the latter, one may mention the rereading of Mawdudi by the Indian Jama'at and the group of scholars led by Javed Ghamidi in Pakistan. Indeed, there is not a single Mawdudi. There are several Mawdudis.

See also fundamentalism; India; Jama'at-i Islami; Pakistan; revival and reform

Further Reading

Irfan Ahmad, Islamism and Democracy in India: The Transformation of Jamaat-e-Islami, 2009; M. Abdul Haq Ansari, "Mawdudi's Contribution to Theology," The Muslim World 93, nos. 3–4 (2003); Muhammad Khalid Masud, "Rethinking Sharia: Javed Ahmad Ghamidi on Hudūd," Die Welt des Islams 47, no. 3–4 (2007); Syed Vali Reza Nasr, Mawdudi and the Making of Islamic Revivalism, 1996.

IRFAN AHMAD

mawlid

The term mawlid, literally birthday, is used to denote the celebrations Muslims hold in remembrance of the Prophet Muhammad's birthday, which Sunnis generally believe was a Monday on the 12th of the Islamic month of Rabi' al-Awwal. (Shi'is believe it was on the 17th.) Parts of the Muslim world additionally use the term to signify any festival honoring a saint, but many regions of the Muslim world assign saintly festivals a separate name. In addition to sermons and feasts, the Prophetic mawlid is characterized by the recitation of poems extolling the Prophet Muhammad and prayer formulas blessing him. The mawlid holds no intrinsic political significance but may, like any religious act, be used to further the agendas of those interested in power.

There is no explicit command in the Qur'an or hadith establishing Muhammad's birthday as a day for celebration. The first reports documenting the sanctification of Muhammad's birth, whether its place or time, occur during the eighth century, when the house of his birth in Mecca was converted into an area for prayer (masjid). A ninth-century historian notes that performance of the ritual prayer (salat) at that location is commendable, and a tenth-century exegete relates that supplications (du'ā') made there just after midday on Mondays will be answered. The traveler Ibn Jubayr (d. 1217), who visited Mecca in 1183, records that Muhammad's birthday was commemorated every Monday of Rabi' al-Awwal by keeping open his birthplace, which is visited by all for its blessings, and other holy sites of the city.

While these accounts from Mecca illustrate the veneration of Muhammad's birth, they do not appear to be official public celebrations. The earliest instance of such celebrations can be traced to Egypt in 1123, during the rule of the Isma'ili Shi'i dynasty of the Fatimids. The Fatimids did not limit the mawlid only to Muhammad but also marked the birthdays of other members of the Prophet's family (ahl al-bayt). All of these mawlids were commemorated in the same manner and apparently did not involve the general populace. Sweets, and possibly money, were distributed to the Fatimid ruling and religious elite, which included the stewards of tombs holding Muhammad's descendants. This was followed by Qur'an recitals and sermons in the presence of the Fatimid ruler. The Fatimids' claim to leadership was their connection to Muhammad's lineage, and these mawlids emphasized this tie.

It is not known whether the Sunni Prophetic mawlid was an outgrowth of the Fatimid one, and the first records of the Sunni mawlid occur during the mid-12th century in Syria and northern Iraq. These observances were promoted by both Sunni rulers and Sufis and quickly grew in popularity. A report from 1207 describes a mawlid in northern Iraq as a renowned festival attracting attendees from as far south as Baghdad. In addition to official sermons, poetry was recited and banquets held for the poor. Soon thereafter, the celebration of the mawlid became commonplace throughout the Muslim world. These Sunni mawlids were endorsed by rulers to bolster their standing with the populace, win the support of influential families who claimed Prophetic ancestry, and emphasize the nobility of their own lineage if connected to Muhammad.

The mawlid was not accepted by all scholars, and prominent debates over its legitimacy occurred during the 13th and 14th centuries. Scholars who opposed the mawlid did so for a number of reasons: they found no explicit textual command for it; they did not find the earliest Muslims commemorating it; and they found aspects of the popular celebration, such as the use of wind instruments, to be un-Islamic. Scholars who supported the mawlid, while acknowledging these criticisms, saw it is as praiseworthy provided that the actions undertaken as part of the festivities remained within legal boundaries.

In the 19th century, the mawlid continued to be commemorated, even with the growth of conservative and reformist thinkers who opposed it, such as the Deobandis and Rashid Rida (d. 1935). Objections to the mawlid remained, with detractors adding that the excessive veneration of Muhammad transformed him into a demigod and encouraged superstitious beliefs among common people. The mawlid was banned by the conservative Wahhabis in Saudi Arabia by the late 1930s, though it presumably continued to be observed privately, and the late 20th century produced a flurry of writings revisiting the debate over its validity. In the early 21st century, the mawlid enjoys state recognition in almost all Muslim countries and remains an essential expression of Muslim piety.

See also Muhammad (570–632); Sufism

Further Reading

Nico Kaptein, "Materials for the History of the Prophet Muḥammad's Birthday Celebration in Mecca," Der Islam 69, no. 2 (1992); Idem, Muḥammad's Birthday Festival: Early History in the Central Muslim Lands and Development in the Muslim West until the 10th/16th Century, 1993; Marion Katz, The Birth of the Prophet Muḥammad: Devotional Piety in Sunni Islam, 2007; Aviva Schussman, "The Legitimacy and Nature of Mawlid al-Nabī (Analysis of a Fatwā)," Islamic Law and Society 5, no. 2 (1998); Mark Sedgwick, "Saudi Sufis: Compromise in the Hijaz, 1925–40," Die Welt des Islams 37, no. 3 (1997).

SAYEED S. RAHMAN

Mecca and Medina

The cities of Mecca and Medina, located in western Saudi Arabia, are the most ritually significant sites in Islam. Both cities appear in Islamic cosmological legends as centers or origins of God's creation, and one of the epithets for Mecca, "Mother of Towns" (umm al-qurā), celebrates this precedence.

Mecca was the birthplace of the Prophet Muhammad, and according to Islamic tradition, he received his first revelations from God in its environs in 610. Mecca was also home to the Ka'ba, a black, cubic structure believed by Muslims to be the earliest bayt, or house of worship, first built by Adam and then rebuilt by Abraham and his son Ishmael. At the time of Muhammad's birth, it housed a set of idols and attracted pilgrims from among the largely polytheistic peoples of the Arabian Peninsula. Mecca also seems to have been a commercial center of at least local importance, though its role in longer distance trade has been debated. When Muhammad took control of the city in 630, he maintained its status as a pilgrimage destination, although he destroyed the idols at the Ka'ba and dedicated it to the one true God. In the following year, he performed a series of rituals at the Ka'ba and sites in its vicinity that became the blueprint for the hajj, the annual pilgrimage to Mecca.

Medina, known in pre-Islamic times by the name Yathrib, was an oasis settlement of farmers and pastoralists some 200 miles north of Mecca. The Prophet Muhammad emigrated to Yathrib with a group of his followers in 622 to escape persecution from Meccan elites. This event, known as the hijra, marks the beginning of the Islamic calendar. Yathrib, which is referred to simply as al-madīna (the city) in the Qur'an, would remain the residence of the Prophet until his death in 632. His tomb, located in the Prophet's Mosque of Medina, is a site of pious visitation for Muslims.

According to Islamic tradition, Muhammad established a paradigm for religious and political authority during his career in Medina. One of the earliest political documents in Islamic history, known as the Constitution of Medina, establishes the Prophet as the leader of "believers" and "Muslims" who compose an umma, the term now used for the worldwide community of Muslims. Its text combines the language of tribal confederations, kinship-based mutual aid pacts well-established on the Arabian Peninsula, with a language of religious belonging and identity. Muslims date the revelation of those chapters of the Qur'an that contain the most explicit guidance for ritual practice and ethical standards of behavior to the Medinan period. Thus while Mecca figures more prominently in pre-Islamic sacred history, Muslims regard Medina as the crucible of a self-conscious religious community with a tradition of political and legal discourse.

Despite this, after Muhammad's death, Medina acted as a seat of political authority only during the reigns of the first four caliphs, or "successors" to the Prophet, up to the year 661, when a new dynasty of caliphs, the Umayyads, was established in Damascus. During the Umayyad and later Abbasid periods, caliphal involvement in Mecca and Medina was largely limited to the erection or renovation of ritual structures and patronage of the wives of the Prophet, who lived in Medina after his death. However, from time to time both cities were known or suspected to host politically fractious elements, which resulted in retribution or periods of relative neglect from the authorities. The most famous of these episodes was the rebellion of 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr against the Umayyads, which culminated in the partial destruction and subsequent rebuilding of the Ka'ba in the late seventh century. Nonetheless, the expectation that the caliphs would be patrons and protectors of the annual pilgrimage meant that appearances and investments in Mecca and Medina were frequent and well documented. Successor regimes, including the Shi'i Fatimids based in Cairo as well as the Sunni Mamluks and later the Ottomans, also sought legitimacy through their control of Mecca and Medina. Today much of Saudi Arabia's prestige in the Islamic world stems from its role as regulator and protector of pilgrimages to the two holy cities.

See also Muhammad (570–632); pilgrimage; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Albert Arazi, "Matériaux pour l'étude du conflit du préséance entre la Mekke et Médine," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 5 (1984); Michael Lecker, The "Constitution of Medina": Muhammad's First Legal Document, 2004; F. E. Peters, Mecca, 1994; W. Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 1953; Idem, Muhammad at Medina, 1956.

ZAYDE ANTRIM

media

Traditional Islamic political thought never dealt with media, or more accurately mass media, since its corpus predates the technological revolution. Anything that is "new," whether it is ideas or technology, tends to be viewed with suspicion by "tradition" because it represents a departure from the prophetic paradigm. The prevailing position is that the various media, such as radio, television, and the Internet, are to be treated as tools and are therefore inherently neutral. It is what one decides to do with them that matters. In other words, if the media are used to spread vices, lies, or corruption, then the one who has chosen to use them for these purposes, and not the tool itself, is blameworthy.

The spread of mass media across the globe has been met with tacit approval by the class of religious scholars of Islam, who themselves propagate their ideas through all the means of mass communication at their disposal. The majority of Muslims also have embraced modern media and social networking online, powerful impacts of which were felt in the "Arab Spring" of 2011.

In spite of this prevailing situation, an inherent tension exists between Islamic religious thought and much of what is considered as "normal" programming in the entertainment industry of the West or "acceptable" forms of speech in journalism. Tensions between Islam and technology, particularly the media, have been manifest historically, for example, with the hesitant adoption of the printing press on the one hand and more recently with the publication of caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad in Denmark in 2005, which sparked outrage among devout Muslims but was defended under the principle of freedom of speech among journalists. In everyday life devout Muslims experience unease with a variety of situations occasioned by mass media, from seeing the name of God in a newspaper that has been trampled on the street to explicit sexual content or suggestive images in advertising and entertainment. Although Shi'is have a long tradition of the dramatic reenactment of the martyrdom of Husayn, this does not necessarily translate into more relaxed attitudes when it comes to the mass media.

It is noteworthy that the science of hadith, used by Muslims to authenticate Prophetic traditions since the classical age of Islam, has been compared to the principles of modern journalism that include the necessity of having a source, a check on the reliability of the source, and means to corroborate the report independent of the source. The science of hadith is a sacred endeavor in Islam whose principal aim is authenticating reports for the purpose of ascertaining God's will for humanity. One could say that, in some essential way, the methods of modern journalism are in harmony with, instead of in contradiction with, this sacred science. The difference is that modern journalism exists for the purpose of ascertaining truth in contemporary worldly events. Tensions arise between Islamic thought and the media in cases where news becomes entertainment or entertainment becomes news, the line between the two being subjectively drawn in the first place.

What is news or newsworthy? Few scholars have paid attention to this question in considering the potential contradictions between traditional Islamic values and the modern mass media. A core idea of modern journalism is that the public has the right to know. Traditional Muslim scholars, and by extension rulers, may take a more patriarchal view toward society, considering what they determine are people's needs in order to best worship God rather than their rights as autonomous subjects. In its most libertarian mode, the right to know justifies the invasion of privacy, the appeal to idle curiosity, and the appeal to a sovereign "public opinion," however unqualified from a traditional Islamic political perspective. It also can mean the circulation of intrinsically nonpolitical but morally discomforting news that exposes the vices of others, which is contrary to Islamic teachings. The Prophet is reported to have said that the better Muslim is "the one from whose tongue and hand the Muslims are safe." Nawawi, one of the great collectors and commentators on hadith, explains that this means to refrain from whatever hurts the Muslims in speech or deed and to restrain from scorning them. Contrast this attitude to that of modern tabloid journalism, which seeks to investigate and expose faults, if not to find ways to invent them for the sake of gossip, which is also forbidden in Islam.

In some Muslim countries, such as the United Arab Emirates (UAE), content is censored online and on video to avoid explicit images, although it is impossible to eliminate suggestive themes and innuendo altogether. The incarceration of political bloggers in the UAE is an example of the relationship between political power, which desires to maintain "stability," and political activists, who follow the principle of peoples' right to know. During the "Arab Spring" of 2011, the various reactions of religious scholars depended on their own particular circumstances and context, which is a clear indication of the positional nature of the issue in Islamic religious and political thought. On the other hand, in some Muslim countries such as Turkey, the media are as open and permissive as in most Western countries.

See also democracy; rights

Further Reading

Akbar S. Ahmed, Islam under Siege, 2003; Jonathan Brown, Hadith: Muhammad's Legacy in the Modern World, 2011; D. F. Eickelmann and J. W. Anderson, New Media in the Muslim World, 1999; Elizabeth L. Eisenstein, The Printing Press as an Agent of Change, 1979; K. Hafez, Islam and the West in the Mass Media, 2000; E. Said, Covering Islam, 1997; S. Abdallah Schleifer, "Islam and Information: Need, Feasibility and Limitations of an Independent Islamic News Agency," American Journal of Islamic Social Sciences 3, no. 1 (1986); Idem, "Mass Communication and the Technicalization of Muslim Society," Muslim Education Quarterly 4, no. 3 (1987); A. L. Tibawi, Arabic and Islamic Themes: Historical, Educational and Literary Studies, 1974.

S. ABDALLAH SCHLEIFER

messianism

Messianic ideas have played significant roles in Islamic political history in different forms. The traditional account of Muhammad's life represents him as a preordained messianic deliverer leading a community to political and military triumph. From early on in Islamic history, Muslim groups evolved distinctive doctrines of future messianic figures known under such terms as mahdī (rightly guided), qā'im (one who rises up), and mujaddid (renewer). Over the centuries, Muslims of many different persuasions have claimed messianic functions for themselves and led widespread movements, and messianic ideas have formed part of the imperial visions of major Islamic dynasties. In the modern period, messianic claimants have advocated activist struggles as well as political and socioreligious reform in the face of Western hegemony over Muslim communities.

The Qur'an does not evoke the notion of a future messianic deliverer. This is understandable since in its internal perspective, the scripture is the fulfillment of prior messianic prophecies through the figure of Muhammad. The traditional story of Muhammad's life, which acquired its contours in the first Islamic century, can be read as the first fully articulated messianic narrative in Islam. Muslims in this period were caught in a paradox: their great worldly successes, built on the foundations of Muhammad's religious message, had also precipitated severe internal dissension that included numerous wars and shocking massacres such as that of Muhammad's grandson Husayn at Karbala in 680. This situation generated new messianic paradigms in which the careers of Muhammad and some of his early Companions, regarded as heroes, became models for the hope of future messiahs.

Islamic messianism has from its origins consisted of a variety of doctrines. Among Sunni Muslims, views vary between complete denial of the idea of a future messiah, to the notion that the messiah is simply Jesus in his future Second Coming, to the expectation of a man who would lead Muslims to a worldwide religiopolitical triumph shortly before the world undergoes its final apocalypse and destruction. Among Shi'is, the messiah is a particular descendant of Muhammad, and he is either expected to be born in the future or is one of the imams of the past. The doctrinal structure of Twelver Shi'ism combines these two possibilities since it is centrally focused on the Twelfth Imam, Muhammad al-Mahdi, who, it is believed, was born in 869 and went into occultation (ghayba) in 874. He is expected to come back and, together with Jesus, lead the Twelver community to a triumph shortly before the end of time.

Throughout history, individuals from Sunni as well as Shi'i backgrounds have attempted to enact theological doctrines by proclaiming themselves messiahs. Generally speaking, messiahs rising from Sunni backgrounds tend to highlight the notion of renewal of Islamic law and the reestablishment of a righteous Muslim community in the image of the time of Muhammad and his early successors, the Rightly Guided Caliphs. Prominent examples include Muhammad b. Tumart (d. 1130) in North Africa, Sayyid Muhammad of Jawnpur in India (d. 1505), Muhammad Ahmad b. 'Abdallah of the Sudan (d. 1885), Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (d. 1908) in British India, Shehu Usman dan Fodio (d. 1817) in northern Nigeria, and a number of later West African figures. In contrast, Shi'i messiahs are likely to see themselves as harbingers of altogether new religious dispensations since, from a Shi'i perspective, early Islamic history is not a golden era but a tragedy marked by the usurpation of the rights of 'Ali b. Abi Talib and his descendants. Prominent examples of Shi'i messiahs include 'Abdallah (or 'Ubaydallah) al-Mahdi (d. 934), the founder of the Fatimid caliphate in North Africa, who presented himself as a messianic savior and was justified as such in later Isma'ili scholarship. Among the later Nizari Isma'ilis was the imam Hasan 'ala dhikrihi al-salam (d. 1166), who enacted a dramatic festival meant to represent the raising of the dead after the cosmic apocalypse (qiyama) at the fortress of Alamut in Iran in 1164 and saw himself as fulfilling messianic expectations. In a Twelver Shi'i context, the fact that a particular person from the past, the Twelfth Imam, is seen as the messiah requires a claimant to the mantle to justify a seeming impossibility. Messiahs who have risen from Twelver contexts—for example, Muhammad b. Falah Musha'sha' (d. 1462), Muhammad Nurbakhsh (d. 1464), and Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad Bab (d. 1850)—have done so through innovative doctrines in which they claim themselves to be messiahs based on the idea that the Twelfth Imam's spirit has been transferred to their own bodies.

In the central Islamic lands from 1200 onward, Sufi ideas have overlapped with messianic doctrines of various provenances. This amalgamation stems from some Sufis' investment in a paramount living human figure—called the pole (qutb), the perfect human being (insan kamil), or the seal of God's friendship (khatam al-walaya)—who is supposed to mediate between earthly and heavenly realms. Over the past eight centuries, concrete messianic claims have very often been justified through a combination of sectarian and Sufi doctrines. While messianism is a political doctrine by definition, Muslim claimants are split between activists and quietists. Some have seen themselves as divinely appointed agents charged with reforming society by force, while others have espoused a religiously revolutionary function accompanied by a shunning of the political sphere.

The earliest connection between messianism and Islamic imperial doctrines can be seen in the origins of the Abbasid caliphate (750–1258). As a group opposed to the ruling Umayyads, Abbasid propagandists relied on nascent messianic doctrines to lead a revolutionary movement. Once triumphant, they co-opted the political potential of messianic ideas through acts such as the caliph Abu Ja'far al-Mansur (d. 775) giving his successor Muhammad b. al-Mansur (d. 785) the title Mahdi, which had acquired a distinctly messianic connotation by this time. In later history, ruling houses that wished to portray themselves as direct religious agents (instead of solely being supporters and protectors of law and religious scholars) appealed to messianic ideas. An example is the imperial myth surrounding Tamerlane (d. 1405) in which the conqueror is referred to by the messianic title the sahib-qiran (Lord of the Auspicious Conjunction). The Safavid dynasty of Iran (1501–1722) rose to power and ruled on the basis of a messianic claim that interweaves Twelver Shi'i and Sufi ideas. The Ottomans and the Mughals, contemporaries to the Safavids in their origins, also incorporated messianic functions in their imperial self-presentations.

In the modern period, the three most prominent movements stemming from messianic claims are Babism in Iran (which later evolved into a new religion, the Baha'i Faith), the Ahmadiyya led by Mirza Ghulam Ahmad of Qadiyan in South Asia, and the Nation of Islam led by Elijah Muhammad in the United States. All three reflect the evolution of Islamic messianic doctrines in the face of modern intellectual and sociopolitical challenges and the imperative to respond to European Christianity. Adherents of these movements have often faced repression and persecution by ruling authorities as well as the societies in which they have been influential.

See also Mahdi; revival and reform; utopia

Further Reading

Kathryn Babayan, Mystics, Monarchs, and Messiahs: Cultural Landscapes of Early Modern Iran, 2002; Shahzad Bashir, Messianic Hopes and Mystical Visions: The Nurbakhshiya between Medieval and Modern Islam, 2003; Claude Andrew Clegg, An Original Man: The Life and Times of Elijah Muhammad, 1998; Yohanan Friedmann, Prophecy Continuous: Aspects of Ahmadi Religious Thought and Its Medieval Background, 2003; Mercedes Garcia-Arenal, Messianism and Puritanical Reform: Mahdis of the Muslim West, 2006; Mervyn Hiskett, The Sword of Truth: The Life and Times of the Shehu Usuman dan Fodio, 1994; Abdulaziz Sachedina, Islamic Messianism, 1981; Hayrettin Yücesoy, Messianic Beliefs and Imperial Politics in Medieval Islam: The Abbasid Caliphate in the Early Ninth Century, 2009.

SHAHZAD BASHIR

military

Military activity has been an important part of Islamic history since the Prophet. In the earliest decades of the Islamic community, under the leadership of both Muhammad and the early caliphs, the organized use of force continued to follow patterns typical of pre-Islamic Arabian society, in which fighting was confined to particular months of each year and took place primarily in the form of raids intended to acquire loot and livestock from rival tribes. In the early Islamic context, the men who carried out these campaigns were not career soldiers but instead were paid for their efforts in booty before returning to their usual occupations—often as herders—for the rest of the year. Aside from the elite, specially trained forces guarding the caliph, most of the individuals fighting in the name of Islam were minimally trained and came from each of the diverse tribes that had come under the protection of the Islamic caliphate.

As these early armed forces rapidly expanded the borders of the Islamic territory, the nature of the military in Islamic thought changed in several respects. First, strategists encouraged the use of more organized, line-formation military strategies on account of their greater efficacy. Second, there developed a greater concern for the distinctly Islamic character of military operations, attained through careful imitation of the Prophet in matters as precise as the day of the week on which operations should begin. Third, the military was professionalized, so that soldiers were paid a fixed salary for their work, which could now take up their entire year rather than only selected months. According to works on rule written from a theological or legal point of view, the military was dependent on the imam or caliph, who was the supreme leader of the Islamic state. It was his duty to keep public order, uphold the rule of law, subdue rebels within Islamic territory, suppress heretical movements, defend the borders against invasion, and support the superiority of Islam in the world, and so the military was essential in enabling him to fulfill his obligations. At the same time, the military was not allowed to act on its own, except in defense; it required the order of the imam to engage in offensive jihad, fighting in order to expand the abode of Islam. Later works delegated these same powers to sultans or other rulers of Muslim states.

The organization of the military also changed over time. While the early caliphs were leaders of a single Islamic military force, during the Abbasid caliphate military forces began to decentralize. Several different armies and navies existed simultaneously, associated with various smaller Islamic governments, including, for example, those of the Fatimids, the Zengids, and the Seljuq Turks, in the 11th and 12th centuries, as well as under the leadership of regional amirs. Slave soldiers (mamlūk, pl. mamālīk) came to play a pivotal role in these various forces. Mamluks were light-skinned slaves, often of Turkish origin, who were purchased, brought into Muslim territories, educated in Islam, and trained as soldiers. By 200 years after the Prophet's death, mamluks made up the majority of the soldiers in Muslim armies. Sometimes, as in the case of the Seljuqs in the 11th century, they gained power and became ruling sultans on their own. The Seljuqs instituted a new military organization in which soldiers were divided into different classes, each further subdivided into ranks. Enlisted soldiers and slaves received fixed salaries, while the more elite class of soldiers were paid with land grants for limited periods (iqṭāʿ).

The history of the military in the Islamic world thus went through what may be described as three ethnic phases. In the early expansion of the empire, the forces were primarily Arabs. From the 9th to 11th centuries, Daylamis—from the southern Caspian region—dominated the central Islamic lands, and from the 11th to the 20th centuries, Turks and Mongols dominated. Each ethnic group had a characteristic form of warfare. The Arabs were mounted swordsmen, who also used long spears. The Daylamis, accustomed to mountainous terrain, were primarily heavy infantry armed with stout javelins, axes, and short swords. Turks and Mongols were most effective as mounted archers and used composite bows that were short but extremely strong. Military command usually led to direct political rule, as commanders of mercenary forces or slave troops either controlled the rulers who were supposedly their masters, as occurred in the Abbasid caliphate already in the ninth and tenth centuries, or simply assumed rule. For example, the Ghaznavids (977–1186) and the Simjurids began as Turkish mercenaries for the Persian Samanid dynasty (819–999), then served as governors in Khurasan, and then carved their own states out of Samanid territory in the mid-tenth century. In Egypt and Syria, the Mamluks (1250–1517), former Turkish slave troops for the Ayyubids (1171–1250), established a new regime in which the top echelons of the military and the rulers were all Turkish slaves. In this unique system, sultans often passed on rule to their former protégés, slave troops that they had acquired and trained in their own barracks. The descendants of this elite group, termed awlād al-nās, were excluded from top military command. Turkish military rule therefore became a stable feature of politics in the Islamic world for nearly a millennium. It was viewed as natural by many theorists on the grounds that different ethnic groups had particular strengths and propensities: those of the Turks included horsemanship, archery, hunting, and warfare in general, while other ethnic groups were more suited to various civilian occupations.

Mirrors for Princes or instructive manuals on political rule from the premodern period gave Muslim rulers a variety of advice on their bodyguards and their armies. The bodyguard should be of mixed ethnic origins in order to avoid a coup. The army should also be comprised of units recruited from diverse ethnic groups so that they may be played against each other. In addition, spies should be used to inform on matters within the army as well as in the populace. It is crucial that the military be paid promptly and well: the works lauded the ancient Persian kings for their acumen in realizing that wealth was the basis of long rule because it enabled the ruler to support his army properly. Some Mirrors for Princes also held that the populace at large should avoid military matters. Mahmud b. Sebuktigin of Ghazna supposedly castigated the people of Balkh for taking up arms against Qarakhanid invaders: the result, he argued, was the destruction of the city, which was to his own disadvantage, and he threatened to make them pay him for the damage.

In the modern context, national armies are the norm, and the authoritarian nature of many governments in the Muslim world has ensured that the military forms a relatively large part of the government, using a large percentage of national income. In fact, one might argue that the military—as much as or even more than the president or the executive branch of government—controls the nation-state and grants it stability and continuity over time, particularly in Pakistan, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and Iraq before the fall of Saddam Hussein. In recent years, however, the rise of activist Islamist movements such as Hamas in Palestine and Hizbullah in Lebanon has led to the establishment of trained military groups outside of state control.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; jihad; Mirrors for Princes; slavery

Further Reading

David Ayalon, "The Mamluks: The Mainstay of Islam's Military Might," in Slavery in the Islamic Middle East, edited by Shaun E. Marmon, 1999; Anthony H. Cordesman, After the Storm: The Changing Military Balance in the Middle East, 1993; Patricia Crone, God's Rule—Government and Islam, 2005; Eadem, Slaves on Horses: The Evolution of the Islamic Polity, 2003; Reuben Levy, The Social Structure of Islam, 1957.

ROSEMARY B. KELLISON
DEVIN J. STEWART

minorities

This entry treats both Muslim minorities under non-Muslim rule and non-Muslim minorities under Muslim rule. Due to the limitations of space, it includes only the most significant minorities.

Muslim Minorities under Non-Muslim Rule

The question of the majority-minority relationship has been relevant to Muslims since the emergence of Islam. Muslims began their history in Mecca as a minority persecuted by the polytheistic establishment of the city (610–30). This situation, however, did not last long. Following the conquests of the seventh century, the Muslims became an elite ruling over non-Muslim majorities in the vast expanses of the emerging empire. The process of conversion to Islam was much slower than the conquests themselves; scholars disagree on when Muslims became a majority in the Middle East and North Africa. It is clear that this transformation did not take place before the 11th century, but some argue that it did not occur until the beginning of the Mamluk period in the 13th century. In the Indian subcontinent, the Muslims never exceeded a quarter of the population, although various Muslim dynasties ruled substantial parts of India from the 13th to the 19th century. Historians of Indonesia—where Islam spread by slow penetration of traders and divines rather than by conquest—have not been able to chart demographic developments with great confidence, but Islamization apparently started there (probably in the 15th century) with the ruling elite so that Muslim rulers initially controlled a mainly non-Muslim population. It is not possible to say when exactly Muslims became a majority in Indonesia, which at the time of writing is the state with the largest Muslim population. Similar difficulties face the historians of sub-Saharan Africa. The coastal region of East Africa became a Muslim majority area between 1200 and 1500, while comparable development in West Africa differed from region to region. The Chinese Muslim minority developed during the Tang dynasty (618–907); its growth accelerated during the period of the Mongol invasions, and in 2006 it numbered 20 million, according to government estimates.

In the formative centuries of Islamic history, when Islam was constantly expanding, Muslims who lived as minorities under non-Muslim rule were rare. Early tradition (hadith) considered living under such conditions undesirable, and a tradition makes the Prophet denounce Muslims who live among polytheists. Later jurists do not distinguish between situations in which the Muslims formed a majority or a minority of the population: what matters is the religious affiliation of the ruler.

When the Muslims were forced for the first time to abandon significant areas previously under their control, the legal thinking on the permissibility of living under non-Muslim rule began to change. While some schools of law continued to reject the legality of living under non-Muslim rule, others weighed such issues as the ability to practice Islam freely in a non-Muslim area and the possibility that Muslims living there would bring about the conversion of the non-Muslims to Islam. In Spain, the process started with the fall of Toledo into Christian hands in 1085. Further Christian advances in the 12th and 13th centuries left substantial numbers of Muslims, known as Mudejars (those who were allowed to stay), under Christian rule, but the Muslim population eventually would vanish from Spain completely. In Syria and Palestine, on the other hand, the Crusaders' takeover at the end of the 11th century was followed by a Muslim restoration at the end of the 13th century. Nevertheless, for almost two centuries, the Muslims of Syria and Palestine lived under Frankish-Christian rule. In some areas they were a subjugated majority, while in others they were reduced to minority status. In the 12th century, the non-Muslim Central Asian empire of the Qara Khitay treated the Muslim population with tolerance and won the general appreciation of their subjects. The 13th century, on the other hand, saw the destructive Mongol invasion of Persia and Central Asia, although this episode of non-Muslim rule over a Muslim population came to an end with the conversion of the Mongol Ghazan Khan to Islam in 1295.

During the era of the three great Muslim empires—the Ottoman, the Safavid, and the Mughal—barely any Muslim minorities lived under non-Muslim rule. This situation began to change in 1774 when the Ottomans were forced to surrender Crimea and its Muslim population to Russia in the Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca. A substantial Muslim minority came into being when the Ottomans ceded Bosnia and Herzegovina to the Habsburg Empire in 1878. The Muslims of India were a minority, but since the government of most areas of the Indian subcontinent was in their hands, they experienced few problems until 1858, when the gradual takeover of India by the British was formalized. India was incorporated into the British Empire, and the Muslims of India were transformed from a ruling elite to a subjected minority. After the partition of the Indian subcontinent and the establishment of Pakistan in 1947, a substantial Muslim minority came into being in the newly established independent and professedly secular Republic of India. The difficulties initially experienced by this minority because of its connections with the rival and professedly Islamic state of Pakistan were brilliantly analyzed by W. C. Smith in his Islam in Modern History (chapter 6). The question of living Islamically in a non-Muslim environment has long been the subject of public debate among Indian Muslims in terms of Islamic law: is India the abode of Islam (dār al-islām) or the abode of war (dār al-ḥarb)? How should this question be answered in a region that had been under Muslim rule in the past and in a situation in which the sovereign is non-Muslim but where Muslims enjoy unrestricted freedom of worship? A comparable analysis could be attempted concerning the Muslim minority in Israel.

The 20th century—and especially the years after World War II—saw the development of significant Muslim minorities in Europe and the Americas. In the medieval period, very few Muslims were ruled by others or lived in a non-Muslim environment, but in contemporary times millions of Muslims find themselves under non-Muslim rule. This has become a significant issue of debate among Muslims themselves and in the scholarly literature. The Muslim minorities that emerged in the West are diverse. They differ in their countries of origin, their mode of integration into the local society, and their vision of life in their adoptive countries. In England, most Muslim immigrants originated from Pakistan and Bangladesh, in France from North Africa, and in Germany from Turkey. The Russian Muslim minority has been estimated at 15 to 20 million. The Muslim minority in the United States, now estimated at about 4 million, is also of diverse origins. The first substantial number of Muslims entered the United States as slaves brought from Africa between the 17th and 19th centuries. In late 19th century, Muslims started immigrating to the United States from the Arab provinces of the Ottoman Empire. Beginning in the 1970s, the number of North American Muslim institutions and organizations increased dramatically. The Islamic Society of North America (ISNA), an umbrella association of a few hundred mosques and Islamic centers; the Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC); and the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) brought the problems of the American Muslims to the attention of the government and into public awareness. The debate concerning the Muslim minority in the United States grew in intensity and gained importance in the wake of the terrorist attacks on New York City and Washington, DC, perpetrated by radical Muslims on September 11, 2001.

Among the most important issues in the relationship between these minorities and their adopted countries are their involvement in politics, their economic integration, their mosques, their educational institutions, and their relations with the other religions. As of 2003, there were Muslim members of Parliament in England, the Netherlands, Denmark, and Sweden. All were elected in the framework of existing political parties; attempts to organize specifically Muslim parties in Belgium, England, France, and Germany were not successful. Muslim participation in local governing bodies was substantially greater than on the national level. Organizations that claimed to represent the generality of Muslims in various countries were established; prominent among them were the Muslim Council of Britain, Union des Organizations Islamiques de France, and Zentralrat der Muslime in Deutschland. Radical Muslim organizations with small memberships but considerable visibility also developed: among them, the Jama'at-i Islami (The Islamic Group) was active among Muslims of Indian and Pakistani extraction and the Hizb al-Tahrir (The Party of Liberation) promoted a radical Muslim agenda in several European countries.

In the early 21st century most Muslim children in Europe and America studied in state schools; additional instruction in Islam frequently was given in mosques or prayer rooms after school or on weekends. In recent years, Western Europe experienced a remarkable increase in the construction of mosques, estimated at 212 in 2003, and prayer rooms, of which several thousand were in operation. Countries with the largest number of mosques were England (80), Germany (66), and France (8). Hundreds of mosques from the Ottoman period survived in Bulgaria, Western Thrace, and Romania.

Since the 1990s, the emergence of significant Muslim minorities in non-Muslim countries provided the impetus for the development of a new branch in Islamic thinking called "legal theory for Muslim minorities" (fiqh al-aqalliyyāt). Fiqh al-aqalliyyāt addresses the problems encountered by Muslims who want to live according to Islamic precepts in a non-Muslim environment. The most prominent figures in the development of this branch of Muslim thought are Yusuf al-Qaradawi and Taha Jabir al-Alwani. Alwani was born in Iraq, studied at Azhar, taught in Saudi Arabia, and then became the president of the School of Islamic Social Sciences in Ashburn, Virginia. Qaradawi, a prominent public figure in contemporary Muslim thought, was born in Egypt, also studied at Azhar, and moved to the emirate of Qatar in 1961. Among the matters discussed in the framework of this legal theory are the nature of the Western countries when analyzed according to the classical division of the world into dār al-islām (abode of Islam), dār al-ḥarb (abode of war), and dār al-'ahd (abode of covenant); the question of jihad; economic questions such as the permissibility of trading in stocks and bonds (i.e., if doing so violates the Muslim law that prohibits paying or receiving interest); the problems of child adoption (which is prohibited in classical Muslim law); and, in general, the permissibility of deriving new rulings from the sacred sources of the shari'a (ijtihād). Qaradawi maintains that since Muslims are a community with a global mission, they must have a presence in the West since the West is a leading force in the world and they must influence its policies. He devotes considerable attention to the question of marriages between Muslim men and non-Muslim women. Classical Muslim law allowed Muslim men to wed Jewish or Christian women, though many jurisprudents expressed reservations concerning this practice. The Qur'an permits marriage to scriptuary women, and while, in principle, Qaradawi accepts this rule, he considerably restricts its applicability. The Christian woman must be a real believer (being born of Christian parents is not sufficient proof of this—she herself must not be an atheist, an apostate, a communist, or a member of the Baha'i faith), and it is forbidden to marry a Jewish woman as long as there is war between the Muslims and Israel. Another interesting ruling by Qaradawi concerns what happens when a non-Muslim woman married to a non-Muslim man embraces Islam while her husband retains his original religion. After surveying the views of classical jurists—most of whom believed the woman must leave her husband—Qaradawi rules that in the West such a woman should stay with her husband. The purpose of this rule is to encourage married women to embrace Islam, to spare them the hardships facing women without husbands, and to give the husband an incentive to follow his wife into Islam.

The growing importance of Muslim minorities in Europe and America in the second half of the 20th century gave rise to a growing interest in public debate, academic study of interfaith relations, and interfaith dialogue. Numerous conferences, along with journals dedicated to this field (Islamo-Christiana; Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations; Studies in Muslim-Jewish Relations; Journal of the Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs; Encounters: A Journal of Intercultural Perspectives), have served as significant venues for adherents of diverse faiths to share their sensibilities and points of view.

Non-Muslims under Muslim Rule

This section focuses on non-Muslims living under Muslim rule, whether the non-Muslims constitute a majority or a minority in a given area. Medieval Muslim law initially distinguished among Jews and Christians ("People of the Book" or scriptuaries [ahl al-kitāb]), Zoroastrians, and polytheists. According to the Qur'an, the Muslims are obliged to fight the scriptuaries "until they pay the poll tax (jizya) out of hand while being humbled" (9:29). This has been taken to mean that the purpose of the war against the scriptuaries is not their conversion to Islam but rather their submission to Islamic rule. The scriptuaries who submitted to Islamic rule were described as "protected communities" (ahl al-dhimma; *dhimmī*s). Their rights and obligations were defined in a series of documents referred to as the Treaty of 'Umar (al-shurūṭ al-'umariyya), which probably date from the eighth century, despite being attributed to 'Umar b. al-Khattab, the second caliph (r. 634–44). These "conditions" promised the *dhimmī*s the right to retain their religion and perform their rituals, though various restrictions were placed on religious observance in public. The granting of this right was conditioned on the payment of the poll tax (jizya) and on the acceptance of a lowly status reflected in numerous rules relating to the construction and maintenance of places of worship and behavior in the public sphere.

The dhimma concept, which initially included only Jews and Christians, was broadened as a result of the huge expansion of the areas under Muslim control. The first religious group to be added to the dhimma category was the Zoroastrians, adherents of a dualistic religion that had been dominant in Iran before the Muslim conquest. Though the Zoroastrians are not mentioned in Qur'an 9:29, and though most schools of law do not consider them scriptuaries, they were included in the dhimmī category on the basis of a Prophetic tradition. As for polytheists, two of the four schools of law (the Hanafi and the Maliki) were willing to bestow dhimmī status on non-Arab polytheists. Only Arab polytheists were excluded from this category and therefore forced to choose between conversion to Islam and the sword; however, according to the perception of most jurists, all Arabs embraced Islam during the Prophet's lifetime. The exclusion of Arab polytheists from the dhimmī status therefore had little practical significance after the Prophet's death in 632. Hence, according to the Hanafi and Maliki schools of law, all non-Muslims living under Muslim rule—except for the apparently nonexistent Arab polytheists—are eligible for the dhimmī status; whereas, according to the Shafi'is and the Hanbalis, only Jews, Christians, and Zoroastrians are eligible.

The question of the relationship between Islam and the non-Muslims under its rule developed in the earliest period of Muslim history as a result of the major conquests in the first century. The non-Muslim communities of the Middle East, which was the first area conquered by Muslims, included Christians, Jews, Zoroastrians, and Manicheans (the latter were persecuted and never attained the status of ahl al-dhimma). In some regions of the Indian subcontinent, adherents of Indian religions lived under Muslim rule from the eighth century; this phenomenon grew dramatically in the 12th century and lasted until the 19th. Since the Hanafi school of law was predominant in India, the Hindus of the subcontinent were treated in most periods as *dhimmī*s; the few attempts to change their status and consider them unprotected polytheists came to naught. The Ottoman Empire had substantial Christian and Jewish minorities and developed the millet (from Arabic milla or "community") system for their governance. This system brought the non-Muslim communities (mainly the Greeks, the Armenians, and the Jews) into the framework of Ottoman law while giving them a substantial measure of religious and cultural freedom. The Iranian Safavid Empire had Armenian, Zoroastrian, and Jewish minorities whose situation was, in general terms, worse than that of the minorities of the Ottoman Empire. In the 19th century, the Babi and Baha'i religions came into being in Iran; as religions founded after the revelation of the Qur'an, their adherents never received the dhimmī status and have been persecuted by successive Iranian governments. In Egypt, muftis have repeatedly declared the tiny Baha'i minority as apostates who are not entitled to the free exercise of their religion.

During the medieval period, several groups that began as Muslim sects developed beliefs so remote from Islam as to constitute distinct religions and therefore are considered minorities. The Druze community originated in the 11th century, developing out of the Isma'ili movement and named for Muhammad b. Isma'il al-Darazi, one of the early supporters of the Fatimid caliph Hakim (r. 996–1021) in his quest for recognition of his supernatural status. After Darazi's death in 1019, the leadership of these supporters passed to Hamza b. 'Ali, who is considered the founder of the Druze faith. The Druze call their faith "the Unitarian Way" (madhhab al-tawḥīd) and call themselves the "Unitarians" (muwaḥḥidūn). God is one, incomprehensible and undefinable by humans. The intricate cosmogony of the Druze faith cannot be discussed here. The faith has major ethical components, including truthfulness and solidarity within the community. The community is divided into the "learned," initiated into the secrets of the religion ('uqqāl) and the "ignorant" (juhhāl), who are not initiated but are nevertheless members of the faith. Of the principal commandments of Islam, only the Feast of Sacrifice ('Id al-Adha) is observed. Polygamy as well as divorce against the wife's will are forbidden. The Druze live in Syria, Lebanon, Israel, and Jordan. Their number is estimated at slightly above one million.

The Nusayris (or 'Alawis), whose main concentrations are in Syria and Turkey, are a syncretistic group that originated in ninth-century Syria among radical Shi'is. They are named after Muhammad b. Nusayr, who proclaimed the divine nature of the Shi'i imams and supported the transmigration of souls and antinomianism. They believe in the divine nature of 'Ali b. Abi Talib, as well as in the trinity of 'Ali, Muhammad, and Salman al-Farisi. They celebrate some Muslim and some Christian festivals, but the way in which these festivals are performed and the meaning given to them by the Nusayris are not the same as in Christianity and in Islam. It is noteworthy that despite their minority status, the Nusayris have held power in Syria since the early 1970s.

Mention should also be made of the Yazidis, a Kurdish-speaking group. They believe in one God who created the world and entrusted it to seven archangels, whose leader is the Peacock Angel (Ṭāwūs-i malak). This angel has been identified by outside observers with the devil; this identification has not yet been satisfactorily explained, but it resulted in the description of the Yazidis as "devil worshipers" and has increased the scholarly interest in their history and system of belief. The Yazidis were not considered as *dhimmī*s and their religion was not protected in any way until the period of the Tanzimat (Reforms) in the Ottoman Empire. Their origins can be traced to the activities of 'Adi b. Musafir, a Sufi shaykh who was born in Biqa' (now in Lebanon) in 1073 or 1078 and moved to Kurdistan at the beginning of the 11th century, where he established the 'Adawi order and acquired a considerable following. According to Maqrizi's (1364–1442) account, the order was transformed after 'Adi's death: his followers engaged in excessive veneration of their founder, claimed that he sits together with God, refused to accept any livelihood that is not from him, disregarded sexual taboos, and abolished the ritual prayers, saying that 'Adi prayed on their behalf. Consequently, 'Adi's tomb was destroyed in 1414–15; his bones were exhumed and burned. Since the 17th century, the Yazidis have experienced several waves of persecution and were even forced to convert to Islam. At the present time, most Yazidis (estimated by Kreyenbroek at about 120,000) live in Northern Iraq; in Syria they number about 15,000. In the 1980s, most Yazidis who lived in Turkey found refuge from religious persecution in Germany, where they number between 20,000 and 40,000. Modern Yazidis deny any relationship with Islam, but their religious vocabulary is still influenced by Sufism.

An important minority in the Indian subcontinent are the Sikhs. Their religion was founded in the Punjab province by Nanak (1469–1539). His creed centered on a preference for devotion as opposed to ritual and on a fierce criticism of the Hindu caste system. His followers in the leadership of the community were known as gurus, or teachers. They affirmed the existence of one God and rejected both Hindu and Muslim rituals. The Sikhs started as a peaceful religious group bent on bridging the gap between Hinduism and Islam but transformed themselves, since the 17th century, into a militant movement. This development was caused mainly by the change in the policies of the Mughal Empire from toleration during the reign of Akbar (r. 1556–1605) to persecution, which started during the reign of Jahangir (r. 1605–27), who executed Arjun, the third Sikh guru, in 1606. In the modern period, the number of Sikhs is estimated at 23 million, of whom more than 19 million live in India (according to the census of 2001).

In the medieval period, the dhimma system was the legal framework for the treatment of non-Muslims by the various Muslim governments. It seems to have been changed for a limited period only by the Mughal emperor Akbar, who abolished the jizya in 1581; the tax was restored in the framework of orthodox measures carried out by Emperor Aurangzeb (r. 1659–1707) in 1679. Though the exact nature of the jizya in India is open to debate, the symbolic significance of both its abolition and its restoration is not in any doubt. A much more significant change that heralded the end of the dhimma system took place during the Tanzimat period in the Ottoman Empire. The Hatt-ı Sherif of Gülhane (1839) proclaimed the equality of all Ottoman subjects, regardless of religion. In 1855 the jizya was abolished and the principle of equality of all subjects reaffirmed.

The question of non-Muslim minorities in Muslim majority countries entered a new phase in the 20th century with the emergence of numerous new states in the Middle East, Asia, and Africa. There are Hindu and Sikh minorities in Pakistan and a Hindu minority in Bangladesh. The Jewish minorities in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and North Africa practically disappeared when most of the Jews emigrated to the newly established state of Israel and elsewhere. Significant Christian minorities exist in Egypt (the Copts), Syria, Iraq, and Jordan.

The Shi'is

The minority with the most ancient roots in Islam are the Shi'is. In general, Shi'is have not been denounced as non-Muslims by mainstream Islam, and they are therefore different from the other minorities discussed in this entry. The term "Shi'i" is derived from the expression "Shi'at 'Ali," the party of 'Ali. Shi'is support the principle that the leadership of the Muslim community after Muhammad's death must be retained by the Prophet's descendants (ahl al-bayt) and that religious authority must be derived from the same source. Several attempts to implement these principles and place the Shi'is in positions of leadership were foiled during the Umayyad period. There is no way to estimate the size of the Shi'i community during this period, but its minority status does not seem to be in doubt. Similarly, in the premodern period it is not possible to estimate the size of the Shi'i population in any given region.

Despite being a minority, Shi'is succeeded in establishing major political units in the medieval period. The Buyid dynasty, which ruled from Baghdad between 945 and 1055, was significant for the development of the Twelver Shi'a. During Buyid rule, important developments took place in the development of Shi'i thought and ritual. Shi'i luminaries such as Ibn Babuya (d. 991), Mufid (d. 1022), Murtada (d. 1044), and Muhammad al-Tusi (d. 1067) flourished during the Buyid period. The lamentations of the Day of Ashura on Muharram 10 (the first month of the Islamic calendar), commemorating the killing of Muhammad's grandson Husayn and his supporters in Karbala on October 10, 680, as well as the festival of Ghadir Khumm, commemorating the alleged appointment of 'Ali b. Abi Talib as the Prophet's successor, were granted recognition during this period.

The main political achievement of the Isma'ili branch of Shi'is in the medieval period is the Fatimid state. Established by 'Ubaydallah al-Mahdi in the early tenth century, it progressively extended its power throughout North Africa; during the reign of Mu'izz it conquered Fustat in 969 and established the city of Cairo in 970. Thus began two centuries of Shi'i domination in Egypt, ending with the Ayyubid takeover in 1171 and the restoration of Sunnism. It is noteworthy that the Fatimid period does not seem to have brought about a substantial increase in the number of Shi'is in Egypt.

The political achievement of Shi'is that had the most durable results is the establishment of the Safavid state in Iran in the 16th century. In contrast to the Fatimid case, the establishment in Iran of the Twelver Shi'a as the official religion of the Safavid state by Shah Isma'il in 1501 launched the process by which Iran became, in the modern period, the most important concentration of Shi'i population.

Reliable statistics on the size of the Shi'i community are hard to come by, but it is estimated to constitute 10–15 percent of Muslims. Despite their minority status in the Muslim world in general, the Shi'is constitute a majority in Iran, Iraq, and Bahrain. In Iraq until 2003, the Shi'is were dominated by the Sunni minority. Since the establishment of the Iraqi monarchy in 1921, the government strove to marginalize the Shi'i majority. This was done by using citizenship criteria, such as holding Ottoman citizenship before the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, to restrict the civil rights of the Shi'is. In the late 1960s, the Ba'th government used the nationality law, first introduced in 1924 and amended several times in the 1970s, in order to deny the Iraqi nationality to a large number of Shi'is. During the Iran-Iraq War of 1980–88, according to Yitzhak Nakash's Reaching for Power, about 300,000 Iraqi Shi'is were forced to leave the country.

The Shi'is are the largest community in Lebanon. Substantial Shi'i minorities exist in Pakistan, India, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, the Gulf states, Afghanistan, Syria, and Turkey.

The Shi'is are not proponents of a single political attitude. In contradistinction to the idea propagated by Ayatollah Khomeini and his successors in Iran, according to whom scholars of religious law should rule (wilayat al-faqih), Ayatollah 'Ali Sistani, the most prominent religious leader of Iraqi Shi'is, has been reluctant to be drawn directly into worldly affairs.

Other Minorities under Muslim Rule

Minorities that adhere to religions known to the classical Muslim tradition (Judaism, Christianity, Zoroastrianism, polytheism) have their place in the scheme developed by Muslim jurisprudents. However, other types of minorities also developed during Muslim history. The Ahmadi movement emerged in the last decade of the 19th century in British India. The Ahmadis maintain that they are Muslims in the fullest sense of the word but are not recognized as such by many mainstream Muslim organizations and were declared a non-Muslim minority by the Pakistani parliament in 1974. This happened because their prophetology can be interpreted as contradicting the doctrine claiming Muhammad as the last prophet (khatm al-nubuwwa). Since then, and especially since the introduction of the Islamization policy of the Pakistani president Zia-ul-Haq in the 1980s, the Ahmadis suffered serious persecution in Pakistan, and the headquarters of their movement was relocated to London in 1984.

On the other hand, there are groups whose status as Muslims is not disputed but who are considered minorities because of their ethnic affiliation. A prominent example is the Kurds. The Kurds are a people who speak various Iranian languages and whose territory is divided between Turkey and Iraq; significant Kurdish minorities live also in Syria and Iran. Most Kurds are Sunni Muslims of the Shafi'i madhhab. In modern times, the Kurdish minority of Turkey rebelled several times in order to achieve the independence that was envisaged in the Treaty of Sèvres (1920) but abandoned in the Treaty of Lausanne (1923). The Turkish government suppressed these rebellions and went as far as denying the very existence of a Kurdish people, officially calling the Kurds "mountainous Turks." As recently as 1967, a presidential decree prohibited the import into Turkey of any written or recorded material in Kurdish. In northern Iraq, the secessionist tendency was also in evidence in the wake of World War I, and several Kurdish revolts were suppressed both during the monarchy and after its fall in 1958. The most brutal suppression of the Iraqi Kurdish minority was committed during the so-called Anfal ("spoils," after the name of sura 8 in the Qur'an) campaign in 1987–88 when the Iraqi army massacred tens of thousands of civilians. In Iran, the most important event for the Iranian Kurds in the 20th century was the establishment of the ephemeral Kurdish republic of Mahabad (January to November 1946).

Concluding Observations

The issue of minorities in the Islamic world is complex. The minorities are not restricted to Jews and Christians, who are frequently given exclusive attention when the issue is addressed. Some minorities belong to religious communities that existed before the emergence of Islam (Jews, Christians, Zoroastrians, Hindus, Buddhists); among these can be included the Manicheans, who were not tolerated and are now extinct. Others were related to Islam when they came into being but developed into distinct religions (Yazidis, Nusayris, Druzes, Babis, and Baha'is). Another group considers itself Muslim but has been placed beyond the pale of Islam by the Muslim mainstream (Ahmadis). It is important to note that whatever tolerance was practiced in most historical periods in relation to the Jews, the Christians, the Zoroastrians, and even the non-Arab polytheists was not accorded to adherents of religions that came into being after the emergence of Islam. The prime examples of such minorities are the Baha'is in Iran and the Ahmadis in Pakistan. There are also minorities that are not religious but ethnic, such as the Kurds in Turkey, Syria, and Iraq and the Arabs in the Iranian province of Khuzistan.

The Muslims were a ruling minority for at least four centuries in the Middle East and for more than six centuries in various parts of India. The Arabian Peninsula, the birthplace of Islam, is an area with special rules: it was declared a region in which there would be no two religions, though there is evidence that Christians lived in Najran for some period after the Prophet's death. There was also a substantial Jewish community in Yemen, an area that was considered distinct from the rest of the peninsula according to most early jurists. The Yemeni Jews fared reasonably well until the 17th century, which brought a series of intermittent persecutions and oppressive policies. After 1948, most Yemeni Jews emigrated to the newly established state of Israel. In modern times, a considerable number of foreigners work in Saudi Arabia, but citizenship is conferred on Muslims alone: according to the "Saudi Arabian Citizenship System" (para 14.1), applications for citizenship must include "a certificate signed by the imam of the mosque at the applicant's area." This seems to preclude any non-Muslim from submitting an application.

In practical terms, the fortunes of the non-Muslims living under medieval Muslim rulers varied. Modern historians generally agree that non-Muslims under medieval Muslim rule fared better than non-Christians or heretical Christians under medieval Christendom. The prominent historian Bernard Lewis aptly observed that "there is nothing in Islamic history to compare with the massacres and expulsions, the inquisitions and persecutions that Christians habitually inflicted on non-Christians and still more on each other. In the lands of Islam, persecution was the exception; in Christendom, sadly, it was the norm." This must not be taken to mean that freedom of religion was unrestricted in the Islamic world or that the non-Muslims minorities also enjoyed equality. Nor was the relationship between the Muslims and their non-Muslim subjects as idyllic as it is sometimes described. Various disabilities were imposed on the non-Muslims and they were at times persecuted. The Abbasid caliph Mutawakkil (r. 847–61), for example, ordered his officials to destroy newly built churches, to confiscate parts of non-Muslim homes, to prevent the public performance of some Christian and Jewish rituals, and to impose distinctive clothing on the non-Muslims. It is not clear to what extent these instructions were carried out. The Fatimid caliph Hakim (996–1021) ordered the demolition of churches, the dismissal of non-Muslim officials, and the prohibition of various non-Muslim religious rituals, though he reversed this policy toward the end of his reign. The Almohad dynasty of North Africa and Spain (12th century) denied any tolerance to the Christian and Jewish communities and even engaged in forced conversions. This was also the policy of some Safavid rulers in 17th century Iran. Nevertheless, it seems that the treatment of non-Muslims under various Muslim governments in the Middle Ages was, overall, better than that of non-Christians or "deviant" Christians under medieval Christian rule. Modern Muslims frequently take pride in this comparison and draw from it conclusions concerning the tolerance inherent in the Islamic civilization.

In the modern period, the above-mentioned comparison is no longer tenable. Since the Enlightenment, there has been a marked increase in religious tolerance in the West. With the glaring exceptions of Nazi Germany and some communist regimes, countries whose population is predominantly Christian generally have shown more tolerance than countries whose population is predominantly Muslim. Massacres of Assyrians and Armenians in the late Ottoman Empire and the massacre of the Assyrians in Iraq in 1933 are significant examples of the harsh treatment of minorities in the modern Muslim world. Likewise, the growing strength of radical Islam in recent decades and the persecution of minorities such as the Baha'is in Iran and the Ahmadis in Pakistan and elsewhere go a long way to undermine the argument for the inherent toleration of religious minorities in Islam.

See also democracy; equality; minorities, jurisprudence of

Further Reading

Meir Bar Asher and Aryeh Kofsky, The Nusayrī–'Alawī Religion: An Inquiry into Its Theology and Liturgy, 2002; Allan D. Austin, African Muslims in Antebellum America, 1997; Robert Brenton Betts, The Druze, 1988; Rainer Brunner and Werner Ende, The Twelver Shia in Modern Times, 2001; Michael Dillon, China's Muslim Hui Community: Migration, Settlement and Sects, 1999; Shammai Fishman, Fiqh al-aqalliyyāt: A Legal Theory for Muslim Minorities, 2006; Yohanan Friedmann, Prophecy Continuous: Aspects of Ahmadī Religious Thought and Its Medieval Background, 2003; Idem, Tolerance and Coercion in Islam: Interfaith Relations in the Muslim Tradition, 2003; John S. Guest, Survival among the Kurds: A History of the Yezidis, 1993; Heinz Halm, Shi'a Islam, 1997; Idem, Shi'ism, 2004; M. Ali Kettani, Muslim Minorities in the World Today, 1986; Philip G. Kreyenbroek, Yezidism—Its Background, Observances and Textual Tradition, 1995; Philip G. Kreyenbroek and Stefan Sperl, eds., The Kurds: A Contemporary Overview, 1992; Donald Leslie, Islam in Traditional China: A Short History to 1800, 1986; Milka Levy-Rubin, "Shurut 'Umar and Its Alternatives: The Legal Debate on the Status of the Dhimmis," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 30, 2005; Bernard Lewis, The Jews of Islam, 1984; Otto F. A. Meinardus, Christians in Egypt, 2006; Matti Moosa, Extremist Shiites: The Ghulat Sects, 1987; Yitzhak Nakash, Reaching for Power: The Shi'a in the Modern Arab World, 2006; Vali Nasr, The Shi'a Revival: How Conflicts within Islam Will Shape the Future, 2007; Jørgen Nielsen, Muslims in Western Europe, 2004; Wilfred Cantwell Smith, Islam in Modern History, 1957; Yosef Tobi, The Jews of Yemen: Studies in Their History and Culture, 1999; Raquel Ukeles, The Evolving Muslim Community in America: The Impact of 9/11, 2003.

YOHANAN FRIEDMANN

minorities, jurisprudence of

The jurisprudence of Muslim minorities (fiqh al-aqalliyyāt) has emerged as a distinct field of Islamic legal research in the wake of the establishment of sizable Muslim populations in Western Europe and North America since World War II. Although Muslims have lived as minorities throughout history, premodern Muslim jurists devoted little systematic reflection to the minority condition as potentially experienced by Muslims, although they addressed in a sustained manner the minority condition of Jews and Christians living under Muslim rule. Historically, one might contend that instances of fiqh al-aqalliyyāt have occurred whenever Muslim minorities have sought guidance under the shari'a. The problems they have faced and the juristic opinions these problems have elicited constitute fiqh al-aqalliyyāt in a descriptive sense. This entry is concerned with the normative usages of fiqh al-aqalliyyāt related to the calls voiced by a range of Muslims for construction of a new system of Islamic normativity (fiqh) that addresses the specific concerns of Muslim minorities. These calls represent a thoroughly modern phenomenon, engaging a number of contemporary Muslim scholars and intellectuals.

The debate on a new Islamic law for minorities, and even whether the project is a legitimate one, is transnational. It takes place in print, via satellite television, in Internet forums, as well as in mosques and Islamic centers of the Islamic diaspora in the West, and the proliferation of mass media has been crucial in facilitating it. Contemporary minority fiqh advocates are based in France, Britain, and the United States as well as in Egypt, Morocco, and Saudi Arabia. Like minority fiqh critics, proponents of fiqh al-aqalliyyāt operate in a global space of normative fiqh debate. Unlike their critical interlocutors, however, they have to work through the disjuncture arising out of their far-flung geographical locations on the one hand and their commitment to setting symbolic boundaries on the other. Minority fiqh advocates based in Muslim majority countries face an even more specific predicament: if their call for the creation of a new law for Muslim minorities by integrating knowledge of the reality of Muslim communities in the West works to disqualify competing voices in the Muslim world, it also undermines their own authority to speak on these issues, not least in the eyes of Muslims in the West, the audience they hope to reach.

The first attempts to theorize a fiqh for Muslim minorities appeared in the 1990s in Arabic theses submitted to the shari'a faculties of universities in Morocco, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, and elsewhere by students who had come from, or had a special interest in, Europe. In addition to works in European languages, they drew on the research on Muslim minorities undertaken in Arab universities since the late 1970s—notably at the Institute for Muslim Minority Affairs at King 'Abd al-'Aziz University in Jeddah—and on a steady flow of accounts published by Muslim scholars and diplomats who had studied or worked in the West. Interest in the questions of Muslims in the West increased significantly in the post–cold war period, when "Islam" and the "West" became related and opposed with a new intensity. This wave of interest in law for Muslim minorities illustrates the effects of geopolitics on the production of knowledge in contemporary Islam. Although the discussion is framed in the language and categories of traditional Islamic law, the debate has attracted a wide range of participants, including Muslim social scientists. The journal Islamiyyat al-Ma'rifa (The Islamization of knowledge), edited by the International Institute of Islamic Thought in the United States, published the first major piece on fiqh al-aqalliyyāt in the late 1990s. In the following decade, and following the shock of the attacks in New York and Washington, many other texts followed.

Yusuf al-Qaradawi's 2001 book Fi Fiqh al-Aqalliyyat al-Muslima: Hayat al-Muslimin fi al-Mujtama'at al-Ukhra (On the law of Muslim minorities: The lives of Muslims in other societies) is perhaps the most widely read and taught treatise on the subject. By the turn of the millennium, Qaradawi had a long-standing audience in the West. His books were read in Arabic and translated into the major European languages, and his program on Aljazeera titled Al-Shari'a wa-l-Hayat (Islamic law and life), aired since 1997 and regularly devoted to Muslim minority issues, had become a favorite of Arabic-speaking Muslims. Qaradawi was also a regular visitor to the United States until 1999 and to Europe until 2004. Since then, his traditionalist positions on gender and sexuality and his support for Hamas in Palestine have reduced his prominence, but he continues to be viewed as a high religious authority and still chairs the Dublin-based European Council for Fatwa and Research, which he helped found in 1997. His book carefully places fiqh al-aqalliyyāt within the discursive tradition of the shari'a, in keeping with his calls for ijtihād in the Muslim world. Taha Jabir al-'Alwani's (b. 1935) treatise on minority fiqh, first published in 1999, circulates widely in Arabic and English versions. This Iraqi scholar, who lived in the United States for two decades, links his understanding of minority fiqh to a larger project of reform not limited to Muslim minorities. In the English version of the text, he relates the need to construct Islamic law for Muslim minorities to the post-9/11 struggle against terrorism. His approach draws on the Islamiyyat al-Ma'rifa project and is grounded in an attempt to develop a new discourse of Islamic ethics drawing primarily on the Qur'an. Alwani's exclusion of the prophetic sunna—embodied in the canonical collections of hadith reports—from serving as a basis for the law is underscored by his understanding that the sunna is intolerant, a view that many of his peers have hotly contested. In 2007 'Abdallah bin Bayyah, a Mauritanian expert in Maliki law who now teaches in Saudi Arabia, wrote Sina'at al-Fatwa wa-Fiqh al-Aqalliyyat (The derivation of legal opinions and the Islamic law of minorities). He perceives in liberalism's claims to fairness and neutrality a real challenge to the Islamic legal tradition's understanding of justice. After elaborating his own method for issuing fatwas, he dedicates a large part of the text to a discussion of the opinions issued by the European Council for Fatwa and Research (of which he is also a member). His commitment to the traditional madhhab or juridical school gives Bin Bayyah's text a specific orientation. While Qaradawi and 'Alwani seem to start from general principles and draw rulings from these, Bin Bayyah proceeds by seeking to recapture the rich detail of traditional fiqh. These three texts highlight minority fiqh advocates' diverse views and raise the question of how to characterize minority fiqh as a project. Advocates of minority fiqh share a commitment to the Islamic legal tradition, the terrain where solutions to Muslims' problems continue to be sought, and a perception that the minority status poses a problem for that tradition. These two general ideas differentiate scholars calling for a new fiqh for Muslims in the West from many of their interlocutors. The level of commitment to the Islamic tradition and understanding of the kinds of problems posed by life in the West vary significantly from one theorist to another, and the minority fiqh project shares a certain indeterminacy with current calls for ijtihād (independent reasoning), tajdīd (renewal, reform), and the elaboration of Islamic law according to maqāṣid al-shari'a (the fundamental goals of the law).

Islamic law for Muslim minorities is also embodied in a number of institutions, including the European Council for Fatwa and Research (ECFR) and the Fiqh Council of North America (FCNA), as well as the efforts of websites such as Islam Online (islamonline.net) and On Islam (onislam.net) to adapt religious rulings for Muslims living in the West. In general the fatwas of minority fiqh institutions seek to reconcile the impetus of the Islamic Revival with the problematics of integration. They oscillate between emphasizing the perceived powerlessness of Western Muslims and stressing their individual moral responsibility. The former founds a regime of exceptions that suspend traditional Islamic norms through legal dispensations such as "dire need" (darūra) and stresses the need to abide by European laws. The latter purposefully ignores the context in order to consolidate a shared Muslim identity rendered fragile—in the eyes of the muftis—by strong pressures toward assimilation.

Criticisms of fiqh al-aqalliyyāt have been wide-ranging. Like its advocates, critics of minority fiqh cannot be easily categorized. They include 'ulama', public intellectuals, and secular Muslims with different intellectual commitments and disparate political agendas. Some of the critiques they have voiced include condemnations of minority fiqh as an attempt to secularize Islam, divide and weaken Muslims, and sell out to the West. Others have argued that the emphasis on the "minority" condition is a syndrome that prevents Muslims from realizing their rights and duties as citizens of liberal democracies. In a 2005 statement, the International Islamic Fiqh Council rejected the idea of a minority fiqh because it is based on an assumed minority–majority antagonism, deemed incompatible with an Islamic vision of pluralism and coexistence, and because it seems to deny Muslim agency.

The debate on whether minority fiqh is legitimate is partly a debate about how to understand the viability of the Islamic legal tradition (What continuities and changes are necessary for it to remain a living and coherent tradition in a diasporic context?) and how to conceptualize the political space that constitutes the West (What kinds of constraints are placed upon Muslims in European secular regimes, and what freedoms do they have?). Very often, however, the texts arguing for or against minority fiqh are more situated engagements with particular legal positions adopted by the scholars and institutions associated with the minority fiqh project. Critics of minority fiqh have targeted in particular the fatwas allowing Muslims to participate in elections in non-Muslim countries, allowing married women who convert to Islam to remain with their non-Muslim husband, and allowing Muslims to have recourse to interest-bearing mortgages to buy a house.

Since the aim of fiqh al-aqalliyyāt is to provide an authoritative reading of the Islamic tradition in a context of migration and social change, its success depends perhaps first and foremost on the recognition of Muslim audiences. This recognition has been ambivalent. The success of minority fiqh should also be related to the way the project resonates, or fails to do so, with wider public debates about the integration of Islam in the West. State policies and debates in the public sphere may contribute to authorize or undermine the idea of a fiqh for Muslim minorities. Both focus on the notion of "integration"—although what they mean by that often varies significantly. Minority fiqh advocates appear to assume that Muslims must "adapt" to Western societies. The muftis thus seem to share with many European and North American policy makers and public intellectuals a common diagnosis of the current situation as a failure on the part of Muslims to integrate properly, an understanding that Muslims are morally responsible for this failure as a consequence of "extremist" interpretations of Islam, and a vision of the conditions under which community cohesion becomes possible and social conflict is eliminated, envisioning Islam as a "civil" religion contributing to the common good.

See also ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence; al-Qaradawi, Yusuf (b. 1926); shari'a

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, "Islamic Law and Muslim Minorities: The Juristic Discourse on Muslim Minorities from the Second/Eighth to the Eleventh/Seventeenth Centuries," Islamic Law and Society 1, no. 2 (1994): 141–87; Taha Jaber al-Alwani, Toward a Fiqh for Minorities—Some Basic Reflections, 2003; Alexandre Caeiro, "The Power of European Fatwas: The Minority Fiqh Project and the Making of an Islamic Counterpublic," International Journal of Middle East Studies 42, no. 3 (2010): 435–49; European Council for Fatwa and Research, First and Second Collections of Fatwas, 2002; Bettina Gräf and Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen, ed., The Global Mufti: The Phenomenon of Yusuf al-Qaradawi, 2009; Asif Khan, The Fiqh of Minorities: The New Fiqh to Subvert Islam, 2004; Peter Mandaville, "Globalization and the Politics of Religious Knowledge: Pluralizing Authority in the Muslim World," Theory, Culture and Society 24, no. 2 (2007): 101–15; Andrew March, Islam and Liberal Citizenship: The Search for an Overlapping Consensus, 2009.

ALEXANDRE CAEIRO

Mir Damad (1561–1631)

Mir Damad, grandson of the highest ranking jurist and head of the religious establishment in Safavid Iran, Shaykh 'Ali al-Karaki (d. 1534), was a scion of Persian nobility from Astarabad who were descendants of the Prophet. Trained as a jurist and philosopher in Mashhad and Isfahan, where he studied with leading students of Shaykh Zayn al-Din al-'Amili (d. 1558) such as Shaykh Husayn b. 'Abd al-Samad, as well as with leading philosophers of Shiraz such as Mir Fakhr al-Din al-Sammaki, he became a prominent figure at the Safavid court of Shah 'Abbas I. His skill in philosophy led him to be dubbed the "Third Teacher" after Aristotle and Farabi. While his writings primarily concern jurisprudence and philosophical theology more than political thought, he was a major political figure. He defended the Safavid polity; trained students in philosophy, including the important figure of Safavid thought, Mulla Sadra Shirazi (1572–1640); and served as a prayer leader and jurist for the capital, Isfahan, most notably conducting the coronation of Shah Safi in 1629 and leading the prayer in Isfahan. On a visit to the Shi'i shrine cities in Iraq with Shah Safi, he died in Najaf and was buried in the courtyard of the shrine.

His contributions to political thought and defense of the Safavid polity lie in three areas. First, he wrote glosses on major works in Shi'i jurisprudence and tradition to bolster the official status of Shi'i Islam in the empire and to further the Safavid project of reviving and disseminating Shi'i teachings as the official theory underlying the empire. He therefore wrote marginalia and commentaries on the four main collections of Shi'i hadiths as well as on al-Sahifa al-Sajjadiyya (The scroll of Sajjad), the famous collection of the supplications of the fourth imam, 'Ali Zayn al-'Abidin, that was widely disseminated and popularized in the period.

Second, in the field of jurisprudence, he wrote works on the necessity of establishing the Friday congregational prayers under the authority of the jurist and in the name of the just authority (al-sulṭān al-'ādil), which was either the Hidden Imam or the jurist as his general representative. He also wrote works on legitimate claims to the rights for declaring jihad and on the need for the polity and religious establishment to assume the guardianship of those unable to take care of themselves. These works, which represent some of the strongest claims to clerical authority in the Safavid period, argue clearly for the legitimacy of the Safavids as rulers with divine favor and for the jurists as figures whose authority underpins the polity of which they are guardians.

Third, as a leading courtier, Mir Damad was also involved in official embassies and wrote correspondence for the shah defending the dynasty, and his elite mysticism favored the imperial conception of authority.

See also Mulla Sadra (ca. 1572–1640); Safavids (1501–1722); al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

Further Reading

Rula Abisaab, Converting Persia: Religion and Power in the Safavid Empire, 2004; Said Amir Arjomand, The Shadow of God and the Hidden Imam: Religion, Political Order, and Societal Change in Shi'ite Iran from the Beginning to 1890, 1984; Seyyed Hossein Nasr, "Spiritual Movements, Philosophy and Theology in the Safavid Period," in The Cambridge History of Iran, edited by Peter Jackson and Laurence Lockhart, 1986; Andrew J. Newman, "Towards a Reconsideration of the 'Esfahan School of Philosophy: Shaikh Bahā'ī and the Role of the Safawid 'Ulamā'," Studia Iranica 15, no. 2 (1986).

SAJJAD H. RIZVI

Mirrors for Princes

The term "Mirrors for Princes," following European practice, is given to works of literature that impart advice to rulers and high-ranking administrators; such writings are abundant in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish. The designaton "Mirrors for Princes" has often been used as a synonym for the more general category of advice literature and applied to a variety of written texts as long as they serve an advisory purpose and address a royal recipient; in this sense, the term has been applied to works of ḥikma (wisdom), mawʿiẓa (moral exhortation), akhlāq (ethics, characteristically in the personal, domestic, and political settings), and waṣiyya ("testament," usually of a father to his son[s] and successor[s]). In other usages, the term "Mirrors for Princes" has been restricted to a particular literary genre, understood as a branch of adab (belles lettres). According to this more limited definition, the designation is usually reserved for independent book-length works (sometimes known as adab or ādāb al-mulūk ["the manners of kings"], naṣīḥat al-mulūk ["counsel for kings"], or siyar al-mulūk ["the conduct of kings"]) subdivided into thematic chapters or sections, in which materials from varied sources (such as Qur'anic verses, hadith, proverbs, bons mots, poetry, anecdotes, historical narratives) feature prominently. Whether the broader or the more restrictive definition is taken, the author's choice of a distinct literary form played a major role in shaping his work and its reception.

Advisory works were among the compositions that facilitated the accommodation of late antique political-cultural ideas and ideals, and their literary expressions, into the medium of Arabic and later Persian. They incorporated and adapted materials that dealt in significant measure with matters pertaining to (or considered relevant to) courts and courtiers, drawn from texts such as the pseudo-Aristotelian Sirr al-Asrar (known in the Latin West under the title Secretum secretorum, or Secret of Secrets), the romance of Alexander, and the collection of animal fables titled Kalila and Dimna, all of which circulated in several languages and versions in the Mediterranean and West Asian regions in the late antique and early Islamic periods. In the context of later Muslim-majority societies, the best-known examples of Mirrors for Princes are a trio of celebrated late-11th-century works written in Persian in the shadow of the rise of the Seljuqs or during their rule in Iran: the Qabusnama (Book of Qabus) of Kay Kaʾus, the Nasihat al-Muluk (Counsel for kings) of Ghazali, and the Siyar al-Muluk (Conduct of kings) or Siyasatnama (Book of governance) of the vizier Nizam al-Mulk. It is perhaps on account of the lasting popularity and familiarity of these highly individual works that Mirrors for Princes have sometimes been associated particularly with the Persian language and with "Iranian" political-cultural ideas. While the Persian language has indeed produced a remarkably rich moralizing literature, these associations should not be overstated: the Mirrors for Princes literature, richly represented in Arabic and Turkish as well as Persian, is extremely varied, and the meanings and significance of particular ideas and motifs, even where they can be traced to "translations" from Pahlavi or Greek, were shaped according to the exigencies of the specific environments in which they were articulated.

Modern scholarship has firmly established the importance of Mirrors for Princes in the context of medieval political thought, the category of which, otherwise construed so as to assign a preponderant role to juristic sources, has been greatly enriched by attention to the literature of the courts. Like their counterparts writing in Latin and the European vernacular languages, the authors of Arabic and Persian Mirrors for Princes did not necessarily, or even frequently, set out to expound a comprehensive political vision. At first glance, Mirrors for Princes often appear to be somewhat conventional in that certain themes (justice and injustice, the virtues of patience and clemency, the importance of consultation and heeding good advice, the need for the king to refrain from making hasty judgments, and so on) as well as certain sayings, citations, and formulae (such as the "circle of justice") recur with marked regularity. Despite these common elements, the Mirrors for Princes literature cannot be said to represent a remotely uniform outlook, style, or mode of expression. The form has proven highly flexible and has been employed to accommodate a wide range of authorial purposes and dispositions. From the 12th century onward, it becomes possible to identify a number of variants: some Mirrors for Princes emphasized matters of administration, some concentrated on the ruler's cultivation of personal virtue, some were encyclopedic in scope, some were homiletic, and some combined several approaches and tones appropriate to particular sections of the book. These choices depended on, among other factors, the background, professional training, and occupation of the author; the period and region in which he lived; the specific circumstances under which he wrote; the language he decided to use; and the interests of his royal patron. An author's reasons for writing might include the consolidation of ties with particular members of the courtly elite, aspirations for professional advancement, and a desire to instruct and entertain. What is clear is that every author wrote under and in response to specific conditions, political and otherwise; indeed, several Mirrors for Princes may be regarded as occasional in character.

A number of scholars, among them Cornell Fleischer and Julie Scott Meisami, have explored the meanings of the ideas and materials relayed in Mirrors for Princes when applied to the particular historical contexts in and for which they were written. If portions of the materials that appear in Mirrors for Princes can often be traced through a large number of earlier texts, their deployment in any given literary context carries its own significance. Situated in its full historical context, a book of counsel may convey a particular vein of commentary on, and criticism of, prevailing political and cultural trends; it may also represent the participation in political discourse of a specific group or faction in response to contemporary conditions and circumstances.

Recent scholarship has placed importance on the literary strategies pursued by authors of Mirrors for Princes in response to the constraints imposed by the relationship between counselor-writer and ruler-addressee. To read Mirrors for Princes in the light of the author's dependence on the recipient provides a necessary perspective, and, although relations between counselors and kings were sometimes quite complicated, it is important to acknowledge the effects of the differential in power. Following the conventions of the literary genre decreased the risks involved in offering advice to the ruler. In addition to addressing an established repertoire of themes and adducing expected quotations from recognized authorities, authors sometimes cast their advice in the framework of paradigmatic embodiments of the wise sage and receptive monarch, such as Aristotle and Alexander or Buzurgmihr and Anushirvan: figures distant in time and context from the author and his addressee. Such techniques allowed the writer to present himself as an intermediary rather than a direct critic.

See also Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92)

Further Reading

F. R. C. Bagley, Ghazālī's Book of Counsel for Kings (Nasīhat al-mulūk), 1964; Robert Dankoff, Wisdom of Royal Glory (Kutadgu bilig), 1983; Cornell H. Fleischer, Bureaucrat and Intellectual in the Ottoman Empire: The Historian Mustafa Âli (1541–1600), 1986; Ann K. S. Lambton, "Islamic Mirrors for Princes," in La Persia nel Medioevo, 1971; Reuben Levy, A Mirror for Princes: The Qābūs Nāma by Kai Kā'ūs ibn Iskandar, 1951; Julie Scott Meisami, The Sea of Precious Virtues, 1991; G. M. Wickens, The Nasirean Ethics, 1964.

L. MARLOW

modernism

Modernist Islamic political thought emerged in the middle of the 19th century as a response to European imperial expansion. Muslim scholars such as Rifa'a Rafi' al-Tahtawi (Egypt, 1801–73), Sayyid Ahmad Khan (India, 1817–98), and Shihabuddin Marjani (Tatarstan-Bukhara, 1818–89)—themselves trained in traditional Islamic settings—urged Muslim societies to adopt certain elements of European civilization in order to forestall further European encroachments. Fortunately, in their view, the institutions most associated with Europe's military and industrial power happened to coincide with the original principles of Islam. By adopting these institutions, according to modernists, Muslims would simultaneously join the "civilized world" and return to the proper practice of Islam. In the words of Albanian scholar Shemseddin Sami Frasheri (Ottoman Empire, 1850–1904), "Therefore, saving the Muslim peoples from ignorance and once again bringing them to civilization"—in the singular, by which he means European civilization—"are among the most important priorities of any zealous person who loves his religious community and fatherland, since the survival and glory of Islam are contingent upon this alone."

From the beginning, political institutions were among the modernist movement's most important targets for reform. Tahtawi, for instance, translated the French Charter of 1814 into Arabic and commented that it offered a model for Muslim societies: "What they [the French] hold dear and call liberty is what we call equity and justice, for to rule according to liberty means to establish equality through judgments and laws, so that the ruler cannot wrong anybody, the law being the reference and the guide." Muhammad Rashid Rida (Syria-Egypt, 1865–1935), one of the leading Arab modernists of the early 20th century, stated clearly that these political principles derived primarily from observation of European models: "The greatest benefit that the peoples of the Orient have derived from the Europeans was to learn how real government ought to be, as well as the assimilation of this knowledge." Muslims could not have developed this independently, he continued. Muhammad Iqbal (India, 1877–1938), the preeminent Islamic modernist of early 20th-century South Asia, went so far as to hail European imperialism as a progressive political force: "Democracy has been the great mission of England in modern times, and English statesmen have boldly carried this principle to countries which have been, for centuries, groaning under the most atrocious forms of despotism."

At the same time, many Muslim modernists rejected European imperialism. Afghani (Iran, 1838–97) and Muhammad 'Abduh (Egypt, 1849–1905), among the most influential Islamic modernists, railed against imperialism in their influential but short-lived journal al-'Urwa al-Wuthqa (The firmest bond), which was published in Arabic in Paris in 1884: "Are [Muslims] satisfied to live under the yoke of foreigners, after having enjoyed supreme power?"

To fend off European imperialism, as well as to reshape society and forestall secessionist movements, modernists sought to strengthen Muslim-led governments. "Can this state be saved?" the Young Turks asked of the Ottoman Empire. For more than half a century, from the Crimean War through World War I, they and other modernists answered in the affirmative, urging state-building through the spread of government-run education, the development of transportation and communication infrastructure, and the modernization of the military, among other reforms. Some of these plans were adopted by certain modernizing Muslim rulers, such as the long-ruling monarchs of the late 19th century, Sultan Abdülhamid II of the Ottoman Empire, Nasir al-Din Shah (r. 1848–96) of Iran, 'Abd al-Rahman Khan (r. 1880–1901) in Afghanistan, and Sultan Abu Bakar (r. 1862–95) of Johore in Malaya. In the view of these rulers and the Muslim thinkers who supported them, Western technologies could be imported to shore up the authority of traditional Muslim states.

Other modernists considered Western democratic institutions necessary as well. In keeping with contemporary European social science, these Muslim thinkers argued that such institutions would strengthen the state by generating popular commitment in the form of increased payment of taxes, obedience to the law, and participation in national defense. In addition to this secular reasoning, many Muslim modernists also marshaled Islamic justifications. For some, these justifications appear to have been strategic: "ideas which were by no means accepted when coming from your agents in Europe," Mirza Malkum Khan (Iran, 1833–1908) told a British audience, "were accepted with great delight when it was proved that they were latent in Islam." Even those who were sincere in their adoption of Islamic reasoning acknowledged the strategic advantage of this use. Iqbal, for example, urged modernists "not to shock the naturally suspicious conservatism of their people by appearing as prophets of a new culture. They would certainly impress them more if they could show that their seemingly borrowed ideal of political freedom is really the ideal of Islam, and is, as such, the rightful demand of free Muslim conscience."

Among the most influential Islamic justifications for democracy was the Qur'anic concept of shūrā, or consultation, which modernists beginning with Namık Kemal (Ottoman Empire, 1840–88) associated with Western parliamentary institutions. Another Qur'anic justification for democracy appeared in a tract by Muhammad Husayn Na'ini (Iran, 1860–1936): "He [God] cannot be questioned about what He does, but they will be questioned" (21:23). Na'ini concluded from this and similar passages that "Absolute power belongs only to God, yet [reactionaries] declared it un-Islamic to struggle against the absolute power of earthly tyrants." Other modernists noted the protodemocratic selection and conduct of early Muslim leaders. Chiragh 'Ali (India, 1844–95), for example, argued that the "first four or five caliphates were purely republican in all their features. The law, when originally framed, did not recognize the existence of a king, of a nobility, or even of a gentry."

These and other Islamic arguments accompanied constitutionalist movements in many countries. Egypt promulgated a constitutionalist document in 1860 and a fuller constitution in 1882; Tunisia did so briefly in 1861 and then after the colonial interlude, in 1959; the Ottoman Empire issued a constitution briefly in 1876, then again in 1908; Iran did so as well briefly in 1906, then again in 1909; and so on. These constitutions did not enact democracy as it came to be understood later in the 20th century: universal adult suffrage, reduction of monarchs to symbolic offices, and constitutional protection of a growing list of rights. Rather, in keeping with most of Europe, most Muslim modernists sought constitutional monarchies with limited suffrage. Many modernists did not believe that illiterates—who comprised the great majority of Muslim populations at the time—or literate women were capable of exercising electoral rights responsibly. According to a demeaning joke told by modernists in Iran, a lower-class demonstrator supposedly thought constitutionalism was some sort of food, complaining, "I've been waiting for two days and I haven't gotten even a single piece of constitutionalism." Western observers noted that the terms that Muslims frequently used for constitutionalism at this time, such as meşrūtiyet in Turkish and mashrūtiyyat in Persian, were only recently invented and, they felt, scarcely understood.

Nonetheless, when democratic rights were available, the popular classes frequently rushed to take advantage of them. After the reinstallment of the constitution in the Ottoman Empire in 1908, workers in numerous fields went on strike almost immediately, recognizing their improved legal position. During the constitutional period in early 20th-century Iran, peasants mobilized to protest mistreatment by local landowners, petitioning parliament and claiming rights as citizens. In the 1910s, Muslims in the four Senegalese cities that had been granted French citizenship began to exercise their voting rights in large numbers, and Indonesians exploited Dutch colonial regulations to found mass civic organizations such as Sarekat Islam.

Modernists' enthusiasm for democracy waned after World War I among Muslims as well as many other populations around the world, as leftist and fascist dictatorships took center stage. At this time, modernist political thought split into several streams. One of these streams was composed of secularist movements that adopted the modernists' goals but sought to limit the importance of Islamic faith in public life—examples include Atatürk in Turkey, Muhammad Reza Shah in Iran, and Amanullah Khan in Afghanistan. Another consisted of religious revivalist movements that adopted many of the modernists' tactics and goals but claimed to be pursuing a political path independent of Western models—examples include the two mass organizations founded in the late 1920s and early 1930s, Hasan al-Banna's Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and Mawdudi's Jama'at-i Islami in India. Yet another was represented by liberal Islamic movements that continued to maintain the compatibility of Islamic faith and modernist ideals, including major proindependence parties such as Ahmad Dahlan's Muhammadiyah in Indonesia and Ahmadu Bello's Northern People's Congress in Nigeria.

Although the modernist movement fractured, much of its political thought remains widespread. Democracy is widely popular among Muslims, according to the World Values Survey and other polls. Parliaments meet in almost every Muslim-majority country and are considered crucial to the integration of state and society, even where parliament's members are not freely elected. Written legal codes are almost universal, and state-run judicial systems are now taken for granted, having wrested control from religious courts in almost every Muslim society over the past century. Large majorities of Muslims hold the state responsible for education, infrastructural investments, economic growth, and other duties that modernists first championed in the 19th century.

In other respects, however, the modernist movement failed. Muslim-majority countries on the whole are less democratic than other countries, according to cross-national statistical studies. The rule of law is incomplete in many Muslim societies. And modernism itself is often derided as overly Western-oriented and insufficiently authentic, even by some Muslim intellectuals who themselves espouse Western-derived global norms such as democracy and human rights.

See also constitutionalism; liberalism; modernity

Further Reading

Aziz Ahmad, Islamic Modernism in India and Pakistan, 1857–1964, 1967; Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939, 1962; Adeeb Khalid, The Politics of Muslim Cultural Reform: Jadidism in Central Asia, 1998; Charles Kurzman, ed., Modernist Islam, 1840–1940: A Sourcebook, 2002; Şerif Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideas, 1962; Mansoor Moaddel, Islamic Modernism, Nationalism, and Fundamentalism, 2005; Itzchak Weismann, Taste of Modernity: Sufism, Salafiyya, and Arabism in Late Ottoman Damascus, 2001.

CHARLES KURZMAN

modernity

The idea of modernity combines a variety of vectors and paths of transformation: economic factors linked to the rise of capitalism, sociopolitical dynamics related to the formation of increasingly centralized and bureaucratized states, and cultural orientations putting a premium on individual autonomy and collective agency, on self-reflexivity, self-steering, and a capacity for creative innovation, and new, pervasive forms of solidarity. This complex yet well-profiled idea reflects in a first instance the historical experiences and achievements of European societies, or better, of some parts of northwestern Europe. It is also important to consider that the transformations that ushered in the advent of modernity concerned religion, both institutionally and conceptually. It was in modern transformations that religion became a clearly circumscribed—optimally, a privatized—sphere, one increasingly differentiated from the realm of politics.

The social science literature that, from the founders of sociology at large (Marx, Durkheim, and Weber) onward, has delineated the key traits of modernity (including its relations to religion) and has postulated that the historical breakthrough to modernity is a Western prerogative, focused on Western Europe and on some of its former settlement colonies overseas (mainly North America and Australia)—primarily because of some allegedly "Occidental" cultural and institutional conditions that did not exist or did not come to maturation in other civilizations. Such civilizations, including Islam, were by contrast considered lacking in one or more crucial features of modernity, in particular the fundamental capacity to spawn creative innovations and to liberate new transformative energies from the "shackles of tradition." According to this vision, non-Western civilizations could at best achieve limited degrees or dependent forms of modernity through their introduction from outside, via a modernization process induced from the West.

More recent theoretical work has revised both the assumption of the uniqueness of the West and the corresponding conception of modernity as singular. In order to reframe the issue of modernity from the perspective of Islamic political thought, a sound conceptualization of the relation between tradition and modernity cannot approach the former as a mere relic of premodern cultures that is destined to be either neutralized or erased in the course of modernization. Specifically, the relation between modernity and Islam cannot be reduced to an analysis of deficits to be measured by Islam's alleged insufficient capacity to supersede its rooting in tradition or in a set of combined traditions, by Islam's dependencies on Western hegemonic patterns of modernity, or by alleged Islamic idiosyncrasies reflected by distorted outcomes of a dependent modernization.

Questions such as "What went wrong?" with Islamic civilization vis-à-vis the modern world hegemonized by the West are the result of static and unilateral views of both tradition and modernity. The famous British Orientalist Bernard Lewis was not the first author to ask this type of question with regard to Islam, nor was 9/11 the first event that prompted such interrogations. The question has been repeatedly formulated from the perspective of a long-term Western hegemony extended over the entire modern world and therefore facing recurrent traumas (from the Indian revolt of 1857 through the oil embargo of 1973, to the terrorist attacks of 2001 and after) resulting in a continual challenge of this same hegemony, often occurring on a symbolical level more than on a material one. The formulation of the question therefore already presupposes that the Western path to modernity is unique, though exposed to challenges.

The heyday of modernization theory, which articulated ideas of modernity as monopolized by the West but exportable, under certain conditions, to the rest of the world, go back to the 1950s and 1960s. The approach suffered a lethal blow in the wake of various events unfolding on the global level during the 1970s and in particular the Iranian Revolution of 1978–79, which raised the banner of Islam against the Shah's authoritarian rule and Westernizing programs. Seeds for an alternative conception, according to which modernity is not a uniquely Western prerogative and cultural and religious traditions are not just detritus left behind by the waves of modernization, were sown in the decolonization struggles, which sparked reinterpretations and critiques of modern ideas and institutions. Their combined result was to challenge the West's monopoly over the definition of modernity.

With even greater intensity since after the demise of modernization theory, key voices within Western social sciences and in particular within social theory have concurred in observing that modernity was never singular, neither was it homogeneous, not even within Europe. A major contribution to make this simple insight productive in theoretical and comparative terms has been the development of a civilizational approach to modernity itself, according to which the civilizational heritage of a given country or macroregion has an impact on the type and outlook of the modernity to come. Yet even within this revisionist approach it is also admitted that modernity—as a global condition affecting cultural life and institutional forms as much as capitalist cycles and hegemonic contentions—equally impinges on a plurality of civilizational tracks differentiating the hegemonic West from the institutions and cultures developing in other macroregions like China, India, and the Islamic world. In spite of such significant theoretical revisions, the older patterns of Western appraisal of Islam vis-à-vis modernity that were cumulatively built over time have retained a considerable influence on a variety of levels, from scholarship to the media—not least, as mentioned earlier, due to the periodical reiteration of traumatic events.

The branches of scholarship that happened to deal with the issue of Islam's otherness from a Western viewpoint saw the light during the 19th century in coincidence with the European colonial encroachment upon the Muslim world. They underwent important changes during the 20th century, mainly as a consequence of the two world wars and of the ensuing processes of decolonization. Yet they were also influenced by earlier views of Islam propagated by leading European thinkers who were not academic specialists within Islamic studies but who contributed to shaping the Enlightenment and post-Enlightenment self-understanding of the West—thinkers such as Hume, Voltaire, Hegel, and even Nietzsche. Both the discourse on Islam's insurmountable otherness on issues of modernity and the attempts to critique and revise it are therefore neither a merely scholarly enterprise nor the inexorable reflex of malign media campaigns. The debate has profound philosophical roots and widespread intellectual implications. Any attempt to develop a critical viewpoint should be aware of such deep ramifications in order to avoid falling into a facile counterhegemonic posture.

A host of historians and social theorists—from Ernest Renan through Max Weber to Rémi Brague—have provided the key link between intellectual manifestations of a Western modern self-understanding and scholarly programs for investigating specific cultural factors that were held responsible for the blockage or delay of the political and economic development within Muslim-majority societies. Within such a body of Western scholarship, it was argued that the doctrine of divine command proclaimed by Islam led Muslims and particularly the 'ulama' to deny a full legitimacy to government and therefore hindered a full-fledged, modern state formation. In a similar vein, the presuppositions to capitalist growth that enlivened the early modern sociopolitical formations of Western Europe have been considered too frail within Muslim lands. The cause for this deficit was often identified in cultural mechanisms of self-limitation of the entrepreneurial and innovative spirit. This self-limitation was in turn explained with the deeply religious commitments of both cultural elites and popular classes.

Such views have been elaborated upon within the specialized scholarship of Islamic studies. An influential antecedent to the discourse propagated by Bernard Lewis in the academic world of the post–World War II era is the work of another leading Orientalist of the 20th century, Gustave E. von Grunebaum. His approach capitalized on selected Weberian insights revolving around a keen understanding of Western cultural uniqueness and its universal normativity. Even more than Weber himself, von Grunebaum engaged in the study of Islam as a representative of the Western cultural elite deeply imbued with its civilizational values. While he was convinced that the Weberian approach held the key to understanding the West's rationalist spirit, he considered Islam to be at the mercy of the Western-led process of modernization. Not least, von Grunebaum followed Weber closely in explaining Islam's purportedly unsuccessful encounter with modernity by seeing in it a dilution of the inner impetus of Christian faith.

This idea aggravated Weber's derogatory view of the Islamic orientation toward immediate rewards in contrast to Christianity's focus on the "inner" realm of pure values. According to this interpretation, the inherent deficit of Islamic faith was magnified in the modern era by the fact that Islam did not undergo the process of self-renewal that the West had been going through since after the Protestant Reformation. This stress on reformation often became an obsessive theme in Western approaches to the issue of Islam and modernity. The Protestant Reformation was seen as anchored in a reform of the self that was facilitated by an increasing reflexivity and rationality. Von Grunebaum denied to Muslim cultural elites and political leaders such a capacity for intellectual renewal, which could enable them to successfully cope with the challenges and requirements of modernity.

Modernization theorists introduced some important distinctions into the picture. According to Manfred Halpern, the Muslim as a social actor is not completely paralyzed by the legacy represented by Islamic traditions. It was evident to him that many Muslim actors were not idle but on the move in postcolonial society. While the process and its predictable outcome amounted for him to a gradual collapse of Muslim culture, some key Islamic ideals may not only survive modernization but can even feed into it, if separated from the traditional system to which they originally belonged. Within this more dynamic picture, Islam appears ambivalently positioned toward modernity: while modernization theorists (wrongly) predicted the demise of Islamist forces, they did allow that selected elements of Islamic traditions could enliven the forces of change.

For all these Western scholars the ambivalence toward the West and Western modernity manifested by subsequent generations of Muslim leaders and thinkers, including the so-called modernists or reformists, was deeply problematic. What most Western observers neglected to see was a cumulative trend among Muslim reformers consisting in rejecting the view of either "Islam" or "modernity" conceived as comprehensive entities, as Western scholars were used to seeing them. The idea that Islam is internally plural and that modernity is a process not entrenched in a singular culture seemed alien to most Western observers, while it gradually became a main avenue of reasoning for key Muslim thinkers. A rare and early recognition of this insight came with the observation of Lothrop Stoddard (1883–1950), a non-Orientalist, who in spite of being a WASP supremacist wrote in the early 1920s that Muslim thinkers were not simply obsessed with the West but rather intent on developing "a new synthesis."

A more comprehensive appreciation of original Islamic approaches to modern thought as well as to modernity as a social process could only take form after the slow agony of modernization theory. A major change was prompted by the innovative work of younger Islamologists and historians. They saw that patterns of intellectual modernity, in their multiple ties to specific developments within capitalist production and markets, were seeing the light within the Muslim world prior to any overt confrontation with the encroaching Western modernity. They placed such developments in the context of comprehensive social processes and intellectual trends that linked Western Europe with the Muslim and in particular with the Ottoman world.

The two scholars who most coherently worked on the idea of largely endogenous seeds of an Islamic modernity were Peter Gran and Reinhard Schulze. In order to tackle the weakest point of the Orientalist argument about the decline of the Muslim world in the modern era prior to the advance of the West on Muslim lands, they challenged head-on the "Napoleon's theorem"—namely, the assertion that the issue of modernity, with its spirit of enterprise and innovation, was first brought to the core of the Muslim world by Napoleon's occupation of Egypt and other parts of the Near East at the end of the 18th century. The main point of convergence between the work of Gran and Schulze is the intent to show the existence in 18th-century Ottoman society, including Egypt, of thriving bourgeois-like intellectual cultures, many of them significantly connected to some Sufi brotherhoods. According to the two scholars, such cultures reflected commercial and capitalist interests and revealed a new, genuinely modern emphasis on social autonomy and individual responsibility. Accordingly, the Islamic 18th century, far from being the stagnant counterpart to a flourishing European Enlightenment, might have manifested innovative dynamics both at the level of culture and politics.

In the debates that followed their scholarly challenge, Gran and Schulze also stressed that the analysis of texts is meaningful only if situated in the context of wider sociopolitical processes of transformation. Therefore, neglecting the sociopolitical context might lead students of Islamic civilization to lose touch with more general academic debates about the internal reform of tradition and the singularity versus the plurality of modernity. In other words, belittling the diversity of sociopolitical context encourages essentializing both Islamic traditions and Western modernity. The emergence of this new type of scholarship prefigured the possibility of interpreting the relation of Islam and modernity no longer as an oxymoron but as a theme in its own right, opening the way to thinking about the capacity of actors to creatively recombine endogenous resources with exogenous stimuli and challenges.

Secular Subjectivity and Social Solidarity

Against the deeper background of Western theorizing about the allegedly deficient capacity of Islamic civilization to fit into a modern world—not to mention its ability to initiate autonomous modern transformations—the new challenge strengthened the argument, supported by a general reflection on Islamic history (including a new attention to earlier works like The Venture of Islam of Marshall Hodgson), that a differentiation of state power and religious authority was integral to the development of Islamic civilization. Hodgson in particular anticipated interpretations that became familiar to a larger academic public only from the late 1970s onward, ranging from the critique of Orientalist worldviews to a plural and civilizational approach to modernity. Hodgson stated that at the dawn of the modern era, Islamic civilization reached the zenith not only of its political power but also of its cultural creativity. Key Muslim actors and institutions, he argued, worked to selectively blend the resources of power and culture that constitute a civilization within the three different but equally flourishing early modern Muslim empires: the Ottoman, the Safavid, and the Mughal or Timurid.

In the early 21st century, comparative civilizational analysts are revising the older bias of Western social theorists by valorizing selected Orientalist contributions like the work of Hodgson. As stated by Johann P. Arnason—a social theorist and leading practitioner of comparative civilizational analysis, who has thoroughly studied and commented on the work of Hodgson—the idea that any differentiation of religion and politics was alien to Islamic civilization has given way to the more nuanced view that this civilization displays specific trajectories of differentiation that cannot be measured on a homogeneous scale via a comparison with purported normal standards, usually taken from simplified Western models. Edward Said was right in suspecting that Orientalists were not alone with their essentialist bias concerning Islam. The mother of all essentialisms lies indeed in the way Western social scientists and social theorists have conceptualized religion and its role within modern societies. The work of revision within Western social theory concerning the issue of modernity is therefore no less crucial than the challenge launched by new historians and Islamologists.

In order to throw more light on the vexed question of the differentiation, or lack thereof, of religion and politics within Muslim societies, we need to extend our purview to the wider context that overloaded the study of religion in the West with heavy presuppositions closely tied to the Western self-understanding and its hegemonic discourse. In a variety of academic disciplines that attempted to locate the sources of human sociability, religion was identified as a key sphere of human endeavor, whose emergence basically coincided with the formation of organized community life. From comparative linguistics and comparative mythology through text criticism and history to anthropology and sociology, an army of Western scholars has worked since the 19th century to investigate the role of religion in the constitution of human society and the social bond. The issue of religion figured centrally in the genesis of sociology.

It was Karl Marx who defined religion as a crucial instrument of domination in human history and as a token of human alienation. Émile Durkheim and the school associated with his name reinterpreted religion as the pristine force of social cohesion through which the subject first alienates but then appropriates the power located in the collective world of social relations. According to this school, religion became the overarching category for investigating the nature of the collective forces providing cohesion to society via ever more abstract—and in this sense purportedly rational—models of solidarity. The idea itself of a modern society based on a rational division of labor became with Durkheim the key to postulate an evolutionist trajectory through which the integrative potential of traditional religion is transformed into a civic religion that is strictly functional to the maintenance of the social bond—a trajectory that sees its completion in Western, modern, and complex societies. In this perspective, secularization as a chief characteristic of modernization does not occur by suppressing religion but by transforming its cohesive potential in parallel with the deepening of the social division of labor. In the process, religion takes on increasingly abstract, and nonetheless civil, forms.

The purported role of a "civil religion" within modernity gained further prominence in the latter part of the 20th century, in particular in the United States, where civil religion was interpreted as a cultural capital of society capable of reconciling tradition and modernity. This approach was also represented, though in original ways, in the work of the anthropologist Clifford Geertz, for whom the role of religion as a source of stability is found both in the most modern of Western societies—especially in those with a strong Protestant background, characterized by an increasing individualist ethos—and in the new postcolonial nations, including many Muslim-majority societies, where the cultural function of religion as a provider of collective identity comes to the fore. This interpretation overlapped with the idea, well represented within modernization theory, that elements of Islamic traditions were on their way to being reabsorbed as fragments of a new collective identity, in forms suitable to new development imperatives. Unlike the idea, dominant during the rise of European colonialism, that the Islamic doctrine of divine authority prevented a real legitimization of political power and justified the colonial supremacy of the West over Muslim lands, Geertz argued that in the postindependence polities of the Muslim world, cultural elites and political leaders might be able to culturally construct and politically legitimize new and sophisticated forms of social power and political organization—different from those of the West, but nonetheless modern or at least sufficiently compatible with the modern world.

The chief latent issue underlying the cohesion of modern, Muslim-majority societies, however, does not concern so much the role of "religion," on which Geertz focused his attention as the configuration of the domain of "politics." The specter of Western essentialism pushed out by the main door comes back through the window when it is assumed that a secular subjectivity aligned with the model nation-states of the modern West is surrogated within Muslim societies by hybrid formations favoring a basically authoritarian fabrication of a developmental ethos, whereby a conveniently reduced type of Islam remains a key component of collective identity. The relentless critique performed by Talal Asad, targeting a wide arch of Western scholarship stretching from Durkheim to Geertz, puts in evidence the vicious circle between the affirmation of secular subjectivity as the banner of Western culture and values and the reiteration of essentialist knowledge of the West's other, as incarnate in Islam. Western norms of modern governance remain both in the metropoles and in the former colonies connected to ideas of individual autonomy rooted in a secular subjectivity. Hereby the "secular" should not be equated with a rejection of "religion" but rather presupposes an essentialized, reformed religion as the necessary condition for the formation of self-governing agents.

Asad has stressed that practitioners of Islamic Studies often wrongly assumed that Islamic traditions had no notion of subjective inwardness, in spite of sufficient evidence of the importance of subjective intention and cultivation of the self, both in Islamic worship and in mysticism. Certainly, modern Western subjectivity is different in its emphasis on individual autonomy and dependence on state law, regulation, and administration, as well as on consumer choices mediated by the market. Asad warns, nonetheless, that based on a reiteration of such patterns across various stages of world politics (e.g., from the colonial to the postcolonial age), a full normalization of politics in Muslim-majority societies will always be deferred to some form of direct or indirect, benign or violent intervention by Western powers.

The historical reality is far more complex. Muslim intellectuals from the Maghrib to the Ottoman Empire viewed modern Europe not as culturally unique but as a frontier of new ideas and programs for the rational steering of society. The trauma of colonialism fractured this potentially positive perception of Europe, yet the continuous development of solidarity within modern European societies continued to impress subsequent generations of several Muslim reformers, for whom modern power could be attained within and through a variety of cultural settings. According to these Muslim reformers, there was nothing wrong with Islam per se, provided that its pristine forms of social cohesion and power were restored and reenergized. Yet most reformers remained caught in a polarizing dilemma, also evidenced by Asad's critique: Is the "organic solidarity" envisioned by Durkheim a legitimate goal for Muslim leaders intent on pushing for the reform of their societies? Does it necessarily require turning religion into mere civic morals? Or can it help instead retrieve the full power of Islamic normativity and even promote a transnational dimension of solidarity extended to the entire Islamic umma (community of believers)? Is the price to be paid the acceptance of the secular subjectivity of the citizen as reflected in the historic trajectory of Western nation-states: a type of subjectivity requiring a privatization of shari'a? While the latter option seems unattractive to the majority of Muslim intellectuals, all other responses risk becoming trapped in facile formulas of reconciliation of "tradition and modernity" that hide the node represented by the normative requirements of the secular subjectivity rooted in the Western historic models and experiences.

Premodern Forms of Collective Action and the Role of Sufism

Revising the postulates of the Western monopoly of modernity entails a questioning of its universally normative power. Western Europe accomplished a compromise between the state's control of the religious field and the sovereignty of the soul, between publicness and inwardness. This normative arrangement, however, does not match the historic dynamics through which the Islamic dīn (religion) was incorporated within sociopolitical structures. The dīn and the dawla (state) designated different, though at times overlapping, fields of social activity. Bernard Lewis's typical assertion that the state and the church are identical in Islam is fundamentally flawed, since neither "church" nor "state" are concepts that can be neatly translated into the institutional grammar of Islamic traditions. The conceptual pair dīn and dawla designates two poles of activity that permanently contribute to each other's definition while retaining their principled, though conditional, autonomy: they are not absolutely autonomous; rather, they are autonomous within the boundaries defined by Islam. Even at face value, the slogan islām dīn wa-dawla (Islam is religion and state), which became particularly popular as a modern Islamic response to a state whose autonomy was compromised by colonial dependency, does not proclaim the identity of religion and state but the possibility of their concomitant and, optimally, mutual legitimation "in Islam." The problem in the formula is not an alleged identity of religion and state but rather a strong essentialization of Islam and of its univocal normative force—a presumption that was maintained with particular energy by Western Orientalists in the first place and by some Islamic actors concomitantly or subsequently.

Therefore, one cannot impute a deficit to Islamic civilization for having largely shunned the fully autonomous powers of Western models. Yet in the reiteration of historical processes under Western norms of autonomous agency—inscribed in constitutional formulas, sanctioned by human rights provisions, and prescribed in the form of good governance—this specific type of autonomy becomes an absolute value, in proximity of which any other tradition of self-governance is rarely recognized as fully legitimate from a Western viewpoint (be it "absolutist" or "relativist"). Modern associations invoking a specifically Islamic ethos and adopting organizational forms and funding patterns that refer directly or indirectly to Islamic tenets have had to prove their loyalty to the state in Egypt, while in France they have sometimes claimed a secular identity in order not to incur the suspicion of the authorities and of the public alike.

Invocations of an Islamic legitimacy of forms of organization cannot be reduced to a mere counteressentialist reflex prompted by the need to respond to the affirmation of the universality of Western standards. Once more we need the help of unbiased Orientalist scholarship to understand the relation of tradition and modernity in Islamic history. Hodgson stressed in particular the seminal role of Sufi movements, especially in the later phase of the Middle Periods, during the three centuries that preceded the modern era and the nearly simultaneous rise of what he termed the three dynamic and powerful "gunpowder empires" of the Muslim world: the Ottoman, the Safavid, and the Mughal or Timurid. According to Hodgson, Islamic civilization gained from the 13th to the 15th century the profile of a transstate ecumene, thanks to a steady expansion across the Afro-Eurasian landmass.

Orientalists before (but also after) Hodgson have mainly characterized this "medieval" period as an epoch of decadence and lack of creativity. It cannot be denied that in this phase, which followed the Mongol invasion of the mid-13th century, political domination was weak and fragmented. Yet at the same time, the cultural elaboration on the relationship between siyāsa (a term of Mongol origin that means sheer government) and shari'a (designating the comprehensive idea of Islamic normativity more than simply "law") reached a high point. During this period, Muslim society was a society of networks more than states, so that social governance and its legitimacy were effectively divorced from state power. In the Middle Periods, and especially in its latest phase, Sufi turuq (brotherhoods) played a key role in Islam's expansion into the Eurasian depths—particularly into the Indian subcontinent and Southeast Asia—and across sub-Saharan Africa. Their flexible and semiformal model of organization and connectedness, of balancing competition, cooperation, and hierarchy, was well suited to the political characteristics of the epoch. As synthetically put by Hodgson at the end of this period, at the threshold of the modern era, thanks to the expansive capacity of this crystallizing model of soft governance, the dynamics of Islamic civilization exhibited a markedly hegemonic potential.

The most interesting question to ask from a contemporary perspective, which witnesses the erosion of the West-centered state system and the advent, in the wake of globalization, of new forms of governance and solidarity, concerns the aborted yet still latent potential of religious cosmopolitanism that Islamic civilization inherited from the Middle Periods and ambivalently invested into the structures of power of the modern Muslim empires. Viewed from the perspective of the seminal developments of the Middle Periods, these empires, in spite of displaying impressive political power, military organization, and promotion of high culture, and basing their power on specific patterns of differentiation of state and religion, could only partially inherit the creative impetus of the Middle Periods, when a cosmopolitan high culture thrived alongside a dense social autonomy balancing horizontal cooperation and solidarity with hierarchy and command—a pattern that facilitated the penetration of the Islamic message into the lifeworld of lower population strata across new territories.

Western scholars and Muslim reformers alike predicted that the Sufi networks would vanish as several colonial and postcolonial societies of the Muslim world adopted a greater separation between the religious sphere and a civic domain or "civil society." Yet in the colonial era some Sufi orders expanded their constituencies, and some actually participated in or even led movements of resistance against colonial occupation, most notably in North and West Africa and in Southeast Asia. Several scholars have noticed major shifts in some Sufi orders toward more formal and hierarchical modes of organization since the 18th century—a development that demonstrated their ability to push for social and even political change. While this thesis is well reflected in the previously examined work by Gran and Schulze, earlier scholars like Fazlur Rahman and John O. Voll already spoke of a distinctive "neo-Sufi" associational form characterized by a sociopolitical activism nurtured by a commitment to Islam's potential for mobilizing various social groups in order to implement Islamic ideals of justice. Some such Sufi groups cultivated the study of hadith in ways that are comparable to some puritan movements—like the Wahhabis—of a decidedly anti-Sufi inclination. The decentralized nature of studies of hadith and the latitude allowed within this branch of study to reinterpret norms of social interaction, including those affecting trade and business, appeared in some cases to further the interests of a rising commercial class. Some urban reformers of the 19th century seemed to be influenced by selective Sufi ideas even in the absence of solid organizational ties to any tariqa or Sufi master. Those reformers who attacked Sufism stigmatized types of practices (like saint worshipping, shrine and grave visits, and above all the "abominable" display of superstition and promiscuity at Sufi saints festivals) that most "neo-Sufi" leaders also shunned.

Sufi orders were overall in good health during the 19th and early 20th century and able to absorb the challenge of colonialism in order to partially renew their social goals and organizational forms; yet by the middle of the 20th century, during the formation of postindependence states, observers registered a state of stagnation if not an outward crisis of Sufism. Nonetheless, this moment of difficulty was overcome in the 1970s via the larger phenomenon commonly dubbed Islamic resurgence, which took a firmer root in a nonoverly political, "civic" field and therefore also favored a revival of Sufi types of affiliation. Nonetheless, especially in late-colonial and postindependence settings, Sufi orders in many countries underwent a process of bureaucratization through their subjection to a more centralized control under ultimate state supervision and patronage. In the new context, however, Sufi leaders often sought connection and influence with various, sometimes high echelons of the state bureaucracy. In this sense, while the formula of incorporation of awqāf (plural of waqf: "pious foundation") into the state administration was streamlined and could be roughly compared to secularization processes in European settings (whereby the first meaning of secularization was the confiscation of church properties by the state), the way Sufi orders renegotiated their space and autonomy in a postcolonial, nation-state setting was open to arrangements that did not necessarily erase the earlier autonomous dynamism of Sufism and in some cases even reinvigorated it. In republican Turkey, the Naqshbandis (almost reflecting a prototype of neo-Sufi ethos) reenergized themselves in the second half on the 20th century in spite of the thorough secularization measures of earlier republican governments. Most notable in Turkey is the capacity of Sufism to mutate into a new type of movement that is no longer formally a Sufi order but incorporates a rationalization of the Sufi ethos and its flexible organizational and disciplinary forms. This is the case of the Nur movement founded by Sa'id Nursi and its presently most successful spin-off initiated by Fethullah Gülen: increasingly pervasive in the media world and in the educational sector, aiming at the formation of new elites and audiences alike, imbued of a modern Islamic ethos, and active transnationally, not only in Turkey but also in several other countries of West and East.

Modern Politics and the Reform Program

In contrast to the pursuit of the social idea of human connectedness inspired to the "common good"—an idea that cuts across the divide between tradition and modernity—the prime theme of modernity lies in the issue of differentiation between societal spheres, a process governed by the new forms of power and regulation deployed by modern states. This process affected the original forms of organization and collective action historically promoted by Sufi orders in their pursuit of interconnectedness over distant spaces. The process of differentiation did not destroy or absorb the patterns of connectedness promoted by Sufism—but by affirming the centralization and monopolization of the state's power on the territory on which it exercised sovereignty, it inculcated in the state subjects the disciplines of the rational agent, increasingly identified with the social agent acting on the basis of narrowly defined personal interests (homo economicus). As an unexpected consequence of the process, these subjects started to reclaim more control of governance and tried to compensate the emerging dominance of economic rationales within social relations by mobilizing the ties of affection and solidarity entailed by ideals of civility—intended as a form of social intercourse, politeness, and interconnectedness that cuts across closed communities and confessional divides. The observation of the unfolding of such highly ambivalent processes in Muslim-majority societies first in the colonial era and then in the postindependence settings also drew the attention of observers to the programs of a host of self-proclaimed Muslim reformers. Many of them still saw in the Sufi ethic a resource, and not a hindrance, for encouraging a new ethos of participation.

Within Muslim societies, the path to modern transformations cannot be therefore reduced to an adaptationist twist of an older model of "Oriental despotism," which never existed except in the imagination of Western thinkers. Unless we want to identify the access to political modernity of Muslim-majority societies as a process entirely induced by colonial domination or indirect Western pressures (as in the case of the Ottoman Empire, whose kernel regions were never controlled by colonial powers), we should look at the transformations of the cohesive and mobilizing potential of discourses on the "common good" cutting across the conventional divide between traditional and modern social worlds. Islamic notions of the common good (maslaha) were appropriated by some early reformers in the 18th century (some of them linked to neo-Sufi groups) and were later reinvigorated both intellectually and politically by subsequent generations of thinkers and activists in the context of colonial and postcolonial politics, or, in the Ottoman Empire, in the framework of administrative reforms, known as Tanzimat, and which started in the 1830s.

It is noteworthy that the culture of those reformers who were also members of the high echelons of the state bureaucracy was particularly close to the adab tradition—distinct from the core Islamic traditions based on Qur'an and sunna—inherited from Persianate court culture. Adab denotes the catalogs of the ethical and practical norms of good life that were cultivated by a class of literati in the framework of life at court: a tradition that was central to Islamic civilization, even if detached from the core religious traditions. Far from being abandoned at the passage to the modern era, the cultivation of the adab tradition provided the background culture to the scribal class during the period, from the 18th century onward, when it increasingly acquired the ambitions of a modern bureaucracy. We might conceive of the transformations of adab as the cultural engine of a civilizing process in the sense highlighted by Norbert Elias: initiated in court milieus but with the potential to reach down the social ladder and encompass wider populations, and therefore as a substantial aid to "state-building." The upgrading of adab into the matrix for a self-sustaining civilizing process starting in the era of the Tanzimat (during which printed administrative bulletins first saw the light) was followed by the rise of a full-fledged public sphere based on a largely free press and the emergence of new genres of public speech. This process suggests that conceptual syntheses of the essence of modernity in terms of either autonomy or self-mastery neglect the more complex social layering effected by a "civilizing process" also via the communicative sophistications allowed within a modern public sphere. Both phenomena are particularly well visible in a sociopolitical world, as in Ottoman and other Muslim, post-Ottoman and postcolonial societies, which are neither the modern incarnation of Oriental despotism nor the exact antithesis of liberal civil society.

By the time, in the late 19th century, when the reform discourse started to be formulated in the context of emerging public spheres by urban personalities who were in most cases both thinkers and activists and sometimes state servants, the Western diagnosis of the inherent deficits of Islamic cultural traditions was already gaining currency. Starting with Afghani (1838–97), reformers were faced with the task both to ground a shared cultural perspective and institute its communicative infrastructure in order to challenge their Western colonialist counterparts on their own terrain while relying on select elements of their own intellectual traditions and institutional legacies. With later reformers such as Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), the operational conditions were complicated by the fact that colonial (and later postcolonial) rule at the same time empowered the reform discourse and channeled it into a modern, positive view of the law as a key tool of reform controlled by the state.

The resulting visions could no longer be reconciled with the traditional approach to maslaha, in spite of the rising popularity of this concept among many Muslim reformers who were interested in its potential to provide the hub for a Muslim theory of social agency and autonomous judgment. The way the Islamic traditions ingrained into the newly emerging sphere that became the battleground of the civilizing process marks an interesting difference with regard to developments in northwestern Europe, where the moral subject was, initially, effectively integrated in the governance machine of the modern state before it claimed autonomy in the public sphere. In the Ottoman Empire and especially in Egypt, the public sphere, though still dependent from conditions dictated by the colonial regimes, developed from the beginning an autonomous potential distinct from the state by virtue of its reposing on a newly recombined discourse of shari'a and adab—a discourse that, though focused on the building of a new moral subject, was not entirely functional to the sovereign domain of state law and was still to a large extent related to ideals of connectedness and self-governance. This is best illustrated by 'Abdallah al-Nadim (1845–96), a committed Muslim reformer but also one major disseminator of adab, who defined virtue not just in terms of the canonical injunction al-amr bi-l-ma'ruf wa-l-nahi 'an al-munkar (commanding right and forbidding wrong) that is at the heart of the normative system of shari'a, but as tied to economic development and "industriousness." Adab thus acquired a meaning close to "civility," understood as an ensemble of moral dispositions entailing good manners and mastery of the self as well as a sense of social circumstances. While initially reflecting a classic notion envisioning models of cultivation of the self, in the course of the reform process the concept of adab evolved into defining a quite homogeneous field of public morality that the state could not fully control by legislating measures.

Global Civil Society and Transnational Islam

The reform project has left a strong imprint on popular movements inspired by Islamic tenets until our era. Yet the rise of such movements since after the late 1920s can also be considered the symptom of a backlash in the attempt to autonomously articulate an Islamic modernity in the context of an ongoing colonial dependence and postcolonial weakness. Instead of increasing the power of the Islamic sphere through inculcating cultured behavior in the masses, as earlier reformers had tried to do, with the formation of Islamist sociopolitical movements like the Muslim Brothers, the reform program ended up justifying a more one-sided focus on the power of engineering a morality-based public culture. One major test of the development of the branch of Muslim reform that has morphed into modern Islamism has been whether it can renounce a prioritization of power as an instrument to enforce public morals and thus fit into modern visions of "civil society." Civil society is in the first instance the outcome of specific developments within northwestern Europe. The long erosion of ideological unity since medieval Christianity and the social fragmentation that resulted from the commercial and industrial revolutions led several modern authors, in particular those from the 18th-century Scottish Enlightenment, to view the social bond as resting on a combination of interest and affection and ultimately on mutual trust among individuals. This formulation replaced a more traditional notion of community as a partnership of faith in God among individuals. The emerging vision stressed new factors of cohesion in society, made "civil" by the simultaneously spontaneous and necessary bond of trust that linked individuals without any divine mediation. The "moral sense" theorized by the Scottish moralists was a form of pristine trust facilitating contractual exchange among private individuals and providing the necessary stability to social relationships spurned by the commercial and industrial revolutions.

Trust among individuals within civil society became the key tool to redefine a social bond increasingly exposed to the impersonality of factory work and of contract-based labor relationships within capitalist economies, as well as to the faceless bureaucracies that were replacing the arbitrary rule of absolutist autocrats. Civil society was considered distinct from the modern state, while it entered a rather symbiotic relationship with it. Optimally, civil society expresses legitimate interests and produces ties of solidarity, while the state guarantees the rules that protect those interests and provides a legal framework for warranting social order. Far from being an antistate, civil society contributes to both solidarity and governance from the bottom up. With the present processes of globalization, however, solidarity at the national level has been eroded, while governance gains ever more transnational contours.

In this sense, globalization as a whole denotes the long-term process of adaptation of practices, discourses, and institutions of a given society or civilization to standards dictated by the rationality of world capitalism and of the international political system of nation-states. The latter increasingly includes—especially since the 1990s—narrowly defined liberal norms, aligned with the governance standards of international organizations like the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. A response to the combined economic and political dynamics of globalization can be found at the level of sociopolitical movements that act on a global scale to challenge the hegemonic paradigms of globalization and propagate alternative global visions, typically subsumed under the slogan "Another world is possible" of the World Social Forum. To describe these developments, the term "global civil society" has been coined—an idea that happens to stress solidarity much more than ties of interest.

As a result, globalization does not weaken either solidarity or governance per se but deterritorializes and redeploys them across conventional borders. Solidarity in particular becomes less tied to locales and potentially more expansive, while governance can be either concentrated in transnational centers or delegated to local power centers less bound by conventional notions of citizenship. The obverse of this process is a looming sense of rootlessness that is caused by the weakening of the incorporation of individuals and groups into nation-state jurisdictions. Sociopolitical integration comes to increasingly depend on market rules and consumption preferences.

The contemporary unfolding of a globally Islamic, post-Westphalian sphere of connectedness, solidarity, and communication builds on the earlier illustrated historical experiences of global interconnectedness within Islamic civilization, while it also responds to Western norms raising the banner of civil society and global governance and to the deep ambivalence of the current processes of globalization, which create new dependences and constraints but also new occasions and spaces for collective action. Although the eyes of Western observers are mainly focused on so-called global jihadism and transnational networks of migration, Islamic globalism includes far more components and facets, which should be carefully taken into consideration. Underlying all forms of Islamic globalism is an abstract notion of a global umma, which superimposes social relations and political contests that are still mainly framed within nation-state frameworks and their narrow patterns of governance and solidarity.

In the extensive literature on Islam in Europe and in the West, several Muslim spokespersons and public intellectuals report a rising feeling of participation in a universal umma—a perception that is sharpened by critical events, from the Rushdie affair of 1989 to 9/11 and the ensuing "war on terror," which have nourished renewed patterns of Muslim global solidarity in the face of a threatening Western posture. This phenomenon is particularly intense in the Muslim diasporas of the West, and an increasing number of Muslim intellectuals who were born or reared in the West have led struggles for Muslim participation within global networks of solidarity. Such battles are often intended to transcend narrowly defined Muslim interests and to join broader efforts for global justice. While increasing attention has been paid to radical groups, particularly remarkable in this context is the flourishing of Sufism. Throughout Islamic history, one strength of Sufi networks was their capacity to support travelers across wide distances. Postcolonial labor migration has been, since the second half of the 20th century, similarly intertwined with the thriving of Sufi turuq in the West. These orders are often linked with the regions of origins of the migrants, such as South Asia and West Africa, but sometimes initiate new networks that cut across traditional regional localizations and attract Western members, including practitioners and sympathizers who are not Muslims in the conventional sense.

To conclude, the significance of Islamic globalism at the present stage of entanglement of multiple modernities might support the decoupling of modernization from Westernization and a reconstruction of modernity along specific civilizational paths conforming to their foundational images, symbols, and discursive patterns. Mass cultural production can further this process but can also increase the chances of building new ties and coalitions across communal or national domains. The growing Islamic focus on transnational interconnectedness transcends a Eurocentric modernist approach to modernity confined within the rationales of nation-states or of new aggregations thereof, like the European Union.

See also civil society; globalizaton; international Islamic organizations; West, the

Further Reading

Said A. Arjomand, "Coffeehouses, Guilds and Oriental Despotism: Government and Civil Society in Late 17th to Early 18th Century Istanbul and Isfahan, and as seen from Paris and London," European Journal of Sociology 45, no. 1 (2004); Johann P. Arnason, "Marshall Hodgson's Civilizational Analysis of Islam: Theoretical and Comparative Perspectives," in Islam in Process: Historical and Civilizational Perspectives, vol. 7, Yearbook of the Sociology of Islam, edited by Johann P. Arnason, Armando Salvatore, and Georg Stauth, 2006; Talal Asad, Formations of the Secular: Christianity, Islam, Modernity, 2003; Karen Barkey, Empire of Difference: The Ottomans in Comparative Perspective, 2008; Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Muslim Politics, 1996; Shmuel N. Eisenstadt, "Fundamentalist Movements in the Framework of Multiple Modernities," in Between Europe and Islam: Shaping Modernity in a Transcultural Space, edited by Almut Höfert and Armando Salvatore, 2000; Clifford Geertz, Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia, 1971; Haim Gerber, "The Public Sphere and Civil Society in the Ottoman Empire," in The Public Sphere in Muslim Societies, edited by Miriam Hoexter, Shmuel N. Eisenstadt, and Nehemia Levtzion, 2002; Ralph D. Grillo, "Islam and Transnationalism," Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies 30, no. 5 (2004); Robert W. Hefner, ed., Remaking Muslim Politics: Pluralism, Contestation, Democratization, 2005; Marshall G. S. Hodgson, Rethinking World History: Essays on Europe, Islam and World History, 1993; Bernard Lewis, What Went Wrong? Western Impact and Middle Eastern Response, 2002; Saba Mahmood, "Secularism, Hermeneutics, and Empire: The Politics of Islamic Reformation," Public Culture 18 (2006); Şerif Mardin, Religion, Society and Modernity in Turkey, 2006; Muhammad Khalid Masud, Armando Salvatore, and Martin van Bruinessen, eds., Islam and Modernity: Key Issues and Debates, 2009; Brinkley Messick, The Calligraphic State: Textual Domination and History in a Muslim Society, 1993; Timothy Mitchell, Colonizing Egypt, 1988; Armando Salvatore, Islam and the Political Discourse of Modernity, 1997; Adam B. Seligman, The Idea of Civil Society, 1992; Georg Stauth, ed., Islam, a Motor or Challenge of Modernity, vol. 1, Yearbook of the Sociology of Islam, 1998; Martin van Bruinessen and Julia D. Howell, eds., Sufism and the "Modern" in Islam, 2007; John O. Voll, Islam: Continuity and Change in the Modern World, 1994; Björn Wittrock, "Social Theory and Global History: The Periods of Cultural Crystallization," Thesis Eleven 65 (2001); Muhammad Qasim Zaman, "The Scope and Limits of Islamic Cosmopolitanism and the Discursive Language of the 'Ulama'," in Muslim Networks from Hajj to Hip Hop, edited by Miriam Cooke and Bruce B. Lawrence, 2005; Sami Zubaida, Law and Power in the Islamic World, 2003.

ARMANDO SALVATORE

Mohammed, W. D. (1933–2008)

Wallace Delaney Mohammed, who later changed his name to Warith Deen (or W. D.), was the leader of the Nation of Islam, an American organization advocating black pride and independence. W. D. brought the Nation of Islam more in line with the mainstream of Sunni Islam, reversing or altering many of the more radical teachings of his father, Elijah Muhammad (1897–1975). Elijah, who took over leadership of the Nation of Islam when its founder, Muhammad Fard, mysteriously disappeared in 1934, introduced many unusual teachings. He taught, for example, that all white people are ruled by Satan but that Allah, who is black, permitted them dominion over Allah's people until the imminent apocalypse, in which all the "white devils" would be destroyed. He also taught that Fard was not a mere prophet but rather Allah embodied in human flesh.

Raised in the shadow of his father, W. D. quickly rose within the Nation of Islam's ranks, becoming the leader of its Philadelphia temple. In 1961, however, he received a three-year prison sentence for refusing the military draft. While in prison, W. D. assiduously studied the Qur'an and the sunna, which caused him to see glaring differences between his father's teachings and those of the rest of the Islamic world. Consequently, W. D. defected from the Nation of Islam upon his release from prison and formed a splinter group called the Afro-Descendant Upliftment Society. He rejoined the Nation of Islam after the assassination of Malcolm X in February 1963. Over the following years, W. D. was repeatedly expelled from the organization because of his dissenting teachings, but he succeeded his father as leader of the Nation of Islam after Elijah's death in 1975.

Upon taking control of the Nation of Islam, W. D. enacted several sweeping reforms. Rather than directly attacking his father's teachings, he altered them to fit mainstream Islamic belief. He claimed that Elijah's teachings were intended to bolster and elevate black Americans but that the teachings were purposefully rendered absurd so that followers would naturally seek a more enlightened path once they overcame their mental and physical oppression. He then opened up the Nation of Islam to all nonblack people, disbanded the militant wing of the Nation of Islam (the Fruit of Islam), and enacted educational reforms, including the study of the Qur'an and the five pillars of Islam. The Nation of Islam also went through several name changes, finally calling itself the American Society of Muslims. W. D.'s changes upset several of Elijah's closer followers, most notably Louis Farrakhan, who broke from W. D.'s organization in 1978 and later formed the "restored" Nation of Islam.

W. D. spent the later years of his life advocating a unified American Islamic community and interfaith efforts against poverty and injustice. He was honored with numerous awards and chairmanships from such notable leaders as U.S. president Bill Clinton, Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, and Pope John Paul II. He was also the first Muslim to offer morning prayers on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

See also Muhammad, Elijah (1897–1975); Nation of Islam

Further Reading

Herbert Berg, "Mythmaking in the African American Muslim Context: The Moorish Science Temple, the Nation of Islam, and the American Society of Muslims," Journal of the American Academy of Religion 73, no. 3 (2005); Zahid H. Bukhari, Sulayman S. Nyang, Mumtaz Ahmad, and John L. Esposito, eds., Muslims' Place in the American Public Square: Hope, Fears, and Aspirations, 2004; Edward E. Curtis IV, Muslims in America: A Short History, 2009; Richard Brent Turner, Islam in the African-American Experience, 1997.

ANDREW POLK

monarchy

Although independent local dynasties appeared on the periphery of the Abbasid caliphal body politic in Iran and Egypt in the latter part of the ninth century, the critical period for the recovery of the Persian idea of kingship and its development was the early tenth century, with the consolidation of a Persianate polity in Khurasan and Transoxiana (mā warā'a l-nahr) under the Samanids (819–1005). The Buyids (945–1062), who ruled independently in Iran later in that century, assumed the pre-Islamic Persian title of shah (king) and even the imperial shāhānshāh (king of kings).

The development of the Persianate concept of monarchy continued under the Ghaznavids (977–1086) in the 11th century. The father of Persian epic, Abu al-Qasim Firdawsi (d. 1020), summed up the emerging idea of monarchy in a famous verse, "Kingship and prophecy are two jewels on the same ring," alongside many other statecraft maxims such as "The king is the shadow of God on Earth." His Shahnama (Epic of Kings) made royal charisma (farr-i izādī), confirmed by the justice of the ruler, the basis of monarchy.

Meanwhile, Greek political science had been introduced to the Muslim world with the translations of works of Greek science and philosophy and was made central to the philosophical movement by one of its founding fathers, Abu Nasr al-Farabi (d. 950). Among the Iranian philosophers who sought to synthesize Greek political science and Persian statecraft in this period, Abu al-Hasan al-ʿAmiri (d. 991) is of particular interest. He modified Farabi's teachings to allow for a more harmonious reconciliation of Islam and philosophy by considering prophecy and kingship the two institutions vital for the preservation of the world. The Ghaznavid secretary and historian, Abu al-Fadl al-Bayhaqi (d. 1077), offers a concise statement on what he calls the two powers: "Know that God Most High has given one power to the prophets and another power to the kings; and He has made it incumbent on the people of the Earth to follow these two powers and thus to know God's straight path."

The Turkish Seljuqs, who replaced the Buyids in Baghdad in 1055 and defeated the Byzantine emperor, creating a vast empire from the Oxus to the Mediterranean, assumed the titles both of shāhānshāh and sultan, an abstract term meaning authority in the Qur'an, which was now assumed by the person of the ruler. Local rulers in Iran used the title shah, and those in the Arab countries used the equivalent title malik (king). The theory of prophecy and kingship as the two divinely ordained powers was reaffirmed in an important statement erroneously attributed to the great Sunni thinker Muhammad al-Ghazali in the 12th century: "Know and understand that God Most High chose two categories of mankind, placing them above others: the prophets and the kings. He sent the prophets to His creatures to lead them to Him. As for the kings, He chose them to protect men from one another and made the prosperity of human life dependent on them." The Turkic conception of kingship as a divine gift to the founder of the state also linked it to the establishment of the law (törü), but as the Seljuqs adopted the Persian conception of kingship and championed the Sunni restoration under the caliphate, the impact of the Turkic conception of the law had to wait for the Mongol invasion two centuries later. Meanwhile, a new idea emerged in the Seljuq period and subsequently gained greater currency: that of the "king of Islam," in such allocutions as pādshāh-i islām, malik-i islām, and sulṭān-i islām. This term was significant in dispensing altogether with the idea of the caliphate as the representative of Islam.

Monarchy thus developed under the Abbasid dynasty, but the relation between the two institutions was never free from tension. When the caliphate and the sultanate coexisted in Baghdad under the Buyids and the Seljuqs in the 11th and early 12th centuries, the Islamic jurists such as Mawardi and Ghazali developed a mode of subordination of monarchy to the caliphate as successor of prophecy and protector of the Islamic ethico-legal order anchored in the shari'ia. The juristic theory of the caliphate, however, did not find expression in the books of ethics and thus had limited currency, being confined to the circles of religious learning.

During the medieval and early modern period, Turkish slave generals established a Muslim monarchy in northern India early in the 13th century, with Delhi as its capital. The Delhi Sultanate lasted for some three centuries, until the conquest of India by the Timurid prince Zahir al-Din Babur (d. 1530) and the establishment of the Mughal Empire in 1526. After the overthrow of the Abbasids by the Mongols in 1258, the rulers of Muslim lands typically called themselves sultan and caliph, except in Mamluk Egypt (1250–1517), where a shadow Abbasid caliph was maintained until the Ottomans conquered Egypt. In addition to shāhānshāh, the Ottomans, the Safavids, and the Mughal rulers of India used pādshāh as an imperial title.

Monarchy (salṭana, pādshāh, mulk) was legitimated independently of the caliphate and its juristic theory and primarily on the basis of justice. The function of monarchy was to maintain order and rule with justice. As such, monarchy was compared to prophecy, the function of which was the salvation of humankind. Kings were thus necessary for cosmic order, just as were the prophets. A distinct literary genre on political ethic and statecraft grew and absorbed the philosophical strand, grounding the legitimacy of monarchy in its justice. A major synthesis of these ideas, Akhlaq-i Nasiri (The Nasirian ethics), was written in the 13th century by the Shi'i philosopher and statesman Nasir al-Din al-Tusi. It had many imitators and became the standard work on political ethics and statecraft in the three early modern Muslim empires: the Ottoman, the Safavid, and the Mughal.

The idea of monarchy as sultanate spread eastward in the 15th century and survives in the 21st century in the federal states of Malaysia and in Brunei. With the spread of Islam into sub-Saharan Africa, some of the Muslim rulers assumed the title of sultan, and in 1841, the sultan of Oman transferred his court to Zanzibar across the Indian Ocean. The idea of constitutional monarchy was introduced into the Islamic world in the process of political modernization, with the Ottoman Constitution of 1876 and the Iranian constitution of 1906. The Ottoman sultanate was abolished in 1922 and the Iranian monarchy overthrown with the Islamic Revolution of 1979. A number of Muslim constitutional monarchies survive, however, notably in Morocco and Jordan.

See also caliph, caliphate; constitutionalism; patrimonial state; sultan

Further Reading

Said Amir Arjomand, "Evolution of the Persianate Monrachy and Its Transmission to India," Journal of Persianate Studies 2, no. 2 (2009): 115–36; Idem, "Legitimacy and Political Organization: Caliphs, Kings and Regimes," in The New Cambridge History of Islam, vol. 4, edited by R. Irwin and M. Cook, 2010; Linda T. Darling, "Islamic Empires, the Ottoman Empire and the Circle of Justice," in Constitutional Politics in the Middle East, edited by S. A. Arjomand, 2008.

SAÏD AMIR ARJOMAND

Mongols

The Mongol conquests led by Chingiz Khan (ca. 1167–1227) produced the most extensive land empire in history, stretching from China in the east to Anatolia and Syria in the west. This vast but attenuated empire soon crystallized into two smaller states that adopted the cultures of the conquered populations, the Perso-Islamic Ilkhanid dynasty in Iran and the Sinicized Yüan dynasty in China, with the Golden Horde, a third offshoot, occupying southern Russia. By the time the Mongols, originally a forest people from Siberia, appeared on the world stage, they had become steppe nomads and intermarried with Turkic tribes; the Mongol conquests should thus properly be called the Turco-Mongol conquests and represent a second, far more devastating wave of westward expansion after the Turkic Seljuq invasion of Iran, Iraq, and Anatolia just over a century before. The conquerors' approach to administration was initially rudimentary and wholly centered on the distribution of booty; though they adopted existing bureaucracies wholesale for efficiency, their primary concern was to exploit the sedentary populations materially and financially, leading to the neglect of agriculture even as a source of revenue.

The driving force of these conquests was Temüjin, the son of a minor clan chieftain, who after a meteoric rise to power assumed the title Chingiz Khan, meaning oceanic or universal ruler, and was acclaimed as such at the tribal assembly (quriltay) of 1206. At this assembly he declared his mandate from Tengri (heaven) and his commitment to the sacred Yasa, or army and civilian code of law. By 1215 Chingiz had conquered northern China, and by 1223 Central Asia and Khurasan. The provocation of the Khwarazmshahid governor in Transoxiana, who rashly executed several Mongol ambassadors in 1218, had provided the excuse for a westward push in which most of the great cities of Transoxiana and Khurasan were razed and whole populations exterminated. Before his death in 1227, Chingiz divided his empire between his four sons according to the custom of Mongol chiefs, with the eldest receiving the territories farthest from the Mongolian heartlands and the youngest, designated as "guardian of the hearth," receiving the heartlands themselves. Thus Batu, the son of his eldest, Jochi, who had predeceased him, received western Siberia and the Qipchaq steppe, and from this base he founded the Blue Horde in southern Russia, while Batu's brother Orda founded the White Horde in western Siberia; the two would later unite to become the Golden Horde. The second eldest, Chaghatay, received Mogholistan and Transoxiana; in the 15th century, the Chaghatayids would come under Timurid sway. The third, Ögedey, became Chingiz's successor as Great Khan or emperor, though this office soon fell to the descendents of Toluy, the youngest son, whose own sons Möngke and Qubilay consolidated China under their rule first from Qara Qorum in Mongolia and then in Beijing.

Qubilay's brother Hulagu (r. 1256–65) meanwhile had been dispatched to assert Mongol control over the Islamic realms of western Asia. In Iran he broke the power of the Isma'ili Assassins at Alamut in 1256 and in 1258 sacked Baghdad and executed the last Abbasid caliph, Musta'sim (r. 1242–58), effectively putting an end to both the Abbasid line and the Sunni caliphate, largely symbolic by this time, as an exclusive institution. In the post-Mongol period, any upstanding ruler could lay claim to caliphal status. The Mongol advance was only halted by the Mamluks in Palestine in 1260 at the Battle of 'Ayn Jalut. Hulagu was appointed Il khān, or territorial or subordinate khan, over Iran, Iraq, Transcaucasia, and Anatolia by the Great Khan Möngke.

Despite an initial dilettantish interest in tantric Buddhism and Nestorian Christianity—indeed, at one point it was hoped in Europe that Persia would become part of a pan-Christian empire—the Ilkhanid line became both Islamicized and Persianized over the course of the next two generations and soon shed any practical connection to the Great Khans in the east. Their underlying shamanistic orientation persisted, however, and was frequently expressed in the form of devotion to charismatic Sufi shaykhs as authorities in matters of spirit and state. The high point of Mongol conversion to Islam is often associated with that of Ghazan Khan (r. 1295–1304), though his Islam, like that of the later Turco-Mongol elite, was a syncretist blend with Mongol custom and tradition.

Despite warfare and economic disturbance, the Ilkhanid period was materially prosperous and culturally and intellectually productive and saw the rise of Tabriz, Maragha, and Sultaniyya as centers of learning and science; vigorous trade led to a fresh influx of international influences, especially from China and Italy. Common hostility toward the Ilkhanids, however, led to an alliance between the Mamluks and the Golden Horde, which the Ilkhanids countered by attempting to create a coalition with European Christian powers, including the Crusaders in the Levantine littoral. The last great Ilkhanid ruler was Abu Sa'id (r. 1316–35), who made peace with the Mamluks, after which the dynasty devolved into a rivalry between petty khans; Iran and Iraq were soon divided among local dynasties such as the Jalayirids, Muzaffarids, Sarbidarids, and Karts. A generation later, Tamerlane (r. 1370–1405) reconquered these territories in his partially successful quest to reconstitute the Mongol Empire.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); China; Isma'ilis; Mamluks (1250–1517); Seljuqs (1055–1194); Sufism; Tamerlane (1336–1405); Timurids (1370–1506); al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

Further Reading

Thomas Allsen, Culture and Conquest in Mongol Eurasia, 2001; Michal Biran, Chingis Khan, 2007; David Morgan, The Mongols, 2007.

MATTHEW MELVIN-KOUSHKI

Morocco

Unlike many parts of the Middle East and North Africa, Morocco entered the modern era with a well-established tradition of Islamic monarchy represented by the 'Alawi dynasty, which came to power in 1669. This indigenous monarchical tradition played a major role in the development of modern Moroccan political thought and behavior. Although French colonial analyses focused on the rupture between the dilapidated "medieval" political structures of the sultanate and the effective "modern" system they introduced during the protectorate (1912–56), it would be more correct to say that, while the Moroccan sultanate was in a state of collapse by the early 20th century, the 19th century witnessed a dynamic reinterpretation of many indigenous political concepts and the spontaneous formation of a resilient protonational community, which was reshaped in colonial and postcolonial times.

Central to this development was the contract that existed between the 'Alawi sultans and their predominantly tribal subjects. The sultans demanded loyalty and revenues from their subjects in return for ensuring their welfare by means of the sultans' descent from the Prophet and their commitment to waging jihad. When the sultans failed to protect and provide, their subjects reserved the right to wage jihad against them, which, as armed tribesmen, they were well able to do. In the 19th century, recurrent popular jihads against the sultans for their inability to defend Morocco from European penetration played a powerful role in inculcating the principle of political reciprocity. The fact that the perceived threat to Morocco came from non-Muslims enhanced the religious dimension of these movements.

The imposition of the French and Spanish protectorates in 1912 further discredited the sultan and fostered the development of alternative political perspectives of European and Middle Eastern origin: secular nationalism, socialism, Salafism, Pan-Islamism, and Pan-Arabism. In the colonial context, Moroccans were naturally preoccupied with national liberation, but they sought it within a Pan-Islamic and Pan-Arab framework that combined recognition of Morocco's distinctive "national" history with participation in the fraternity of "Arab" states. Personal contacts existed between Moroccan nationalists and the famous Pan-Islamist Shakib Arslan in the 1930s. 'Allal al-Fasi, Morocco's most famous national leader and a Salafi scholar, expressed in his memoirs the deep satisfaction he felt when the president of the League of Arab States declared that the Maghrib and Mashriq (i.e., North Africa and the Middle East) were the two indispensable wings of the same Arab bird.

While the Arabs of the Mashriq had to choose between religion and ethnicity, the conflation of Arab and Islamic identity posed no contradictions for Arabs in solidly Sunni Morocco. However, other ethnolinguistic groups—namely, the three main Berber communities—had to be subsumed within the new hegemonic Arabo-Islamic identity. The status of Morocco's culturally and economically important Jewish community was also ambiguous despite reassurances from nationalists, many of whom hoped for a secular republic. However, the sultan, Muhammad V, managed to activate his latent power and authority as a symbol of the Islamic Moroccan community and orchestrate a hybrid political system in which the Commander of the Faithful became a constitutional monarch who ruled rather than reigned.

In the half century since independence, Moroccan political thought internalized many global concepts of European origin. Some Moroccans have called for a more representative government, legal parity for men and women, and greater recognition of the Berber cultural contribution to shaping Moroccan identity. What is distinctive is the extent to which political discourse is shaped by Islam despite the existence of numerous secular political groups. In the early 21st century, monarchical legitimism still derived its power from the dynasty's status as descendents of the Prophet. The most successful rival political discourse was that of Islamism, which, as elsewhere, provided an authentic framework for articulating calls for social justice, a more equitable distribution of wealth, and a redress of the concerns of the frustrated urban middle and lower classes. Although Islamism has not attracted the same following in Morocco as in some other countries due to the monarchy's rival Islamic credentials, it is nonetheless a potent force.

See also colonialism; international Islamic organizations; modernity; North Africa

Further Reading

Amira Bennison, Jihad and Its Interpretations in Pre-colonial Morocco, 2002; Rahma Bourqia and Susan Gilson Miller, eds., In the Shadow of the Sultan, 1999; Henry Munson, Religion and Power in Morocco, 1993; John Waterbury, The Commander of the Faithful: The Moroccan Political Elite—a Study in Segmented Politics, 1970; Malika Zeghal, Islamistes marocains: Le défi à la monarchie, 2005.

AMIRA K. BENNISON

mosque

The mosque (masjid), which serves as the preferred site for prayer among Muslims, has a rich social and political history. From the time of the Prophet Muhammad, whose home in Medina, together with the adjoining courtyard, became the prototype for later designs, mosques have combined worship, instruction, administration, practical uses, and ritual activities with direct and indirect bearing upon the maintenance of order, popular mobilization, and the exercise of power. Although after Muhammad's death, the unity of religious and secular authority embodied by the Prophet could not be replicated, it is significant that this ideal combination of roles played a key part in the selection of Abu Bakr as the first caliph.

The Companions explicitly justified their choice by recognizing that Muhammad had designated him to lead the congregational prayer on numerous occasions when the Prophet himself was unable to do so. This symbolic link between the imam or prayer leader and the ruler underwent considerable variation over the following centuries, but the precedent it established remained a core principle in classical Islamic theories of political stability.

An early and enduring manifestation of the close conjuncture of secular and spiritual leadership is reflected in the architecture and design of the new capital cities founded or appropriated by the victorious forces in the course of establishing the new Islamic empire. A standard feature of this urban outline, which persisted through the Ottoman period, consisted of placing the governor's palace and the central mosque as a pair, marking the convergence of the administrative and ceremonial functions, at the heart of a city. In some cases, such as the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus and the Ayasofia Mosque in Istanbul, an existing Christian church was converted into a mosque, with remodeling and additions such as minarets and areas for ritual ablutions. In other instances, as happened in Basra, Kayrawan, and Cairo, conquering Arab leaders drew up plans for the first mosque at the center of a military camp. Historically, many Islamic dynasties have constructed immense monumental mosques to mark their authority, as seen, for example, in the Mughals' Jama Masjid in Delhi, the Abbasids' Great Mosque of Samarra, or, most recently, the Hassan II Mosque in Casablanca. The actual task of presiding over the prayer was, in time, delegated to others, but typically caliphs or their representatives continued to oversee the conduct of public religious ceremonies and thus legitimate their performance, whether by support, attendance, or through the invocation of a blessing upon the ruler by name spoken during the Friday prayer sermon.

The delivery of the sermon in the mosque as part of the obligatory Friday noon prayer, which the Prophet himself had originally performed, was also entrusted, upon his death, to the designated successor or caliph. Muslim rulers usually delegated this function to a scholar chosen for his eloquence and trustworthiness, but certain fixed conventions defining the classical forms of this oration continued to refer to the leader under whose auspices the preacher was speaking. For instance, the minbar, or mosque pulpit, retained importance as part of the formal procedure for recognizing the legitimacy of succession. Traditionally, the content of a Friday sermon reflected concern for the political order as well as the spiritual welfare of the community. Today, in most Muslim lands, a convergence of worldly and otherworldly concern continues to characterize sermon content, reflecting a wide range of variation from compliance and conformity to dissent and rebellion.

Another pattern that associates the administration of mosques with those governing a community derives from systems of patronage and oversight, including subsidies for the construction, the maintenance, and the staffing of a place of prayer. In general, Islamic legal conventions allow for a variety of particular edifices, large and small, to serve as mosques, but with a distinction made between the many ordinary mosques for everyday use and a limited number of generally much larger cathedral mosques. Traditionally, only these more spacious and often more celebrated mosques were authorized as sites for conducting the Friday noon prayer, a status designated by the term jāmi'. Typically, such privileged central mosques also had more resources, enabling them to provide enhanced worship services. Today, however, this distinction does not apply consistently. On the one hand, governments in most lands with Muslim majorities have instituted ministries or other bureaucratic agencies that seek to exercise some surveillance or control over the operation of mosques, often with special attention to any potentially incendiary content in sermons. These developments include a transfer, the pace of which varies considerably across the Islamic world, of the site of education from mosques to schools. On the other hand, a vast array of mosques funded, sometimes lavishly, by private donors or by benevolent societies rather than by the government have emerged over the last century, creating independent bases for preaching, instruction, and frequently for the provision of social services. The activities of the Society of Muslim Brothers and its later offshoots, ranging from medical clinics and vocational training facilities to transportation and financial cooperatives, provide perhaps the best known example of this trend.

A second important dimension of a mosque in the context of Islamic political culture is its reference to the model of the sanctuary in Mecca, the point of convergence for the hajj or pilgrimage. Symbolically, of course, every Muslim place of prayer is related to this original site, al-Masjid al-Ḥarām, by virtue of its directional orientation, which Muslims face when they pray. But Mecca also represents an emphasis on the enduring and transcendent unity of Muslims in a way that eludes any other earthly location, even Medina, the center of the early Islamic polity and first capital of the Islamic empire. Jerusalem, considered by Muslims to be the third most sacred site, is also venerated specifically by virtue of the Qur'anic allusion to the Prophet's mystical night journey, described as the visit to a mosque (17:1); this devotion later provided a concrete focus when the Umayyad caliphs constructed the Aqsa Mosque on the Temple Mount and the adjoining Dome of the Rock. The primary historical tendency has been to view both the mosques of Mecca and Jerusalem as focal points for spiritual promise rather than secular aspiration. However, in the context of the prolonged conflict between Israel and Palestine in the 20th and 21st centuries, a traditional religious site and symbol for all Muslims is frequently deployed as a popular nationalistic icon.

The Islamic revival that has surged dramatically and widely since the 1970s has also influenced the development and use of mosques. Mosque construction has increased exponentially in many Middle Eastern nations as well as the West and the former Soviet republics of Central Asia. Similarly, this movement has promoted the enhancement of mosques and the expansion beyond the traditional function of worship to the operation of schools, playgrounds, clinics, workshops, libraries, gyms, and performance venues. Many major European and American cities have recently acquired Islamic Centers that feature impressive architecture and décor and combine mosques with additional facilities for social and instructional purposes. Not surprisingly, mosques have lately also advanced with measured enthusiasm into cyberspace, after having extended their reach through radio and television for decades.

See also Friday prayer; madrasa; preaching; pulpit

Further Reading

Martin Frishman and Hasan-Uddin Khān, eds., The Mosque: History, Architectural Development and Regional Diversity, 1994; Oleg Grabar, The Formation of Islamic Art, 1987; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change, 2002.

PATRICK D. GAFFNEY

Muʿawiya (602–80)

Muʿawiya b. Abi Sufyan b. Harb was a member of the powerful ʿAbd Shams clan of the Quraysh, a Companion of the Prophet, and the founder of the Sufyanid branch of the Umayyad dynasty, which ruled the Muslim Empire for almost a hundred years (661–750). Born in Mecca in 602 to Abu Sufyan b. Harb and Hind bt. ʿUtba bt. Rabiʿa, outspoken opponents of Muhammad and the early Muslim community before they converted to Islam in 630, Muʿawiya, it is believed, became a Muslim immediately before the conquest of Mecca by Muhammad in 629. After converting to Islam, Muʿawiya worked for a period as the Prophet's scribe, writing down some of the Qurʾanic revelations that the Prophet received.

After the death of the Prophet and during the last year of Abu Bakr's reign (634), Muʿawiya was sent to Syria to support his half-brother Yazid, who had been dispatched there to lead the Arab troops against the Byzantines. ʿUmar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44) appointed Muʿawiya commander of the forces besieging Caesarea on the Palestinian coast, which was eventually taken sometime between 637 and 640. Thereafter ʿUmar named Muʿawiya governor of Damascus in 640, and between 643 and 646, the territories of Jordan and Palestine were added to his governorship. In 647, ʿUmar's successor, ʿUthman b. ʿAffan (r. 644–56) charged him to invade Cyprus (647) in what was perhaps the largest use of maritime warfare and is seen by most historians as the inauguration of the Muslim navy.

Muʿawiya was thrust into the limelight with the assassination of ʿUthman in 656 by his refusal to step down as governor on the orders of ʿUthman's successor, ʿAli b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61). Muʿawiya's refusal was based on his demand that ʿAli punish ʿUthman's killers, a large number of whom were in ʿAli's camp. This confrontation escalated into a full-fledged war between Muʿawiya and ʿAli at the Battle of Siffin (657). This battle resulted in a stalemate, after which both parties agreed to an arbitration that also resulted in naught, although it did show Muʿawiya's skill in political maneuvering. After the assassination of ʿAli in 661 by the Khariji ʿAbd al-Rahman b. Muljam, Muʿawiya reigned for the next 20 years with very little or no opposition. According to the Islamic historical tradition, Muʿawiya reigned as caliph from the abdication of the caliphate by Hasan b. ʿAli (ca. 624–70) in 661 to his death in Damascus in 680. The Syrians had given him the oath of allegiance (bayʿa) even before Hasan's abdication, perhaps as early as 657.

As ruler, Muʿawiya instituted a number of centralizing reforms, such as the establishment of the chancellery and the bureau of the post. He allowed his governors to be semiautonomous, especially with regard to the moneys levied from these provinces. His ability to disarm former adversaries such as Hasan, or even turn them into loyal supporters, such as Ziyad b. Abih (623–73), was legendary. It is said that he took the bayʿa for his son Yazid a few years before his death in 680.

Muʿawiya is remembered for his ḥilm (forbearance), which is generally seen as an attribute that he inherited from his father, although it is conceivable that the Prophet was a greater influence on his forbearance, generosity, and political astuteness toward his enemies and followers alike.

See also ʿAli b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); civil war; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Stephen Humphreys, Muʿawiya ibn Abi Sufyan: From Arabia to Empire, 2006; Charles Pellat, "Le Culte de Muʿāwiya au IIIe siècle de l'hégire," Studia Islamica 6 (1956); Erling Ladewig Petersen, ʿAlī and Muʿāwiya in early Arabic Tradition, translated by P. Lampe Christensen, 1974; Abu Jaʿfar Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari, The First Civil War (The History of al-Ṭabarī, vol. 17), translated by G. R. Hawting, 1996; Idem, Between Civil Wars: The Caliphate of Muʿāwiyah (The History of al-Ṭabarī, vol. 18), translated by Michael G. Morony, 1987.

KHALED M. G. KESHK

mufti/grand mufti

A mufti is someone who issues fatwas, or religious opinions on points of Islamic law. The origins of the institution of iftāʾ (the act of giving a fatwa) lie in the rise of legal experts around the turn of the eighth century. In contrast to qadis, or government-appointed judges who decided legal cases on an ad hoc basis, muftis emerged as legal experts whose deliberations had legal value and who determined the acceptable range of opinion on concrete issues of Islamic law. According to this classical understanding, a mufti possessed legal authority on the basis of his recognized expertise in legal studies and was not necessarily affiliated with the government. "Mufti" can also refer, more specifically, to the office of the grand mufti—a bureaucratic position developed by the Ottoman government in the latter half of the 16th century. Also referred to as shaykh al-Islam, the grand mufti was appointed by the sultan as the chief jurisconsult overseeing other scholars in a centralized hierarchy of madrasas (Muslim schools) and provincial courts. The office of grand mufti has lived on in the state governments that emerged from the former Ottoman Empire in the 20th century; for example, Shaykh 'Ali Gomaa is now the grand mufti of Egypt and Muhammad Rashid Qabbani is the grand mufti of Lebanon.

As early as 740, the authority to issue fatwas was commonly acknowledged as belonging solely to muftis. While some judges qualified as muftis, most did not. Therefore, the judge's role was relegated to deciding the facts of a pending case and applying the laws put forward by muftis. When faced with a case involving complex questions of Islamic law, the judge would request a mufti's opinion. While muftis provided an essential service within the legal system, their authority was epistemic, not based on holding a government office. This conception of legal authority began to change during the reign of Ottoman sultan Mehmed II (1451–81). Under Mehmed, the Ottoman government began to routinize Islamic law by organizing a hierarchical system of madrasas throughout the empire and by developing a bureaucratic apparatus that employed scholars as teachers, judges, and legal advisors to the central government. By the end of the 16th century, the government-appointed mufti of Istanbul was recognized as the grand mufti in charge of this apparatus.

The grand mufti's responsibilities changed in the course of the history of the Ottoman Empire but typically included serving as the sultan's personal religious advisor, appointing and dismissing provincial judges, teaching law, investigating charges of heresy, supervising religious endowments (waqf), and helping government administrators make state law (qānūn) compatible with Islamic law. With these responsibilities, the grand mufti acquired bureaucratic powers that increased his influence over other scholars. Yet the Ottoman system also made him, and the entire religious hierarchy beneath him, more beholden to the central government. The influence of the grand mufti was greatly curtailed during the Tanzimat (reforms) of the 19th century, as the Ottomans came to rely more on Western-trained civil bureaucrats to make and implement policy. The office of grand mufti survived the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire and is recognized in many nations of the Islamic world today, including Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, Tunisia, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, India, Albania, and others. Indonesia has an interesting arrangement whereby the position of grand mufti is held by the Indonesian Ulama Council as a group. Al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni (d. 1974), the grand mufti of Palestine from 1921 to 1948, became well known for his opposition to Zionism, particularly during the Arab revolt from 1936 to 1939, and appears frequently in polemics regarding the Israel-Palestine conflict on account of his meeting Adolf Hitler in 1941 and having fled to Lebanon, Iraq, Italy, and then Germany to escape imprisonment by the British. Grand muftis still serve the important function of legitimating government policies, although contemporary Islamists often regard state muftis as government collaborators lacking proper religious authority.

See also judge; jurisprudence; shaykh al-Islam

Further Reading

Zvi Elpeleg and Shmuel Himelstein, The Grand Mufti: Haj Amin el-Hussaini, Founder of the Palestinian National Movement, 1993; R. C. Repp, The Mufti of Istanbul: A Study in the Development of the Ottoman Learned Hierarchy, 1986; Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen, Defining Islam for the Egyptian State: Muftis and Fatwas of the Dār al-Iftā, 1997.

JAMES BROUCEK

Mughals (1526–1857)

Founded by Zahiruddin Muhammad Babur (1483–1530), a Chaghatay Turkish ruler from what is now known as Central Asia, the Mughal Empire grew to control most of the Indian subcontinent over the next two centuries. Babur's victory at Panipat in 1526 over Ibrahim Lodi of the Delhi Sultanate is memorably recorded in his autobiography, the Baburnama. Babur bequeathed his empire to his son Humayun (d. 1556), who was unable to hold on to his father's domains. Humayun sought refuge with Shah Tahmasp I in Safavid Iran after losing northern India to the Afghan ruler Sher Shah Suri (d. 1545). With the help of the Safavid army, Humayun eventually established himself in India. The reigns of Humayun's successors, most notably Akbar (d. 1605), Jahangir (d. 1627), and Shah Jahan (d. 1666), saw the spread of Mughal political and cultural institutions into India's cities, shrines, and marketplaces. Successful assertions of local autonomy marked the reign of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb (d. 1707), and the Mughal Empire also began to weaken because of the growing power of the English East India Company. Following an uprising against the British in 1857, India was placed under British rule, and the Mughal Empire was put to a formal end.

The multiethnic composition of Mughal courts demonstrates the heterodox nature of religious identity in the premodern Islamicate world. Babur brought with him a network of Central Asian nobles who were related to him by blood, by marriage, or through oaths of allegiance. Humayun brought with him members of the Persian elite, and Akbar began cultivating marital ties and military allegiances with the Hindu Rajputs (a warrior elite in India) as a means of securing a solid power base in India. Mughal patronage of local Sufi networks, most notably the Chishtis of Ajmer, and the Mughal elite's patronage of art, architecture, and literature are indicative of the many forms through which Mughal sovereignty was articulated. By appropriating local bases of spiritual authority such as the tombs of Sufis and building architectural monuments that wedded the spiritual authority of the king with a recognizable visual idiom, Mughal kings inscribed the landscape with articulations of their own power. In this, Mughal kings resembled their Ottoman and Safavid counterparts, as well as other Muslim and Hindu rulers of premodern India, all of whom saw themselves as world rulers. Flourishing urban centers and port cities allowed for trade with Europe, Southeast Asia, and the Muslim world, and Mughal chronicles frequently mention the arrival of travelers and embassies from abroad, the splendor of Mughal cities, and the wealth of Mughal kings.

The syncretic and dynamic nature of the Mughal administrative apparatus has been seen as both contributing to the longevity of the empire and aiding in its devolution. Mughal methods of governance drew on existing Indian political norms, Islamicate legal and administrative codes, and a distribution of power among different ethnic and linguistic groups. The Mughal mansabdārī system, developed by Akbar, involved the assignment of positions to military leaders according to the number of troops they could provide in the event of war. Military officers were paid cash salaries or given an estate (jāgīr) to administer and from which to collect revenue. The historian Irfan Habib argues that the distribution of power to local elites, while useful for broadening the reach of the Mughal polity, led to the eventual fragmentation of the empire. Mughal campaigns into the Deccan, most notably under Aurangzeb, were met with a limited measure of success. The 18th century saw the weakening of Mughal power as the global economy came to be dominated by European powers and sea-based trade. By the time India was placed under the British Crown, the Mughal Empire had become a regional power, even though the Mughal king continued to command the symbolic loyalty that led to the uprising of 1857.

See also Akbar the Great (1556–1605); Aurangzeb (1618–1707); Babur, Zahir al-Din (1483–1530); Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526); India

Further Reading

Muzaffar Alam, The Crisis of Empire in Mughal North India: Awadh and the Punjab, 1707–48, 1986; M. Athar Ali, Mughal India: Studies in Polity, Ideas, Society, and Culture, 2006; Jos Gommans, Mughal Warfare: Indian Frontiers and Highroads to Empire, 2002; Irfan Habib, The Agrarian System of Mughal India, 1556–1707, 1999; J. F. Richards, The Cambridge History of India: The Mughal Empire, 1993.

TAYMIYA R. ZAMAN

Muhammad (570–632)

Muhammad's Career and Achievements

In Muslim belief, the religion of Islam is based on divine revelation and represents a divinely willed and established institution. In the perspective of history, the origins of Islam can be traced back to the prophetic career of Muhammad, its historical founder in the first third of the seventh century. Born around 570 in Mecca, a town in a rocky valley of the Hijaz—the northwestern quarter of the Arabian Peninsula—Muhammad began his prophetic proclamations circa 610. He appeared not as a mystic or visionary but as a prophet with the mission to convert the Quraysh, his fellow Arab tribesmen who had settled there.

The town of Mecca flourished on trade and commerce. It was built around a well, which provided a reliable yearlong water supply and held in its center the Ka'ba, the sanctuary of the Black Stone and seat of the tribal deity Hubal. Most importantly, it was a pilgrimage site where fairs and festivals were held every year. Muhammad's message to his fellow townsmen was based on the religious synthesis that had formed and fermented in him since his youth and that he understood to be the divine revelation that God had sent to him to proclaim. This message eventually became known as Islam, or "submission to God," and grew into a universal and missionary religion whose current followers represent about a fifth of the world's population. Muhammad experienced his revelations as inner promptings that inspired ad hoc utterances that he recited piecemeal to his listeners over about 20 years. These recitals were collected after his death in the Arabic Qur'an (literally, "recitation"), the holy book of Islam. They were couched in rhymed prose (saj'), a mode of expression that facilitated memorization and distinguished them from Muhammad's personal instructions.

Muhammad broke forth with his message, proclaiming faith in the one God (Allah), whose messenger he perceived himself to be. In God, the Prophet Muhammad recognized the divine creator of the universe and humanity as well as the final judge of all human beings on the Day of Judgment, which would bring this world to its end in an apocalyptic cataclysm. On that final day, all human beings would be raised in the general resurrection to account for their lives on Earth and enter into everlasting life in the world to come. The life offered in the hereafter would be either God's reward of eternal bliss in paradise for those who had surrendered to His will in this world, obeying His commandments and putting them into practice, or His punishment of never-ending suffering in hellfire for those who had acted against His will by violating the divine commands and interdictions.

For some ten-odd years, Muhammad tried to convert his fellow tribesmen at Mecca to his newly found faith of Islam. Rejected by the majority of the Quraysh, however, he took flight from Mecca with a small group of followers, becoming a tribal dissident who breached the bonds of common descent with his clan, and, in 622, immigrated to Medina, situated about 200 miles to the north. Medina was a cluster of fortresses and compounds scattered over a large area. It was known as Yathrib at the time, but it later came to be called "the city of the Prophet" (madīnat al-nabī) after Muhammad had settled there. Medina was an agricultural settlement inhabited by two major Arab tribes and three smaller Jewish tribes that had assimilated to the Arab way of life and its customs, adopting the Arabic language but not the beliefs of the pre-Islamic Arab tribal religion. Medina offered the emigrants (muhājirūn) the livelihood of its fields, palm groves, and orchards and extended to them the welcome of the helpers (anṣār), a group of Medinan Arabs who accepted Islam and became brothers in faith with the emigrants. Muhammad's emigration, known as the hijra and occurring in September 622, became the moment in history in which the small Muslim community of Medina was launched on its meteoric rise; by the time of Muhammad's death, it had established its hold over the entire Arabian Peninsula. In the centuries after his death, both the religion and the empire of Islam spread over the Middle East, advancing westward along the North African shores of the Mediterranean into Spain and Sicily and pushing eastward across the Iranian plateau into Central Asia and the Indian subcontinent. The first day of the lunar year in which the hijra took place came to mark the beginning of the Muslim era, and the Muslim calendar reckons its own lunar calendar from this year.

Muhammad's time at Medina was characterized by a struggle for preeminence vis-à-vis the Meccan leadership of the Quraysh; his success in Medina represented a threat both to their authority and to their caravan trade that passed Medina on its route to Syria and Palestine. It also drew him into serious confrontations with the Jewish tribes of Medina, whose memory of their religious legacy was at variance with Muhammad's proclamation of events surrounding major biblical figures, such as Abraham and Moses. In addition, Muhammad faced the challenge of providing leadership for his Meccan emigrants and Medinan helpers while arbitrating issues between the two Arab tribes (the Aws and Khazraj and their clients) who had emerged exhausted after a long history of fraternal feuds and their ensuing blood revenge and adjudication of blood money. Especially in the first few years at Medina, Muhammad had to deal with the "waverers" (munāfiqūn): those Medinan Arabs on whose loyalty and zeal he could not rely and whom it took time to convert. Furthermore, he had to find a means of channeling the tribal raiding tradition of the Arab clansmen away from fraternal warfare and into the constructive building of a community.

At the end of his life in 632 in Medina, Muhammad was able to claim three major achievements: the foundation of the Muslim community (umma), the proclamation of the Arabic scripture (Qur'an), and the dynamism of the "struggle on the path of God" (jihad). For the first time in history, he had united all the Arabs living in the Arabian Peninsula into one umma based no longer on the tribal principle of blood kinship and descent from a common ancestor but rather on the religious basis of a common faith expressed in the Muslim profession of faith (shahāda) that "there is no god but Allah and Muhammad is his messenger." This achievement resembled a social revolution because it transformed Arab society from an unwieldy conglomeration of rivaling kinship groups into an ordered whole of individuals united by a common bond of faith. Rather than resting in the hands of freely elected tribal elders (shaykhs), community leadership rested thenceforth in the divinely chosen messenger (rasūl), to whom all owed obedience next to God. For the first time in history, Muhammad had given the Arabs a scripture in their own language that would remain the basis of their faith throughout the ages. It signified a religious revolution that uprooted the polytheistic beliefs and cultic practices of the pre-Islamic Arabs and substituted for them a strong monotheistic faith. The proclamations of this faith in the one God, understood as divine revelation, were written down and collected about two decades after the Prophet's death in the first Arabic book ever produced: the holy writ of the Qur'an. From now on, each Arab was charged to surrender to God alone and to justify his actions before God rather than seeking protection as a clan member and living in submission to the customs of his forefathers and tribal ancestors. For the first time in history, the tribal energy of the Arab clansmen, spent in the past on nomadic raids or tribal blood feuds, became directed toward the common goal of building a coordinated polity. This polity was to be driven by jihad, which marshaled all means, whether peaceful or militant, available to the members of the community. Jihad became the engine that, through conquest, empowered the Arabs to establish a global empire and, through proselytization, propelled Islam in its missionary thrust toward its goal of a universal religion.

Muhammad's Life from ca. 570 to 610

Western scholarship has studied the life of the Prophet assiduously and meticulously, beginning in earnest in the 19th century with F. Wüstenfeld and J. Wellhausen. The harvest of scholarship since then on the biography of the Prophet has been synthesized in two standard works: the one-volume masterpiece of F. Buhl, Das Leben Muhammeds (1934), and the two-volume set of W. M. Watt, Muhammad at Mecca (1953) and Muhammad at Medina (1956). Many studies, monographs, and articles have been added since World War II, but none has produced a radically new analysis that would change the basic assessment of Muhammad's achievements or alter the historical development of his career. Western scholarship is ultimately based on the principal work of the traditional Islamic biography of the Prophet, known as his "way of life" (sīra). This work of Ibn Ishaq (704–767), the famous Sirat Rasul Allah (Life of God's Messenger), is extant in the recension by Ibn Hisham (d. 833). Compiled more than a century after Muhammad's death, it portrayed the Prophet as a revered figure and the glorified founder of the religion. Other early Islamic works that include important information on the Prophet's life are those on his "campaigns" (maghāzī), such as the one by Waqidi (d. 823), as well as the history of Tabari (d. 923), which includes the valuable reports of 'Urwa b. al-Zubayr (d. 712). The Qur'an itself offers limited historical data for the construction of Muhammad's biography. On the whole, the traditional biographical literature on Muhammad neglects the early phase of his life, focusing instead on his career as a prophet, which began with his call to proclaim the Qur'an in about 610. For the early period (ca. 570–610), only a small number of historical facts were recorded, such as those concerning his humble origins, his early career as a merchant, and his marriage to a widow in Mecca.

Muhammad was born into the family of the Banu Hashim, one of the clans of the Quraysh tribe. That his birth occurred in the "Year of the Elephant" (Q. 105:1–5), when Mecca was unsuccessfully threatened by a group of Abyssinian invaders, is not based on a reliable tradition. Because his name, Muhammad (worthy of praise), can be understood as an Arabic epithet, some scholars doubt whether this actually was his given name; yet it is the name by which he is mentioned four times in the Qur'an

(3:144; 33:40; 47:2; 48:29) without, however, being addressed by it directly. In general, Islamic literature addresses him by his Qur'anic titles—"the Prophet" (al-nabī) and "God's Messenger" (rasūl Allāh)—and frequently calls him "the Chosen One" (al-muṣṭafā) and honors him with the eulogies such as "peace be upon him" and "may God bless him and grant him salvation" after his name, while Muslim mystics tend to revere him as "the beloved of God" (habīb Allāh). Muhammad grew up in poverty as an orphan, his father, 'Abdallah, having died before his birth. Raised by his mother, Amina, and looked after by his grandfather, 'Abd al-Muttalib, he may have spent a year with a wet nurse among the nomads. His mother died when he was six years old, and his grandfather died two years later. After passing into the custodianship of his uncle Abu Talib, the young boy showed an interest in the life of a trader and merchant, possibly making a trade journey to Syria while still a young man. Noticed for his business skills by Khadija, a well-to-do merchant's widow who was twice married before and possibly divorced, Muhammad became an agent in her employ. According to tradition, Khadija was 40 years old when she proposed marriage to him, and Muhammad was about 25 years of age. They had four daughters, who later were given in marriage to some of Muhammad's Companions, and several sons, all of whom died in infancy.

The legendary stories that Muhammad's breast was cleansed by angels shortly after his birth and that, in his youth, Muhammad placed the Black Stone in the wall of the Ka'ba during its reconstruction, thereby solving a squabble of the tribal elders of Mecca for the privilege of doing so, are later creations of tradition to signify immunity from sin and leadership qualities already manifested by Muhammad as a youth. Equally doubtful are encounters in his youth with a Christian monk, named either Bahira or Nastur, who is presented as prophesying Muhammad's later career. In his early life, Muhammad proved his mettle as a merchant, and he used a good portion of commercial vocabulary in his Qur'anic proclamations. He proved to be a responsible father, an energetic member of his clan, and a sound and capable person; this is in contrast to many discrediting assessments of his personality in European accounts from medieval times until today. Unfortunately, the traditional biographical literature tells us little about the provenance of the religious ideas Muhammad acquired during his early life. These ideas came from two principal sources: on the one hand from the religious environment into which he was born, the tribal Arab cult of pre-Islamic Arabia with its fatalistic notions and pagan practices that were observed in his hometown, and on the other hand from a medley of mainly Christian sectarian beliefs, certain Jewish practices, and some Manichean notions that he encountered during his youth in Mecca.

In Islamic historiography, the epoch of Arabia prior to the promulgation of Islam is generally called the age of "ignorance" (jāhiliyya), against which Islam is contrasted as the age of enlightenment and knowledge. The jāhiliyya was a time when the Arabs were known for their virtues of courage and bravery, their generosity and hospitality, their excesses in eating and drinking, their drinking songs and love poetry, their worship of idols and stone cults, and their beliefs in a variety of local and tribal deities, both male and female. Muhammad grew up in this environment of the jāhiliyya, as indicated by some scattered references in the Qur'an: he was found erring (93:3), did not know scripture and belief (42:52), offered animal sacrifices to deities (cf. 108:2), once brought a sheep as a sacrifice to the female deity al-'Uzza, and believed in spirits (jinn) and demons (shayāṭīn). His uncle Abu Lahab, cursed in the Qur'an (111:1), was a violent defender of paganism, and his uncle and tribal protector Abu Talib never embraced Islam. Furthermore, Muhammad's early Qur'anic proclamations were expressed in cryptic rhymed prose that resembled the oracles of the pre-Islamic soothsayers (kāhin). To assert their truth, he would introduce them with oaths, swearing by natural phenomena, such as the heavens and the Earth, the sky and the constellations, the sun and the moon, the stars and the planets, the dawn and the forenoon, or the fig tree and the olive tree.

Muhammad speaks of the Jews and Christians with whom he came into contact cumulatively as "possessors of the scripture" (ahl al-kitāb) without specific reference to their religious differences. It is possible that the occasional reference to Sabaeans in the Qur'an (Ṣābi'ūn, 2:62; 5:69; 22:17) implies contact with Manicheans as well. The biblical lore of Jews and Christians made an overpowering impact on Muhammad; he firmly believed that his revelations agreed with the content of their original scriptures, and on occasion he asked them for clarification of his newly found ideas (Q. 10:94). In our present state of research, it is impossible to pinpoint the sources from the Jewish-Christian background that Muhammad may have had for his religious ideas. It is certain, however, that he received his knowledge by oral information and that he had not read the scriptures of Jews and Christians. In his time, the Bible had not yet been translated into Arabic, and Muhammad was unable to read either Hebrew or Greek. In fact, only one verse of the Bible (Psalms 37:29) is quoted verbatim in the Qur'an (21:105). As a merchant he may have had a rudimentary knowledge of Arabic writing and record keeping, though it is a general Muslim perception that he was illiterate (ummī—a term that in the Qur'an means not "illiterate" but rather denotes Muhammad as "the heathen prophet," al-nabī al-ummī; 7:157–58).

Most of the biblical lore included in the Qur'anic proclamations shows similarities with the Book of Genesis and signals midrashic or apocryphal origin. In the case of Christianity, it points to sectarian rather than normative and orthodox beliefs and possibly includes some traces of Manichean ideas. The significant number of Syriac and Ethiopic loan words in the Qur'an further document that Muhammad not only assimilated elements of biblical and extrabiblical lore but also absorbed some foreign ritual vocabulary. Furthermore, the Qur'an retains traces that reveal Muhammad's rather distinct knowledge of circumstances linked with Mount Sinai, its monastery, and the tradition of the burning bush (28:29–30; 44–6; 52:1–6; 95:2). It also shows some familiarity on his part with Christian prayer practices and some awareness of the lives of Christian hermits. There is not sufficient evidence, however, to link Muhammad with particular Christian monks as his teachers. In general, all information about Christian themes and topics came to him by word of mouth, probably through contact with Christian traders or slaves in Mecca itself. Some scholars refer to accounts in Muslim tradition that signal Waraqa b. Nawfal, a cousin of his wife Khadija, as a possible channel of Christian ideas for Muhammad. Most of these accounts, however, treat him as one of the *ḥanīf*s, or seekers of a pure worship of God, who were dissatisfied with idol worship and inspired by an innate monotheistic belief. It should not be overlooked, however, that pre-Islamic Arabia was exposed on its borders to Christian beliefs. There were Christians living in Najran in Yemen in the south of the Arabian Peninsula, and Arab principalities had formed on the northern fringes of the Arabian desert: these included the Ghassanids, who adhered to a Monophysite creed, and the Lakhmids, who had adopted Nestorian beliefs.

Muhammad's Career in Mecca from ca. 610 to 622

In about 610 Muhammad began to proclaim his message at a decisive moment of his life when he suddenly broke through to the unshakeable conviction that he had to proclaim to the people of Mecca the inner promptings he received as the word of God. Muslim tradition places this event—"his call to prophecy"—in a cave on a mountain outside Mecca, when he was impelled to recite, "Recite in the name of your Lord who created . . ." (Q. 96:1–5). Tradition describes him as experiencing states of spiritual excitement and ecstatic seizures; at times he asked to be wrapped (Q. 73:1; 74:1) in a mantle, and his cryptic speech resembled the words of a magician (sāḥir) possessed by demonic forces (majnūn). According to tradition, he hesitated for an "interval" (fatra) of three years before he came forward publicly with his message, but then he continued fearlessly persevering in proclaiming it until his death. When explaining his revelations, Muhammad conceived of them as originating from an archetypal book (umm al-kitāb, Q. 43:3), a guarded tablet (lawḥ maḥfūẓ, Q. 85:22), kept in the presence of the angels, its noble scribes (Q. 80,15–16). Rather than reading this heavenly book, Muhammad received from it individual revelations of a few verses at a time, orally communicated to him by a spirit of revelation later identified as the angel Gabriel (Q. 2:97).

The content of his proclamations was focused on praise for God the Creator and the warnings of God the Judge, the one and only God, Allah. Muhammad saw himself as both a "warner" (nadhīr) of an apocalyptic end of the world followed by an eschatological punishment for unbelievers and a "bringer of good tidings" (bashīr) about God as the bountiful creator of the heavens and the Earth as well as the fashioner of each and every human being. His most prominent role was that of a prophet who proclaimed an uncompromising monotheism centered on God who had neither partners nor associates. He singled out the prophets of old as prototypical recipients of revelation in history and referred to them by their biblical names in Arabic, such as Nuh (Noah), Ibrahim (Abraham), and Musa (Moses), as well as certain heroes of pre-Islamic Arab lore. He made no reference, however, to any of the great prophets of the Bible, such as Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel, yet he mentioned central figures of the gospels, such as Yahya (John the Baptist) and 'Isa b. Maryam (Jesus, son of Mary), the Messiah (masīḥ); he saw himself standing in line with these prophets of old as their final representative, the "seal of the prophets."

At first, Muhammad's proclamations were given little attention by most Meccans. They made an impact, however, on a small group who became his followers, honored in history as the first Muslim converts. Among them were his wife Khadija; his cousin 'Ali, a youth at the time; the well-to-do merchant Abu Bakr, who adhered to him with unswerving loyalty; as well as a handful of young men who would later play a significant role in the succession struggles to Muhammad's leadership of the community. One early convert to Islam, perhaps the first, was Zayd b. Haritha, a slave bought in Syria and given by Khadija to Muhammad, who freed and adopted him. Ten years younger than Muhammad, he hailed from the region of Dumat al-Jandal, an oasis halfway between Mecca and Damascus, where the idol Wadd was worshipped and a considerable Christian colony had found shelter. Until his death in 629 as standard bearer of the Muslim forces on an unsuccessful expedition at Mu'ta against Arabs on Byzantine soil in Transjordan, Zayd b. Haritha remained very close to the Prophet; his extreme solicitude for Muhammad may be seen in the fact that he divorced his wife Zaynab a few years after the hijra so that the Prophet might marry her.

The Meccans stiffened in their opposition to Muhammad's revelations when they realized that his message attacked their tribal religion and its polytheistic pantheon, threatening their authority and trade by challenging their tribal oligarchy and endangering their fairs. When their opposition turned into persecution, Muhammad sent a group of weaker followers away to seek the protection of the Christian ruler of Abyssinia in a migration (hijra), which occurred about 615 (most of these emigrants drifted back later to rejoin their Muslim brethren). In Mecca itself, Muhammad tried to gain the goodwill of the Meccans by accepting as special intercessors with God their three favorite female deities, whom they worshipped as "daughters of Allah." These three goddesses were al-Lat, a solar deity, who had her sanctuary in a valley near Tai'f, a neighboring town of Mecca; al-'Uzza, an astral deity, to whom animal sacrifices were made at her sanctuary in an acacia grove located in a valley on the road from Mecca to Tai'f; and Manat, the goddess of fate and death, whose sanctuary was a Black Stone on the road from Mecca to Medina. Realizing that the recognition of "daughters of Allah" harmed his radically monotheistic message, Muhammad withdrew this compromise and abrogated it by altering the relevant verses included in the Qur'an (53:19–23). The most trying hostile scheme of Muhammad's Meccan adversaries, however, occurred about 616, when the tribesmen of the Quraysh engaged in a full tribal boycott of the Banu Hashim, Muhammad's clan. Although most of the Banu Hashim, including his custodian Abu Talib, had not accepted Islam, the clan stood by Muhammad in loyalty to their tribal code of honor and protected him during this difficult period. Only his uncle Abu Lahab, together with his wife, remained resolute in his hostility toward Muhammad (Q. 111:1). This boycott failed, however, because it proved to be more of a disruption to the communal life in Mecca than a successful step to silence Muhammad.

Most scholars place Muhammad's vision of a miraculous night journey (isrā') in the later period of his life at Mecca. According to the legend, Muhammad was carried by a flying steed in the company of the angel Gabriel from the sacred area of the Ka'ba to the "farthest place of worship" (Q. 17:1), interpreted as either the temple precinct in Jerusalem or the place of prayer of the angels in heaven. Furthermore, Muslim tradition links the nocturnal journey with Muhammad's ascension to heaven (mi'rāj). This heavenly ascent, seen as initiation to his prophetic career, would need to be placed at the beginning of his Qur'anic proclamations. Though connected with a vision recorded in the Qur'an (53:1–18; 81:19–25) in which Muhammad is approached by a heavenly figure rather than being carried off, this would seem to refer to a separate experience. The interpretation of the Prophet's ascension to heaven as an ascent through the seven heavens into the very presence of God, with Muhammad passing beyond the spheres of other prophets (among them Adam, Jesus, Abraham, and Moses), is a further elaboration of Muslim tradition. According to the legend, Muhammad began his heavenly ascent from the rock in Jerusalem, which became associated with the Dome of the Rock, the symbol of Islam's triumph over Judaism and Christianity, erected in about 694 by the Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik on the temple precinct of Jerusalem and opposite the hill crowned by the Church of the Holy Sepulcher.

Certain significant events occurred during the last third of Muhammad's prophetic activity in Mecca. In about 618, 'Umar b. al-Khattab, a young man of a certain social status, converted to Muhammad's cause and became one of his strongest supporters as well as the founder of the Arab Empire about a decade after Muhammad's death. 'Umar's joining of the Muslims in Mecca, however, was followed in the next year by the deaths of Khadija and Abu Talib, resulting in a loss of both deep personal and strong tribal support. Exhausted and discouraged by the obstinate opposition of the Meccans to his reforms and unsuccessful in his initiative to find a welcoming audience for his proclamations in Tai'f, Muhammad came to despair of converting his fellow townsmen, convinced that God had destined them to unbelief. At this point in time, he realized that he had to cut the blood bonds with his tribe and find a new theater for his message to be accepted. At this juncture, something happened that was beyond his control.

The settlement of Medina had reached an impasse in its communal life due to tribal warfare and bloodshed between the Aws and Khazraj, the two major Arab tribes living in the town together with three smaller Jewish tribes that were drawn into the altercations. Because of this predicament, the inhabitants of Medina were looking for a political leader who could arbitrate their tribal conflicts. Muhammad, for his part, was looking for a new environment that would be receptive to his teachings. Medina answered this need. It had been prepared for a monotheistic message and the vision of a history of prophets through the presence of the three Jewish tribes—the Banu Qaynuqa', Banu al-Nadir, and Banu Qurayza—who had settled in the town before the arrival of the Aws and Khazraj. At the same time, it offered Muhammad a platform to combine his role as a prophetical reformer with that of a political leader. It so happened that some peasants from Medina, who had come as pilgrims to Mecca, saw Muhammad as the person who could provide the solution to their communal strife. Muhammad found willing listeners for his message among them, and in 621, he met about a dozen of them on the hill 'Aqaba outside Mecca. A year later, a formal pledge was made at the same place between him and a group of 73 men and 2 women from Medina that they would receive him and his followers as brethren into their community and offer them their tribal protection by the force of arms if necessary. On the basis of this "pledge of war" (bay'at al-harb), Muhammad had successive groups of his followers leave Mecca for Medina and then finally left the town himself with Abu Bakr and 'Ali, hiding in a cave, according to tradition, as the Meccans were in pursuit. The Meccans failed in their attempt to prevent Muhammad's group of fugitive dissidents from forming a new polity allied with other tribal groups in the neighboring town of Medina.

Muhammad's Career in Medina from 622 to 632

The emigration from Mecca to Medina in 622, known as the hijra, was to become a key historical event, marking as it did the decisive moment Muhammad became an exemplary political leader. Muhammad integrated the people of Medina into one cohesive community by subsuming the Arab tribal elements into his community and by eventually eliminating the Jewish tribes altogether from the town. With regard to the Arabs, Muhammad could rely on two groups: the muhājirūn, who were firmly identified with his message and had given up their livelihood and left their homes, and the anṣār, the group of tribesmen (mainly belonging to the Khazraj but some also to the Aws), who welcomed him and his followers into their midst and accepted Islam wholeheartedly. Henceforth the Muslim community of believers, established by and loyal to Muhammad, would be founded on these two groups who acquired rights of kinship with one another rooted not in common blood but rather in common faith. Many people of Medina, however, remained noncommittal toward Muhammad and as such were identified as "hypocrites" (munāfiqūn), turncoats on whose loyalty Muhammad could not rely, and "waverers," who irritated him because of their reluctant support and persistent doubt about his message. They were led by 'Abdallah b. Ubayy, a rather irresolute leader of the Khazraj who did not manage to organize them into an opposition to Muhammad; he did, however, incite the three smaller Jewish tribes to resist Muhammad but left them in the lurch when it came to blows.

It is not known whether the three Jewish tribes living in Medina, each of them about 500 to 800 men, were descendants from Hebrew stock or Arabs who had adopted Judaism. They spoke Arabic, lived according to Arab customs, and were organized as tribal units but held to basic religious principles and practices of Judaism. Muhammad called the Jews (yahūd) "children of Israel," knew that they followed the laws of Moses, and was aware that they had their own scripture (called Tawrat in the Qur'an) and the psalms of David (called Zabur). Among the Jewish tribes that settled in Medina, the Banu Qaynuqa' lived in two strongholds in the southwest of the town, becoming clients of the Khazraj; as they did not possess any lands, they made their livelihood by trading. Muhammad perceived them as a challenge to his message, obstructing his way with their religious claims and mockeries of his person. He would eventually expel them from Medina after the Battle of Badr in 624, demanding that their arms and tools be left behind for the Muslims and taking a fifth of the spoils for himself. The Banu al-Nadir, believed to have come from Palestine at an unknown date, had connections with the Jews of the oasis of Khaybar and probably had an admixture of Arab blood in their veins. Though they bore Arabic names, they spoke their own peculiar dialect and lived in fortified compounds half a day's journey to the south of Medina. They were clients of the Aws and entered into alliance with Muhammad in the first year after the hijra. Muhammad, however, became suspicious of them and feared that they intended to kill him. Laying siege on them and cutting down their palm trees, he forced them to surrender and made them leave with their possessions to the oasis of Khaybar and Syria; he gave their lands to the emigrants and kept part of them for himself. The Banu Qurayza, related to the Banu al-Nadir, lived as agriculturalists of cereals and palms on lands outside the city to the southeast of Medina. They were known to have adhered firmly to Jewish traditions and had intermarried with Arabs, becoming allied with the Aws. After the Battle of the Trench (khandaq) in 627, they were made to surrender unconditionally; the men were put to the sword and their women and children sold as slaves. It remains a mystery why the Jewish tribes did not rally together to prevent their expulsion from Medina.

In Medina, facing the task of creating a united community—bringing together emigrants and helpers, overcoming the reluctance of the "waverers," and dealing with the Jewish tribes—Muhammad displayed considerable political acumen. After establishing a link of brotherhood between the emigrants and helpers, he realized that he needed a practical mechanism to form a true unity of highly different and incongruous elements of the Medinan society. He pursued this end soon after the hijra by promulgating a document, recorded in his biography, known as the "Constitution of Medina" (sahīfat al-Madīna); it may be considered authentic. This legal document drafted on Muhammad's initiative had two sections: the first defining the duties of the believers (mu'minūn), including both emigrants and helpers from various clans of the Aws and Khazraj, and the second guaranteeing the rights of the yahūd and their clients. It was a significant document of brotherly solidarity that formed the foundation for the communal life of the umma, now no longer based on the traditional tribal system of blood kinship groups. Indeed, it broke up the tribal system of Medina by severing links of some of its tribesmen, based on common blood, and bonded the helpers with the emigrants who belonged to the Quraysh, a separate blood kinship group. From now on, this new political order of society would make a radical distinction between those loyal to Muhammad and those who did not follow him. As a consequence, it fortified Muhammad's position as the highest authority, next to God, of the newly established community and demonstrated the eminent practical sense of purpose with which he established himself as the political leader of the new polity in Medina.

When Muhammad arrived in Medina, he came with the firm conviction of his status as the bearer of a revelation in Arabic that confirmed the revelations "the possessors of the scriptures" had received in their own languages. In this spirit he tried to win over the local Jews by adopting their fast on the day of atonement ('āshūrā'), introducing the midday prayer (al-salāt al-wustā, Q. 2:238) in emulation of Jewish custom, easing the rules of ablutions before prayer, and maintaining the direction (qibla) of the ritual prayer (salat) toward Jerusalem. He soon realized, however, that he misjudged their openness to his message when they ridiculed his version of biblical stories due to discrepancies with their own traditional lore. In a religious sense, it was not possible for the Jewish tribes of Medina to welcome an Arab as their promised Messiah or accept Muhammad's claim to be "the seal of the prophets" (khātam al-nabiyyīn, Q. 33:40)—a title Mani (216–77), the founder of Manicheanism, had applied to himself—and whose coming Jesus is said to have predicted in the Qur'an under the name of Ahmad (Q. 61:6). Faced with overwhelming rejection from the Jews, Muhammad abruptly reoriented his religion, transforming it into an Arab religion focused on the sanctuary of the Black Stone in Mecca and dismissing the existing Jewish and Christian scriptures as a corruption of their original revealed form. He ordered that the direction of ritual prayer be changed toward the Ka'ba, making Mecca the hub of the true religion (Q. 2:144). He stressed Friday as the day of congregational prayer (Q. 62:9) yet not as a day of rest like the Sabbath because, in his view, God did not rest after his work of creation. Substituting for the fast on 'āshūrā', he instituted, following Manichean custom, the lunar month of Ramadan (Q. 2:183–5) as a month of fasting from daybreak until sunset requiring abstention from food, drink, and sexual intercourse during daylight hours. He introduced what was to become an essential element of the Muslim pilgrimage (hajj) by celebrating the day of sacrifice on the tenth day of the month of pilgrimage (Dhu al-Hijja) in Medina, and most of all, he identified Islam as a restoration of the primordial religion of Abraham (millat Ibrāhīm). Abraham, neither a Jew nor a Christian, thus became the prototype of the true Muslim and hanīf, the monotheist who had rejected all pagan polytheism. He now maintained that Abraham, assisted by his son Isma'il, had erected the Ka'ba (Q. 2:127) and celebrated the rites there that Muhammad sought to restore to their original purity.

Distancing himself somewhat from his identity as a prophet called to warn people of an oncoming apocalyptic judgment and to confirm the revelations other groups of people had received in their own languages before him, Muhammad now embraced his new role as legislator and leader of the burgeoning Muslim community. It now became the duty of his followers to obey God and the Prophet. He pursued his newfound role not only in Medina but also in his relations with the Meccans, who constituted the major challenge he faced outside Medina. With Mecca as the focus of his religious thrust and with the responsibility of providing sustenance for his group of emigrants, Muhammad turned his attention to Mecca and focused the energies of the Arab tribesmen who were accustomed to raiding. His altercations with the Meccans, developing from skirmishes to full-fledged war, were driven by the idea of jihad, the all-out struggle on the path of God that demanded the total devotion of his Muslim followers such that they would go to war against the Quraysh of Mecca.

A new chapter began in the life of Muhammad and that of his community with a sequence of battles with the Meccans. A first instance of war was triggered by a raid made by some of Muhammad's followers on a caravan at the oasis of Nakhla. In it a Meccan was killed during the holy month of Rajab, in which raiding was forbidden by current pre-Islamic custom, and the spoils of his operations were taken to Medina. Emboldened by this success, Muhammad led a group of his Medinan followers in a new raid on a caravan of the Quraysh that was advancing from Syria to Mecca. In their attempt to ambush the caravan at Badr in 624, Muhammad's small contingent was forced to engage an army sent from Mecca to protect the caravan (Q. 3:123); surprisingly, however, they succeeded in routing the superior enemy, whose leader Abu Jahl was slain. Muhammad interpreted his glorious victory as divine confirmation of his religion and believed that angels fought at his side, enabling him to overpower the forces of the mighty commercial hub of Arabia. Islamic historiography upholds this day as a great watershed in the course of Muslim ascendancy as granted by divine assistance. To follow up on his victory, Muhammad not only expelled the Banu Qaynuqa' but, more importantly, sent letters to Bedouin tribes to contract alliances of mutual assistance with them, now recognized as a leader well beyond the confines of Medina. Trying to avenge their losses at Badr, the Meccans equipped an army of 3,000 men and sent them against Muhammad's forces in 625 under the leadership of Abu Sufyan, defeating them decisively at the hill of Uhud outside Medina (Q. 3:118, 121; 33:23). In this battle Muhammad was severely wounded and his uncle Hamza was killed. The Meccans, however, did not follow up on their victory and returned home thinking that they had put the upstart in Medina in his place; for his part, Muhammad expelled the Banu al-Nadir from the town and confiscated their possessions in order to replace the spoils his force had failed to secure in the battle.

Further harassed by Muhammad's raiders and realizing that their assessment of their victory at Uhud was premature, the Meccans assembled a force of Quraysh and tribesmen from the surrounding areas, specified as 10,000 men in the tradition, to advance against Medina in 627. Whether or not this was at the suggestion of a Persian by the name of Salman, Muhammad had a trench (khandaq) dug around the unprotected parts of Medina, which caused a long siege to drag on and gave Muhammad time to plot against the besieging force, who eventually lost heart and returned home without ever engaging in open battle. In the aftermath of the "Battle of the Trench," Muhammad felt free to deal harshly with the Banu Qurayza, executing their men and selling their women and children into slavery.

Still intent on bringing Mecca under his control, Muhammad called on a group of his followers in 628 to accompany him on a peaceful pilgrimage ('umra) to the Ka'ba in Mecca; in the process he tried to negotiate his way into the town. He encamped with his group at Hudaybiyya and sent 'Uthman b. 'Affan, who was related to the Meccan leadership, ahead to make arrangements for their peaceful passage. When 'Uthman did not return at first, Muhammad had his men swear an oath that they would fight for him to the last. This proved to be unnecessary when the Meccans offered the compromise proposal of a ten-year truce that would allow Muhammad to visit the town for a pilgrimage in the following year. Muhammad accepted this proposal, but his followers were disappointed by this apparent about-face, though history would later call it a stroke of brilliance on Muhammad's part to induce the Meccans to recognize a tribal dissident as an opponent of equal rank.

Muhammad made use of the lull in the struggle with the Meccans to capture the oasis of Khaybar in 628 and constrained its Jewish inhabitants to pay taxes every year. However, the tradition that holds that, in the same year, Muhammad began to send letters to the governor of Alexandria, the ruler of Abyssinia, the Byzantine emperor, and the Persian king, inviting them to adopt Islam, cannot be trusted. More certain is his dispatching of letters to chiefs of Bedouin tribes in different parts of Arabia, demanding that they join the fold of Islam, perform the ritual prayer, and pay the alms tax (zakat) incumbent on every Muslim. In the following year, 629, Muhammad performed the pilgrimage to the Ka'ba as agreed and welcomed Khalid b. al-Walid, later a great general of the Muslim conquests, into Islam. Khalid b. al-Walid proved his mettle soon thereafter in 630 when he subdued the inhabitants of Dumat al-Jandal and forced their leader to come to Medina to sign a treaty with Muhammad. Then in the Battle of 'Aqraba' in 632, Khalid b. al-Walid crushed the apostasy of the tribes after the Prophet's death and defeated Musaylima b. Thumama, the leader of the Banu Hanifa, who inhabited the oasis of Yamama in central Arabia. Musaylima rivaled Muhammad with his claim to be a prophet and to receive revelations from God the Merciful (al-Rahman). He aspired to be Muhammad's successor after his death, but when both of them met in Medina, the Prophet had him summarily dismissed, refusing to give him "even a splinter of a palm branch."

Using the pretext of a conflict that led to bloodshed between two tribal bands—one affiliated with him, the other with the Quraysh—Muhammad broke the ten-year truce of Hudaybiyya and set out to conquer Mecca at the head of an army of emigrants, helpers, and Bedouin tribesmen. They were met in the field by Abu Sufyan, the leader of the Quraysh, who accepted Muhammad's terms and received lavish gifts for himself and other chiefs of the Quraysh. The town of Mecca was opened to Muhammad's forces, and its inhabitants nominally adopted Islam en masse; the idols were destroyed and some poets who had ridiculed Muhammad were executed. In 630, then, Muhammad achieved his ultimate victory, the conquest of Mecca, and was able to defeat a remaining hostile alliance of Bedouin tribes from central Arabia at Hunayn, after which the town of Ta'if was opened to him as well. Muhammad sent letters to various tribes, demanding that they adopt Islam and pay tribute, and he received their embassies in Medina. However, there were some signs of inner division among the Muslims, caused by a rival "mosque of dissension" (masjid al-dirār, Q. 9:108–9) where Muhammad, in his early years at Medina, used to perform a ritual prayer on the Sabbath. In fact, this mosque was the first established in Medina, founded by the exiled Abu 'Amir, "the monk" (al-rāhib), of the clan 'Amr b. 'Awf, who lived in the compounds at Quba' in the southern part of the town. The unrest did not prevent Muhammad, however, from setting out in 630 on an expedition to Tabuk on the northern border of Arabia, where he received some petty Christian rulers and Jewish towns into Islam. New converts from tribes all over Arabia formally entered Islam—many out of fear, others more nominally than fervently—in hope of material and political advantages.

It is not fully clear to what extent Muhammad perceived his message to be a local or a universal one. At the beginning of his mission he directed his message primarily toward the people of Mecca (qawm), just as the prophets of old spoke to their own people, but he also addressed all of humanity (al-nās, al-'ālamūn) without confining his audience to a specific group. The expeditions to Mu'ta and Tabuk across the northern borders of the Arabian Peninsula in the latter years of his career may indicate a shift in his consciousness toward a more universal applicability of his message. In addition, Muhammad sent letters from Medina to numerous Arab tribes in the desert demanding their conversion and received tribal delegations in Medina from all over Arabia in the last years of his life. They pledged their allegiance to his cause, a phase described by the Qur'an as being characterized by "men entering God's religion in throngs" (Q. 110:2). The actual spread of Islam beyond the confines of Arabia, however, did not occur during Muhammad's lifetime but would come about with astonishing rapidity during the age of the Muslim conquests that began shortly after his death. In 631, Muhammad sent Abu Bakr to Mecca to read a declaration of "exemption" (barā'a) from the hajj that excluded all pagans from performing it. Then, in 632, at the climax of his career, Muhammad performed his "Farewell Pilgrimage"—referred to in the Qur'an with the words "Today I have perfected your religion" (Q. 5:3)—that reformed some of the pagan rites and became the standard of the pilgrimage until today. On his way back to Medina from the pilgrimage, Muhammad had stopped at the watering place of Ghadir Khumm and, taking 'Ali b. Abi Talib by his hand, apparently signaled him to be his successor as leader of the Muslim community with the cryptic words, "For whomever I am the patron (mawlā), 'Ali is also his patron." A few months later, Muhammad died in Medina after a short fever in the lap of his beloved wife 'A'isha on June 8, 632, a day that according to tradition saw an eclipse of the sun.

Throughout history all factions within Islam have maintained that prophecy, in the sense of the proclamation of a sacred scripture, had come to an end for all times with Muhammad's demise. In political terms, however, an intense struggle for succession began immediately during the preparations for his burial. Abu Bakr, 'A'isha's father and an early Meccan convert, managed to secure the leadership, backed by the majority of the clans of the Quraysh, who acclaimed him as Muhammad's successor (khalīfa, or caliph) at the Portico of the Banu Sa'ida. 'Ali, Muhammad's cousin, son-in-law, hero of many battles, and a man of great merits, was pushed aside despite his legitimate claim to being Muhammad's successor as champion of the family of the Prophet (ahl al-bayt) and leader of the Banu Hashim. A major bone of contention was that, during Muhammad's career at Medina, his family was assigned a certain religious privilege that entitled Muhammad and his kin to a fifth (khums) of the war booty as well as property (fay') that came into possession of the community by means other than war. Upon his accession to leadership, Abu Bakr stripped the family of the Prophet of this entitlement and transferred it to the clans of the Quraysh, thereby solidifying their support for his caliphate (632–34). In this succession struggle lie the roots of the primary Islamic schism between the majority Sunnis and the minority Shi'is, the party of 'Ali (Shi'at 'Ali). In its origin, the ultimate issue driving the schism was political and material rather than religious and spiritual; in the history of the ideological development of orthodoxy and heterodoxy in Islam, however, it took on theological dimensions.

Muhammad as a Political Leader

That one man could achieve so much in such a short time is astounding. Muhammad can truly claim the status of one of humanity's greatest founders of religion who made a global impact over more than a millennium and whose cause continues to exert a worldwide attraction today. His message has stood the test of time for more than a thousand years, and his community has grown steadily over the centuries. Except in small corners of the Muslim world, Islam has never receded but rather has always expanded without losing any substantial region to any other religion. Throughout history, conversions from Islam to other religions have been rare and conversions to it plentiful.

Inasmuch as it can be gathered from the sources, Muhammad was a man of average height and sturdy build. He had a prominent forehead, a hooked nose, and black eyes. His hair was long and slightly curled and his beard was full and thick. His charming smile was endearing and his energetic stride difficult to keep pace with. He experienced periods of silence and withdrawal and was at times plunged into deep thought and meditation. He showed great self-control and spoke with clarity, frankness, and precision. He treated people with great friendliness, was fond of children, and was apt to break into tears during moments of grief and sadness. He lived in modest circumstances all his life and was known for his courage, impartiality, and resolve. Most of all, Muhammad was a deeply religious man whose strongest characteristic was, without doubt, his deep personal conviction that he was called by God.

This consciousness of a call from God gave him an unshakeable faith in his divine mission. On the strength of this conviction, he persisted in proclaiming his message of an uncompromising monotheism over more than 20 years in the face of all adversities and hostilities, whether in times of disappointment or in moments of success. He was a charismatic personality with enormous leadership qualities, stupendous political gifts, and persuasive diplomatic skills. He commanded intellectual superiority at critical moments of his career and was capable of savvy and executive decision making, even if this required an abrupt reversal of approach. He was a very practical man who found ways to compromise and adapt when presented with unforeseen circumstances. He showed an uncanny ability to maneuver through the labyrinth of tribal bonds, rivalries, and compacts. His strong personality gave him real power to influence others and win them over to his cause. After his death, his followers began to regard him as the model of the ideal Muslim and the perfect Prophet, placing him on the highest pedestal and attributing to him the qualities of impeccability and infallibility as well as the powers of intercession for his community at the Last Judgment.

Contrary to the oft-repeated claim that Muhammad functioned as a religious reformer and prophet in Mecca and became a political leader and statesman only in Medina, his qualities of political leadership were already evident during his Meccan days. From the beginning of his preaching in Mecca, Muhammad showed great political skills in building a network of followers woven together from family relations, young men belonging to influential clans of Meccan society, men nominally related to clans but without close ties to them, and a few older men of considerable social standing. It was essential for him to establish these bonds because, as an orphan, he lacked the natural protective power of the nucleus of his family and faced hostility from his uncles Abu Lahab, a determined opponent, and ʿAbbas, who joined his cause only reluctantly after the conquest of Mecca, while his uncle Abu Talib granted him loyal protection but never accepted Islam.

Muhammad's political acumen may also be seen in the way he strengthened his bonds with the core group of his followers through ties of marriage. Through his marriage with ʿA'isha, Abu Bakr's daughter, and Hafsa, ʿUmar's daughter, he established family bonds that tied him to the two caliphs who would succeed him at the head of his community. His marriages with widows of Companions who died in warfare or women who belonged to the group that early on had migrated to Abyssinia served to strengthen his bonds with his community early in the Medinan phase of his career. Other unions established links with a Jewish woman of the Banu al-Nadir in Medina and a Christian woman given to him by the ruler of Egypt. By giving his own daughters, Ruqayya and Umm Kulthum, to ʿUthman in marriage, he forged a bond with a representative of an opposing clan who became his third successor. ʿAli, the fourth caliph who became the leader of the Shiʿa, received Fatima, a third daughter from Muhammad's union with Khadija, as his spouse and also married the daughter of Muhammad's oldest daughter, Zaynab.

Two other political moves of great consequence include his decision to send a group of weaker members of his following in Mecca to Abyssinia and his decision to go with his group of emigrants as dissidents and fugitives on the hijra to Medina. The negotiations he held with the emissaries of the Medinans and the pledges he made with them shortly before the hijra paved the way for his subsequent political leadership in Medina. The draft of his first legal document soon after his arrival in Medina shows his sharp political insight into the new circumstances he and his followers faced in the new urban environment. It constituted the foundation of the social unity of the community established by Muhammad, integrated the Meccan immigrants with the Medinan helpers, and provided clauses of security for Jewish believers. With regard to military planning and strategy, Muhammad's political gifts may be seen in the way in which he calmly conducted the Battle of Badr, decided on an innovative form of defense at the "War of the Trench," and pragmatically reversed his position to arrive at a solution at the truce of Hudaybiyya. In the years after the conquest of Mecca, he exhibited shrewd political instincts in drafting the many treatises he concluded and in exacting tribute from the inhabitants of a number of oases, such as those with the people of Dumat al-Jandal in 630 and the Christians of Najran in northern Yemen in 631. In these later years of his activity he also forged alliances of mutual assistance and established ties of political dependence with many Arab tribesmen by sending a large number of delegations all over Arabia that served to tie them to his personal political authority. In all these political actions, Muhammad was led by a sense of flexible and adaptable pragmatism rather than by preset principles of political theory and may thus be considered a genius in the field of applied political practice.

See also Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634); ʿAli b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); community; God; jihad; pilgrimage; prophecy; Qur'an; Quraysh; ʿUmar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644); ʿUthman b. ʿAffan (ca. 579–656)

Further Reading

Tor Andrae, Mohammed, the Man and His Faith, 1936; Regis Blachère, Le problème de Mahomet, 1952; Frans Buhl, Das Leben Mohammeds, 1934; Alfred Guillaume, The Life of Muhammad, 1955; Harald Motzki, The Biography of Muhammad: The Issue of the Sources, 2000; Rudi Paret, Muhammad und der Koran, 1957; Maxime Rodinson, Muhammad, 1980; Uri Rubin, The Eye of the Beholder, 1995; William Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 1953; Idem, Muhammad at Medina, 1956.

GERHARD BOWERING

Muhammad, Elijah (1897–1975)

Before joining the great migration of African Americans to the northern United States in the 1920s, Elijah Poole witnessed the worst of the American South's racism, including poverty, Jim Crow laws, and lynchings. Along with his fellow migrants, he discovered that racism was still a problem in the North, including his new home of Detroit, Michigan. His acute sensitivity to racism drew him to Wali Fard Muhammad's uniquely racial formulation of Islam. When Poole, renamed Elijah Muhammad, assumed the leadership of Fard Muhammad's Nation of Islam after the latter's disappearance in 1934, the racial problems of the United States completely infused the new leader's political thought and his understanding of Islam.

According to the teachings of Fard Muhammad that Elijah Muhammad developed over four decades, the original humanity was black. Some 6,600 years ago, one of their number, the diabolical genius named Mr. Yakub, set up a 600-year eugenics program to breed the evil white race. It was prophesied that this race would rule the world for 6,000 years. Although their evil ways were held in check for 1,000 years by the coming of the Prophet Muhammad, eventually they escaped the land of their banishment, Europe, and conquered and pillaged the rest of the nonwhite world. The greatest evil that the whites perpetrated was to capture Africans and enslave them in the Americas. In so doing, they robbed these blacks of their identities, including their natural language (Arabic) and their innate religion (Islam). They remained "lost" for 400 years under the white devil until Allah came in the person of Fard Muhammad to rescue this "Lost-Found Nation of Islam."

Given that his movement was conceived of as a nation, Elijah Muhammad had a fairly active political agenda. His political thought can be summarized by the slogan "Do for self." For him, this meant complete independence from whites: socially, religiously, economically, politically, and territorially. For example, blacks were not to befriend, much less intermarry with, their enemy. Christianity was a creation of whites to enslave blacks by teaching them to wait for justice in the hereafter and to worship a "white, blue-eyed" god. Instead, they should follow their innate religion, Islam. His economic program included Nation of Islam–owned farms, grocery stores, and restaurants. Elijah Muhammad taught his followers that the American government served only the interests of the whites, and it actively sought to control and destroy nonwhites. So he and his followers refused to vote or fight in its wars. Elijah Muhammad also demanded that the American government make reparations for slavery by giving African Americans a number of contiguous states within the continental United States. This was not just segregation but complete separation.

While Elijah Muhammad's "do for self" agenda was in some respects politically active, in other respects, he can be seen as advocating political quietism. His followers were told not to vote, because to participate in the political process was to be an "Uncle Tom." He saw the quest for civil rights and integration led by Martin Luther King Jr. (1929–68) as not only pointless but also dangerous. Despite his creation of the Fruit of Islam, a group of Nation of Islam's zealous young males trained in combat for self-defense, Elijah Muhammad repeatedly forbade the use of violence and the carrying of arms. Malcolm X (1925–65) became particularly frustrated by this lack of direct political action. Yet Elijah Muhammad maintained that the destruction of white society and its political structures would not come from him or through his followers' actions (violent or otherwise). The apocalyptic battle that would destroy white rule would be fought by Allah himself. Elijah Muhammad's duty was to prepare his followers to be independent and to separate them from whites lest they be destroyed by Allah along with whites.

Elijah Muhammad's movement was quickly reformed after his death in 1975. Under the leadership of his youngest legitimate son Warith Deen Mohammed (1933–2008), his vision of Islam and his racial political agenda were abandoned in favor of a more traditionally Sunni formulation. Nevertheless, Elijah Muhammad was enormously influential among African Americans. Long before slogans such as "black pride" and "black power" came into vogue, he not only advocated them but also effectively put them into practice.

See also Malcolm X (1925–65); Mohammed, W. D. (1933–2008); Nation of Islam; slavery

Further Reading

Herbert Berg, Elijah Muhammad and Islam, 2008; Claude Andrew Clegg III, An Original Man: The Life and Times of Elijah Muhammad, 1997; Elijah Muhammad, Message to the Blackman in America, 1965 (repr. 1992)

HERBERT BERG

Muhammad ʿAli (1769–1849)

Muhammad ʿAli, or more formally Muhammad ʿAli Pasha (Mehmed Ali), was an energetic and ambitious Ottoman governor of Egypt from 1805 to 1848. During his long career, he augmented Egypt's wealth, introduced long-lasting changes to its society, and embarked on an expansionist policy that gravely threatened the Ottoman Empire. Due to European opposition, however, the mini-empire he had founded had to be dismantled; in exchange, the Ottoman sultan granted him hereditary rule of Egypt.

Born in 1769 in the Macedonian town of Kavala, Muhammad ʿAli was dabbling in the tobacco trade when, in 1801, he joined an irregular military force that the Ottoman sultan dispatched to Egypt to evict the French army that had occupied the country three years earlier. Following the French evacuation in 1801, Muhammad ʿAli seized effective control of Cairo and forced the sultan in Istanbul to appoint him officially as governor of Egypt with the title of pasha in 1805.

Muhammad ʿAli moved fast to consolidate his control over Egypt by inviting many friends and relatives to settle in his new country and appointing them in key positions within the provinces. Next, he moved to curtail the power of the merchants and the 'ulama' (religious scholars) by forcing some into exile and confiscating the property of others. He also put some of his opponents under house arrest. His decisive consolidation of power came in March 1811, when he invited rival warlords, Mamluks, to his citadel and had them massacred.

Gradually, Muhammad 'Ali imposed a monopoly over the sale of a large number of locally produced agricultural commodities. He then entered into negotiations with European merchants who had to deal with him and him alone if they wanted to trade with Egypt. Furthermore, throughout his second decade in power, he undertook a complete overhaul of the agricultural sector: he raised new taxes, conducted a thorough land survey, and ordered huge infrastructural projects the scale of which had not been seen in Egypt for centuries.

Aware of Istanbul's desire to dislodge him from power in Egypt, he attempted to raise troops from the Sudan in 1818. When these attempts proved unsuccessful, he started conscripting peasants from the Egyptian countryside in 1820 to 1821 and quickly appointed European officers to train the peasant soldiers. Conscription waves spread throughout the country, and within ten years the army reached the impressive figure of 130,000 troops. Numerous institutions were founded to supply this army with all its needs. Schools for infantry, cavalry, and artillery were opened to train army officers. These were followed by schools for metallurgy and agriculture. A number of "manufactories" were also founded to supply the army with uniforms, footwear, headgear, guns, and ammunition. A large educational hospital was opened that trained doctors and surgeons needed for the different regiments. A printing machine that had been founded in 1820 started printing military and medical books.

Using these well-trained troops, Muhammad 'Ali grudgingly lent a helping hand to the sultan in his fight against his Greek subjects who had broken out in a nationalist revolt in 1820. After initial successes that his army had achieved against the Greek rebels, a naval force of the British, French, and Russian navies sank the combined Egyptian-Ottoman fleet in Navarino Bay in October 1827.

Following the Greek debacle, the pasha resolved not to get embroiled in the sultan's struggles. In 1831, he even invaded Syria to establish a buffer area between his power base in Egypt and the sultan's in Anatolia. His troops faced ineffective resistance and soon crossed into Anatolia and gravely threatened Istanbul itself. Alarmed at his vassal's surprise advance, the Ottoman sultan sought help from Britain, and when this did not materialize, he turned to the Russians, who were only too eager to interfere in Ottoman affairs. In time, the British saw the pasha's bid for independence and expansionist policies as undermining the peace in Europe and seriously threatening their interests in Asia. In 1840, they convened a European conference in London that forced the pasha to withdraw from Syria, southern Anatolia, Crete, and Arabia. Finally, in 1841, the Ottoman sultan further limited Muhammad 'Ali's power by issuing a rescript ordering him to reduce the size of his army, but in return the sultan bestowed on him the hereditary rule of Egypt and the Sudan.

Said to be illiterate till the age of 40, Muhammad 'Ali was nonetheless a well-read man. He was in the habit of having his advisors read to him history books as well as European newspapers. He was a keen observer of the contemporary European scene, and despite not having ambassadors in any European capital, he was fairly well informed of the political situation in London, Paris, and St. Petersburg. Besides military training manuals and medical textbooks, the famous printing house he founded in Bulaq printed many Turkish and Arabic translations of European historical books and political biographies, most notably of Catherine the Great and Napoleon Bonaparte. He was also aware of Machiavelli's The Prince, although he was not keen on having it published, saying that it had nothing to teach him; he preferred, instead, to read Ibn Khaldun's Muqaddima (Prolegomena). Muhammad 'Ali was also curious to learn about Egypt's history and was particularly intrigued by the Pharaonic and the Ptolemaic periods, less so by the Mamluk and Ottoman ones. Above all, he was intimately familiar with Ottoman history and always looked at Istanbul to learn how to run his prized province. Specifically, he was keen to learn how the Ottomans attempted to use law (qānūn) in order to reinforce their rule by controlling members of the elite and by trading justice to the commoners in exchange for their production of the necessary surplus.

Dubbed as the "Founder of Modern Egypt," Muhammad 'Ali is often depicted as a strong man who stood up against Western imperialism. Having had imperial designs himself, however, it is probably more correct to see his legacy as changing Egypt's relationship with the Ottoman Empire, posing the gravest threat that the Ottoman Empire had faced in its history, instituting long-lasting socioeconomic changes in Egypt, and establishing a dynasty that ruled over Egypt for a hundred years.

See also colonialism; Egypt; Ottomans (1299–1924)

Further Reading

Henry Dodwell, The Founder of Modern Egypt: A Study of Muhammed Ali, 1931; Khaled Fahmy, Ali the Pasha's Men: Mehmed Ali, His Army and the Making of Modern Egypt, 1997; Idem, Mehmed Ali: From Ottoman Governor to Ruler of Egypt, 2009; Shafik Ghorbal, The Beginnings of the Egyptian Question and the Rise of Mehemet Ali, 1828; F. Robert Hunter, Egypt under the Khedives, 1805–1978: From Household Government to Modern Bureaucracy, 1984; Fred Lawson, The Social Origins of Egyptian Expansionism During the Muhammad 'Ali Period, 1992; Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid Marsot, Egypt in the Reign of Muhammed Ali, 1984; Helen Rivlin, The Agricultural Policy of Muhammad 'Ali in Egypt, 1961; Judith Tucker, Women in Nineteenth-Century Egypt, 1985.

KHALED FAHMY

mujahidin. See jihad

Mulla Sadra (ca. 1572–1640)

Sadr al-Din al-Shirazi, commonly known as Mulla Sadra, is one of the most revered philosophers in Islam. Born Muhammad b. Ibrahim Qawami al-Shirazi to a wealthy family in Shiraz, southern Iran, on the return journey from his sixth pilgrimage to Mecca, he died in Basra, where his burial place was known until recent times.

Sadra's oeuvre does not include a treatise on political philosophy. A systematic examination of the principles of political philosophy is absent in his writings, and, contrary to classical political philosophy, he does not treat the concept "city" (madīna), or the "ideal city" (al-madīna al-fāḍila), as a subject of inquiry. There is no discussion of what constitutes a good or bad city, and there is neither a systematic examination of what justice is nor a theoretical concern with types of rule. Classical concepts such as "governance" (siyāsa), "political rule" (ḥukūma), and "management" (tadbīr) are never discussed in relation to the "virtuous city" (al-madīna al-fāḍila), while his discussion of the concept of "rule" relates to "divine management" (tadbīr-i ilāhī) generally and never to any specified political process, actual or theoretical. This means that Sadra's works can be described neither as political philosophy (al-siyāsa al-madaniyya) nor as practical philosophy (al-falsafa al-'amaliyya) in the classical sense. This does not mean that his new holistic philosophical system, "Metaphysical Philosophy" (al-Ḥikma al-Muta'āliya), is devoid of ideas and doctrines on political philosophy or theory; rather, it means that we have to glean his thoughts on the subject from different parts of his work.

Sadra's political thoughts focus on three themes: the authority and legitimacy of the learned ('ālim) philosopher-sage (ḥakīm), the source of inspirational knowledge that renews the foundations of science in every age, and governance by Shi'i imams who possess infallibility ('iṣma) and impart unrestricted knowledge to the most learned (a'lam). In all, the emphasis is on legitimizing the structure of Shi'i governance and establishing the "most learned" figure as the "source of imitation" (marja' al-taqlīd), an emerging Shi'i political institution later designated "ayatollah" (hierophant, lit. "Sign of God"). These themes are found in the classical theories of Farabi (d. 950) and Ibn Sina (d. 1037) and in the political doctrine of Shihab al-Din Yahya al-Suhrawardi (d. 1191).

The classical theory has a twofold core. First, it comprised an epistemology based on Aristotelian theories of intellectual knowledge according to which any person devoted to philosophical inquiry may gain access to objective knowledge and achieve union with the Active Intellect ('aql fa"āl), which acts as the giver of forms (wāhib al-ṣuwar) in Aristotelian epistemology, unrestricted by God's will. This theory of knowledge, later refined and reformulated by Ibn Sina into a unified theory of prophecy, is one of the most significant and enduring components of Islamic political philosophy. The second part of the theory is a practical philosophy that fuses the theories of intellectual knowledge in Aristotle's De Anima III and Metaphysics XII with the ideals of the perfect state in Plato's Republic, framed by the Islamic notion of just rule as the ultimate purpose of philosophy. Farabi had redefined Greek political philosophy in the context of Islamic monotheism and beliefs about prophecy and revelation, positing the ideal political order as one legislated by a prophet-lawgiver and reformed and upheld by the learned ('ulama'). This ensures just rule, a condition necessary for earthly and eternal happiness. Following Farabi's most popular work, The Ideas of the Inhabitants of the Virtuous City, Sadra mentions the doctrine of just rule and encourages philosophical discourse on prophecy and laws that affect the beliefs and practices of the Muslim community.

These form the classical components of Sadra's views and later help define the Shi'i political doctrine that invokes the "virtuous city" to describe just rule by the divinely inspired philosopher-ruler, who is progressively referred to as the "jurist-guardian" (al-walī al-faqīh).

The next components, perhaps the most essential of Sadra's political views, are founded on Suhrawardi's doctrine in which the political system is deemed meaningful if, and only if, a state, nation, or city embodies and in some actual manner manifests a divine dimension in its politics. According to Suhrawardi's illuminationist (ishrāqī) theory, legitimate rule is associated with a wholly other source, the "unseen realm" (al-'ālam al-ghayb), and is not shaped or initiated by the "sensed realm" (al-'ālam al-maḥsūs) or the "seen realm" (al-'ālam al-shahāda)—that is, the corporeal. Rulers in command of temporal rule, be they kings, sages, philosophers, or persons in a state of occultation, must possess and exhibit a sign of divine inspiration that displays a real relation with the "unseen" source of authority. Such rulers serve as a link between the world of sense perception and pure being and light from which all things emanate, political authority included. A ruler gains legitimacy by God's command (al-ḥākim bi amr allāh). This means that governance or ḥukūma can be justified if and only if it is through connection with the divine, or by the command (amr) of God.

The synthesis of earlier political philosophies with Illuminationist thought is revealed in Sadra's views, which combine the following elements: the theory of prophethood and the Islamic view of the miraculous powers of prophets (anbiyā') and saints (awliyā'); the ancient Iranian concepts of royal "glory" (kharra-yi k̄yānī), a sign of authority granted to legitimate rulers, and divine glory, which, as related by Suhrawardi, may be gained by any person who obtains wisdom (ḥikma) and in whom it will visibly radiate as a divine light (farra-i izādī); and an Islamic belief in saints and mystics who exercise awe-inspiring occult powers.

To conclude, Sadra's political doctrine may be summarized as follows: Any member of the 'ulama' who persists in the pursuit of knowledge, preoccupies himself with the Divine Word, and immerses himself in remembering the attributes of the Shi'i imams may gain unrestricted intellectual knowledge. Combining what is bestowed in the conjunction of the Active Intellect and acquired intellect ('aql mustafād) with intuitive inspirational knowledge, such a person acquires legitimate authority to rule. Authority will manifest itself upon the ruler as a radiating light that is visible to his subjects, who will consequently obey his commands as though issued by an infallible imam. The unrestricted knowledge associated with such a figure is also essential for the renewal and upholding of the principles of science, which in turn ensure enduring justice in the state.

See also al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (ca. 980–1037); philosophy

Further Reading

Jalal al-Din Ashtiyani, Sharh-i Hal wa-Ara'-i Falsafi-yi Mulla Sadra, 1981; Fazlur Rahman, The Philosophy of Mullā Ṣadrā, 1975; Hossein Ziai, "Source and Nature of Authority: A Study of Suhrawardi's Illuminationist Political Doctrine," in The Political Aspects of Islamic Philosophy, edited by Charles Butterworth, 1992.

HOSSEIN ZIAI

Mulla 'Umar (b. 1959)

Mulla Muhammad 'Umar is supreme leader of the Taliban, a disciplined and highly pious organization of madrasa (Muslim school) graduates emerging from the expansion of madrasa education in Pakistan during the 1960s that came to play a significant political role in Afghanistan since the 1990s. He has made few details of his life public, which serves to cultivate his spiritual stature as "Commander of the Faithful" (amīr al-mu'minīn), a title first held by 'Umar b. al-Khattab (second caliphal successor to the Prophet Muhammad), and also to conceal his association with Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI). He was born, it is believed, in 1959 in Nodeh, a village in the province of Kandahar (another alleged birthplace is Singesar in the same province), and lived in Tarin Kowt in the province of Uruzgan for a period during the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan (1979–89). He is Pashtun, belonging to the Hotak clan of the Ghilzai tribe, and was raised in very simple circumstances. He apparently received enough of a madrasa education to be considered a religious authority, hence the title "mulla." Although he has no real depth as a religious scholar, his followers believe he is divinely sent, partly, it is claimed, because he receives guidance through dreams. He allegedly knows Arabic and was devoted to the teachings of 'Abdallah 'Azzam (d. 1989), a Palestinian figure who became the leader and ideological architect of the jihad against the Soviets and also the erstwhile mentor of Osama bin Laden. Mulla 'Umar is highly reclusive and has not met with foreign journalists; even his physical features are not fully known, only that he is relatively tall and is missing one eye as a result of a wound suffered while fighting the Soviets in the 1980s.

After the fall of Soviet-installed President Najibullah Ahmadzai in 1992, Mulla 'Umar founded a madrasa in Singesar. He was useful to the ISI in keeping the border roads clear, and he began to consolidate his power as a military leader. He recruited students from madrasas in Afghanistan and Pakistan, some of whom had been trained at ISI camps, for armed campaigns against the corruption and brutalities of warlords exploiting a post-Soviet society that had descended into chaos and civil disorder. Pursuing the goal of social order through a strict implementation of shari'a, he was able to take control of the province of Kandahar in 1994 and then Herat in 1995. Kabul fell to his forces in 1996, at which point foreign radical groups that had conducted jihad against the Soviets began to return to Afghanistan, a development that would distort the national focus of the Taliban and drag it into the arena of global jihadism.

With power in the hands of the Taliban, Mulla 'Umar became head of the Supreme Council, governing Afghanistan from September 1996 until November 2001. Taliban rule over the nation, known since October 1997 as the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan, was recognized by Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and the United Arab Emirates. Already in April 1996, Mulla 'Umar had received the title of Commander of the Faithful, elected to the position by a large assembly of religious scholars from Pakistan, Iran, and Afghanistan, who symbolically robed him in a cloak alleged to have belonged to the Prophet Muhammad. Pious and ascetic, he did not personally head the government in Kabul but remained in Kandahar, apparently preferring the familiarity of his ancestral homelands to the urban life of the capital. He was, however, the ultimate authority of the political structure and issued decrees on a range of issues from local concerns to global jihad. Under his rule, the government pursued a strict and highly visible application of shari'a: women were denied a public presence and were forbidden to pursue educational and professional opportunity; men were required to grow their beards to a specified length; adulterers were stoned to death; homosexuals were executed by being crushed under brick walls; murderers were executed by members of the victim's family; and the hands of thieves were amputated. He banned conversion from Islam upon pain of death and infamously ordered the destruction of the Buddha statues of Bamiyan in March 2001. In May 2001 he issued a decree requiring Hindus to wear a yellow patch, and in August 2001 he ordered the arrest of foreign nationals working for the nongovernmental organization Shelter Now International on charges of proselytism.

The religious prestige enjoyed by Mulla 'Umar comes not from being recognized as a leading scholar of shari'a but from a combination of spiritual aura and combat success. He was employed at one time as a madrasa teacher in Quetta, Pakistan, and then as a prayer leader in a mosque in Karachi, where he reportedly met Bin Laden for the first time. The nature of the relationship between the two men, which developed during their time fighting the Soviets, is not clear. It is said that they cemented their alliance through marriage, but this is not confirmed. Mulla 'Umar did allow Bin Laden and his organization, al-Qaeda, to use Afghanistan as a base from which to promote its global jihadism, and he did defend Bin Laden against charges of orchestrating the 9/11 attacks, but their relationship was apparently marked by occasional tension. It is said that Mulla 'Umar denied Bin Laden authority that could be used to undermine him and also that some Taliban saw al-Qaeda as a distraction from their religious and political goals for Afghanistan. However, in general, the Taliban became more hostile to the West after the United States imposed sanctions on their regime in 1999, pushing them to align more closely with the jihadist ideology of al-Qaeda. Because of their association with al-Qaeda, the Taliban regime, upon which popular hopes for social order had been initially placed, quickly fell to U.S. attacks beginning in October 2001. However, while the Taliban was destroyed as a regime, its members quickly regrouped as a fighting force with Pakistani support, and Mulla 'Umar continued to act as a symbol of allegiance for a movement that effectively stymied international efforts to rebuild the nation and that even regained control of parts of the country. On the run since the fall of his government and wanted by the FBI for harboring al-Qaeda militants, Mulla 'Umar continued to issue statements on varied topics through different media. In April 2004, for example, he is said to have told a Pakistani journalist in a telephone interview that Bin Laden was alive and that the Taliban were in pursuit of U.S. soldiers. In June 2006 he saluted the martyrdom of Abu Mus'ab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, who had recently been assassinated by U.S. forces. In December 2006 he expressed confidence that foreign forces would be driven from Afghanistan. In April 2007 he called for more suicide attacks. Moreover, his prestige as leader of the Taliban seemed only to grow with the emergence of a Pakistani version of the Taliban. For example, Baitullah Mehsud (d. 2009), former leader of the Pakistani Taliban, swore allegiance to Mulla 'Umar.

As a result of the survival of the Taliban on both sides of the border, some have begun to consider Mulla 'Umar as part of the solution for restoring stability to Afghanistan. After a September 2007 suicide bombing in Kabul, for example, Hamid Karzai, the president of Afghanistan, offered to talk with the "esteemed" Mulla 'Umar. In January 2010 a retired ISI officer and graduate of Fort Bragg, Sultan Tarar, claimed that Mulla 'Umar, whom he once trained, was ready to turn against al-Qaeda, opening the door to national unity—that is, since Mulla 'Umar alone could end the legitimacy of al-Qaeda in the region, his role in the resolution of the national crisis would be vital. However, his willingness to work with the government came with conditions that were unlikely to be fulfilled—namely, the evacuation of foreign forces from the country and the refusal of a U.S. role in the process of restoring national unity.

See also Afghanistan; Pakistan; al-Qaeda; Taliban

Further Reading

Gilles Dorronsoro, Revolution Unending: Afghanistan 1979 to the Present, 2005; William Maley, The Afghanistan Wars, 2009.

PAUL L. HECK

Murji'is

The Murji'is were a religiopolitical group that emerged in Kufa in the second century of Islam and later spread to Khurasan. They formulated a unique position on the moral standing of the caliphs involved in the First Islamic Civil War, and in later times they were renowned for a theological position that measured faith by belief rather than acts. Heresiographers treat the latter as the most fundamental dogma of the Murji'is, giving less attention to their views on the caliphs.

The basic contention of the Murji'is was that human beings should not judge the caliphs who participated in the civil war, 'Uthman b. 'Affan and 'Ali b. Abi Talib; rather, that judgment should be deferred to God. In contrast, the two caliphs who ruled before the civil war, Abu Bakr and 'Umar b. al-Khattab, deserved praise and emulation, while anyone was free to take a stance on the (iniquitous) status of the Umayyad caliphs. The Murji'is argued for the suspension of judgment with respect to 'Uthman and 'Ali on the basis of the Qur'anic expression "and others are deferred to God's commandment" (9:106). By advocating this position, the Murji'is distanced themselves from Shi'is, who repudiated the caliphs preceding 'Ali (including 'Uthman); the 'Uthmanis, who repudiated 'Ali (the official Umayyad position); and the Kharijis, who denied the legitimacy of all the participants as well as the Umayyad caliphs. The Murji'is position was an attempt to avoid extreme partisanship on the issue of the caliphate and to advocate a return to unity among Muslims.

The Murji'is formulated the suspension of judgment doctrine on the basis of a unique epistemological principle: that something can be judged only on the basis of personal observation or unanimous testimony. Because the First Islamic Civil War was a disputed event that happened before their time, the Murji'is declined to pronounce on the rightness or wrongness of 'Uthman's and 'Ali's actions. The Murji'is accepted Abu Bakr and 'Umar as Rightly Guided Caliphs, however, because the members of the community were in agreement on this point.

The main opponents of the Murji'is were the Kharijis, who attempted to undermine the Murji'i position by showing that their epistemological position resulted in a rejection of tradition. The Kharijis argued that if the status of the Muslims who fought in the First Islamic Civil War was so uncertain, then the status of some of the Companions of Muhammad—the founders of tradition—was also uncertain. If the status of even the Companions was uncertain, then the Murji'is had lost their connection with God's messenger.

See also caliph, caliphate; civil war; Ibadis; Kharijis; Mu'tazilis; Shi'ism; theology

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Early Muslim Dogma: A Source-Critical Study, 1981; Patricia Crone and Fritz Zimmermann, The Epistle of Salim Ibn Dhakwan, 2001; Wilferd Madelung, "The Murji'a and Sunnite Traditionalism," in Religious Trends in Early Islamic Iran, 1988.

TARIQ JAFFER

Muslim Brotherhood

The Society of the Muslim Brothers (al-Ikhwan al-Muslimun) is a political movement whose ideology is based in Islamic principles. It was one of the most significant political opposition movements in the second part of the 20th century. Founded in Egypt in 1928 by Hasan al-Banna (1906–49), it produced offshoots elsewhere in the Middle East, such as in Palestine, Syria, Jordan, and Sudan, and influenced the ideologies of Islamist movements in Northern Africa.

In the 1940s, the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood became the first mass grassroots political organization in the modern Middle East. Under the leadership of Banna, it sought recruits from the educated middle class and from the lower classes—who thereby gained a nonelitist access to politics—in contrast to the recruitment of politicians from higher socioeconomic backgrounds through patronage and clientele networks. This style of recruitment partially explains the extraordinary growth of the movement, in combination with Banna's focus on moral and religious education as well as on a practical vision of Islam reflected in active preaching and in the construction of schools and mosques. This vision brought to life many of the principles underlying reformist intellectual trends such as those inspired by Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905) and Rashid Rida (1865–1935). The Muslim Brotherhood has authoritarian forms of internal governance as well as administrative structures that resemble those of a political party. Banna was not in favor of parliamentary partisan life as it played out in Egypt between the two World Wars, however, and it was not until the end of the 20th century that the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood and some of its offshoots located elsewhere attempted to become legal political parties.

The Muslim Brotherhood's history is marked by internal conflicts as well as by tempestuous relations with local regimes. A secret armed wing had existed since the end of the 1930s with the intention of fighting against British occupation, and its activities created tensions with the Egyptian government in the second half of the 1940s, leading to the assassination of Banna in 1949. The movement has often been repressed, which gave it its great martyrs, such as Banna himself. In particular, its harsh repression at the hands of Gamal Abdel Nasser's government in Egypt after a short alliance between the Muslim Brotherhood and the Free Officers' regime explains the radicalization of some of its members, as illustrated by the ideology of Sayyid Qutb (1906–66). Influenced by the Pakistani thinker Mawdudi (1903–79), Qutb insisted on political sovereignty (hākimiyya) as belonging exclusively to God and argued that it must not be usurped by the tyrant (tāghūt) presiding over the "societies of ignorance" (jāhiliyya). In Qutb's ideal polity, political power is not the result of human preferences: the political sovereign does not derive his power from God, but it is rather the law of God that is sovereign.

The more mainstream trend within the Muslim Brotherhood did not approve of the revolutionary appeal of such a doctrine. Although its members claim that the regimes governing their countries are not fully Islamic, they have preferred to compromise with them and have adopted a reformist stance. On the other hand, since the 1970s, some groups calling for immediate revolutionary action against "impious" regimes, such as al-Jihad, the group responsible for the assassination of the Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, were inspired by Qutb's doctrine, which they radicalized, and their strategy has been clearly denounced by the Muslim Brotherhood.

The mainstream Muslim Brotherhood does not have a homogeneous theology nor political ideology. Early on, the Muslim Brotherhood criticized the official religious institutions and their 'ulama' for neglecting their duty as guardians of Islam. However, leading members of the Muslim Brotherhood were also in contact with reformist 'ulama' from the mosque-university of Azhar, and, like them, sought a religious and political regeneration of their society. Anti-imperialism, the opposition to Christian missionary activism, and more generally the defense of Islam were at the heart of the early ideology of the Muslim Brotherhood, which articulated a strong critique of Western influence on Muslims. Banna blended Egyptian nationalism and Pan-Islamism, and the ambiguity produced by this combination remains important.

The Muslim Brotherhood was also radically opposed to Arabism and particularly to Ba'thism. Conflicts with Ba'thist regimes and political parties have run deep. In the 1950s, especially with Muslim Brotherhood members such as Egyptians Sayyid Qutb and Muhammad al-Ghazali and the Syrian Mustafa Siba'i, the theme of "Islamic socialism" and social justice became significant, reflecting a desire to reduce socioeconomic differences through redistribution of wealth while respecting private property. This reformist trend envisioned the role of the state as a central agency for welfare.

One of the most enduring elements of the Muslim Brotherhood's ideology has been the critique of secularism defined as the separation of religion and politics. Developing the idea that Islam must be a comprehensive way of life, their motto, "Islam is religion and world" (al-Islām dīn wa-dunyā), means that Islam must be applied to mundane problems. The political domain is particularly central since they believe that the political system organizing the life of the community must derive from Islam: Islam is "a religion and a state" (al-Islām dīn wa-dawla). For Banna, political power was one of the "roots" of the sacred law, not one of its "branches," going back to the classical notion of siyāsa shar'iyya and applying it to the modern state. For the Muslim Brotherhood, the legitimate polity should be founded on Islamic legality. The political vision of Banna, which continues to influence the conception of politics of the Muslim Brotherhood, was the formation of a Muslim public opinion drawn by the principles of shari'a.

The Muslim Brotherhood primarily has focused on legal strategies of the Islamization of institutions and in particular of the state. While it originally showed some reluctance toward party politics, since the 1970s the mainstream Muslim Brotherhood has tried to form legalized parties in order to participate in electoral politics and in government. Whether legalized, as in Jordan and Morocco in the 1990s, or not, as in Egypt, the Muslim Brotherhood has shown a significant ability for electoral mobilization that derives from its denunciation of government corruption and authoritarianism, and more particularly its attention to social needs in domains where the state remains weak (health, education, charitable work). In Jordan and in Sudan, the Muslim Brotherhood governed the state or participated in governments after 1989, and in Morocco it governed at the local level since the end of the 1990s. Its inclusion in party competition and governance made the Muslim Brotherhood's ideologies more accepting of its governments, which it now wants to reform from within, with remarkable convergences between all the Muslim Brotherhood-inspired movements. The Brotherhood tended to see its respective political programs as animated by an "Islamic reference" (marja'iyya Islāmiyya) rather than by the desire to implement Islamic law, and it focused on the definition of an Islamic political ethics and citizenship. It also appealed to the expertise of the 'ulama' more than it used to and envisioned the 'ulama' as playing a significant role in policy decisions in its political programs. However, its normalization by the regimes of the Middle East remains a major point of contention among the Brotherhood, the larger public, and the state elite.

See also Azhar University; al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); Ba'th Party; fundamentalism; Hamas; Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79); Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–70); revival and reform; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)

Further Reading

Marion Boulby, The Muslim Brotherhood and the King of Jordan (1945–1993), 1999; Roxanne Euben, Enemy in the Mirror: Islamic Fundamentalism and the Limits of Modern Rationalism: A Work of Comparative Political Theory, 1999; Gilles Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt: Prophet and Pharaoh, 1985; Brynjar Lia, The Society of the Muslim Brothers in Egypt: The Rise of an Islamic Mass Movement (1928–1942), 1998; Olivier Carré et Gérard Michaud, Les Frères Musulmans. Egypte et Syrie (1928–1982), 1983; Richard P. Mitchell, The Society of the Muslim Brothers, 1969; Malika Zeghal, Islamism in Morocco: Religion, Authoritarianism, and Electoral Politics, 2008.

MALIKA ZEGHAL

Muslim League

The Muslim League (ML) is the successor of the All-India Muslim League, which was founded in Dhaka on December 30, 1906, during the annual meeting of the Muhammadan Educational Conference under the leadership of Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98), its first honorary president. Following the partition in 1947, the All-India Muslim League was split into two organizations, the Pakistani Muslim League (ML) and the Indian Union Muslim League. The ML was instrumental in the creation of Pakistan as a Muslim state and has remained active in the political life of the subcontinent.

The objectives of the ML, as stated in its first resolution, were threefold: to foster Indian Muslims' loyalty to the British government, to protect and promote the rights of the Muslim minority in India while providing them with an adequate representation, and to prevent the rise of communal tensions between Muslims and Hindus. The ML was created as a reaction to the rising political influence of the Indian National Congress (INC), which was founded in 1885 to promote Indian participation and representation in government under British rule. The INC was perceived by many Muslims as an organization serving the interests of the Hindu majority to the detriment of Muslim Indians. Sayyid Ahmad Khan hoped to counterbalance this trend by providing Indian Muslims with their own representative body while asking them openly not to join the INC.

The ML has its origins in the Aligarh movement led by Sayyid Ahmad Khan since 1857. The movement had multiple stated objectives: to modernize Islam, to improve relations between Muslims and the British, to provide Western education to Indian Muslims, and to involve Indian Muslims more substantially in the administration of the country. The Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College of Aligarh was established in 1877 to fulfill the educational purposes of the movement and to create politically active Muslim elites. The ML was born out of the first forum of the All-India Muslim Educational Conference held in 1906. Ahmad Khan initiated a movement of self-awakening and identity awareness for the Muslims of India. He formulated the "two-nation theory," known as the Ideology of Pakistan, arguing that Hindus and Muslims are two distinct peoples and nations that may not live in a single state. This theory later became the basis for the partition of India in 1947.

In its early years and under the leadership of Ahmad Khan, the ML adopted a policy of cooperation with the British in order to secure political rights for Muslim Indians. There were also efforts at a rapprochement with the INC. In 1916, Hindu-Muslim unity was symbolized through the signing of the Lucknow Pact, an agreement between the INC and the ML to combine their efforts to pressure the British for self-government. However, this unity was short-lived, and in 1929 Muhammad 'Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), a leader of the ML, proposed the "Fourteen Points" with the aim of protecting the political rights of Muslims. These points, adopted by the ML in 1929, included the creation of an independent Muslim province in Sindh; the protection of the Muslim majority of Punjab, Bengal, and the North-West Frontier Province; and an adequate share for Muslims in government positions. These constitutional reforms were further promoted by Muhammad Iqbal (1877–1938), who, in his presidential address for the ML in Allahabad in 1930, suggested the idea of an independent state for Muslims in northwest India. Both the INC and the Deobandi 'ulama' (religious scholars) opposed the idea and defended a one-state solution.

In the mid-1930s, the former alliance between the ML and the INC came to a definitive end when the INC refused to admit ML representatives into its cabinets in the provinces. The growing power of the INC provoked suspicion among the ML that the INC would attempt to push for a Hindu agenda. On March 24, 1940, under Jinnah, the ML adopted the Lahore Resolution (commonly known as the Pakistan Resolution), which officially called for an independent Muslim homeland. The Muslim state of Pakistan was eventually established in 1947.

Following the creation of Pakistan, the newly named All-Pakistan Muslim League ruled Pakistan intermittently until the 1958 military coup and again in the 1960s, 1980s, and 1990s. After Jinnah's death in 1948, it suffered from internal splits, financial corruption, and a lack of a long-term political program. The ML has had a significant impact on modern Pakistani politics, however, and on most political parties formed in Pakistan after independence. Its importance is underlined by the fact that a number of political groups have used its name as a source of legitimacy.

See also India; Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938); Jinnah, Mohammad 'Ali (1876–1948); nationalism; Pakistan; Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98)

Further Reading

Lal Bahadur, The Muslim League, 1954; Ayesha Jalal, The Sole Spokesman: Jinnah, the Muslim League, and the Demand for Pakistan, 1994; Sayyid A. S. Pirzada, ed., Foundations of Pakistan: All-India Muslim League Documents, 1906–1947, 1970; Matiur Rahman, From Consultation to Confrontation: A Study of the Muslim League in British Indian Politics, 1906–1912, 1970.

NASSIMA NEGGAZ

Mu'tazilis

The Mu'tazilis were the followers of a religious movement in early Islam called Mu'tazilism, founded in Basra by Wasil b. 'Ata' (d. 748–49) and his disciples in the late Umayyad period. Mu'tazilism evolved into a significant theological school, politically dominant during the ninth and tenth centuries, before experiencing a steady decline in the following centuries.

The origins of Mu'tazilism are highly controversial. According to some scholars, Mu'tazilism emerged out of a religiopolitical attitude during the First Islamic Civil War (fitna), specifically the Battle of the Camel (656) and the Battle of Siffin (657). A group of Muslims abstained from taking sides with 'Ali b. Abi Talib or his opponents and were called Mu'tazilis, from the Arabic i'tazala, meaning "to separate from" and "to dissociate oneself from." This historical attitude of "political neutrality" was later translated, on the doctrinal level, into a position of independence regarding the central question of Islamic theology at its beginnings: the status of the Muslim who committed a grave sin. Wasil allegedly was the first to place such a person between the status of the believer and the infidel, the so-called manzila bayna al-manzilatayn. A cloth merchant from Basra, he left the circle of his teacher, Hasan al-Basri (d. 728), after disagreeing with the teacher's views. With his disciples, he led a missionary organization spreading the views of the movement through travel and business activities. While other explanations have been suggested concerning the origins of the movement and the meaning of the term mu'tazila, this is the most commonly accepted one.

Mu'tazili doctrine is characterized by five principles, defined by Abu al-Hudhayl (d. 841): God's unity (tawhid), God's justice ('adl), divine retribution (al-wa'd wa al-wa'id), the intermediate position concerning the Muslim sinner (al-manzila bayna al-manzilatayn), and commanding right and forbidding wrong (al-amr bi-l-ma'ruf wa-l-nahy 'an al-munkar). Each one of these principles carries significant doctrinal implications. Because of their understanding of tawhid, the Mu'tazilis considered God's inessential attributes, but also His speech (the Qur'an), to have been created. The second principle ('adl) entails the idea of human free will and responsibility. Because God is infinite justice, humans are the creators of their acts and are capable of distinguishing between good and evil. A fundamental aspect of Mu'tazili creed is the belief that human reason is able to demonstrate the existence of God rationally. Human reason and divine revelation are placed on an equal footing. Due to their rationalist approach and methods, the Mu'tazilis were opposed by the traditionalists who preached a literal reading of the Qur'an and traditions of the Prophet (hadith).

Scholars divide the development of Mu'tazilism into three main phases or periods: an incubation phase (eight century), a second period during which the movement was at its height both intellectually and politically at the Abbasid court (815–50), and finally a third period during which Mu'tazili thought was systematized (several centuries following). Under Wasil, the early Mu'tazilis were predominantly non-Arabs (mawali), particularly Persians, who were not granted the same rights as Muslim Arabs despite their conversion. The movement and its early followers might have reacted to the difference of status between Arabs and mawali. While it was rather politically neutral in its early years, the Mu'tazili movement took part in the 762 revolt led by the Shi'i Muhammad b. 'Abdallah al-Nafs al-Zakiyya against the Abbasid caliph. The failure of the revolt led to harsh persecution of the Mu'tazili movement and years of inactivity. However, Mu'tazilism was soon propelled to success due to the theological interest of the Abbasid caliphs. While the viziers of Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–802), the Barmakid family, showed a predilection for theological disputes, Caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33) imposed Mu'tazilism as a state doctrine and started an inquisition (mihna) in 833. The Mu'tazilis, though not the instigators of the policy, provided the state doctrine with intellectual support, notably through the figure of Ahmad b. Abi Du'ad (d. 855).

Several explanations have been offered regarding the Abbasid support for the Mu'tazili doctrine. The Abbasid caliphs, argues Josef van Ess, saw in Mu'tazili rationality and dialectical methodology a potential way to transcend the fierce sectarianism that emerged from the early politico-theological disputes. Another explanation suggests that Mu'tazili political theory, grounded on the principle of the just ruler, justified the overthrow of the Umayyads by the Abbasids. The distinguished Mu'tazili jurist of the time, Abu 'Uthman 'Amr al-Basri (d. 869), known as "al-Jahiz," established that a tyrant imam is to be rebelled against and deposed. This position stands in contradiction to the traditionalists' emphasis on patience toward the imam and preference for stability against chaos. A third group of scholars argues that the Abbasid movement rested upon the early Mu'tazili theology of Wasil.

The mihna continued under the caliphs Mu'tasim (r. 833–42) and Wathiq (r. 842–47) but was abandoned by Mutawakkil (847–61), who favored the traditionists, the scholars of hadith. Although Mu'tazilism was more influential in Iran, it declined in the early 13th century. Mu'tazili theology had a strong impact on Shi'ism, particularly on Zaydism and Twelver Shi'ism.

Mu'tazilism played a significant role in the development of Islamic theology and had a strong impact on the formation of traditionalist orthodoxy. While Mu'tazilism virtually disappeared after the Mongol invasion in the 13th century, it has experienced a comeback today through the work of modern scholars such as Fazlur Rahman or Harun Nasution, often labeled as "neo-Mu'tazilis."

See also Abbasids (750–1258); justice; Ma'mun (786–833); Qur'an; theology

Further Reading

Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam: An Introduction to the Study of Islamic Political Theory, 1981; Richard C. Martin, Mark R. Woodward, and Dwi S. Atmaja, Defenders of Reason in Islam: Mu'tazilism from Medieval School to Modern Symbol, 1997; Albert Nasri Nader, Le Systeme Philosophique des Mu'tazila, 1956; J. A. Nawas, "A Reexamination of Three Current Explanations for al-Ma'mun's Introduction of the Mihna," International Journal of Middle East Studies 26, no. 4 (1994); J. A. Nawas, "The Mihna of 218 A.H./833 A.D. Revisited: An Empirical Study," Journal of the American Oriental Society 16, no. 4 (1996); Josef van Ess, The Flowering of Muslim Theology, 2006.

NASSIMA NEGGAZ

Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–70)

An Egyptian military commander and president of Egypt (1956–70), Nasser became a heroic figure whose charisma and nationalistic ideals moved the masses for decades and continue to endure in major parts of the Arab world. His political approach was characterized by nationalism, Pan-Arabism, and socialist ideas on how to lead the state and the economy. "Nasserism" is often cited as a political movement combining these ideologies that stands against Western imperialism and colonization and in favor of the emancipation of the Third World. Nasser was one of the founders and leaders of the Non-Aligned Movement, founded in Belgrade in 1961 as an international organization of states that chose not to align themselves with any powerful bloc during the cold war.

Nasser was born on January 15, 1918, into a modest family in Alexandria. His father, who worked as a post-office clerk, was from the village of Bani Murr in Upper Egypt, where Nasser spent part of his childhood. In 1933, he moved to Cairo to complete his secondary education and start a degree in law at Cairo University. The capital was fertile ground for Nasser to get involved in militant activities against both foreign domination and its support by local politicians. After the signing of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty in 1936, Nasser interrupted his studies and joined the Royal Military Academy, which provided him with an outstanding social ladder. In the army he also met fellow dissident junior officers with whom he created the Free Officers movement in the aftermath of the 1948 Palestinian exodus. The Free Officers was a clandestine revolutionary movement committed to overthrow the monarchy and establish a new regime free of foreign influence.

Egypt's internal political life in the highly tense era of the 1940s and early 1950s provided the Free Officers with an excellent opportunity for political action. The well-known corruption of King Farouk's monarchy, the Arab defeat in Palestine, and the continuing British presence in Egypt all contributed to making change imminent. On July 23, 1952, following a series of anti-British riots during the events of Black Saturday on January 26 of that year, the Free Officers launched a coup d'état that overthrew King Farouk peacefully. The Republic of Egypt was proclaimed on June 18, 1953, with Muhammad Naguib (1901–84) as its first provisional president. After serving as chairman of the Revolutionary Command Council starting in 1954, Nasser was elected president of the young republic by a referendum on June 23, 1956.

Nasser and the Free Officers' political rule was characterized by a set of ideals rather than by a definite political program. Among their long-term goals were the liberation of Egypt from foreign presence and influence, the cleansing of the former autocratic political system and the creation of a modern and democratic one, and the dismantling of the former landowning elite and the establishment of a socialist economy. Internally, political and social reforms were launched to address these goals. The agrarian reform law of September 1952 established a limit of 200 feddāns of land per landowner (roughly 207 acres), severely limiting the reach of the powerful landowning families. Several reforms took on the modernization of religious institutions and put them under state control, curtailing significantly the authority and independence of the 'ulama' (religious scholars). Meanwhile, the newly established regime used a religious discourse to legitimize its rule, and the concept of "Islamic socialism" was created as a justification of the religious foundations of the socialist reforms of the state. Azhar University, the main religious-educational institution of Egypt, was thoroughly reformed and modernized; the mosque and the university became officially separated from one another by the reform law of 1961. Externally, Nasser signed an agreement with Britain in 1954 for the gradual withdrawal of the British forces from the Suez Canal. The compromising nature of the agreement led to strong criticism and opposition from the Muslim Brotherhood. Eventually, an assassination attempt on Nasser that same year triggered a severe repression of the Muslim Brotherhood by Nasser after an early alliance with it based on common anti-imperialist goals.

In February 1955, a devastating raid launched by Israel in Gaza made Nasser realize the importance of modernizing the military. After a failed arms agreement with the United States and Britain and the withdrawal of their pledge to finance the construction of a high dam project at Aswan, Nasser signed an arms agreement with Czechoslovakia, then acting as an intermediary for the Soviet Union. Following Egypt's deteriorating relations with the Western powers and its political alliance with the Soviet Union, Nasser announced the nationalization of the Suez Canal on July 26, 1956, a considerable achievement in the country's history. This decision quickly led to an Israeli invasion of Egypt in October 1956, followed by invasions by France and Britain a month later, in what was called the Tripartite Aggression. At that point, external affairs became a priority in Nasser's political agenda.

In The Philosophy of the Revolution, which he authored in 1954, Nasser highlighted the strong existing ties between the Arab world and the African continent and put forth the political and moral responsibility of the Arab countries towards the "Dark Continent," which suffered from the dividing schemes of the "white man." After mentioning the first two circles of unity (Arab and African), Nasser envisioned a third level corresponding to a unified Islamic community, with Mecca as its religiopolitical center hosting an "Islamic-world-parliament."

In 1958, the Nasserist pan-Arab vision saw a concrete realization in the foundation of the United Arab Republic (UAR) encompassing Egypt and Syria. The dream of Arab unity was short-lived, however. In 1961 the UAR was dissolved, and in June 1967, the Arab states suffered a crushing defeat in the Six-Day War. Nasser died of a heart attack on September 28, 1970. The decline of Pan-Arabism saw the rise of Pan-Islamism throughout the Middle East.

See also Arab nationalism; Egypt; Muslim Brotherhood; Pan-Islamism; revolutions; socialism

Further Reading

Raymond William Baker, Egypt's Uncertain Revolution under Nasser and Sadat, 1978; Rami Ginat, Egypt's Incomplete Revolution: Lutfi al-Khalil and Nasser's Socialism in the 1960s, 1997; Joel Gordon, Nasser's Blessed Movement: Egypt's Free Officers and the July Revolution, 1997; Derek Hopwood, Egypt, Politics and Society 1945–1990, 1993; Gamal Abdel Nasser, The Philosophy of the Revolution [Falsafat al-Thawra], 1955; Robert Stephens, Nasser: A Political Biography, 1971.

NASSIMA NEGGAZ

nationalism

It is often assumed that an inherent contradiction exists between nationalism and Islam. On the one hand, nationalism is a product of secular Europe, which posits that human society should be organized along the dividing lines of language, kinship, and territoriality. On the other hand, Islam turns a community of believers into a political unit whose single religion should overpower any differences of culture, race, or geography. Nevertheless, the putative contradiction between Islam and nationalism did not prevent the inexorable global diffusion of the national state during the 19th and 20th centuries. Now, in the Islamic world no less than in the West, the national state provides the only viable unit of political organization.

The dramatic success of nationalism in the face of long-standing identities linked to Islam has puzzled scholars since Europe's decolonization of the Middle East, Africa, and Asia in the years following World War II. These debates have involved concerted efforts to identify not just the relationship between Islam and nationalism but also the meaning of nationalism itself. Earlier scholars conventionally understood nationalism as a political doctrine that stated the nation is the natural unit of human society, but this only begs the question of what the nation is and where the nation comes from. More recent work has focused less on nationalism as a set of ideas than on nationalism as a sociological phenomenon. This shift has been accompanied by a broader historiographical move away from a textualist, and often elitist, history-of-ideas approach to a perspective that focuses more squarely on subaltern practices and the popular imagination. Nationalism is no longer seen as a purely intellectual edifice: it is more often considered to be a constructed stage on which particular social performances are played out.

Nationalism as Idea

If nationalism is understood primarily as political ideology, one way to trace its spread from Europe to the Islamic world is to study how the language of "nation" penetrates local vernaculars and how it is absorbed by and eventually naturalized into political discourse. The Islamic world's exposure to modern nationalism effectively began with the French invasion of Egypt in 1798, when Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821) addressed the population as al-umma al-miṣriyya, a phrase that his learned Orientalist experts thought would adequately convey the intended meaning of the "Egyptian nation." But the word umma was more familiar in its Qur'anic context, where it referred to a whole community of believers rather than a delimited geographical body. Indeed, Muslims writing in the early and mid-19th century struggled to make sense of how the European Christians organized themselves politically. Terms such as ṭā'ifa (sect, segment), milla ([religious] denomination), and even qabīla (tribe) were all variously employed to describe the nations of Europe—sometimes in the space of a single text. As Ami Ayalon (1987) points out, the famous work Takhlis al-Ibriz fi Talkhis Bariz (The Extraction of Gold in the Abridgement of Paris, 1834) written by Egyptian chronicler Rifa'at al-Tahtawi (1801–73) interchangeably uses the words milla, umma, and ṭā'ifa to refer to the French people. Not until the growth of the Arabic printing press and the standardization of modern political terminology did umma become the generally accepted equivalent of a European "nation." Even then, the earlier religious connotations of umma remained intact, sustaining a certain ambiguity about the basis of European political identity.

Muslim writers in the second half of the 19th century often slipped between traditional religious and contemporary political understandings of nation. This ambiguity was instrumentally useful as Muslims sought to defend against the increasing encroachment of European powers into the Islamic world. Muslims in India and Central Asia called for aid and solidarity from their coreligionists, which inspired Sultan Abdülhamid II (d. 1918) to cast himself as the new caliph. The claim to unite a Muslim community faced with European advances in India, North Africa, and the Caucasus had evident rhetorical appeal. Yet political activists such as Afghani (1838–97) had no qualms about invoking the historical glories of particular peoples to galvanize them into action against the threat of foreign invasion. Elsewhere, Afghani couched his arguments in pan-Islamic terms, demonstrating what might be construed as a blatant disregard for the logical consistency of his overall position.

Nikkie Keddie (1969) offered an alternative position: that Afghani used religion for "protonationalist" purposes. By glorifying the Islamic past, opposing Islamic and Western cultures, and adopting a historicist perspective on civilizational progress, Afghani conceptualized "Islam" within a framework that was essentially nationalist.

In contrast, filtering out "Islamic" from "nationalist" elements was a challenge that equally confronted political nationalists in the mid-20th century. The ideologues of the Ba'th Party elaborated an understanding of the Arab nation that owed much to romantic German notions of nationalism as the organic expression of a vital linguistic and historical community. Yet if the Arabic language was to be the constitutive element of the Arab nation, it was impossible to ignore its sacred status as the language of Qur'anic revelation. As a consequence, even secular Ba'thism was obliged to incorporate the Islamic factor into its political formula. For the Christian Michel 'Aflaq (d. 1989), the genius of Islam was simultaneously the genius of the Arab people; 'Aflaq thought it would be dangerous to detach religion from nationality, as the Europeans had done. For secular Arab nationalists, differentiating between religious and nationalist culture was ill-advised, if not impossible. Both were equally part of the primordial Arab nation.

Nationalism as Political Practice

Once they ascend to the seat of power, political leaders have proved astute at avoiding a decisive choice between religious and nationalist principles. Such ostensible secularists as Syria's Hafiz al-Assad (in power 1970–2000) and Iraq's Saddam Hussein (in power 1973–2003) crushed religious opposition to their rule while donning the outer trappings of piety to appease any concerns about their ungodliness. Islamists have demonstrated a similar political dexterity at reconciling the apparently contradictory logics brought into play by attempting to construct a modern political project according to religious imperatives. This is most clearly demonstrated in the political theory and empirical practice of the Islamic Republic of Iran. Far from representing a return to the pristine principles of Shi'i jurisprudence, the Iranian doctrine of clerical rule enacts a radical departure from existing tradition. As Sami Zubaida (1989) has argued, Ayatollah Khomeini's (1902–89) argument for wilāyat-i faqth (guardianship of the jurist) rests on a preeminently modern and implicitly nationalist conceptualization of "the people" as a distinct social entity and, more importantly, a political force. The rhetoric of the revolution owed more to political radicals such as Karl Marx (1818–83) and anticolonial activists such as Frantz Fanon (1925–61) than it did to Shi'i scholars. As the revolution became institutionalized, it increasingly conformed to the framework of the modern national state: the new constitution was modeled on that of the French Republic; the export of the revolution was reconsidered as it threatened to undermine the gains made by the regime; even the ideological basis of wilāyat-i faqth proved flexible when faced with the thorny question of which scholar should succeed Khomeini after his death. While religion provided much of the symbolic content of Iranian politics after the revolution, the overall framework remained that of the modern national state.

A similar process of accommodation with existing national frameworks can be seen across a variety of Islamic movements in the 20th century. The Muslim Brotherhood is perhaps the most widespread of such movements in the Middle East. Founded in 1928, the Brotherhood's emphasis on social renewal and Islamizing the private sphere diverted its energies from working to unify the Islamic world after its dismemberment into separate national states at the hands of the colonial powers. While the Brotherhood did establish branches in a number of Arab states, each branch remained autonomous. There was little attempt to centralize control or to create an alternative to the existing system of national states. As a result, each individual branch developed in response to local, not transnational, conditions. The most notable example of this is the involvement of the Palestine Muslim Brotherhood in the formation of Hamas in 1987, completing the transition into a national(ist) movement. Lebanon's Hizbullah provides another example of how the reality of a particular state works to shape and delimit political programs within a recognizably nationalist political field. Although Hizbullah was initially inspired by the political radicalism of distant Iran in the mid-1980s, during the following decade it underwent a process of "Lebanonization" that witnessed its steady integration into the national political scene. This is not to say that Hizbullah gained unconditional support from all Lebanese as an uncontested representative of the nation, but that Hizbullah operated firmly within the organizational framework and social imaginary of the Lebanese national state.

Nationalism and Modernity

The commensurability between Islamist and nationalist political programs supports the notion that nationalism is more a constructed social phenomenon than it is the offspring of a particular intellectual genealogy. Since the 1980s, several theorists have articulated a "modernist" perspective that proposes that nationalism is the product of a variety of social processes such as urbanization, industrialization, modern educational practices, print capitalism, and innovative methods of social control (e.g., cadastral maps, surveys, and censuses). Ernest Gellner's Nations and Nationalism (1983) and Benedict Anderson's Imagined Communities (1991) have been influential in this regard. While Gellner, in particular, subscribed to the opinion that Islam was an island of resistance against the tide of nationalism sweeping the world, the necessary association between secularism and nationalism has been hotly disputed by other scholars studying the Middle East. As James Gelvin (1997) argues, "Popular nationalism and Islamism might be viewed as kindred oppositional movements that use a traditionalizing discourse to mobilize their constituents against those forms of cultural and political domination they view as alien." Seen from this angle, nationalism and Islam each act as avatars for anti-imperialism. Yet if contemporary Islamism is simply a particular expression of Third-World nationalism—a local variation on a larger theme of resistance—then the specific discursive configuration of nationalism and religion have little real significance. Accounts of nationalism as a sociological phenomenon arguably neglect the content of nationalism as secondary to nationalism's structural function within the world-historical context.

In the early 21st century, the appearance of al-Qaeda seriously challenged the thesis that Islam and nationalism were on convergent paths. A transnational network apparently operating in the interstitial spaces of an increasingly globalized world, al-Qaeda rejected the modern system of national states and called for the unity of the umma to be restored under a new caliphate. But while al-Qaeda projected the image of being a free-floating structure detached from the institutional framework of the state, its achievements were always dependent on a real territorial base (first in Sudan, then in Afghanistan) and real state support (whether directly from Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, or indirectly from the United States). The image of its supposedly cosmopolitan, international membership masked the reality of its dependence on Saudi and Egyptian nationals to fill leadership positions. Far from heralding the end of the appeal of nationalism among Muslims, al-Qaeda illustrated the difficulty of constructing a modern political project along nonnational lines.

See also Arab nationalism; community; Pan-Islamism; al-Qaeda

Further Reading

Ami Ayalon, Language and Change in the Arab Middle East, 1987; James L. Gelvin, "Modernity and Its Discontents: On the Durability of Nationalism in the Arab Middle East," Nations and Nationalism 5, no. 1 (1999); Nikkie Keddie, "Pan-Islam as Proto-Nationalism," Journal of Modern History 41, no. 1 (1969); Anthony D. Smith, Nationalism and Modernism: A Critical Survey of Recent Theories of Nations, 1998; Sami Zubaida, Islam, the People and the State, 1989.

DANIEL NEEP

Nation of Islam

Whether the Nation of Islam is a political movement or a religious movement has been much debated by scholars. Within the movement, only Warith Deen Mohammed (the son of Elijah Muhammad) viewed the Nation of Islam (then under the leadership of Louis Farrakhan) as a social reform movement. All the other leaders of the Nation of Islam—Wali Fard Muhammad, its founder; Elijah Muhammad, its leader from 1934 to 1975; and Louis Farrakhan, who revived the movement after Warith Deen Mohammed reformed the Nation of Islam—saw no such distinction between the Nation's religion and its politics.

It is not always certain which teachings of the Nation of Islam go back to Fard Muhammad and which to his successor and sole transmitter, Elijah Muhammad. However, it does seem that Fard Muhammad first identified Islam with what he called the "original humanity," who were black. Thus the original and natural ruler of the world was the "blackman." This should not be understood to mean just Africans and their descendants. For Fard Muhammad all "original" people were Asiatics, with the distinction between Asia and Africa introduced by whites in order to divide and thereby conquer them.

Elijah Muhammad inherited and expanded on Fard Muhammad's racial understanding of religion, history, and politics but focused on the independence of African Americans. He encouraged them to set up their own economy and society and separate themselves entirely from white America. Even his strong emphasis on education and morality could be seen as a means of separating the races. Elijah Muhammad never used the term, but he advocated a kind of theocracy. He continually demanded obedience to himself—the "Apostle of Allah"—from his followers. And as he approached death, he believed the Nation of Islam needed no successor: the teachings of Allah as he had expounded them would suffice.

When Warith Deen Mohammed (then still named Wallace D. Muhammad) assumed the leadership of the Nation of Islam after his father's death in 1975, he radically transformed the movement, religiously and politically. He rapidly brought most of the beliefs and practices of the movement in conformity with more traditionally Sunni formulations of Islam. The anti-American statements and the demands for territorial separation between blacks and whites were also dropped. Although Warith Deen Mohammed frequently met with both American and Muslim political leaders and supported Muslim groups such as the Afghan mujahidin in the 1980s, the Palestinians, and the Kuwaiti refugees, he eschewed political activities. Instead he argued for interfaith dialogue and the unity of humanity. Unlike his father, he saw no problem with African American Muslims voting, running for office, or even joining the army. They were to be model citizens. His "solution" for the ills of the United States was Islam.

Louis Farrakhan strongly objected to the reforms of Warith Deen Mohammed. He returned to the beliefs of the Nation of Islam under Elijah Muhammad. However, Farrakhan was far more politically active. He supported Jesse Jackson's 1984 bid to be the Democratic presidential nominee and provided him with bodyguards. Farrakhan's most ambitious foray into politics came with his 1995 "Million Man March" on Washington, D.C. Although the purpose of the march was to advocate "unity, atonement, and brotherhood," it also included efforts to register African American men to vote and to convince them to engage in volunteerism and community activism. Several speakers also attacked the Republicans, who were depicted as hostile to welfare, Medicaid, and other programs that assisted poor African Americans.

The most recognizable and iconic political thinker to emerge from the Nation of Islam was also the one with the most ambivalent relationship with the movement: Malcolm X (1925–65). His program of black nationalism and antiassimilation came directly from the Nation of Islam's political program. After his break with the movement, however, he was able to abandon its policy of political quietism. In fiery speeches such as the "Ballot or the Bullet" or demands for human rights for African Americans "by any means necessary," Malcolm X may have drawn on the political ideology of the Nation of Islam, but he also seemed poised to put it into action.

See also Malcolm X (1925–65); Mohammed, W. D. (1933–2008); Muhammad, Elijah (1897–1975)

Further Reading

Edward E. Curtis, IV, Black Muslim Religion in the Nation of Islam, 1960–1975, 2006; C. Eric Lincoln, The Black Muslims in America, 1994; Clifton E. Marsh, From Black Muslims to Muslims: The Transition from Separation to Islam, 1930–1980, 1984; Aminah Beverly McCloud, African American Islam, 1995.

HERBERT BERG

nation-state

The position of Islam toward nationalism and the nation-state has been subject to debate. According to some groups, the Qur'an overtly acknowledges and promotes nationalism and thus recognizes the nation-state. Such groups often cite Qur'an 49:13 ("O mankind! We divided you into nations [peoples] and tribes so that you may know each other better") to contend that nationalism is not destructive or divisive to religious unity but instead that the Qur'an acknowledges diversity and reinforces different languages and cultural practices to advance cohesive human relationships. For others, Islam opposes any type of schism, including those instigated by nationalist ideologies, which are often exclusionary, divisive, and thus incompatible with Islam. For this group, the Prophet's "farewell speech," which was delivered during his final pilgrimage in 632 and summarized the fundamental beliefs of Islam, not only denounced ethnic and racial domination but also declared Muslims as members of one unified community. Muhammad is reported to have said on this occasion, "An Arab has no superiority over a non-Arab; also a white has no superiority over a black—except through piousness. Every Muslim is a brother to every Muslim and Muslims constitute one brotherhood."

Discussion of these two principles continues to shape the policies endorsed by current Islamic movements. Some Islamic movements take a nationalist position by appropriating Islam as their main component, while others challenge national boundaries and seek to forge transnational ties based on the unity of and mutual responsibility for fellow Muslims under the umma—the global Islamic community. What form of the "state," if any, Islam endorses poses a more complicated question. The Qur'an offers detailed rules pertaining to social interactions and legal issues (e.g., divorce, collective decision making, inheritance, and the like) that are regulated by the modern state. The presence of these rules makes "the state" a more controversial term. While some perceive Islamic rules to be applicable and sustainable under any state, others subscribe to the establishment of an Islamic state that would solely uphold Qur'anic rules. Against this background of contesting interpretations, Islamic groups privilege different Islamic dictums while the national or international contexts give advantages to certain positions. For instance, early 20th-century anticolonial movements provided fertile ground for national Islamic movements and parties (e.g., the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party in Malaysia), whereas the post-Iranian revolution context instigated the expansion of global umma-based movements (e.g., the Hizb-ut-Tahrir in Indonesia). Beyond their different forms, national-religious movements endorse the notion of the nation-state and share the view that nationalism serves as the first step toward resisting foreign influence and consolidating a broader range of Islamic identities. The views of umma-based political Islam on nationalism can be seen in the writings of Hasan al-Banna and Sayyid Qutb in the early 20th century. Qutb opposed nationalism in general and Arab nationalism specifically, stating that the "All-Wise God did not lead His Prophet . . . to free the Earth from Roman and Persian tyranny in order to replace it with Arab tyranny. All tyranny is wicked." In Our Message, Banna, the founder of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, acknowledged the potential virtues of nationalism yet also declared, "Every region in which there is a Muslim . . . is our homeland."

In the face of contradictory trends of globalization, national and broader umma-based Islamic movements and parties coexist in many countries and vie for support. Jama'at-i Islami and the National Party in Bangladesh or Hizb-ut-Tahrir and the Islamic Action Front in Jordan exemplify movements that emphasize the universality of the umma and blend Islamic and nationalist ideologies. In many movements, one can see elements of contesting perspectives. For instance, the Muslim Brotherhood describes its goal as—in the words of one of its leaders—"achieving unification among Islamic countries," yet it also qualifies it by recognizing the critical importance of achieving this aim "mainly among Arab states, to liberate them from imperialism."

See also modernity; nationalism; Pan-Islamism

Further Reading

Said Amir Arjomand, ed., From Nationalism to Revolutionary Islam, 1984; Hasan al-Bannah, What Is Our Message, 2004; Asef Bayat, Making Islam Democratic: Social Movements and the Post-Islamist Turn, 2007; Robert W. Hefner and Patricia Horvatich, eds., Islam in an Era of Nation-States: Politics and Religious Renewal in Muslim, 1997; Sayyid Qutb, Milestones, 2003.

SULTAN TEPE

natural law

Natural law is a system of rights or justice held to be common to all humans and derived from nature rather than from the conventions of society. Its opposite is "positive law" in the sense of a law that has been "set" for a society either by itself, its rulers, or a higher, transcendent authority. Islamic revealed law (shari'a) is understood to be a positive law set by God. Muslim legal scholars, however, have always reflected on the relationship between shari'a and the legal systems of other communities and whether some moral and legal standards apply to all humans by virtue of being part of humanity. Here, the early Mu'tazila school argued that the rules of shari'a reflect an objective notion of justice that is accessible to all humans. Sunnis and many Shi'i thinkers oppose this view and argue that before the coming of Islam there was only limited moral guidance in this world and that valid moral judgments must be deduced from the Muslim revelation. Another question is whether considerations about God's creation (i.e., nature) can meaningfully contribute to shari'a's formulation.

In Islam, the subject of natural law is closely connected to discussions about Qur'an 7:172, in which God converses with Adam's offspring. God asks, "Am I not your Lord?" to which they collectively answer, "Yes, we bear witness." Some interpreters see here, together with Qur'an 36:60, the establishment of a covenant (mīthāq) between God and humanity that establishes certain basic legal obligations for all humans, such as acknowledging the existence of a single God and worshipping Him. These obligations were considered part of the "original human disposition" (fiṭra), which is mentioned in Qur'an 30:30 as well as in a famous hadith (prophetic tradition) about the reasons why not all people choose to become Muslims.

Al-Bukhari (d. 870) reports in his collection of hadith (qadar 3), "Every newborn is born according to the original disposition ('alā al-fiṭra) and his parents make him a Jew or a Christian." This hadith led to lively debates about whether Islam is part of the original disposition (i.e., the nature) of humans. A mainstream position was put forward by Ghazali (d. 1111), who argued that while some of Islam's doctrinal truths, such as monotheism or the existence of an afterlife, are part of that fiṭra and thus innate and instinctive to all humans, the normative obligations, such as the rites of Islam and its religious law, are not. God created humans in such a way that they could all reach the most basic doctrines of Islam without the assistance of a revelation. Like many rationalist Muslim theologians, Ghazali thought that humans could reach the basic doctrinal truths though rational arguments and that revelation points to this possibility. Such theologians also agree that the normative rules of Islam are not part of the original human disposition. If that were the case, even humans who had never heard of Muhammad's revelation could become Muslims and then revelation would be superfluous. The rites of Islam, such as the five daily prayers or fasting during Ramadan, are not instinctively plausible, nor can they be deduced from reason. The same applies to its law (shari'a). Yet this position still allows for reflections about the normative role of nature in divine legislation. In cases where the transmitted scriptural sources of shari'a are silent, the Islamic jurist may consider which ruling would maximize the common benefit of humans (maṣlaḥa) and in that decision reflections about what best befits human nature are quite common.

While agreeing on the instinctive element of the original human disposition, the Hanbali jurist Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) disagreed with Ghazali on the role of rational arguments and taught that they would not lead toward the truths found in the fiṭra but might, in fact, distract from it. Ibn Taymiyya developed an influential argument saying on the one hand that the fiṭra includes an intuitive faculty of knowing right from wrong where whatever is found to be right is the same as the basic moral teachings of Islam and its shari'a, while on the other hand arguing that the ritual obligations of Islam and the details of its revealed law are nonintuitive yet respond most perfectly to the requirements of the human fiṭra. Consequently, he stated that humans cannot become Muslims without the Qur'an. He believed that once Islam came into existence and once it is presented to humans without prejudice, however, they all will be compelled by its teachings and by the justice and suitability of its shari'a. Although this concept is different from the natural law tradition that evolved in the West, Ibn Taymiyya's concept of the relationship between the original human condition and Islam elevated shari'a to a system of law that is understood in very similar terms. Therefore, due to the way God created humans, shari'a is among all legal systems the one that most perfectly serves the condition of humans and of their societies.

Responding to Western debates about natural law, Muslim fundamentalist thinkers claim that Islam and its shari'a are in complete harmony with it. Mawdudi (1903–79), one of the first to express this idea, argued, however, that Islam and natural law are not identical, since shari'a is much more comprehensive and responds to more complex legal and moral problems than natural law. While natural law can satisfy the basic legislative needs of human societies, it cannot provide the basis for a truly fulfilling human life. Natural law, therefore, is only a part of shari'a. Here we find a modern expression of the classical position that shari'a cannot be developed by human reason but must be learned from Muhammad's revelation. Sayyid Qutb (1906–66), on the other hand, claims that shari'a is in complete agreement with natural law. Qutb follows Ibn Taymiyya in his understanding of the fiṭra as a disposition that allows humans to do both right and wrong. With the fiṭra comes an intuitive faculty to choose right actions over wrong ones. Shari'a responds to that disposition by recommending (or making obligatory) precisely those actions that the human would choose if he or she follows intuitive judgment (ilhām). This is why Qutb, like many Islamist thinkers, believed that all humans would adopt Islam and its shari'a if it were presented to them without prejudice. Following shari'a brings the human soul back to its original state and creates harmony among humans and between humans and their natural environment.

See also Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79); public interest; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); shari'a

Further Reading

Anver M. Emon, Islamic Natural Law Theories, 2010; Geneviève Gobillot, La fitra: La conception originelle, ses interprétations et functions chez les penseurs musulmans, 2000; Frank Griffel, "The Harmony of Natural Law and Shari'a in Islamist Theology," in Shari'a: Islamic Law in the Contemporary Context, edited by Abbas Amanat and Frank Griffel, 2007; Abul A'la Mawdudi, The Islamic Law and Constitution, 1960; Idem, The Islamic Way of Life (Islām ka-nizām-i hayāt), translated by K. Ahmad and K. Murad, 1986; Sayyid Qutb, Milestones (Ma'ālim fī al-ṭarīq), 1990; A. Kevin Reinhart, Before Revelation: The Boundaries of Muslim Moral Thought, 1995.

FRANK GRIFFEL

Nazim Hikmet (1902–63)

Nazim Hikmet (whose rarely used surname was Ran), widely recognized as the best poet of the Turkish language in the 20th century, was born to a well-to-do family in then-Ottoman Salonica on January 15, 1902. After attending a French-language secondary school in Istanbul, he enrolled in the Naval Cadet School but was discharged at the age of 17 on account of ill health (or, according to another source, because he was a member of a group that opposed military training). Not long thereafter, he began writing poetry.

At that time, the Ottoman state had been defeated in World War I, its lands were partly occupied by Armenians in the East and Greeks in the West, and a struggle for liberation had been under way led by Mustafa Kemal Pasha (later to be called Atatürk [d. 1938]). Having strong nationalistic leanings, Nazim, together with a friend, traveled to Anatolia as a primary school teacher in early 1921 in order to join the liberation efforts. There he learned about the new Bolshevik revolution, which had spread to the Caucasus. He subsequently traveled to Baku, then to Moscow, where he attended the KUTV (the Communist University of the Toilers of the East) and became a Communist. Returning home in late 1924, he joined a Marxist circle in Istanbul and worked there semilegally until April 1925. The few articles he wrote for the journal Aydınlık (Clarté) consisted of stereotypical declarations of historical materialism.

As one of the leaders of the Turkish Communist Party (TKP), Nazim was sentenced in absentia to 15 years in prison, but he fled to Moscow in August 1925, where he gained fame as a poet and playwright. He participated in the Vienna Conference of May 1926, where he exhibited a stern secularist stand against a comrade who had a more lenient attitude toward people's traditions. He returned to Istanbul in late 1928. In the following year, the clandestine TKP suffered extensive arrests and was forced to reorganize. Nazim headed the opposition and was sentenced to four years in prison in March 1933. Pardoned in August 1934, he was purged from his party at the end of 1935 but continued his political activities; he also wrote more poems and plays and participated in filmmaking as a scenario writer. He was arrested in early 1938 and charged with inciting the cadets of the army to mutiny; another lawsuit was brought against him for disseminating communist propaganda in the navy. In total, he was sentenced to 28 years and 4 months in prison. He served the last of these sentences until mid-1950 and was readmitted to the party while he was still in prison. Fearing that he would be assassinated, he fled to the Soviet Union, where he spent the rest of his life. He became active in the World Council of Peace and also served as a member of the TKP External Bureau (Central Committee).

The pretext given for Nazim's dismissal from the TKP in the mid-1930s was his "Trotskite-police opposition," which is a usual cliché for refusal to obey party discipline. In fact, he was an ardent believer in equality and social justice and achieved, through his poetry and plays, much more than the center of the party did in disseminating these values to the public at large. His rebellious nature made him also oppose the personality cult dominant in the Soviet Union. It might be speculated that, had he lived in Russia rather than in Turkey in the 1930s, he would have ended up in the Gulag.

See also communism; Turkey

Further Reading

Erden Akbulut, N.H. in Comintern Documents (Komintern Belgelerinde Nâzım Hikmet), 2002; Memet Fuat, Nazim Hikmet, Life, Psychological Frame, Lawsuits, Discussions, Doctrine, Poetical Development, 2000.

METE TUNCAY

Nigeria

The Federal Republic of Nigeria, comprising 36 states and the federal capital territory of Abuja, as of 2008 had a population of 140,003,542. Nigeria is approximately 50 percent Muslim, 40 percent Christian, and 10 percent adherents of traditional religions. The country's north, composed of 19 states, is home to the Hausa, who make up the majority of the Muslim population in Nigeria.

Before the arrival of Islam, this northern region was ruled by the Hausa Bakwai—the Seven Hausa States. The earliest recorded Islamic influence came during the reign of Sarki (king) Yaji (r. 1349–85), when Mandigo traders traveled westward in search of Sudanese gold. The North African scholar 'Abd al-Karim al-Maghili arrived in Hausaland during the reign of Mohammad Rimfa (r. 1463–99), bringing with him the Maliki school of Islamic law, which now dominates the region. Maghili's era—which is also associated with the spread of Sufism in the region—did not usher forth a stark transition from African traditions to literate Islamic ones; for the next three centuries the struggle between pagan and Islamic cultural and legal traditions would continue in Hausaland cities such as Katsina, Kano, Borno, and Zaria.

The Sokoto caliphate, founded in 1809 by the Fulani (Sheshu) Usman dan Fodio (also known by the Arabic name Ibn Fudi) marks the most important event in Nigerian Muslim modernity. A scholar and political leader, dan Fodio's loyalists defeated all major towns of the Hausa kingdom within six years, replacing them with Fulani emirates and establishing Sokoto as its capital. Dan Fodio combined a call for the renewal (tajdīd) of Islam—including a strict constructionist approach to Maliki law—with a political platform challenging the Hausa kingdom's rule. Dan Fodio cites excessive taxation, corruption, and suppression of Muslim practices as his casus belli in his work Kitab al-Farq bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Islam wa-bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Kufr (The difference between Muslim governance and governance by unbelievers).

British encroachment commenced with the foundation of the Inland Commercial Company in 1833 and culminated with colonial envoy F. D. Lugard's inauguration of the "Northern Region" at Lokoja on January 1, 1900. In March 1903, Sokoto was captured, marking the end of the caliphate. Having encountered a functioning Islamic legal system, the British pursued a policy of "indirect rule," allowing "native law and custom" to proceed undisturbed, save punishments deemed "repugnant to natural justice and humanity"—in practice a moratorium on the ḥudūd, or punishments found in the shari'a (Islamic law), including stoning and amputations.

Eight young civilians formed the Northern Elements Progressive Union (NEPA) in 1950 to challenge the amirs, who they argued had become instruments of the colonial administration. Despite NEPA's activities, however, the amirs' popular prestige was seriously eroded only with the achievement of independence in 1960 and especially when Nigeria transitioned into a republic united under a constitution in 1967. In 1999, Nigeria adopted a new constitution as it reinstated civilian rule under President Olusegun Obasanjo for the first time in 20 years. Section 38 calls for "freedom of thought, conscience and religion," which many northerners interpreted to sanction the reintroduction of shari'a—a view ardently protested by many of Nigeria's non-Muslims.

Claiming credit for this latest reintroduction of shari'a is a group known simply as Izala (full name Izalat al-Bid'a wa-Iqamat al-Sunna; "The removal of innovation and the uplifting of the sunna") founded in 1978 by Shaykh Ismaila Idris in Jos and one of Nigeria's largest Muslim organizations. Izala's ideological leader was Shaykh Abubakar Gumi (1922–92), the former grand-qadi (judge) of the north, whose anti-Sufi and anti-bid'a (innovation) views continue to exert great influence.

In 1999, Ahmed Sani Yerima, governor of Zamfara, reintroduced shari'a in his state amid massive popular support. But since then, the demand for shari'a has largely died down, though it still operates in many parts of the north in parallel or in combination with other legal systems. This can be attributed to politicization of the shari'a, which alienates many and only appeals to the most vulnerable. In addition, governors pay a political price if they attempt to mete out a scripturally sanctioned punishment, especially after two well-publicized stoning cases attracted international attention, embarrassing the state.

Nonetheless, the shari'a has played a role in sectarian violence, particularly in Kaduna, where in 2000 at least 400 were killed after shari'a was reimplemented, and most recently in Jos, where approximately 400 people were massacred in March 2010. Though some use the rhetoric of jihad to explain the violence, many view the underlying problem as the perennial failure of local and state governments to fairly distribute scarce resources within a federal system plagued by massive corruption.

See also Christian-Muslim relations; Dan Fodio, Usman (1754–1817); West Africa

Further Reading

Usman dan Fodio, Ihya' al-Sunna wa-Ikhmad al-Bid'ah [The revival of the sunna and the elimination of innovation], n.d.; Idem, Kitab al-Farq bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Islam wa-bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Kufr [The difference between Muslim governance and governance by unbelievers], n.d.; Philip Ostein, Sharia Implementation in Northern Nigeria 1999–2006: A Sourcebook, 2007; Abdullahi Smith, "The Early States of the Central Sudan," History of West Africa, vol. 1, edited by J. F. A. Ajayi and Michael Crowder, 1971; Ibraheem Sulaiman, The Islamic State and the Challenge of History: Ideals, Policies and Operation of the Sokoto Caliphate, 1987.

SARAH ELTANTAWI

Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92)

Abu ʿAli al-Hasan b. ʿAli b. Ishaq al-Tusi, generally known by his honorific title Nizam al-Mulk, was a scholar, statesman, and celebrated Persian vizier of two Seljuq dynasts, Alp Arslan (r. 1063–72) and his son, Malikshah (r. 1072–92). A manual of advice, the Siyar al-Muluk (The ways of kings), addressed to Malikshah, is generally attributed to him. There are early references to the work, for example in Ghazali's (d. 1111) Nasihat al-Muluk (Book of Counsel for Kings). The text was popular enough by the late 12th century for Nizami (d. ca. 1209) to signal his familiarity with the wording of the text by directly incorporating some phrases from it in his Haft Paykar (Seven Portraits).

Nizam al-Mulk was born in a village near Tus in Khurasan in the waning years of Ghaznavid rule (997–1186) and was assassinated near Isfahan in 1092, most probably on the orders of Malikshah. In spite of the perennial threat of Turkic invasions, as well as Isma'ili-instigated occasional unrest in Baghdad and northern Iranian provinces, Nizam al-Mulk not only managed to hold onto the reins of power for three decades but also brought the Islamic empire, stretching from central Asia (Afghanistan) in the east almost to Egypt in the west, under uniform governance and put into place a vast network of able administrators and loyal acolytes in influential positions. Five of his sons, two of his grandsons, and one great-grandson held the office of vizier to one or another of the rulers after him, though none could reach his eminence. He is also credited with the establishment of privately endowed educational institutions, known as the Nizamiyya madrasas in several cities, including Nishapur, Baghdad, Isfahan, Mosul, Balkh, Herat, and Basra.

Although lionized in medieval sources for his justice, pragmatism, visionary rule, and political acuity, the details of his life and his policies remain sparse. A series of anecdotal reminiscences by foes or allies praise the vizier for his nonpartisanship, strong rule, and benevolence to religious luminaries. He was a follower of the Shafi'i school of law and Ash'ari theology, and his Nizamiyya were dedicated to the propagation of Shafi'i doctrine but without state policy being skewed in favor of the Shafi'i faction. According to a 12th-century Shi'i source, Nizam al-Mulk did not prohibit Shi'i notables from founding several madrasas for their own community in Rayy or Qazvin. And an early 13th-century Hanbali historian applauds Nizam al-Mulk's evenhandedness, recalling the vizier's severe rebuke of the head teacher of the Nizamiyya in Baghdad. In his classes, the instructor had lambasted the Hanbali creed, provoking riots in the city. Nizam al-Mulk reminded the scholar that the Nizamiyya had been established to disseminate learning and knowledge and not to foment sectarian discord. Should the schools fail in their primary function, he would have no choice but to close them down.

Nizam al-Mulk's book of advice, written according to the preface of the book around 1086 but referred to and cited only after his death, is among the later examples of the amalgam of pre-Islamic Iranian lore and literary and cultural tropes prevalent in the late antique world, including pseudo-Aristotelian lore and exempla and dicta culled from the Islamic tradition that dominated political thought in the medieval Islamic world. The introduction firmly sets the king in full command of his kingdom and the fate of his rule when it argues that, although divine selection places the king in office, the longevity and stability of his rule is contingent on his justice and openness to good counsel.

One of the most striking features of the Siyar al-Muluk is its long exposition of the dangers posed by heresiarchs. To that end, the vizier advises the king to keep abreast of intellectual currents in his realm and to familiarize himself with different traditions of thought so as to be cognizant of the political ramifications implicit in every religious dispute. Nizam al-Mulk chose, as an antidote to the rise of heresiarchs, the increasing sectarianism of the various Sunni schools and the spiritual appeal of the less legalistic and more philosophical tenets of the Isma'ili faith, to befriend Sufis throughout the empire and to publicize not only his association with spiritual leaders but also his preference for the Sufis among them. The medieval sources are replete with instances of the vizier's largesse toward the Sufi community.

It is both noteworthy and ironic that the virtues extolled in the Siyar al-Muluk were gathered not in the sultan but in the vizier himself. One of his contemporaries, the influential theologian Juwayni (d. 1085), hypothesized that the Abbasid caliphate and the Seljuq sultanate could both be abolished and the realm left solely to the care of the perfect vizier, Nizam al-Mulk.

See also Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); Nizamiyya; Seljuqs (1055–1194)

Further Reading

'Izz al-Din ibn al-Athir, The Annals of the Saljuq Turks: Selections from al-Kamil fi'l ta'rikh of 'Izz al-Din ibn al-Athir, translated by D. S. Richards, 2002; Nizam al-Mulk, The Book of Government or Rules for Kings, translated by Hubert Darke, 1960; Neguin Yavari, "Polysemous Texts and Reductionist Readings: Women and Heresy in the Siyar al-mulūk," in Views from the Edge: Essays in Honor of Richard W. Bulliet, edited by Neguin Yavari, Lawrence Potter, and Jean-Marc Ran Oppenheim, 2004; Idem, "Mirrors for Princes or a Hall of Mirrors: Niẓām al-Mulk's Siyar al-mulūk Reconsidered," Al-Masāq: Islam and the Medieval Mediterranean 20, no. 1 (2008); Idem, "Niẓām al-Mulk," in The Islamic World, edited by Andrew Rippin, 2008; Idem, "Niẓām al-Mulk and the Restoration of Sunnism in Eleventh-Century Iran," in Tahqiqat-i Islami 10, nos. 1–2 (1996).

NEGUIN YAVARI

Nizamiyya

The Nizamiyya (Niẓāmiyya) Madrasas (Muslim schools) were a network of colleges of Islamic law founded by the famous statesman Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092) in the mid-to-late 11th century in the major cities of Iran, Iraq, and Syria, including Nishapur, Marv, Herat, Baghdad, Basra, Mosul, and Aleppo. The best known and most important of these was the Nizamiyya of Baghdad, which remained a premier institution of learning for several centuries and served as a model for numerous law colleges throughout the Islamic world. Nizam al-Mulk, vizier of the great Seljuq sultans Alp Arslan (r. 1063–72) and Malikshah I (r. 1072–92) and de facto ruler of the Seljuq Empire after the assassination of Alp Arslan and accession of Malikshah in 1072, planned, constructed, and endowed the various Nizamiyya colleges in an attempt to restore the traditional balance between the Hanafi and Shafi'i madhhabs (schools of law) that had existed in Iran for over a century but had been disturbed by the rise of the Seljuqs and their patronage of the Hanafi jurists, whom they favored at the expense of the Shafi'is. Tughril's vizier, Kunduri, had gone so far as to exile Shafi'i scholars from Khurasan; appoint Hanafi chief judges in Rayy; and appoint a Hanafi, 'Ali b. 'Ubaydallah al-Khatibi, as the chief judge in Isfahan, which had traditionally been Shafi'i. Nizam al-Mulk's own position was that there were two acceptable legal madhhabs, the Hanafi and the Shafi'i, but he was determined to support scholars who belonged to the Shafi'i legal madhhab and were Ash'ari theologians, in counterweight to the Seljuqs' Hanafi protégés, in order to restore a proper balance to religious, intellectual, and political life of the community. He brought back to Khurasan exiled Shafi'i-Ash'ari scholars, including Ghazali's (d. 1111) famous teacher Juwayni, known as Imam al-Haramayn, whom he appointed to teach at the Nizamiyya in Nishapur, and Abu Bakr Muhammad b. 'Ali b. Hamid al-Shashi (d. 1093), whom he appointed to a teach at the Nizamiyya at Herat.

Construction of the Nizamiyya in Baghdad, the earliest of the Nizamiyya colleges west of Khurasan, began in 1065, and the college was completed and opened in 1067. While the endowment deed has not been preserved, some of its provisions are known from historical sources: the personnel of the college, including its professor of law, repetitor, preacher, librarian, stipendiary law students, and probably also its grammar teacher (shaykh al-nahw), were required to adhere to the Shafi'i legal school in both fiqh (law) and usul al-fiqh (legal theory or jurisprudence). The Nizamiyya of Baghdad became a significant model for other madrasas not only in Baghdad but also further west in Syria, Anatolia, and Egypt. It was rivaled by the Hanafi law college at the Shrine of Abu Hanifa, built by Alp Arslan's mustawfi (financial agent) Abu Sa'd also in 1057, and the Tajiyya law college, also Hanafi, completed in 1089 by Taj al-Mulk (d. 1093), the mustawfi of Malikshah. The Nizamiyya of Baghdad was probably a principal source of inspiration behind the construction of major Shafi'i madrasas under the Zengids and Ayyubids in Syria and Egypt. It remained the most impressive institution of learning in Baghdad throughout the 12th century and was admired by the traveler Ibn Jubayr (d. 1217), who visited Baghdad in 1185. It was superseded only by the sumptuous Mustansiriyya College, founded in 1234 by the Abbasid caliph Mustansir (r. 1226–42). The Mustansiriyya College was extremely well funded and based on a different model, including provisions for professors and students of all four Sunni legal madhhabs. The Nizamiyya declined after the founding of the Mustansiriyya and the Mongol conquest in 1258 and was probably defunct by the 15th century.

The Nizamiyya in its heyday attracted the most talented scholars available. The professor of law who taught there, the repetitor or assistant professor, the master of Arabic grammar, and the librarian were all outstanding scholars. Nizam al-Mulk first appointed Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi (d. 1083), the leading Shafi'i jurist of his day and author of al-Tanbih (The call to attention) and al-Muhadhdhab (The neatly arranged compendium), which continued to be used as textbooks of Shafi'i law for centuries after his death. The famous jurist and theologian Ghazali taught as professor of law at the Nizamiyya but gave up the position after four years as the result of a personal spiritual crisis, traveling to the Hijaz, Syria, and eventually returning to his native Khurasan. Other leading jurists who held the positions include Abu Nasr b. al-Sabbagh (d. 1084), author of the major textbook al-Shamil (The comprehensive work); Abu Bakr al-Shashi (d. 1114); 'Ali al-Tabari al-Kiya al-Harrasi (d. 1110); As'ad al-Mihani (d. 1129); Abu al-Mansur al-Razzaz (d. 1144–45); and Abu al-Najib al-Suhrawardi (d. 1168). Nizam al-Mulk retained the right to supervise the endowment and to make appointments and dismiss personnel as he saw fit, and this power passed to his descendants at his death but later became the right of the Abbasid caliph or the sultan. Frequent dismissals appear to have been contrary to common practice at the time, for appointments to professorships were often for life, and the large number of incumbents and their relatively short tenures is striking when compared with those of the Shrine College at Abu Hanifa. The law professors were usually Persians, and this condition may even have been stipulated in the endowment deed.

Similarly, the grammarians at the Nizamiyya were highly influential in the history of Arabic linguistic sciences and literary criticism. Abu Zakariyya al-Tibrizi (d. 1109), one of the first scholars to hold the position, is renowned for his commentaries on the classics of Arabic literature such as the Hamasa (Poems on bravery) of Abu Tammam, the poems of Mutanabbi, the Mufaddaliyat (Poems collected by al-Mufaddal), and also his recension of the ten Mu'allaqat, (The suspended odes). Al-Hasan al-Fasihi al-Astarabadi (d. 1110) held the position for a short time after Tabrizi's death but was dismissed when it was discovered that he was Shi'i and replaced with the outstanding linguist and lexicographer Abu Mansur al-Jawaliqi (d. 1144), who wrote, in addition to his famous dictionary al-Mu'arrab (Lexicon of Arabicized words), a commentary on Ibn Qutayba's Adab al-Katib (Instruction for the secretary). Another incumbent was Hibat Allah b. 'Ali b. al-Shajari (d. 1148), whose dictations, al-Amali al-Shajariyya (al-Shajari's dictations), remain widely read. Abu al-Barakat b. al-Anbari (d. 1181) was widely reputed to be the greatest grammarian of his day and wrote Asrar al-'Arabiyya (The secrets of Arabic), a book on grammar, as well as a biographical work devoted to literary figures, Tabaqat al-Udaba' (The classes of literary men). Another well-known incumbent, Abu Bakr Mubarak b. al-Dahhan al-Wasiti (d. 1219), is reported to have changed his affiliation from the Hanafi to the Shafi'i legal madhhab in order to take the position.

Nizam al-Mulk established the Nizamiyya, kept it under his personal control, and maintained it generously as an instrument of political policy. In his time and later, it successfully bolstered the position of Shafi'i law and Ash'ari theology in the societies of Iraq, Syria, and Egypt, and it played an important role in the Sunni revival, countering in some ways but corroborating in others the influence of the Hanafis and their patrons in the Turkish ruling class. It was an elite institution, and the sons of many prominent officials studied there and went on to distinguished careers in the chanceries and judiciaries of various dynasties. Among the prominent graduates of the institution were Ibn 'Asakir (d. 1175), the famous historian and hadith expert; 'Imad al-Din al-Katib al-Isfahani (d. 1201), who went on to a spectacular career as a secretary for Nur al-Din and then Salah al-Din in Syria and Egypt; and Muhyi al-Din al-Shahrazuri (d. 1190), who had been a classmate of 'Imad al-Din at the Nizamiyya under the professor Ibn al-Razzaz and who led an equally spectacular career under the Zengids. He was appointed chief judge of Aleppo under Nur al-Din, but after Nur al-Din's death, he became the de facto ruler of northern Syria under the young Malik al-Salih Isma'il (1174–81).

See also Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); jurisprudence; madrasa; Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92); al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820); shari'a

Further Reading

George Makdisi, "Muslim Institutions of Learning in Eleventh-Century Baghdad," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 24, no. 1 (1961); Idem, The Rise of Colleges, 1981; As'ad Talas, La Madrasa Nizamiyya et son histoire, 1939.

DEVIN J. STEWART

Nizaris

One of two major communities of Isma'ili Shi'i Muslims, the Nizaris are dispersed as religious minorities in more than 30 countries of Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Europe, and North America. The Nizari Isma'ilis have recognized a line of imams or spiritual leaders, represented by the Aga Khan.

Upon the death of Mustansir (r. 1036–94), the eighth caliph of the Fatimid dynasty and the 18th Isma'ili imam, in 1094, his sons Nizar (1045–95) and Ahmad (1074–1101) disagreed over who should succeed their father, leading to a permanent schism in the Isma'ili movement and community. Nizar, Mustansir's original heir-designate, was set aside in favor of his younger brother (who ruled under the caliphal name of Musta'li) by the all-powerful Fatimid vizier Afdal b. Badr al-Jamali (d. 1121). Nizar's succession rights were championed in Iran by Hasan-i Sabbah (d. 1124), the chief Isma'ili da'i, or missionary, in the Seljuq dominions. Hasan had established himself at the fortress of Alamut in 1090, signaling the foundation of what was to become the Nizari Isma'ili state of Iran and Syria, and was then already pursuing an independent revolutionary policy against the Seljuq Turks in Iran. By upholding Nizar's rights, Hasan also founded the independent Nizari da'wa, or religiopolitical mission, on behalf of the Nizari imams, the descendants of Nizar.

The Nizari Isma'ilis failed in their general revolt against the Seljuqs, whose alien rule was detested by the Iranians. Despite their incessant offensives against the Nizaris, the Seljuqs failed to uproot the Nizari fortress communities as well.

From early on, the Nizaris affirmed as their central teaching the old Shi'i doctrine of ta'lim, or the necessity of authoritative teaching by the rightful imam of the time. This doctrine, with various modifications, provided the foundation for all subsequent Nizari teachings. Hasan-i Sabbah and his next two successors at Alamut ruled over the Nizari state and community as the hujjas, or chief representatives, of the Nizari imams who were then concealed and inaccessible to their followers. Starting with the fourth ruler of Alamut, Hasan II 'ala dhikrihi al-salam (r. 1162–62), Nizari imams emerged openly at Alamut to take charge of the affairs of their community. Hasan II proclaimed the qiyama, or resurrection, which was interpreted symbolically and spiritually for the Nizaris. In qiyama times, the Nizaris were expected to focus on the batin, the inner meaning and spirituality of the religious commandments and prohibitions, rather than merely observing the zahir, or the letter of the law.

The sixth lord of Alamut, Hasan III (r. 1210–21), attempted a daring rapprochement with the Abbasid-Sunni establishment, with obvious political advantages for the Nizaris who had been marginalized in their fortress communities as "heretics." He instructed the Nizaris to observe the shari'a in its Sunni form. The Nizaris evidently interpreted this command as the imposition of the Shi'i principle of taqiyya, or precautionary dissimulation, accepting any sort of accommodation to the outside world deemed necessary by the Nizari imam. Henceforth, the rights of Hasan III to Nizari territories were recognized by the Abbasid caliph, leading to peace and security for the Nizaris.

The political prominence of the Nizaris was finally ended by the Mongols. But the Nizaris survived the Mongol destruction of their state and fortress communities in 1256. Subsequently, the Nizaris of different regions, especially in Syria, Iran, Afghanistan, Central Asia, and South Asia, developed locally, concealing their religious identities rather strictly to safeguard themselves against persecution. They variously resorted to Sufi, Twelver Shi'i, Sunni, and Hindu disguises. At the same time, the Nizari imamate continued in the progeny of the last lord of Alamut, Rukn al-Din Khurshah (d. 1257).

By the 18th century, the Nizari imams, residing in Anjudan and other localities in Iran, had emerged from obscurity and acted as central leaders of their community. Some of these imams were also appointed as governors of the province of Kirman by the Qajar monarchs of Iran. By the 1840s, Hasan 'Ali Shah (1804–81), the first Nizari imam to bear the honorific title of Aga Khan, had permanently settled in British India. His successors, notably Sultan Muhammad Shah Aga Khan III (1885–1957) and Prince Karim Aga Khan IV, who succeeded his grandfather in 1957, achieved great success in modernizing their community. As a result, the Nizari Isma'ilis emerged in modern times as a progressive community of educated and prosperous Shi'i Muslims.

See also Fatimids (909–1171); imamate; Seljuqs (1055–1194); Shi'ism

Further Reading

Farhad Daftary, "Hasan-i Sabbah and the Origins of the Nizari Isma'ili Movement," in Mediaeval Isma'ili History and Thought, edited by F. Daftary, 1996; Idem, The Isma'ilis: Their History and Doctrines, 2nd ed., 2007; Marshall G. S. Hodgson, "The Isma'ili State," in The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 5, The Saljuq and Mongol Periods, edited by John A. Boyle, 1968; Bernard Lewis, The Assassins: A Radical Sect in Islam, 1967; Azim Nanji, The Nizari Isma'ili Tradition in the Indo-Pakistan Subcontinent, 1978.

FARHAD DAFTARY

nonviolence

The term "nonviolence" stands for two closely related concepts. Strategic nonviolence is a theory of political power as well as a set of techniques for winning conflicts through protests, noncooperation, defiance, and sanctions that fall short of physical or armed violence. Principled nonviolence is a theory of human nature as well as a set of values that aim at personal transformation so that all parties can meet their needs through peaceful means while establishing deeper connections. Since there are large areas of overlap between these two concepts, the difference between strategic nonviolence and principled nonviolence is sometimes seen as a matter of perspective.

The Islamic tradition of armed combat is well known. It can be seen in the extensive discussion of warfare in the Qur'an, the hadith, and jurisprudence (fiqh), as well as in the numerous instances of warfare throughout Muslim history that have been either inspired by or legitimized through religious beliefs and doctrines. As several scholars have demonstrated, however, there also is a parallel tradition of nonviolence in the Islamic heritage. Even though the term "nonviolence" has no equivalent in the classical Islamic vocabulary, studies by modern scholars provide evidence that many of the key elements that constitute the contemporary understanding of nonviolence have always been integral to Islam. By emphasizing these nonviolent elements of the Islamic tradition and by reinterpreting the meaning and relative significance of elements that promote violence, these scholars have offered fresh perspectives on issues of vital importance.

The use of nonviolent strategies played a central role in Muhammad's success as a religious and political leader. One of the key Qur'anic concepts in this regard is sabr, which denotes patience, perseverance, and persistence. The first 12 years of Muhammad's prophetic career were marked by an actively nonviolent response to opposition and persecution that helped in the formation and solidarity of the new umma (community of believers). Even during the period following Muhammad's emigration from Mecca to Medina (the hijra, in 622), which saw a number of battles and armed skirmishes, nonviolent methods of preaching, negotiating, and persuading were never abandoned. The treaty of Hudaybiyya, which secured a ten-year peace with the Quraysh and its allies, took place as a direct consequence of Muhammad's aggressively peaceful "march on Mecca" for the avowed purpose of performing the pilgrimage. Without bloodshed, this initiative forced the opposition into acknowledging Muhammad's status and allowed Muslims the opportunity to peacefully propagate the Islamic message. Even though the treaty of Hudaybiyya appeared to be a humble compromise at the time, the Qur'an declared it to be a "clear victory." The surrender of the Quraysh in 630 was made possible at least partly due to Muhammad's offer of amnesty for his former enemies; evidently, his aim was not to exterminate his opponents but to absorb them into the Muslim umma.

Both the Qur'an and the hadith offer significant resources for nonviolent resistance to oppression, particularly in the duty of "commanding right and forbidding wrong." A well-known hadith identifies the act of "speaking truth to power" as the noblest form of jihad. The notion of principled nonviolence is not foreign to the Islamic tradition, either, including the imperative of not harming another person, regardless of the cost to oneself. While the Qur'an allows just retaliation, it presents forgiveness as the supreme virtue. In the Qur'anic narrative of Cain and Abel, the latter dies while refusing to defend himself against his brother; a hadith report praises the nonresisting Abel as a role model for Muslims. A similar attitude of nonresistance was demonstrated by the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, who refused to order his supporters to ward off the attacking rebels on the grounds they had not yet broken any laws. While these examples may appear as insignificant exceptions to the mainstream of juristic thought, they cannot be dismissed as ethically irrelevant.

An important hadith mandates disobedience to authorities where compliance would involve support for injustice or disobedience to God. The first caliph, Abu Bakr, is held by some to have established the Islamic social contract when he declared that the Muslim community was obligated to obey him only so long as he obeyed God, emphasizing the religious justification for what is now understood as the right to "civil disobedience." Such teachings contributed to a tradition of refusing allegiance and compliance to unjust rulers, of which Islamic history provides many illustrations. These typically are examples of conscientious individuals refusing to obey political authorities for the sake of holding on to truth rather than organized movements of civil disobedience.

The Tobacco Protests in Iran during the late 19th century was one of the earliest examples of successful nonviolent resistance carried out on a large scale. In the 20th century, perhaps the most spectacular instance of Muslim nonviolent resistance was seen in the collective struggle of the Iranian people that brought down the U.S.-backed regime of Reza Shah Pahlavi in 1979. In the course of the nationwide agitation, Ayatollah Khomeini explicitly prohibited the demonstrators from attacking anyone in uniform. The popular struggle in the ongoing "Green Revolution" in Iran, which began with mass protests in the wake of the 2009 presidential elections, is similar in tactics, for it too is based on nonviolent strategies. In the 1920s Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan (1890–1988) and his nonviolent army of Khudai Khidmatgars challenged the British raj in what is now the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Province in Pakistan. Khan's movement was based on his understanding of Muhammad's life and earned him the honorific title of "Frontier Gandhi."

In the Middle East, the Palestinian people have a long history of nonviolent resistance, initially against Jewish colonization and subsequently in response to Israeli occupation. The most dramatic instances of Palestinian mass resistance were seen during the First Intifada (1987–93), an uprising that was largely nonviolent. A number of contemporary Palestinian groups follow nonviolent strategies to resist Israeli occupation and to achieve freedom and statehood, often in collaboration with like-minded Jewish groups; these include the international movement called Boycott, Divestment, and Sanctions (BDS) that emerged in response to the 2005 call by the Palestinian civil society for a campaign of economic pressure that will force Israel to comply with International Law and Palestinian rights. Other forms of nonviolent resistance, including the efforts to build civil society, have been waged in the midst of violent conflicts, such as those in Iraq and Afghanistan. The nonviolent prodemocracy uprisings in several Arab and Muslim countries that began in December 2010 have been collectively named "the Arab Spring." Mass civil insurrections nonviolently toppled the autocratic regimes in Tunisia and Egypt in January 2011 but led to civil war in Libya. Major nonviolent movements for democracy in Syria, Yemen, and Bahrain spread despite state repression. Significant protests took place in Algeria, Iraq, Jordan, Morocco, and Oman; there are signs of similar upheavals in Kuwait, Mauritania, and Saudi Arabia. As political awareness increases among Muslim communities, some observers expect to see an even more deliberate and organized application of both strategic and principled nonviolence at different levels of society and politics.

See also dissent, opposition, resistance; governance; jihad; quietism and activism; violence

Further Reading

Mohammed Abu-Nimer and Jamal A. Badawi, "Alternatives to War and Violence: An Islamic Perspective," in Peace Movements Worldwide, edited by Michael Nagler and Marc Pilisuk, 2011; Rabia Terri Harris, "Nonviolence in Islam: The Alternative Community Tradition," in Subverting Hatred: The Challenge of Nonviolence in Religious Traditions, edited by Daniel L. Smith-Christopher, 2007; Maxine Kaufman-Lacusta, Refusing to Be Enemies: Palestinian and Israeli Nonviolent Resistance to the Israeli Occupation, 2010; Mary Elizabeth King, A Quiet Revolution: The First Palestinian Intifada and Nonviolent Resistance, 2007; Maria J. Stephan, ed., Civilian Jihad: Nonviolent Struggle, Democratization, and Governance in the Middle East, 2010; Mazin B. Qumsiyeh, Popular Resistance in Palestine: A History of Hope and Empowerment, 2011; Stephen Zunes, "Peace Movements and the Middle East: The 1991 Gulf War and Aftermath," in Peace Movements Worldwide, edited by Michael Nagler and Marc Pilisuk, 2011.

AHMED AFZAAL

North Africa

In contrast to the Mashriq (the Middle East from Egypt eastward), the Maghrib (North Africa) was neither heavily Ottomanized nor urbanized on the eve of colonialism. With the exception of the Husaynid Beylik of Tunis (Tunisia), the region was predominantly tribal and greatly influenced by the religious brotherhoods that underwent a transformation in the late 18th to early 19th centuries. This transformation is associated with Ahmad b. Idris (d. 1837) and the idea of the tariqa muhammadiyya, the Sufi equivalent of Salafism, which advocated a return to the spiritual source, Muhammad, as a means to introduce a new centralized, activist, and orthodox type of Sufi organization ideally suited to the rural Maghribi milieu and similar areas such as the Sudan. In some regions, new brotherhoods such as the Sanusi in Cyrenaica fulfilled many of the functions of a state for their followers. In others, reformed brotherhoods such as the Qadiri, Darqawi, and Wazzani-Tayyibi challenged the authority of weakening indigenous regimes such as the 'Alawi sultans in Morocco or the Deys of Algiers and then went on to lead resistance movements conceptualized as jihads against the colonial intrusions of the French, Spanish, and Italians. Algeria's nationalist icon, 'Abd al-Qadir (d. 1883), emerged from this environment, as did 'Umar al-Mukhtar (d. 1931), the best-known leader of the Sanusi resistance to the Italian occupation of Cyrenaica. These movements established a particular strain of Islamic reformism that was later challenged but also adopted and manipulated by 20th-century Islamic thinkers.

Colonial rule was particularly harsh in French Algeria and, later and more briefly, in Italian Libya. Particularly in Algeria, which was under colonial rule longer than any other country in the region, traditional political institutions were swept away, creating a political vacuum that was extremely difficult to fill. In Morocco and Tunisia, established regimes managed to hold on under the "protection" of France (and Spain in northern Morocco). However, both the 'Alawi sultanate of Morocco and the Husayni Beylik of Tunis were greatly compromised by their subjection to an "infidel" power. In Tunisia this proved fatal and, as in Algeria, the old regime and the political discourse that accompanied it were swept away and new secular forms of political thought of a socialist but thoroughly nationalist persuasion triumphed. However, the Tunisian nationalist movement, headed by Habib Bourguiba (d. 2000), made headway only when Bourguiba started to use mosque networks, thereby implying, if not actually asserting, that Tunisian independence was an Islamic as well as a nationalist objective. In Morocco, the charismatic Muhammad V was able to use the conceptual framework developed by the 'Alawi sultans to set the country on a path to constitutional monarchy, despite the nationalist preference for a republic.

Despite the differences within each Maghribi state, there were also commonalities in the development of modern political thought across the region. As in the Middle East, the struggle for independence from European colonialism dominated the political agenda, and the adoption of ideologies such as socialism and communism depended on their national utility. Salafism, Pan-Islamism, and Pan-Arabism were more appealing because they implied mutual solidarity against the colonizer and were also more deeply rooted in the existing political culture of the Maghrib. In the Maghrib there was little conflict among the movements; the only significant religious minorities were the Jews and the Ibadis (of the Mzab region of Algeria). In both Morocco and Algeria, reformist 'ulama', inspired by the example of Muhammad 'Abduh in Egypt, were prominent in the nationalist movement. In Morocco, for instance, the nationalist leader 'Allal al-Fasi (d. 1974) was a traditionally educated Salafi scholar rather than a member of the French-educated elite, although he recognized the importance of learning French in the course of his political career.

Maghribi nationalists were thus, for the most part, Pan-Arabists and Pan-Islamists in that they perceived the Maghrib as an integral part of the Arabo-Islamic world. This approach was fostered by a new triangular relationship among the Maghrib, the Mashriq, and various European metropoles where intellectuals gathered. London, Paris, Vienna, and even Oslo provided forums where Maghribis met with Mashriqis, and indeed individuals from other colonized countries, to exchange ideas and express solidarity. The League of Arab States also played an important rhetorical role in this respect. Both 'Allal al-Fasi and Bourguiba made extensive use of such networks and understood the political futures of their respective countries to be tied to the crystallization of Arab and Islamic blocs.

The Arabo-Islamic national identity in the Maghrib was a political development that, from a historical perspective, correlated with older concepts of dār al-islām (the abode of Islam) and the Maghrib's participation in its Arab-influenced high culture, but from a contemporary national perspective it downplayed the Berber ethnic component in Algeria and Morocco. Berber communities did not necessarily feel disadvantaged by the emphasis on the Maghrib as Arab during the struggle for independence, but hegemonic Arabization in Algeria and to a lesser extent in Morocco triggered the development of Berber cultural and political movements that sought a more pluralistic vision of national identity in the Maghrib.

This coincided with the rise of Islamism in the Maghrib in the 1980s, which appeared to privilege a hegemonic "Arab" interpretation of Islam over Berber forms of faith and culture. Islamism's main target, however, was the postindependence states of the Maghrib and their poor socioeconomic and political performance. As in other Muslim societies, Islamists presented Islam as the panacea for a range of social, political, and economic ills. In each Maghribi country, Islamism followed a slightly different trajectory, but in general Islamists sought to invest the nation-state with greater authenticity and moral accountability rather than to replace it. In Tunisia and Morocco, Islamism remained moderate. In Morocco's case, this reflected the religious prestige of the monarchy, although a more violent and radical minority emerged from the broader Islamist movement. In Algeria, opposition from the secular army forced a confrontation and civil war, but this was by no means an inevitable outcome based on the ideological premises of Algerian Islamism, which largely accepted modern political forms as in the rest of the Maghrib.

See also Algeria; colonialism; international Islamic organizations; Morocco; Ottomans (1299–1924)

Further Reading

Moshe Gershovich, French Military Rule in Morocco: Colonialism and Its Consequences, 2000; George Joffé, ed., North Africa: Nation, State and Region, 1993; Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Daniel Zisenwine, eds., The Maghreb in the New Century: Identity, Religion and Politics, 2007; Rex O'Fahey, Enigmatic Saint: Ahmad b. Idris and the Idrisi Tradition, 1990; David Prochaska, Making Algeria French: Colonialism in Bône, 1870–1920, 1990; John Ruedy, ed., Islamism and Secularism in North Africa, 1996.

AMIRA K. BENNISON

North America

The exact number of Muslims in North America is unknown largely because the U.S. census does not inquire into religious affiliation. The Canadian census does, however, and in 2001 it identified nearly 600,000 Muslims in Canada. Estimates of Muslims in the United States are based either on telephone surveys or self-reporting, and they range widely from one million to seven million. Scholars estimate three million Muslims in the United States. There are also a few thousand Muslims in Mexico.

The first significant presence of Muslims in North America dates back to the colonial period, when some tens of thousands of Muslims from West and North Africa were brought as slaves to American shores. Although many enslaved Muslims practiced their religion in North America, they did not form enduring communities. Instead, they participated in the formation of slave religion and culture. A descendent of a Muslim slave, for example, recalled in the 1930s that her grandmother used to shout with other non-Muslim slaves at night and perform the Muslim ritual prayer by herself at sunrise.

At the turn of the 20th century, an estimated 60,000 to 75,000 Muslim immigrants from South Asia, Anatolia, Eastern Europe, and the Levant came to North America. They were mostly young men who planned to make money and return home. While many repatriated, others stayed and established roots. Between the two world wars, they founded mosques and Muslim funeral associations on both coasts and the Midwest. The first mosques in the United States were built in the Highland Park area of Michigan in 1921 (no longer in existence), in Ross, North Dakota, in 1929 (no longer a mosque), and in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in 1934 (known as the "mother mosque").

The interwar period also witnessed the rise of indigenous movements that sought to establish a distinctive religious and national identity for black migrants to northern metropolises. The most prominent of these movements were the Moorish Science Temple and the Nation of Islam. These movements taught that the original religion of black Americans was Islam, of which they were robbed by whites during slavery. The movements called on black Americans to return to their "original religion" and to adhere to a black Muslim national identity through which they could help one another and improve their lot in North America. In short, they appropriated Islam as a means of developing a national identity through which African Americans could shed the stigma of being black and participate in American modernity. In the 1950s and 1960s, while the civil rights movement focused on repealing segregation in the South, the Nation of Islam, mainly through its national spokesman, Malcolm X, vigorously criticized institutionalized racism in the North.

In the 1950s, American Muslims began to organize at a more national level through the formation of the Federation of Islamic Associations in the United States and Canada. As the United States came to play a more prominent role in Muslim-majority countries in the aftermath of World War II, they also sought an intermediary role between their countries of origin and the United States. In 1959, for example, the federation established formal relations with the United Arab Republic, and in 1961, they held their tenth annual conventions overseas in Lebanon and Egypt, where Egyptian and U.S. embassy representatives greeted them upon landing in Cairo.

The liberalization of U.S. immigration laws in the 1960s led to the large-scale immigration of Asian and African Muslims. Unlike earlier immigrants, many of these immigrants were educated or came to North America to attend universities. Some had become politicized by anticolonial and Islamist movements. In North America, they found the freedom and means to organize and to work toward the realization of a utopian Islamic community.

The most important American Muslim organization founded at this time was the Muslim Students Association of the United States and Canada (MSA, established in 1963). A number of prominent national Muslim organizations, such as the Islamic Circle of North America and the Islamic Society of North America, emerged out of the MSA. Some of the founding members of the MSA associated with such Islamist organizations as the Muslim Brotherhood and Jama'at-i Islami. MSA publications often presented Islam as an ideology that should shape every aspect of Muslims' individual and communal lives. North America, which had become home to Muslims from every corner of the world, proved an ideal testing ground for the realization of this utopian vision of Islamic society; it provided a context in which cultural differences that had shaped the practice of Islam for centuries could be sidestepped for the realization of a puritanical and idealized Muslim community. In practice, however, cultural differences endured.

Over the years, as activist Muslims who came to study in North America remained, found jobs, and started families, they became involved not only in the politics of their homelands but also in American politics. While there was much debate in the 1980s among Muslim activists about the degree to which participation in American politics was appropriate, given that it was likely to lead to cultural assimilation, events such as the Gulf War (1990–91), the World Trade Center bombing (1993), and the attacks of September 11, 2001, all of which increased hostility toward Muslims, led politically minded American Muslims to become more engaged in American political and civic life in order to protect their civil rights and to counter prejudice. Political and civic participation has thus helped the assimilation of Muslims in North America, and political and civic activists, both immigrant and African American, have been at the forefront of defining an American Islam.

See also Europe; Malcolm X (1925–65); Mohammed, W. D. (1933–2008); Nation of Islam

Further Reading

Edward Curtis IV, ed., The Columbia Sourcebook of Muslims in the United States, 2002; Kambiz GhaneaBassiri, A History of Islam in America: From the New World to the New World Order, 2010; Michael Gomez, Black Crescent: The Experience and Legacy of African Muslims in the Americas, 2005; Yvonne Haddad, "Muslims in U.S. Politics: Recognized and Integrated, or Seduced and Abandoned?," SAIS Review 21, no. 2 (2001); Larry Poston, Islamic Da'wah in the West: Muslim Missionary Activity and the Dynamics of Conversion to Islam, 1992.

KAMBIZ GHANEABASSIRI

notables

The term a'yān, or "notables," was used as early as the medieval period to denote the most distinguished inhabitants of a district or town. Under the Ottoman regime, the term indicated a class of people whose local influence throughout the imperial provinces bestowed them with an official status.

In The Emergence of the Modern Middle East, Albert Hourani, historian and specialist on the Middle East, has called urban notables the "natural" leaders of Muslim towns under the authority of the centralized Ottoman government in the late 19th century. In contrast to imperial rule in the capital, Istanbul, Ottoman power over provincial centers required local intermediaries familiar with the cultures and languages of Arab provinces. There were three types of notables: local politicians who exerted social power as religious authorities or 'ulama', leaders of local armed garrisons, or "secular notables" whose power derived from their families' reputations. In the Arab provinces especially, notables were members of a landowning bureaucratic class comprising urban families who resided in cities but who exercised power over rural hinterlands, a fact that contributed to the increasing dependence of rural populations on growing cities for administrative, social, and commercial services. A form of patrician politics developed, characterized both by the dependence of the countryside on urban families and by the political authority of those families. Leading families could act as independent agents or as semi-independent local authorities. They were subordinate to centralized monarchical powers for whom they served as representatives on behalf of local populations. The notables' influence was never totally uncontested, and resistance to them was exercised in journalistic and historical writing as well as through other forms of social organization that questioned the civic organization of cities.

Because urban notables did not compose institutional bodies, their exercise of power depended on their ability to balance their own authority and their cooperation with, and access to, monarchical power. As intermediaries between provincial populations and a ruler's court, notables were both advisors to the powers to which they were subordinate and leaders in their own right of the populations subordinate to them. This latter power depended on notables' maintenance of independence, from which they could derive their own social authority. Within such a dynamic, notables were both vulnerable and crucial: the balancing act they performed inevitably left them open to criticism from some groups, and their distinct power within their own societies made them necessary conduits of access for agents of imperial rule. For this reason, Hourani has characterized the actions of notables as ambiguous or potentially circumspect. Theirs was a position that could occasion, at different moments, their temporary ascendance to rule in the wake of revolution or their acquiescence to central rule when facing the risk of losing their own access to power. The three types of notables did not exercise power consistently or uniformly across the diverse Ottoman provinces. North African notables, for example, were able to rule under the auspices of the sultan but were able to appoint their own successors. In Syria, by contrast, a more delicate balance between notables and the governor's court was rooted in families with a long-standing tradition of military, social, and commercial power.

Scholarship on the historical roles notables played and on the social history of the cities of the Middle East has traditionally been a large part of Ottoman history. As historian Dina Rizk Khoury has argued in The Urban Social History of the Middle East, 1750–1950, scholars of regions where Ottoman power was weakest have tended to interpret that history through the influence of Arab states and have concluded that notables' political power was proof that Arab cities fell short of full integration into the empire. According to this line of argument, local factions transformed into "national" groups following the collapse of the Ottoman Empire. Rounding out this view, according to Khoury, is the broader one that takes into account other regions, such as western Anatolia and the Balkans. In part, this fuller picture is effected by access to a wider range of sources, Ottoman and Arab, and by a realignment of previous views that were either entirely local or entirely homogeneous with respect to Ottoman authority. The most recent scholarship strikes a middle course that emphasizes the fact that simple binaries do not account for the nuanced roles of notables throughout the Ottoman provinces.

See also masses

Further Reading

Albert Hourani, "Ottoman Reforms and the Politics of Notables," in The Emergence of the Modern Middle East, 1981; Dina Rizk Khoury, "Political Relations Between City and State in the Middle East, 1700–1850," in The Urban Social History of the Middle East, 1750–1950, edited by Peter Sluglett, 2008; Philip S. Khoury, Urban Notables and Arab Nationalism: The Politics of Damascus 1860, 2003; Elizabeth Thompson, Colonial Citizens: Republican Rights and Paternal Privilege in French Syria and Lebanon, 2000; Keith D. Watenpaugh, "Middle-Class Modernity and the Persistence of the Politics of Notables in Inter-war Syria," International Journal of Middle East Studies 35 (2003).

NANCY KHALEK

O

oath of allegiance

In classical thought, the oath of allegiance (bay'a or mubāya'a) derives from the oaths taken by the Prophet Muhammad from his followers. The six Qur'anic occurrences of the verb bāya'a (Q. 9:111; Q. 48:10 [in two places]; Q. 48.18; Q. 60:12 [in two places]) are understood to refer to these pledges. The general obligation to honor covenants also applies to oaths of allegiance (Q. 5:1; 16:91).

Bāya'a is the reciprocal form of ba'a, "to buy or sell," whence "to make a bargain" and "to give the oath of allegiance." Although alternative etymologies have been proposed, the bay'a probably was understood in these terms in early seventh-century West Arabia. Thus, the oath of allegiance is one of many religiopolitical relationships expressed in commercial language in the Qur'an, as they sometimes are in other Near Eastern religiopolitical traditions.

In the ancient and late antique Near East, oaths of allegiance entailed the recognition of a religious or political leader under the sanction of deities—or, as in this case, a deity—recognized by all parties to the agreement. The cultural form is an ancient one, of which Assyrian vassal oaths (late second millennium to first millennium BCE) are an early instance. The biblical berīt (Hebrew, "covenant"), which can denote both God's relationship with man and the related contract between a leader and his followers, is another important precedent.

After Muhammad's death, bay'a quickly became the name for the oath of allegiance to a new caliph and a synecdoche for the accession ritual. Bay'a also denoted the oath taken to the caliph's designated successor and oaths taken to other leaders. An early strand of Islamic thought emphasized the bay'a's soteriological character: "Whoever dies without a bay'a upon his neck, dies a pagan death [mītatan jāhiliyyatan]" was attributed to the Prophet. For the Umayyad caliphs (661–750), the oath recognized their claim to represent God's covenant on Earth; the Abbasids (750–1258) adopted similar rhetoric. Prevalent ideas about the bay'a's voluntary and reciprocal nature, however, are reflected in eighth-century traditions invalidating oaths sworn under duress and justifying rebellion against an impious ruler.

Sanctions for perjury of Umayyad oaths of allegiance varied but sometimes included loss of property and wives. From the early Abbasid period, these latter two penalties became common, together with a third sanction of expiatory pilgrimages. Such penalties perhaps reflect a traitor's loss of his rights as a Muslim (that the perjurer becomes an infidel is sometimes made explicit in Abbasid texts). Although classical legal theorists argued that religiously motivated Muslim rebels should not be executed, the caliphs often killed those who broke their oath and sometimes justified this with reference to the Qur'an (Q. 5:33). Capital punishment finds numerous precedents in ancient and late antique religiopolitical practice.

For the Imami Shi'is, who emphasized designation (naṣṣ) of legitimate authority, the oath of allegiance diminished in importance. In contrast, the Sunni theologian Abu Bakr Muhammad b. al-Tayyib al-Baqillani (d. 1013) held that the bay'a was constitutive of the caliphate, expressing the "choice" (ikhtiyār) of the "people of loosing and binding" (ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd). Accepting the realities of a caliphate long dominated by military commanders, he asserted that the election of a qualified candidate by just one legitimate elector was a contract ('aqd) binding all Muslims, as was a "testamentary designation" ('ahd) by the previous incumbent. The contractual form of the oath, which resembled both commercial and marriage contracts, implied reciprocity, and the caliph had a minimum obligation to uphold Islam. Subsequent Sunni consensus on the oath of allegiance resembled Baqillani's formulation, although theorists debated the minimum number of electors.

The Prophetic bay'a continued, and continues, to be widely invoked in the election or recognition of caliphs and other leaders. In premodern times, practice varied according to circumstance. For example, in some cases written documents were required; other bay'as were entirely oral. In the modern Islamic world the new term yamīn al-walā' (lit. "oath of allegiance") is often used of oaths taken by government representatives or the people to one or more of the nation, the constitution, and the head of state. Some states founded on more traditional principles, such as Kuwait and Morocco, retain some classical features of the bay'a, and the term itself. Some 20th-century theorists have argued that the elective dimension of the classical bay'a is equivalent to the democratic process. For political Islamists, the bay'a often determines membership in the organization.

See also authority; leadership; obedience

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Ella Landau-Tasseron, "The Religious Foundations of the Bay'a in Premodern Islam," Research Monographs on the Muslim World, series no. 2, paper no. 4, May 2010; Andrew Marsham, Rituals of Islamic Monarchy: Accession and Succession in the First Muslim Empire, 2009; Roy Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society, 2001.

ANDREW MARSHAM

obedience

Numerous Qur'anic verses directly command obedience to God and His messenger (Q. 3:32, etc.); several other verses spell out in detail that once the messenger has issued a command, it must be obeyed without reluctance (Q. 4:65; 33:36). In contrast, additional obedience to "those in authority among you (the Muslims)" is mentioned directly only in a single verse, where it is appended or subordinated to obedience to God and His messenger (Q. 4:59). The exegetical tradition plausibly explains this extension as referring to subordinate commanders on expeditions sent out from Medina by the Prophet; such lesser commanders also had to be obeyed in the Prophet's absence. Numerous hadith reports also reinforce the idea of obedience to those in authority, but some of these also place a serious limitation on such authority: obedience is required only provided that the command to be obeyed is not in conflict with the commands of God and the messenger, according to the following formula: "There is no obedience to any created being in disobedience to God." This formula occurs in the writing of 'Abd al-Razzaq b. Hammam al-San'ani (744–827), who cites it in a probably much older tradition regarding an incident in the Prophet's life, showing that it had become a formal doctrine already very early, thus representing a strong countercurrent of resistance against the pretensions of rulers among the nascent class of 'ulama' (religious scholars) and their followers.

Later, this doctrine became embodied in juristic doctrines about the sovereignty of the rulers and their right to obedience from their subjects: People must obey their ruler, especially if he is just. However, even if they do not like him or if he issues commands that are against their personal interests, they must still follow him. For most authorities, a ruler's personal corruption or deviance is an insufficient cause for disobedience as long as the ruler maintains Muslim public worship. In the case of military campaigns, when any insubordination could lead to defeat and death, the right to disobey is limited to those orders in which annihilation is likely; the commander thus cannot give his troops orders that would be suicidal for the army, nor can he order individuals to commit suicide.

The actual effects of these rules are similar to political arrangements in other times and places, for every political system requires organization, hierarchy, subordination, and obedience and uses ideological justifications to legitimate itself. In Islam, the absolute power of the ruler to command is limited by what is right according to God and the Prophet, primarily as interpreted by the 'ulama'. Commands contrary to Islamic law should not be obeyed. In practice, such restrictions had only a limited effect on rulers, government officials, and their retinues, as rulers held actual political power and often autocratically abused it. Nevertheless, the limits placed on obedience to unjust commands and rulers in Islamic law tended to weaken and compromise the legitimacy of the rulers and the state, undermining the ruler's and the state's effective power over the ruled and also giving some excuse for rebellion against an unjust ruler. Also, the ability of the rulers to command obedience from the people for self-aggrandizing projects such as state building was severely curtailed in Islamic law. Since the four legitimate taxes (zakat, jizya, 'ushr, and kharāj) were completely insufficient for running a state, the rulers usually had to resort to illegitimate taxes or duties (mukūs) to keep the state going, which always put them in violation of the law. Such limitations impeded the growth of the institutions required by the intrusive modern bureaucratic state, an effect that continues to be felt in various Muslim polities.

See also authority; leadership; taxation; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought: From the Prophet to the Present, 2001; L. Carl Brown, Religion and State, 2000; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2001; Abu al-Hasan al-Mawardi, al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyyah: The Laws of Islamic Governance, translated by Asadullah Yate, 1996.

KHALID YAHYA BLANKINSHIP

Ottomans (1299–1924)

The Ottomans, the dynasty that ruled the Balkans, Anatolia, and most of the Arab world for up to six centuries, inherited a political tradition from the Seljuqs and Ilkhanids that came from three sources: Islamic, based on the experience of the early Muslim community; Near Eastern, inherited from the pre-Islamic empires of the Middle East and Persia and developed under the Abbasids; and Turco-Mongol, based on the tribal chieftainships of Central Asia. This combined tradition reached them through Islamic political literature translated early in their rule and through their experiences on the steppes and under late Seljuq and Mongol or Ilkhanid government. From the Mongols they adopted world conquest as the purpose of rule, a purpose that dovetailed with Islamic monotheism's goal of world domination and conversion as well as Near Eastern methods of centralized bureaucratic administration. They also learned that rulers' law, reconciled with Islamic law and implemented in state courts, could create a political community extending beyond the Muslims to encompass all faiths. Their political literature suggests that they intended from the beginning to establish a just state fit for world dominion, belying the tendentious image of their pure tribal ethos in 15th-century chronicles and Turkish nationalist legends. By the 16th-century reign of Süleiman the Magnificent (r. 1520–66), it became possible to think with 'Ala' al-Din 'Ali Kinalizade (1510–72) that the Ottomans had succeeded in creating the just and virtuous government recommended by Plato.

Beyond these heterogeneous origins, Ottoman political thought was influenced by two sets of circumstances. One was the initial Ottoman conquests, which were made in Byzantine territory. At first Muslims were in the minority, and it was imperative to harness the strength and skills of non-Muslims for the state. Ottoman rulers therefore allied with Christian powers, created non-Muslim military units, and brought non-Muslims into the palace and administration. Although many of the non-Muslims serving the state converted to Islam, some Muslims reacted against what they defined as the corruption brought by officials of non-Muslim origin into what they assumed to be more truly Islamic politics, and they made the assimilation of ideas and institutions from different sources an excuse for rejecting state policies. An opposition strain developed throughout Ottoman politics (as in earlier Muslim politics) that used Islamic piety and the tradition of "forbidding wrong" to critique the state and condemn rulers' pragmatic politics of incorporation as the source of the empire's political problems.

The other main influence on Ottoman political thought was the transition from the conquest state and expanding economy of the early centuries to the stable geography and challenged economy of the 16th and 17th centuries and then to the shrinking empire and modernization efforts of the 18th and 19th centuries. These changes, deemed a decline from the empire's original potential of world conquest, generated a literature of advice and reform that became the most prominent strand of Ottoman political literature, especially after the end of the 16th century when the major works were composed. By the 19th century, this literature had become preoccupied with the assimilation of Western political thought.

The earliest Ottoman political works were translations of classics from the Seljuq and Ilkhanid periods. The first original works were composed in the 15th century. A book of philosophical ethics by Ahmed b. Husam al-Din al-Amasi (early 15th century) dedicated to Mehmed I (r. 1413–20) contained a section on politics, as did a work in the tradition of Islamic ethics by Sinan Paşa (d. 1486), the grand vizier of Mehmed II (r. 1451–81). The genres of history and historical epic also became vehicles for political thought; the heroic poems of Taj al-Din Ibrahim b. Khizr Ahmedi (d. 1413) and Enveri (late 15th century), as well as histories written by men such as Oruj b. 'Adil (late 15th to early 16th century), Dervish Ahmed Aşikpaşazade (1400–ca. 1484), Tursun Beg b. Hamza Beg (d. after 1491), and Mehmed Neşri, conveyed their authors' attitudes toward the state, individual rulers, and specific policies. In the early 16th century, the Ottoman prince Abu al-Khayr Muhammad Korkud b. Bayazid (1470–1513) and the grand vizier Lutfi Paşa (1488–1562/3) wrote works of political advice in new styles. Several of these works, even some of the earliest, exhibited a theme that would become characteristic of Ottoman political thought: the greatness and virtue of government in the past (the Ottoman, Muslim, or Near Eastern past) and its sad decline in the present. Early in the empire's life, writers claimed that the "Byzantine" administrative complexity introduced by Bayazid I (r. 1389–1402) corrupted the purity of the nomad conquerors, causing them to lose divine favor. Measured against the ideal state of these writers' imaginings, all real political life demonstrated the validity of their theme of decline.

The discourse of decline gained sudden relevance in the disturbed conditions of the early 17th century and generated a flood of political writing. Administrators and statesmen such as Mustafa 'Ali b. Ahmed b. 'Abd al-Mawla (1541–1600), Göriceli Koca Mustafa Bey (Koçi Bey), and Mustafa b. Abdullah Hajji Khalifa Katib Çelebi (1609–57) blamed the government's inability to cope with climatic, economic, technological, and geopolitical changes on the decay of administrative rectitude and sought either to restore the administrative effectiveness of the past or to galvanize the sultan into seizing the reins of government and eliminating bureaucratic corruption by force. Meanwhile, critics in religious positions who followed the reformist preacher Kadızade pointed to sins and ethical deviations in the body politic, such as Sufi worship, the consumption of coffee and tobacco, and peace with Christian states, and sought to convert the ruler and his entourage to a more pious and traditional Islam. The debate over the causes of the observed problems continued unresolved; 18th-century governments attempted to address both sets of concerns through military-political reform and the preaching of Islam. Politics spread beyond the elites; a popular politics of artisans, urban migrants, and their Janissary protectors developed in the cities, and a politics of notables and tax farmers emerged in the provinces.

The assumptions about progress and development in 19th-century European political thought appeared to offer a way out of this endless spiral. It was therefore embraced enthusiastically, especially by officials responsible for the empire's survival. Others, especially those disadvantaged by economic change, saw it as another foreign intrusion. While reforming officials labored to implement bureaucratic modernization, an exiled liberal group called the Young Ottomans critiqued their efforts. In a civilization accustomed to autocratic rule, they generated a new political literature opposing top-down modernization and sultanic absolutism. Their ideas helped prepare the way for the republican government and popular politics of the 20th century. The Young Turk Revolution of 1908, reacting against the heavy-handed despotism of Abdülhamid II (r. 1876–1909), revived the nullified Constitution of 1876, and the last years of the empire were spent under constitutional rule.

See also bureaucracy; commanding right and forbidding wrong; justice; Tanzimat

Further Reading

Caroline Finkel, Osman's Dream: The Story of the Ottoman Empire, 1300–1923, 2005; Halil Inalcık, The Ottoman Empire: The Classical Age, 1300–1600, translated by Norman Itzkowitz and Colin Imber, 1973; Donald Quataert, The Ottoman Empire, 1700–1922, 2000; Stanford J. Shaw and Ezel Kural Shaw, The History of the Ottoman Empire and Modern Turkey, 1976.

LINDA T. DARLING

Pakistan

Pakistan was created on August 14, 1947, when the British partitioned the subcontinent and handed over power to the Dominions of India and Pakistan. The new state comprised the Muslim-majority areas of Sindh, Balochistan, West Punjab, the North-West Frontier Province (as it was known at that time), and East Bengal. A thousand miles of Indian territory divided its western and eastern wings. The refugee crisis that arose from the Partition and the war with India over the disputed territory of Kashmir in 1947–48 undermined the process of democratic consolidation, as did the death of the country's founding father, Mohammad 'Ali Jinnah, on September 11, 1948. The country from the outset also faced unresolved questions concerning the role of Islam in its public life. These were exacerbated by the presence of a sizeable Hindu minority in its eastern wing. The Bengali population also sought national recognition of their language on par with Urdu. The initial refusal to meet this demand was a source of tension between East and West Pakistan, which increasingly acquired economic and political dimensions.

The role of Islam in public life proved equally controversial. It was a factor in the delay in establishing a constitution until 1956. The role of the shari'a in governance continued to divide liberals and conservatives. Changes in the wider Muslim world since the early 1980s and the breakaway of East Pakistan in 1971 following civil war strengthened the forces of Islamization in Pakistan. Some commentators also link this with the role of the army, which cultivated the mullahs (teachers of law) to provide a base of legitimacy but also used militant jihadist groups for strategic purposes in its regional conflict with India.

The army controlled the administration of martial law for well over 20 years of Pakistan's existence, starting with the first military coup in 1958. At other periods, as in the 1990s and following the October 2002 elections, the military exerted a powerful influence behind the scenes. This entrenched position had negative effects on the country's economic development and its efforts to establish normal relations with India. The military's dominant presence reflected Pakistan's unstable geopolitical location. Each military intervention further entrenched the military presence not only in politics but also in the economic life of the country. Successive coup leaders justified their military intervention due to the political corruption and instability that existed at the time. The impact of martial law on civil society in part perpetuated the problem the army was claiming to solve. The fact that the army had a high concentration of officers and troops from the Punjab also undermined national cohesion, as it was seen as an occupying force in such regions as Balochistan and East Bengal.

Military leaders in Pakistan have differed considerably in their attitude toward Islam. Ayub Khan (r. 1958–69) and Pervez Musharraf (r. 1999–2008) were personally liberal and modernist in their approach. In contrast, Zia-ul-Haq (r. 1977–88) emphasized a Deobandi piety. Zia's attempt to legitimize his regime through Islamization intensified conflict with the large Shi'i minority. Zia also encouraged the proliferation of madrasas (schools); this, along with other effects of the Afghan conflict, such as the flood of weapons and Afghan refugees, profoundly affected Pakistan's subsequent development. It was also from Zia's time that the army, through its intelligence arm—Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI)—developed links with militant jihadist groups. This policy was reversed in the wake of the September 11, 2001, attacks on the United States but was a factor in the challenge to the state's authority in the tribal areas, in some of the ambiguities in the prosecution of the "war on terror," and in the rise of terrorist attacks within Pakistan. While Musharraf narrowly escaped assassination on a number of occasions, Benazir Bhutto was killed on December 27, 2007. She had returned from exile in a deal brokered by Musharraf in the face of considerable Western pressure.

Civilian leaders also displayed authoritarian tendencies that undermined democratic consolidation. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto's populist regime (1971–77) became increasingly heavy-handed in its dealings with opponents. The use of the army to quell a tribal insurgency in Balochistan from 1973 onward enabled the army to recover from its public humiliation following defeat in the 1971 India-Pakistan War. Nawaz Sharif's second administration (r. 1997–99) was also marked by authoritarian tendencies that formed the backdrop to Musharraf's "reluctant" coup on October 12, 1999.

Despite hopes for democratic consolidation following the February 2008 elections and Musharraf's stepping down from power, President Asif Ali Zardari was initially reluctant to strip his office of the powers to dissolve the assembly. His government became mired in charges of corruption and incompetency. Pakistan thus more than 60 years after its creation continues to face problems of democratic consolidation, civil-military relations, and the establishment of a culture of religious and political tolerance that have beset it from birth.

See also Bangladesh; India; Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938); Jinnah, Mohammad 'Ali (1876–1948); Mawdudi, Abul al-A'la (1903–79)

Further Reading

Tariq Ali, The Leopard and the Fox: A Pakistan Tragedy, 2006; Stephen Philip Cohen, The Idea of Pakistan, 2006; Zahid Hussain, Frontline Pakistan: The Path to Catastrophe and the Killing of Benazir Bhutto, 2008; Owen Bennett Jones, Pakistan: Eye of the Storm, 2003; Shuja Nawaz, Crossed Swords: Pakistan, Its Army and the Wars Within, 2008; Ayesha Siddiqa, Military Inc.: Inside Pakistan's Military Economy, 2007; Ian Talbot, Pakistan: A Modern History, 2009.

IAN TALBOT

Palestine

In contemporary Arab nationalist and Islamist discourse, the term "Palestine" (filasṭīn) refers to an area delimited by the former British Mandate of Palestine (1923–48). This same territory more or less incorporates the modern state of Israel and the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip. Filasṭīn first entered the Islamic politico-geographic lexicon following the Arab Muslim conquest of former Byzantine areas during the 630s. Adapting the Roman designation, Palestina Prima, the new rulers declared as jund filasṭīn (Military District of Palestine) an area situated between the Jordan River in the east and the Mediterranean coast to the west, Mount Carmel to the north, and Gaza to the south.

The significance of filasṭīn exceeded its administrative function. Muslims, generally, came to associate the region with Jerusalem, known in Arabic and Islamic texts as madīnat bayt al-maqdis, "City of the Holy Sanctuary." In contemporary Palestinian spoken Arabic, this designation reduces simply to al-Quds, "The Holy" (i.e., the Holy City). Asserting the Muslim attachment, Caliph ʿAbd al-Malik (r. 685–705) initiated the construction of the Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock on the platform that had once supported the Jewish temple. Jerusalem's importance declined after the Umayyad collapse in 750. Not until the Crusaders took Jerusalem in 1099 would filasṭīn again become central to Muslim political imagination. The massive expansion of faḍāʾil bayt al-maqdis (the excellences of Jerusalem) literature—a type of propaganda meant to encourage Muslims to take up the jihad against the foreign invaders—played a significant role in this revival.

In the modern period, Palestine served as an important symbol and rallying point of the Arab nationalist and Islamist causes. During the 1930s and 1940s, Palestinian leaders such as al-Hajj Amin al-Husayni (1895–1974), mufti of Jerusalem and head of the Supreme Muslim Council and Arab Higher Committee, made Palestine a central issue in Muslim anticolonial consciousness globally by sending delegations to raise funds and solicit political support as far away as India. Husayni also actively courted the backing of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, a group founded by Hasan al-Banna in 1928. Banna sent activists to organize chapters throughout Palestine. He also preached in Egypt on the threat of Zionism and the necessity of reviving the jihad to prevent the loss of Palestine to the Jews. Palestine, he declared, was an Islamic waqf (inalienable patrimony), and its defense was essential to the revitalization of the Islamic umma (community of all Muslims).

Whereas Banna's perspective was Islamic, secular Arab and Palestinian nationalists saw the defense of Palestine as a matter of preserving Arab rights, sovereignty, and honor in the face of European and American imperialism. Although the Islamic cultural heritage was a critical component of their historical consciousness, the secular nationalists, particularly the main factions comprising the Palestinian Liberation Organization, tended to construe Palestine not as primarily Islamic but as a "holy land" in which diverse religious groups—Muslims, Christians, Jews, Samaritans, and others—historically coexisted. Against the exclusive ethno-nationalist vision of Zionism, or the religiously exclusive idea of an Islamic state, the Palestinian secular-nationalists proposed a multi-sectarian democratic state.

By contrast, the Palestinian Islamist movements that emerged in the aftermath of the 1967 war—groups such as Shaykh Ahmad Yasin's (1937–2004) Islamic Collective (al-Mujamma' al-Islami, founded in 1973)—resisted the secular-nationalist dilution of Islam to a mere heritage shared by others, reasserting instead Banna's emphasis on the priority of the Islamic religious claim. In the 1980s, new groups like the Islamic Jihad and the Islamic Resistance Movement (Hamas) radicalized this perspective by asserting that the road to the umma's revival lay in jihad to retake Jerusalem.

International jihadist groups also made Palestine a rallying cause. The leader of al-Qaeda, Osama bin Laden, declared in 2003, for example, that Palestine and Afghanistan constituted the most important arenas for jihad, since in both areas Muslims had the chance to weaken America and its staunchest ally, "the Jews." Significantly, Palestinian Islamist groups such as Hamas resisted cooperation with al-Qaeda. Although Hamas invoked transnational Islamic solidarity, its policies and practices focused almost exclusively on combating the Israeli occupation and liberating Palestinian territory rather than on a global struggle against the United States.

See also Arab nationalism; Arafat, Yasir (1929–2004); al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011); Hamas; Jerusalem; jihad; Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO); secularism

Further Reading

ʿAbd al-Fattah Muhammad El-Awaisi, The Muslim Brothers and the Palestine Question: 1928–1947, 1998; Osama bin Laden, Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden, edited by Bruce Lawrence, 2005; Loren D. Lybarger, Identity and Religion in Palestine: The Struggle between Islamism and Secularism in the Occupied Territories, 2007; Beverley Milton-Edwards, Islamic Politics in Palestine, 1996; Shaul Mishal and Avraham Sela, The Palestinian Hamas: Vision, Violence, and Coexistence, 2000, reissued with updated introduction 2006.

LOREN D. LYBARGER

Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)

Decreed into existence by Arab leaders gathered at the First Arab Summit in Cairo, Egypt, in 1964, the Palestinian Liberation Organization (Munazzamat al-Tahrir al-Filastiniyya; PLO) functioned for nearly three decades as the primary framework of Palestinian political identity. Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–70), preeminent tribune of pan-Arabism and convener of the First Arab Summit, originally intended the PLO to be an instrument for channeling Palestinian aspirations and buttressing Egypt's claim to leadership of the Arab cause. Israel's stunning victory in the Six-Day War of June 1967, however, weakened Nasser and diminished pan-Arabism as a viable option for addressing Palestinian grievances and goals.

The enfeebling of pan-Arabism after 1967 coincided with the emergence of Fatah—fath, which means "conquest" or "opening," and is also an inverse acronym derived from the organization's Arabic name, Harakat al-Tahrir al-Watani al-Filastini (i.e., the Palestinian National Liberation Movement). Between 1968 and 1969, Fatah took control of the PLO, transforming the organization into a specifically Palestinian instrument of self-assertion. Formed in the late 1950s, Fatah was an indigenous Palestinian response to the perceived failures of leadership during the preceding decade, a period that had ended with the expulsion or displacement of approximately 750,000 Palestinians during the war of 1948. Fatah's founders—principal among them Yasir Arafat (1929–2004), Khalil al-Wazir (1935–88), Salah Khalaf (1933–91), and Khalid al-Hassan (1928–94)—represented a new generation of leaders who had personally experienced the expulsions. Sharing a common class background (petty bourgeois), as well, these individuals met one another while studying in the new state universities in Cairo and elsewhere.

In contrast with others of their generation who had aligned with Nasser-led pan-Arabism, Fatah's founders insisted that the Palestinians could not afford to wait for the Arab regimes to act. They had to seize the initiative themselves to liberate their homeland through independent armed struggle. Making good on the rhetoric, Fatah commandos launched their first raid against Israel on December 31, 1964. Although a failure in military terms, the event carried immense symbolic value. Dozens more actions followed. In the wake of the 1967 war, Palestinian refugee youths inspired by "the Palestinian Revolution" (al-thawra al-filastiniyya) flocked to PLO bases in Jordan to train as guerrilla fighters.

Eminently practical, the new leaders of the PLO accepted all volunteers regardless of their orientation as long as they demonstrated commitment to the baseline objective of national liberation. Underlying this pragmatic inclusiveness was a normative vision, reflected in official PLO documents like the amended covenant of 1968, that conceived of Palestinians as a multisectarian community (1) existing for generations within the territory once demarcated by the limits of the British Mandate of Palestine (1922–48); (2) sharing a common language (Arabic) and ties of affinity with other Arabic-speaking nations; (3) possessing attachments to the three major monotheisms—Islam, Christianity, and Judaism—and a tradition of religious coexistence within the Holy Land; (4) holding in common the customs of the now lost fallāḥī (peasant) past; and, most critically, (5) sharing the memory of violent dispossession during the 1948 war and a consequent commitment to reversing the expulsions and achieving the establishment of a single democratic state for all its citizens—Muslims, Christians, and indigenous Palestinian Jews—in the entirety of Palestine. These themes later underwent modifications in response to historical events that dictated political realism. In the wake of the 1973 war, for example, the Palestinian National Council meeting a year later deemphasized the restitution of all Palestine by instead calling for an independent national authority over any part of Palestinian territory that might be liberated.

Although faced with immense obstacles—Arab state interventions, violent Israeli reprisals, U.S. refusal to open a dialogue, a dispersed Palestinian population, and more—the PLO succeeded in asserting its claim to represent all Palestinians. By the end of the 1970s, the PLO had established an independent territorial base within Lebanon. Operating as a state within a state, the organization featured multiple social service agencies, military forces, and parliamentary and executive structures. It also had embassies in various countries and even attained observer status in the United Nations. The Israeli invasion of Lebanon in 1982 destroyed the PLO's base of operations, but the leadership managed to reestablish the organization in North Africa while also expanding its underground presence in the occupied Gaza Strip and West Bank.

The outbreak of the Intifada (uprising) in December 1987 greatly enhanced these efforts. A new generation of secular-nationalist leaders aligned with the PLO factions moved quickly to form the United National Command of the Intifada (al-Qiyada al-Wataniyya al-Muwahhada li-l-Intifada), while the PLO leadership outside capitalized diplomatically by opening a dialogue with the United States and declaring national independence in Gaza and the West Bank. At the same time, however, in a development that portended the demise of the dominance of PLO-style nationalism, revived Muslim Brotherhood forces responded to the Intifada and secularist attempts to control it by declaring the establishment of the Islamic Resistance Movement (Harakat al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya), better known as Hamas. (The Muslim Brotherhood received its start in Egypt during the 1920s. Advocating a return to piety, it pioneered mass politics as a path to Islamic sociopolitical revival in the Middle East. Beginning in the 1930s, it established branches across British Mandate Palestine, and its members fought alongside the Arab armies during the 1948 war. Yasir Arafat and Khalil al-Wazir, among others, were members of this movement before they established Fatah.) From the start, Hamas pursued an independent line in a bid to reframe Palestinian identity and resistance in Islamic terms. It succeeded in imposing its presence on the Palestinian political field, even during the Oslo Peace Process (1993–2000), an event that led to the formation of a Palestinian National Authority (PNA) in parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The PNA effectively displaced the PLO as the primary institutional framework of the secular-nationalist mainstream. The violent collapse of the Oslo process in 2000 alongside mounting popular frustrations with Fatah and the PNA, however, gave momentum to the Islamist opposition. In January 2006, Hamas won an outright majority in the Palestinian Legislative Council elections. Eighteen months later, faced with an internationally backed effort to arm and train Fatah forces, Hamas initiated a preemptive coup that routed Fatah and ended in a complete takeover of the Gaza Strip. While Fatah remained nominally in control of the West Bank territories that had been ceded to the PNA during the Oslo process, the ascendancy of Hamas in Gaza effectively ended the 40-year secular-nationalist monopoly over Palestinian politics.

See also Arab nationalism; Arafat, Yasir (1929–2004); Hamas; Palestine

Further Reading

Helena Cobban, The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power, and Politics, 1984, reprinted 1992; Rashid Khalidi, Under Siege: P.L.O. Decisionmaking during the 1982 War, 1986; Loren D. Lybarger, Identity and Religion in Palestine: The Struggle between Islamism and Secularism in the Occupied Territories, 2007; Yezid Sayigh, Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993, 1997; Avraham Sela and Moshe Ma'oz, eds., The P.L.O. and Israel: From Armed Conflict to Political Solution, 1964–1994, 1997.

LOREN D. LYBARGER

Pan-Islamism

Pan-Islamism (1876) or Pan-Islam (1882) was an interpretative concept developed by Western observers to denote claims by Muslim public intellectuals and politicians to represent what they imagined to be a unified Muslim community (umma). Though some Western writers denied that this concept referred to anything real, and in spite of the fact that its use was extremely diverse, it deeply influenced the public opinion on Islam and Muslims, especially from 1880 to 1920. In scholarship, Pan-Islam or Pan-Islamism has been studied from 1900 onward. It was mostly Indian Muslim writers who, from the late 19th century, used the concept in a positive sense. Already in the 1870s, the Ottoman term ittihād-i islām (Union of Islam) was conceptually contextualized on the pattern of Western pan-ideologies, in particular pan-Slavism and pan-Germanism. The term itself had come into public use in the middle of the 1860s and soon spread to India and Iran. Originally there was no clear Arabic expression that reflected the Ottoman usage. Only at a later stage in the 19th century did Egyptian reformers coin terms like wahda islāmiyya (Islamic Unity) or jāmi'a islāmiyya (Islamic Union). Nevertheless, already in the late 1870s Muslim reformers based in Egypt, notably Afghani (ca. 1838–97), identified Pan-Islamism as descriptive of a political and cultural agency whose claim was not to be restricted to specific national publics. Many Muslims and some Western writers were extremely critical of efforts to assemble the heterogeneity of Muslim public expressions under the single term Pan-Islam, as this only mirrored the Western construct of a "Muslim peril" (following clichés like the "yellow peril"). In fact, Pan-Islamism was often interpreted as an endeavor to unite Muslims under the despotic rule of the Ottoman sultan Abdülhamid II using Sufi orders and other religious groups or secret political associations, both creating a "widespread European anxiety about Muslim solidarity." In this sense, Pan-Islamism had been frequently used as a framework to contextualize Islam in the then-current realm of political imagination.

Although no longer used as an analytical tool to study Islamic political thought, Pan-Islamism can be discussed as a historical label for different and partly contradictory intellectual and political trends from the 1870s to the 1930s. Both Western observers and Muslims refer mainly to one of the following trends: (1) the claim of the Ottoman Empire to act as a representative of the Muslim world in its struggle with colonial powers; (2) the claim of specific social groups and communities, such as certain Sufi orders, to represent a network of internal solidarity and loyalty that transcend the nation-state boundaries; (3) the claim of Muslim public intellectuals that they represent Islam as a transnational cultural and even political order that should be reunified against the particularism and despotism of nation-states as well as against the dominion of Western colonial powers and, not least, against Christian missionary activities; and (4) a general cultural call for the "awakening of an Islamic conscience" and a striving for "free and complete expression of progress in Moslem societies."

All four trends have in common (1) a reference to the totality of the Muslim World and its "valorization" as a symbolic framework of political activity; (2) a definition of some sort of political, social, or cultural representation, either in the form of the Ottoman sultan or embodied by networks or institutions of Muslim intellectuals; and (3) a moral judgment on the Islamic past and on the contemporary state of Muslim societies. In fact, all three characteristics mirror the standards of secular ideological and religious cultural discourses that dominated the late 19th and early 20th centuries. This is why Western observers had no difficulty seeing these trends as equivalent to other pan-ideologies (e.g., pan-Slavism [1836], pan-Hellenism [1847], pan-Germanism [1850], pan-orthodoxy [Karl Marx; 1855], and pan-Europeanism [1856]).

Perceiving Islam as an immanent frame of political and cultural references was a common feature of public Islam and of Ottoman imperial ideology. Islamic currents subsumed under Pan-Islamism thus belonged to different social fields. As an imperial ideology, Pan-Islamism legitimated the power of the Ottoman sultan after the dramatic course of the Russo-Turkish War (1877–78), which resulted in the establishment of the Bulgarian state; the full independence of Romania, Serbia, and Montenegro; the Russian annexation of the Kars district; and the formation of a British protectorate over Cyprus and of an Austrian-Hungarian protectorate over Bosnia and Herzegovina (established by the Treaty of Berlin in 1878). Its importance grew after the French occupation of Tunisia in 1881, the Greek annexation of Thessaly and South Epirus in 1881, and the British occupation of Egypt in 1882. The Ottoman ruling elites tried to compensate for these territorial losses with an appeal to a transnational Islamic identity, which would create general support for the Ottoman Empire in the emerging public opinion in Muslim societies. As an imperial ideology, Pan-Islamism did not have distinct normative content or irridentist claims but was conceived as a network of solidarity founded on the activities of individual agents. In some cases, this network incorporated Sufi orders (Madani, Rifa'i) whose elites were often called to Istanbul in order to directly work as an Ottoman agency.

The Ottoman propagation of Islamic unity did not, however, yield the response the empire might have expected. Ottoman Pan-Islamism faded out after 1910. In spite of massive propaganda, it had only limited success in mobilizing pro-Ottoman public opinion during the Italian-Turkish War (1911–12) and World War I. Consequently, Muslim public intellectuals came to stress the independence of Islam as an autonomous category of cultural and moral order based on ideas of Islamic unity. Apart from a few exceptions, such as the Khilafat movement in India (1919–24), the denationalized form of Pan-Islamism never served as an instrument for broader political mobilization but remained instead a framework for contextualizing particularistic political and cultural claims. In most cases, Islamic unity was construed as a symbolic field of solidarity that competed with other universalisms like Christianity, socialism, or, more generally, the West. Only rarely was this Islamic unity theoretically constructed, being taken instead as a self-evident form of religious solidarity and of a transnational Islamic public.

See also al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); Ottomans (1299–1924); revival and reform

Further Reading

Kemal H. Karpat, The Politicization of Islam: Reconstructing Identity, Faith, and Community in the Late Ottoman State, 2001; Nikki R. Keddie, "Pan-Islam as Proto-Nationalism," Journal of Modern History 41 (1969); Jacob M. Landau, The Politics of Pan-Islam: Ideology and Organization, 1990; Reinhard Schulze, "Citizens of Islam," in Law and the Islamic World: Past and Present, edited by C. Troll et al., 1995.

REINHARD SCHULZE

Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS)

The Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (Parti Islam Se-Malaysia; PAS) emerged from a split between two factions, the 'ulama' and the political elite, within the Bureau of Religious Affairs of the conservative-nationalist Malay party (United Malays National Organisation; UMNO). On November 24, 1951, PAS was formed under the leadership of Haji Fuad Hassan, who was the head of the UMNO Bureau of Religious Affairs. In 1953 Fuad Hassan was replaced by Abbas Elias, a doctor by training who was also a member of the colonial medical services in British Malaya. By 1955 PAS was no longer linked to the UMNO party. Between 1956 and 1969, the combined leadership of Burhanuddin al-Helmy and Zulkiflee Muhammad helped turn PAS into a modern political organization. These leaders were largely responsible for turning the movement into a political party with a centralized organizational structure, a chain of command, and links with other Islamic parties and movements abroad. Under the leadership of Burhanuddin, PAS developed into an Islamist party that was both nationalist and anti-imperialist in its outlook. Burhanuddin's heroes and models were men of the day such as President Sukarno of Indonesia and Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt. He looked to the Bandung conference and the Pan-Arab alliance, rather than the Muslim community of Medina during the time of the Prophet, as models of collective political action. In 1969 Burhanuddin died after being put under detention without trial by the Malaysian government. PAS then came under the leadership of Mohamad Asri Muda, who was a staunch defender of Malay rights and privileges.

Between 1970 and 1982, Asri Muda turned PAS into an ethnocentric Malay-Muslim party concerned with the promotion of the status of Malay-Muslims in the country. But during that time Asri Muda's defense of Malay ethic rights also compromised PAS's Islamic credentials, and as a result other alternative Islamist movements such as the Malaysian Islamic Youth Movement (Angkatan Belia Islam Malaysia; ABIM) emerged. In 1982, PAS experienced an internal coup that led to the overthrow of Asri Muda and the rise of the "'ulama' faction" led by senior PAS 'ulama' like Tuan Guru Yusof Rawa and Tuan Guru Nik Aziz Nik Mat, as well as a number of ex-ABIM activists like Ustaz Fadzil Noor, Ustaz Hadi Awang, and Muhammad Sabu. The 1980s witnessed the first violent clash between PAS and the Malaysian government, as the Islamist party became more uncompromising in its demands. PAS's fortunes were mixed in the mid-1990s. At the 1995 general elections, it managed to retain control of the northern state of Kelantan but failed to make inroads anywhere else in the country. PAS made its biggest gains ever in the November 1999 elections, gaining control of two states. But in 2004 the party suffered another setback as a result of its support for the Taliban and its protest against the invasion of Afghanistan and Iraq, which reinforced the image of PAS being a radical Islamist party in the eyes of many ordinary Malaysian voters. At the elections of March 2008, PAS regained some of its losses as it joined the People's Alliance (Pakatan Rakyat) coalition and gained control of Kelantan as well as Perak and Kedah. In 2011 PAS was the second biggest Malay-Muslim party in Malaysia with an estimated one million members and supporters throughout the country. It remained committed to its goal of creating an Islamic state in Malaysia.

See also Malaysia; Southeast Asia

Further Reading

Zainah Anwar, Islamic Revivalism in Malaysia: Dakwah among the Students, 1987; Alias Mohamad, Malaysia's Islamic Opposition: Past, Present and Future, 1991; Idem, "The Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party: A Critical Observation," in Southeast Asian Affairs, 1978; Chandra Muzaffar, Islamic Resurgence in Malaysia, 1987; Farish A. Noor, Islam Embedded: The Historical Development of the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party PAS: 1951–2003, 2 vols., 2004; Farish A. Noor, Martin van Bruinessen, and Yoginder Sikand, eds., The Madrasa in Asia: Political Activism and Transnational Linkages, 2008; Zainal Abidin Abdul Wahid, "Islamic Resurgence and Political Movements in Malaysia," paper presented at Ohio University, February 5, 1987.

FARISH AHMAD-NOOR

parliament

National parliaments, legislatures, assemblies, or councils exist in virtually all countries worldwide, including in all the approximately 50 Muslim-majority states and territories. Strictly speaking, parliament is a legislative body deriving from the political tradition of the United Kingdom and having a prime minister. However, national legislative or consultative bodies in different institutional settings (e.g., parliamentarianism, presidentialism, semipresidentialism) and political regimes (e.g., democratic and authoritarian) are often referred to as parliaments.

Democratic legislatures have as their primary function to propose, debate, and vote on bills. Authoritarian parliaments may play an advisory role as prescribed in their constitution (e.g., Oman) or may have more robust lawmaking prerogatives, which are limited, in practice, by the executive branch of government (e.g., Algeria).

Origins of Modern Parliaments

Democracy, or "rule by the many," first emerged in Athens, Greece, in the fifth century BCE. In a city-state, formal equality and self-government were attained through direct democracy—participation of free, adult males in a citizen's assembly. The impracticality of direct democracy in the large nation-states of 19th-century Europe necessitated the development of representative political institutions.

Parliaments in Authoritarian Countries

Parliamentary bodies vary according to the extent to which they embody the procedures of democracy or polyarchy, a term coined by Robert A. Dahl to mean a system in which the interests of every member of the polity are taken into equal consideration when making binding collective decisions. In Democracy and Its Critics (1989), Dahl describes polyarchy as having seven institutions: elected officials, free and fair elections, inclusive suffrage, the right to run for office, freedom of expression, alternative information, and associational autonomy. Democratic legislatures enjoy influence in policy making and institutional autonomy from the executive branch, are representative, and have the material and human capacity to undertake the complex tasks of lawmaking and oversight. Authoritarian parliaments are weak in comparison to the executive branch. Their members can usually provide particularistic benefits to their constituents but have little power to shape policy independent of the executive.

Emergence and Change in Parliaments in the Muslim World

Legislative bodies emerged in new states following the decolonization of Africa and Asia and have frequently been established by nationalist movements, suggesting that they confer legitimacy to nationalist and revolutionary claims and provide other organizational advantages. The Polisario Front, which contests Moroccan claims to the former Spanish Sahara, established the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic and the 101-seat Sahrawi National Council in 1976. The Palestinian National Authority also has a unicameral legislative body, the 132-seat, democratically elected Palestinian Legislative Council, successor to the Palestinian Liberation Organization's Palestinian National Council, established in 1964. The revolutionary Libyan Republic declared the Interim Transitional National Council on March 5, 2011, at the height of its conflict with Colonel Qaddafi's forces.

In Legislative Politics in the Arab World (1998), Abdo I. Baaklini, Guilain Denoeux, and Robert Springborg contend that Arab parliaments are not remnants of colonialism. Rather, the Ottoman Empire's first council emerged during the period of Sultan Selim III (r. 1789–1807), and instances exist in which colonial powers disbanded indigenous parliaments threatening colonial rule. Early republican experiments include the establishment of the first parliament in Egypt in 1866, Iran in 1906, and Iraq in 1922.

Legislative assemblies gained visibility as demands for political reform swept the globe beginning in the 1970s. The Federal National Council (Majlis al-Ittihad al-Watani) of the United Arab Emirates was established as an appointed body in 1971, but pressure from political opposition prompted limited reforms. In 2006, a group of voters consisting of less than 1 percent of the population elected half of the parliament's 40 members for the first time.

Variation in Parliaments in the Muslim World

Apart from the expression of Islamic principles in constitutional and legal instruments, which frequently refer to parliamentary life as an application of shūrā (consultation), parliaments in the Muslim world do not differ markedly in structure or function from those in other parts of the world. The number of chambers (i.e., bicameral or unicameral) and seats, term length, and electoral or appointment system vary little worldwide. The power of the parliament, however, varies as a function of the level of democracy. The preponderance of weak parliaments in the Muslim world corresponds to the high number of authoritarian regimes in the region.

Parliaments in the Muslim world vary widely in their power vis-à-vis the executive branch of government, as measured by the Parliamentary Powers Index (PPI). On this scale, which ranges between 0 and 1, the weakest parliament in the Muslim world is the Somali Transitional Federal Parliament (PPI = 0), and the strongest is the Turkish Meclis (PPI = 0.78).

Among the world's weakest, the Saudi Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura) functions in an advisory capacity to the king, who is both the head of the government and the head of state. Expanding the 12-member Consultative National Council established in 1924, the 60-member Majlis was created in 1993, and its membership gradually expanded to 150 appointed members. The Majlis cannot introduce bills, and promulgation of legislation is the sole prerogative of the king, who can disband the parliament at any time. Rather, it discusses proposed legislation before passing it to the parallel Council of Ministers. The Majlis has the power to summon ministers to debates pertaining to their jurisdiction (Article 22, Consultative Council Act).

Among the world's more powerful parliaments, Turkey's is part of a tradition of constitutionalism dating back to Ottoman rule. The unicameral Türkiye Büyük Millet Meclisi (Turkish Grand National Assembly) was established in the 1920s following the fall of the Ottoman Empire and the abolition of the caliphate. Turkey is a secular state, though the Islamist Justice and Development Party won an absolute majority of the seats for the first time in 2002; 18 women were elected to parliament in 1935. The Meclis (Parliament) enjoys the prerogatives and autonomy of a democratic parliament and can propose laws, elect the president, and remove the president and prime minister from office. Unlike many other countries in the region, Turkey does not have a gender quota, though 9.1 percent of the Meclis is made up of women (2007).

Parliaments and Islamic Political Thought

Debate about the role of parliaments in the modern Islamic state centers on the principle of shūrā, which existed as a practice in pre-Islamic Arabia and was used by the early Islamic community. Shūrā means collective decision making on matters of common interest. Two instances of shūrā are recorded in the Qur'an: the first an injunction to Muhammad to consult with his followers (3:159) and the second an exhortation for members of the community to engage in the praiseworthy act of consultation (42:38). Muslim scholars have debated the meaning and role of shūrā in modern Muslim political life. In Tafsir Surat al-Shura (Interpretation of sura 42, The Consultation [1973]), Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) argued that neither a parliament nor popular elections have a place; shūrā is optional and nonbinding consultation between a ruler and members of the elite. Although the caliph may consult with elites in order to achieve a wise and just ruling in keeping with God's law, he is neither elected by the council nor required to consult with them or take their advice as binding. The Qur'an and the sunna are sufficient sources of law, and no legislative function can be delegated to human beings.

In The Principles of State and Government in Islam (1961), Muhammad Asad (d. 1992) argued that the principles of shūrā, ijtihād (independent reasoning), and ijmā' (consensus), along with the Islamic values of justice, equality, and human dignity, are the basis for the application of representative democracy. Like him, Fathi Osman interprets shūrā as obligatory, citing it as an Islamic impetus for popular sovereignty exercised through the free election of a parliament and head of state. A legislature is required to make laws on matters not addressed by the Qur'an and sunna, including modern issues not encountered at the time of the Prophet and those on which jurists disagree, so long as they do not contradict any part of the shari'a.

See also democracy; elections

Further Reading

Muhammad Asad, The Principles of State and Government in Islam, 1961; Michaelle L. Browers, Democracy and Civil Society in Arab Political Thought: Transcultural Possibilities, 2006; John Bulloch, The Shura Council in Saudi Arabia, 1993; Khaled Abou El Fadl, ed., Islam and the Challenge of Democracy, 2004; M. Steven Fish and Matthew Kroenig, The Handbook of National Legislatures: A Global Survey, 2009; Fathi Osman, Islam in a Modern State: Democracy and the Concept of Shura, 2001.

LINDSAY J. BENSTEAD

patrimonial state

Patrimonialism is one of Max Weber's ideal types of political organization. It is a system of personal authority in which the ruler's servants are the holders of office and the administration of the kingdom is an extension of the management of the ruler's household. In medieval Muslim patrimonial states, Weber noted that the rulers' armies consisted of Turkish military slaves (mamluks). In Weber's view, this type of military force could be the source of chronic political instability, which made the Near East the classic location of nonlegitimate domination or what he called "sultanism." Although Weber's notion of sultanism as militarized, nonlegitimate domination can be misleading, his model of the patrimonial state fits the system of delegated authority as developed by the Abbasid caliphs and evolved with the emergence of independent Islamicate monarchies.

The Persianate polity, as it evolved under the Samanids in Khurasan and Central Asia (Transoxiana) in the ninth and tenth centuries, was divided into the dargāh, the household of the ruler or the court, and the dīwān, the bureaucracy, which consisted of several branches. The court was managed by the ruler's representative or deputy (wakīl) and an observer (mushrif), whose duty was to be aware of all that went on in the dargāh and report on it. The most important group among "the men of the dargāh" was the corps of military slaves, one of whom was appointed the chief chamberlain (hājib-i buzurg), who controlled access to the king. The corps of military mamluks was created by Isma'il b. Ahmad, the founder of the Samanid dynasty, and remained the most important element in its military organization. The same corps of Mamluks supplied the security force under a police chief or captain of the watch (sāḥib or amīr-i haras), either a slave general or a noble freeman, for maintaining law and order in the cities. Just as in Weber's ideal type, the policing of the cities was considered an extension of the duties of the guards who served at the court and protected the king. The Ghaznavid dynasty was founded by one of the Samanid Turkish mamluks. The Ghaznavids in the 11th and 12th centuries modeled it on that of the Samanids. The Ghaznavid patrimonial state was transplanted to India by the Ghurid military slave generals who founded the Delhi Sultanate in the early 13th century.

Meanwhile, another type of patrimonial regime developed with the formation of nomadic Turkic states in the 11th century—namely, the Qarakhanid kingdom in Central Asia and the Seljuq Empire in Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Anatolia. According to this conception, the kingdom was the patrimonial property of the whole family of the khan, the tribal chief, and was divided into appanages upon his death. The problem of succession, however, resulted in the disintegration of the nomadic Seljuq Empire, as it did with the Timurid Empire in the 15th century. Marshall Hodgson rejected Weber's ideal types of patrimonialism and, with better reasons, that of sultanism for these nomadic empires and offered two ideal types of his own in their place: the a'yān-amīr system in the Seljuq period and the military patronage state of the post-Mongol era. The first describes the regime that emerged with the development of the iqtā' system of land tenure in which large land grants were made to the military elite. In this system, social power of the notables (a'yān) in towns and villages was subordinated to the domination of the military elite (amīrs) commanding the garrisons and using enormous landholdings for the maintenance of their tribal contingents. With the weakening of bureaucracy and decentralization of land assignments that resulted from the increase in the size of the iqtā' and the amalgamation of fiscal revenue collection and prebendal grants for military and administrative service, the system developed in a military direction. Furthermore, the power of women in Turkic royal families, in interaction with the absence of primogeniture and indivisibility in nomadic kingdoms, laid the foundation for a novel political regime. The appanage of a young Seljuq prince was de facto governed by his tutor (atabeg), whom his widowed mother tended to marry. The a'yān-amīr system thus changed into an extremely decentralized system in the latter part of the 12th and early 13th centuries.

Hodgson's second ideal type for the post-Mongol period is the military-patronage state. It was modeled on the Mamluk sultanate in Egypt and Syria quite closely. The Mamluk amirs elected the sultan from their own ranks. As a consequence, the Mamluk kingdom was taken over as a whole by an elected sultan and never divided among the princes of the royal house as appanages. The Mamluk regime was strikingly similar to the Delhi Sultanate as an Islamicate polity under a complex system of collective rule by military slave-sultans. Given their relatively small number among the population, the Mamluk sultans of Egypt and Syria and their families developed an extensive network of patronage over civic and educational institutions through the civilian elite.

Despite his objection, however, Hodgson's "military-patronage state" can be considered a subtype of the Islamicate patrimonial state. In applying his model to the Ilkhanid and Timurid Turco-Mongolian empires in the 14th and 15th centuries, Hodgson noted the character of Yasa as the law of the military estate, of which the civilian population took no cognizance. The nomadic tribal confederations that established these empires transformed themselves into permanent ruling castes after conquest and remained rigidly separate from the civilian population to which they cultivated the ties of patronage by holding courts and founding endowments. Holding enormous undifferentiated land grants (soyurghāl) that did not distinguish between fiscal and prebendal elements, they became the landlords of the peasant masses. The pattern of social stratification under the Turco-Mongolian empires differed significantly from that of the Persianate polity of the Samanids and the Ghaznavids. For this reason, according to Hodgson, it should be considered a separate subtype of Islamicate patrimonial state—in fact, the latest. The bureaucratic class, secretaries of the chanceries who were the bearers of the culture of ethics and statecraft, dealt with the civic society and institutions of the kingdoms and provided a picture of the social hierarchy and stratification in terms of status by arranging different modes of address appropriate for different ranks within the civilian population. A rigid dichotomy of the military estate ('askarī) and the subjects (ri'āya) divided society into a dominant Turco-Mongolian estate on the one hand and the nonmilitary Persian or Tajik estate on the other, comprising both the urban strata and the peasantry.

See also endowment; household; monarchy

Further Reading

S. A. Arjomand, "Evolution of the Persianate Polity and its Transmission to India," Journal of Persianate Studies 2, no. 2 (2009); Idem, "The Law, Agency and Policy in Medieval Islamic Society: Development of the Institutions of Learning from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century," Comparative Studies in Society and History 41, no. 2 (1999); M.G.S. Hodgson, The Venture of Islam, vol. 2, 1972; Max Weber, Economy and Society, edited by G. Roth and C. Wittich, vol. 2, 1978.

SAĪD AMIR ARJOMAND

patronage

"Patronage" can be defined either as kindness done to others, usually from a position of superiority, or the power to provide jobs for political and social advantage of those involved. This entry is divided into two sections: the first deals with patronage in the arts and the second with patronage in politics. The former is usually associated with the preindustrial period and the latter generally with the contemporary political situation, though neither is exclusively the case.

In the Islamic world, especially in the Middle Ages, when Islam was a world power, the arts—in the broadest sense of the word—were patronized by the wealthy and particularly at the courts of various rulers of diverse Muslim societies. Poetry benefited the most from the patronage of the time: poets were paid handsome sums for exhibiting their literary works, which usually praised the benefactor or a feat connected with the benefactor in some fashion. The same also held for music and other art forms. Medieval sources are replete with stories of poets, musicians, or other artists being rewarded by the richer segments of society for their contributions. The manner in which patronage was practiced in the Islamic world differed from time to time and area to area, depending on the financial situation and the corresponding standard of living.

In the political arena, patronage belongs not only to the older but also to the contemporary Islamic world, the Middle East and North Africa in particular. Patronage is an important means used to buy loyalty to the state. As a result of the poor economic conditions in some of these countries, some even lagging behind sub-Saharan Africa, the state as an institution has gradually been retracting from the society it is meant to serve. Because the state cannot sustain all members of society, patronage is rampant. In concrete terms, contemporary leaders, especially in the Arab world, buy "loyalty" by extending financial favors and privileges to those who are affiliated with the state. In order to get anything done, a wasṭa is essential—literally a "connection" with someone who has by some means gained the favor of the ruler. In turn, this system of patronage binds the state's functionaries closely to the ruling elite. This balance of power provides stability, however fragile it might be. On the one hand, the numerous coups d'etat that took place in the 1950s and 1960s have ceased for the most part because of diminishing state control over the entire society; on the other hand, the maintenance of a patronage system closely concentrated on the ruler and the ruling elite has increased. Such a situation, which lacks civil society, transparency, and especially accountability, constitutes a serious obstacle for a process of democratization in the region.

See also loyalty; tribalism

Further Reading

Monique Bernards and John Nawas, eds., Patronate and Patronage in Early and Classical Islam, 2005; Ernst Gellner and John Waterbury, Patrons and Clients in Mediterranean Societies, 1977; Gavin R. G. Hambly, ed., Women in the Medieval Islamic World: Power, Patronage, and Piety, 1998; Allen Richards and John Waterbury, A Political Economy of the Middle East, 2007.

JOHN A. NAWAS

People of the Book

The Qur'anic phrase "People of the Book" (ahl al-kitāb) ordinarily connotes Jews and Christians but has also been used, particularly in later legal literature, to include a few other religious groups as well. The identifying quality is possession of a "book"—that is, recognition that the particular group has been the recipient of a previous divine revelation. The notion of "book" need not necessarily signify an actual physical entity or written product. Rather, its meaning can be more fluid, offering a sense of access to the knowledge that God gives to humans, whether recorded or not. Nevertheless, some Qur'anic uses of this phrase (Q. 4:153; 6:7; 17:93) clearly intend a scroll, codex, or similar material object. The related phrase, "source or mother of the book" (umm al-kitāb), which occurs three times in the Qur'an, carries a similar multivalence. Understandings of it also oscillate between the concept of a large celestial, primordial text and that of the totality of God's knowledge and will.

People of the Book is fundamentally a relational description. With this and similar phrases (e.g.,"those who were given the book," "those who recite the book before you"), the Qur'an self-consciously situates itself both chronologically and theologically within an extended sequence of divine revelations, all of which conveyed God's will and guidance. The Tawrat, Injil, and Zabur, to use the Qur'anic terms for the Hebrew Bible, the Christian New Testament, and the Psalms, respectively, convey earlier forms of this revelation, but it is an article of Muslim doctrine that the Qur'an constitutes the final and most comprehensive act of divine revelation. Discrepancies between the Qur'an and earlier scriptures are explained by the accusation of alteration (taḥrīf). Jews and Christians are charged with possession of corrupted versions of their original scriptures, although the long polemical debate on this issue expresses variant understandings of whether this corruption was deliberate or inadvertent and where, when, and by whose agency it happened. Complete disavowal of earlier scriptures was never the dominant position, however, because these texts were also valued for their predictive value. Medieval Muslim scholars compiled lists of biblical passages that were understood to announce Muhammad's advent and the subsequent military and political successes of his community. A similar ambivalence surrounds the People of the Book. Qur'an 10:94 urges consultation with them ("If you [Muhammad] are in doubt about what we have revealed to you, ask those who recite the book before you"), while other verses (e.g., Q. 3:64–65) accuse them of being in dispute or disagreement over the divine revelation.

As the revelation that abrogates all others, the Qur'an frequently criticizes the People of the Book and denounces numerous aspects of Jewish and Christian dogma. Both the hadith and subsequent theological and legal literature develop the Qur'anic discussion of aberrant doctrine, condemning beliefs such as those concerning the Incarnation and the Trinity that counter core concepts of Muhammad's message. Negative judgments about the religious attitudes and practices of the Jews and Christians may be found throughout the Qur'an, as well as prescriptive injunctions that mandate Muslim behavior toward the People of the Book.

Extra-Qur'anic literature expands on these scriptural mandates. The Constitution of Medina ('ahd al-umma) has been acknowledged as one of the earliest Islamic documents to address interreligious relations, and it is followed by centuries of religio-legal literature that deals with the status and treatment of the People of the Book. A key theme of this literature is the control and even coercion of non-Muslim individuals and communities. Forms include a subordinate political and social position as "protected" peoples (ahl al-dhimma); financial encumbrance through a targeted taxation (jizya); legal restrictions in matters of marriage, inheritance, and other aspects of family and civil law; and physical avoidance to avert ritual impurity. The extent to which these forms of control and coercion have affected the lives of non-Muslims within Muslim societies has varied considerably and can be adequately assessed only when analyzed with chronological and geographical specificity. Nevertheless, the desirability or possibility of their contemporary reinstatement remains an active topic within Islamist political groups.

See also Christian-Muslim relations; minorities

Further Reading

Yohanan Friedmann, Tolerance and Coercion in Islam: Interfaith Relations in the Muslim Tradition, 2003; Jane Dammen McAuliffe, "The Qur'ānic Context of Muslim Biblical Scholarship," Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 7, no. 2 (1996): 141–58; Uri Rubin, Between Bible and Qur'ān: The Children of Israel and the Islamic Self-Image, 1999; Jørgen B. Simonsen, Studies in the Genesis and Early Development of the Caliphal Taxation System, 1988.

JANE DAMMEN MCAULIFFE

philosopher-king

The Platonic concept of the philosopher-king, who combines philosophical knowledge with the capability to rule (Plato, Republic, V, 473c–e), reappears in Farabi's (d. 950) work on the "Perfect State." It became influential in later Islamic philosophical works, mostly through the mediation of Ibn Sina (d. 1037), who modified it and combined it with ideas taken from the originally Iranian-Sassanid Mirrors for Princes, which, since the translations of Ibn al-Muqaffa' (d. 757), developed practical rules regulating the behavior of rulers and ruled. Farabi concentrated on the intellectual qualities of the ruler, who, in his persuasion, should have the qualities of a prophet—a charismatic person whose intuition is inspired by the divine revelation, comparable to the revelations that the Prophet Muhammad received from God. Farabi, who apparently dreamed of a worldwide society with common faith and laws under the rule of a philosopher-prophet, did not mention in his Perfect State the Islamic prophet Muhammad and instead used the terms "prophet," "imam," and "first ruler" (al-ra'īs al-awwal), who must have particular ethical and intellectual qualities such as love of truth and justice, resoluteness and contempt of worldly things, the capacity to acquire knowledge, and the rhetorical ability to persuade others. He was convinced, in a much stricter manner than his Isma'ili forerunner Abu Hatim al-Razi (fl. early tenth century), of the universality of religion and belief in one God, the ultimate source of knowledge, which is promulgated by the ruler in the shape of laws, the guiding line of people in a hierarchically structured society. An alternative expression of these laws is "religion" (milla). Farabi expanded the Isma'ili combination of authority and prophecy, knowledge and divine inspiration, by introducing notions taken from Aristotelian epistemology and ethics. Actions of human beings are subject to the rules of laws imposed by the divinely inspired ruler-prophet. These actions, which are based on religious laws, are part of "religion" and mirror the divinely inspired knowledge of the ruler, a philosopher. Here, Farabi introduced his original idea of religion "imitating" philosophy and its universals. Religion becomes a picture of philosophy and, at the same time, religion is understood as an instrument used by philosophy. The practical prudence (sophrosyne) of Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics appears to Farabi as religious laws, as religion that "imitates" the universals of philosophy. This imitation (muḥākāt) of philosophical knowledge is interpreted by Farabi as a kind of representation of the intelligible things through pictures that are the only way to develop a conception of theoretical insights. In consonance with Aristotle's persuasion that humans can only think through pictures based on the perceivable things, Farabi considers religion as the only way, as an "instrument" of theoretical philosophy, which is shaped and realized through the performance of the rules of religious laws. Farabi starts with Aristotle's concept of practical prudence, his assumption of an interrelation between human thought and perception, and his doctrine of an interdependence between theory and practice. Religion is not only "opinion," but also, according to Farabi, the only way to philosophical knowledge, which is moral insight in the shape of religious laws. The performance of religious laws leads the individual to supreme happiness (al-sa'āda al-quṣwā) and regulates the life of society, the city-state that requires the leader, an imam, and in which the people require their fellow-citizens. The Aristotelian notion of man as a political creature is integrated into a soteriological concept of a leader, a person with charismatic qualities, who with his intellectual and rhetorical qualities can lead the masses and persuade them from the prescriptions of religion. Here, religion appears as a picture, an imitation of universal knowledge, which is divinely inspired and becomes existent through the performance of the religious laws.

Farabi's notions reappear in modified form in the encyclopedia of the "Brethren of Purity" (tenth century) and in the later works of Ibn Sina, Ibn Bajja (d. 1138), Ibn Tufayl (d. 1185), Ibn Rushd (d. 1198), and Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406). Farabi's utopian state, which is guided by the ruler-prophet, a philosopher with prophetic qualities, became a model for human behavior in society and for the individual's path to welfare in the other world. As for Farabi, this ideal state is a generally valid model for humankind that becomes reality and receives its shape through the performance of its rules, or religious laws, and stresses both the cooperation of fellow-citizens—Ibn Khaldun's 'aṣabiyya, or "solidarity"—and the necessary qualities of the leader, who must be a philosopher and must have access to divinely inspired knowledge.

See also city (philosophical); Mirrors for Princes; philosophy

Further Reading

Aziz Al-Azmeh, Muslim Kingship, 1997; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Hans Daiber, "Political Philosophy," in History of Islamic Philosophy, vol. 2, edited by Seyyed Hossein Nasr and Oliver Leaman, 1996; Paul L. Heck, "Doubts about the Religious Community (Milla) in al-Fārābī and the Brethren of Purity," in In the Age of al-Fārābī: Arabic Philosophy in the Fourth/Tenth Century, edited by Peter Adamson, 2008.

HANS DAIBER

philosophy

In Islam, philosophy (falsafa) is reasoning about the physical and metaphysical worlds based on the Greek philosophical tradition, especially the works of Plato and Aristotle, received through the harmonizing interpretation of the Neoplatonists of late antiquity. The works most relevant to political thought were Plato's Republic and Laws, available in summary translations, and Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, translated in full. Aristotle's Politics was not translated, though parts of it seem to have been known, perhaps from anthologies or quotations in other works.

The Greek philosophical tradition was still alive in the Near East at the time of the Arab conquests, but little is known of the forms it took, except insofar as it had come to form part of Christian theology. Zoroastrian priests and other religious leaders may have found use for it, but its main exponents in late antiquity were doctors, astronomers or astrologers, alchemists, and secretaries. It was such educated laymen, not religious scholars, who were its main bearers in Islam as well.

The systematic translation of Greek works into Arabic began in the mid-eighth century, but it was not until around 900 that philosophy achieved prominence as a discipline in its own right. Since it was pursued by laymen and claimed to be an avenue to the highest truth and salvation based entirely on human reason rather than divine revelation, it was set for a head-on collision with Islam as understood by the religious scholars. Some early philosophers, notably the physician and alchemist Abu Bakr al-Razi (d. 925), rejected all revealed religion as false and dismissed the prophets as impostors, claiming that philosophy was the road to salvation for everyone. But most philosophers chose to avoid the clash by unifying philosophy and revealed religion. According to Farabi (d. 950), prophets were philosophers of such extraordinary worth that they had achieved contact with the Active Intellect: this was the source of their divine revelations. As prophets, they reformulated the absolute truths of philosophy in a language that everyone could understand, using myths, images, and metaphors and adapting their message to the particular conditions of their audience; as philosophers, they presented the eternal, universal, and unchanging truth as it was.

Some disagreement over the details notwithstanding, this solution was adopted by all later philosophers, including Ibn Sina (Avicenna, d. 1037) and Ibn Rushd (Averroes, d. 1198). Though it was a major intellectual achievement, it was rarely persuasive to the religious scholars for the obvious reason that it made the Prophet a self-made man rather than a person chosen by God and reduced his divine revelation to a popular version of the absolute truth. It implied that the philosophers were the true heirs of the Prophet and leaders of the Muslim community, and that the theologians, jurists, and other religious scholars were to take their cue from the philosophers as mere popularizers of their syllogisms. Indeed, the ruler himself should be a philosopher in Farabi's view. Failing that, a number of philosophers might rule together; this was Farabi's understanding of aristocracy (literally "the rule of the best"). In his view, it would be disastrous if philosophy had no representatives at the highest level of government. Instead of striving for happiness, the community would pursue unworthy aims such as wealth, military power, or mistaken impressions of the truth, all of which he illustrated in accounts of imperfect constitutions, in the loose sense of "ways of life," some adapted from Plato and Aristotle, others worked out by himself.

To modern readers, Farabi's political thought comes across as strangely unreal and decontextualized. He never gives historical or contemporary examples; he rarely mentions any names other than those of philosophers; and he has nothing to say about concrete forms of political organization, distribution of power, conflict resolution, or politics as a process. His interest lies entirely in the diverse views of the ultimate good to be pursued in this life, and government to him really meant spiritual direction. The battle he was fighting was for souls, not for the throne. Since the ultimate good in life followed from the ultimate nature of reality, all his "political" books devote more space to metaphysics than to the city that should reflect it. This was in keeping with the common understanding at the time. Whether known from reason or from revelation, the metaphysical world dictated how one should live on Earth, and concrete politics were far less important than identifying the road to eternal salvation.

Farabi's ideal community was necessarily authoritarian. A philosopher-king of the highest kind (i.e., a prophet) endowed with unique wisdom and understanding of what was best for everyone obviously had to be obeyed without question. The same was true of lesser philosophers in the absence of a supreme philosopher-ruler. Like Plato, Farabi would have liked everyone to follow the dictates of a small intellectual elite credited with superior insight and seen as indispensable for common welfare. Neither Greek nor Islamic philosophy ever extolled the virtues of democracy. The belief that the Greek philosophers were supporters of democracy is a modern lay misconception, and to Muslim philosophers, democracy was a constitution in which everyone was free to pursue whatever aim in life he wanted, resulting in a highly diverse community. This struck them as self-evidently bad, since there was only one eternal truth and all those who ignored it would perish. Uniting people in the common pursuit of a single, overarching objective was the ideal to which philosophers and religious scholars alike subscribed. The shared objective took precedence in the vision of both.

The philosophers never achieved the primacy that Farabi hoped for. They never even succeeded in gaining regular representation in educational institutions, though logic did come to form part of the madrasa (institution of higher education) curriculum, especially in the eastern lands of Islam. In the absence of professorial chairs and schools, philosophers made a living as doctors, astronomers, and, to some extent, members of the bureaucracy. Despite all that, philosophy achieved great prominence in the 10th and 11th centuries, and it continued to exercise a major influence on Islamic thought thereafter, in part thanks to the fact that from the 11th century onward, Muslim theologians were often well read in it, whether they approved of it or not. Ghazali (d. 1111), often believed to be a mortal enemy of philosophy, explained that it was foolish to oppose it completely, since it included eminently useful sciences such as logic, mathematics, and the natural sciences. He presented philosophical writings on government and ethics in a somewhat unfavorable light, but it was only the metaphysics of the philosophers that he condemned, and only on a specific number of points. He was deeply influenced by Ibn Sina, probably beyond the limit he recommended in his pastoral works. By his time, it was above all in Spain, where Ibn Rushd was active, that there was interest in "political science," as the philosophers called their thoughts on communal life. Ibn Rushd, who wrote a commentary on Plato's Republic, which is extant only in Hebrew and which followed Farabi's own commentary, made an unprecedented attempt to relate philosophical constitutions to actual regimes. This played a role in the sociological theory of history developed by Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406), who was proudly aware of having developed a new science. However, his theory did not live on or receive further development, though it had its admirers in the Ottoman Empire. Farabi's political philosophy also left a deep imprint on Jewish thought, not least on that of Maimonides (d. 1204), who was born in Spain and who had a major impact on intellectual developments in Christian Europe.

Farabi's vision also had strong appeal to Shi'is, especially the Isma'ilis, because they shared his conviction that there was a man endowed with supreme wisdom not just in the past in the form of the Prophet but also in the present in the form of the imam. The Isma'ilis cast their imam (especially when he was absent) as the philosopher-king and saw themselves as sharing in his insights, identifying philosophy as esoteric knowledge inaccessible to the masses and themselves as the spiritual elite. Among those who saw themselves as such an elite were the anonymous authors of the tenth-century collection of epistles known as the Rasa'il Ikhwan al-Safa' (Epistles of the sincere or true brethren). The best-known Shi'i exposition of political philosophy is the Nasirean Ethics of the Imami (at some point Isma'ili) philosopher and scientist Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274), who offered advice on the management of the self, the household, and the kingdom and who had many imitators.

From the 12th century onward, philosophy increasingly merged not only with theology but also with Sufism, but its later history is largely unknown, for lack of study rather than for lack of evidence. It is probably safe to say, however, that political philosophy never had much influence on politics on the ground. It is not likely to influence politics today, either. It still has its admirers, usually for its rationalism rather than its authoritarianism, but now as then, it is political visions based on divine revelation that have mass appeal. "Political science" in the modern sense of the term is a Western import.

See also al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); Ibn Rushd (1126–98); Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (980–1037); al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought [American title God's Rule], 2004; Al-Farabi, Farabi on the Perfect State, translated by Richard Walzer, 1985; Ibn Khaldun, The Muqaddimah, translated by F. Rosenthal, 1967; Ralph Lerner and Muhsin Mahdi, Medieval Political Philosophy: A Sourcebook, 1963; Seyyed H. Nasr and Oliver Leaman, History of Islamic Philosophy, 1996; Ibn Rushd, Averroes' Commentary on Plato's 'Republic,' translated by R. Lerner, 1974.

PATRICIA CRONE

piety and asceticism

Piety, the quality of a person's religious devotion, is a prominent feature in both legitimating and critiquing authority in Islam. Asceticism, the cultivation of austerity and rigorous self-discipline, is one of the most manifest forms of the expression of piety.

The distinctive form of piety in Islam is first given shape in the Qur'an, where religious exhortations are numerous. Furthermore, the anecdotal and narrative material of the scripture provides archetypal exemplars for pietistic imitation. Later elaborations of these Qur'anic depictions emphasized the spiritual particularities of certain figures, especially the prophets. For instance, in Sufi writings both John the Baptist and Jesus are paragons of asceticism. The most influential imitative model, however, was invariably the Prophet Muhammad himself, whose sunna was the preeminent source for emulation. The hadith literature attests to his rigorous religiosity as well as his consistent austerity in both body and wealth. This mimetic material has occupied a significant cultural space in Muslim societies and continues to do so.

Markers of Islamic piety include the meticulous maintenance of ritual observances, adherence to modest norms, and the possession of spiritual charisma and wisdom. Asceticism, which is often connected to renunciation, can further entail demonstrating minimal concern for one's physical comfort or well-being, avoiding conventional means of earning a livelihood, abstaining from excesses, performing supererogatory prayers and fasts, adopting unconventional appearances, and physically or mentally withdrawing from society. These elements have figured prominently in the development of Islamic spiritual traditions, such as the Karrami and Sufi traditions. Stricter understandings of asceticism have also led to religious antinomianism and social deviance, as manifested by a group known as the Qalandars, who purposefully contravened normative conventions by adopting countercultural appearances and behavior. All of these modes of pietistic expression are pregnant with political potential and have been consciously and unconsciously displayed by public personas to curry favor with particular factions, demonstrate religious authenticity, or protest the perception of impiety.

Often, the memorialized lives of ascetics and mystics were cast as poignant social and political commentaries against the conditions of their respective eras. Such figures were frequently depicted as chastising rulers, avoiding political appointment, or withdrawing from the community altogether. Their acts of piety and asceticism are both correctives and critiques. Such characterizations, however, extend well beyond explicitly spiritual circles and are a hallmark of the 'ulama' (religious scholars) in general. Biographical records and chronicles are replete with references to a scholar's assiduous religiosity. Mentions of piety are often as important as mentions of position, accomplishment, and lineage in biographies. Pietistic descriptions serve to legitimate a person's social standing and scholastic projects, particularly important given the historically persistent sense of contestation and competition between various figures and schools of thought. In the modern era, a number of Islamist parties have wedded their political and social agendas to a pietistic, if not ascetic, way of life based on particular readings of the Qur'an and sunna.

The politicization of piety is also evident in the sphere of sovereignty. The legitimacy of a ruler was often buttressed with descriptions of his religious scrupulousness. Both the Rightly Guided Caliphs of the Sunni tradition and the Shi'i imams attest to this biographical convention. A sovereign could also consciously cultivate a persona of piety through public acts of worship. The ceremonial patronage of the hajj pilgrimage caravans and the attendance of congregational prayers were the two most prominent historical acts of this sort. A modern example is Egyptian president Anwar Sadat (d. 1981), who acquired a reputation of piety and was subsequently dubbed "the believing president" (al-ra'īs al-mu'min) by the Egyptian media in the early years of his presidency. In other cases, a pietistic portrait could accentuate a leader's exceptionalism, as in the case of the Umayyad caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (ca. 680–720). In that same historical vein, attributions of impiety have also been applied to mar the reputations of unfavorable past rulers, as seen in Abbasid portrayals of their caliphal predecessors, the Umayyads.

See also Muhammad (570–632); Sufism; sunna; 'ulama'; 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (ca. 680–720)

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Fred M. Donner, "Early Islamic Piety," in Narratives of Islamic Origins, 1998; Ahmet T. Karamustafa, God's Unruly Friends, 1994; Christopher Melchert, "The Transformation from Asceticism to Mysticism at the Middle of the Ninth Century C.E.," Studia Islamica 83, no. 1 (1996); John Renard, Friends of God, 2008.

MARTIN NGUYEN

pilgrimage

Pilgrimage in Islam takes three principal forms. The annual hajj and the year-round 'umra involve travel to Mecca and its precincts, and ziyāra involves travel to the tombs of revered religious figures, notably Muhammad's grave in Medina. Jerusalem, as one of the three sacred precincts together with Mecca and Medina, also historically has been a pilgrimage destination.

Hajj and 'Umra

The Qur'an enjoins all able believers to perform the hajj to Mecca, its sanctuary, and environs but does not detail the associated rituals. For these, Muslims rely on Muhammad's one hajj in 631 into which he incorporated many pre-Islamic practices, such as the circumambulation of the Ka'ba, the cubical stone structure that housed personal and tribal idols. The documents of treaties between tribes and succession documents such as that of the caliph Harun al-Rashid were also often stored in the Ka'ba. In 630, when Muhammad retook Mecca, his first act was to destroy the idols in the Ka'ba. Muslims hold that the Ka'ba (also called bayt Allāh, or "the House of God" or "Temple of God") was built by the first man and prophet, Adam, and then periodically rebuilt, most significantly by Abraham: this undergirds political rhetoric and interfaith discussion about Islam as an Abrahamic religion. Non-Muslims are, however, barred altogether from Mecca and Medina. Some Muslims, such as Osama bin Laden and al-Qaeda, have called for the removal of non-Muslims from the entire Arabian Peninsula, including foreign troops posted in Saudi Arabia and Yemen.

In the sixth century, Mecca prospered because of trade through the city and pilgrimage to its sanctuary, control of which was in the hands of Muhammad's tribe, the Quraysh. Such control conferred prestige, legitimacy, and jurisdiction; the Shi'i Fatimids, though based in Cairo, for instance, extended control over Mecca and Medina during their ascendancy. Modern Saudi monarchs, following Ottoman practice, have adopted the title "custodian of the two holy sanctuaries [Mecca and Medina]" (khādim al-ḥaramayn al-sharīfayn). Guardianship came to include the obligation to appoint caravan leaders and guarantee safe passage for pilgrims. Other Muslim potentates have sought legitimacy through ceremonial acts such as sending ornamental keys for the Ka'ba door, official palanquins (mahmal), or a brocaded drape for the Ka'ba (kiswa).

The hajj rituals—which include "halting" (wuqūf) at the plains of 'Arafat and Muzdalifa, the symbolic stoning of Satan and ritual animal sacrifice at Mina, and the circumambulation of the Ka'ba (tawāf) at Mecca, as well as a ritualized brisk walk (sa'y) between the mounts of Safa and Marwa—are performed by Muslims, male and female, from the world over, making it the only significant show of Muslim world unity. This is underscored by the fact that men of all ranks dress the same, in two pieces of unsewn cloth, and women dress in simple cotton garments called ihrām. During the 'umra, the pilgrim is in a sacralized state (also known as ihrām), during which sexual intercourse, the cutting or shaving of hair, and the use of scented products are forbidden, but the 'umra is short, lasting a few hours, whereas the hajj lasts from three to five days. 'Umra rituals are confined to circumambulation, the brisk walk, and the cutting or shaving of hair to exit the sacralized state.

Sectarian and denominational differences are set aside during the hajj, and all pilgrims travel and worship together; in the past, many pilgrims stayed in Mecca and Medina for several months or years. The hajj consequently has long provided scholars of differing views the opportunity to meet and exchange ideas. Between the 10th and 12th centuries, for instance, North African pilgrims carried the Isma'ili ideas they encountered westward. In the 11th and 12th centuries, the Almoravid and Almohad movements are said to have been planned in Mecca. In the 17th century, returning pilgrims repatriated the books of the Southeast Asian Shaykh Yusuf al-Maqassari (d. 1699), who had been banished from Indonesia to Sri Lanka and then to the Cape by Dutch colonial authorities. In the 18th century, Indian pilgrims brought the ideas of Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab to the subcontinent, and in the 20th century, Malcolm X returned to the United States with a new understanding of egalitarian Islam and consequently broke away from Elijah Muhammad's separatist Nation of Islam.

Although never a political capital, Mecca has, nevertheless, at times been the site of political struggle. In Islam's first century, for instance, when 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr disputed the caliphate, he sought sanctuary in Mecca and preached there against the ruling Umayyad caliph, 'Abd al-Malik; he also may have tried to control access to Mecca. According to one account, this prompted the caliph to build the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem and to encourage pilgrimage to Jerusalem rather than to Mecca. Pilgrimage reverted to Mecca when Ibn al-Zubayr was killed in 692, but Jerusalem remains an important destination for the pious.

More recently, in 1979, 'Abdallah al-Qahtani proclaimed himself an awaited savior (mahdī) and with roughly 500 armed followers captured the Grand Mosque; hundreds, including hostages, died before the militants were subdued. In 1987, Iranian protesters (and bystanders) were killed by security forces after staging a demonstration.

Since ritual prayers are performed facing Mecca, every single Muslim, pilgrim or not, gains a sense of unity, community, and common purpose. Only 2 to 3 million out of some 1.5 billion Muslims perform the hajj each year, many of them repeat pilgrims. Thus most Muslims' actual experience of the hajj is only through national discourses. Sponsorship, regulation, and subsidy by governments politicizes those discourses and, in turn, the hajj itself. The fact that Saudi Arabia has been in charge of the hajj for the past century has meant that it, in particular, has wielded considerable political leverage. In the late 1960s, for instance, King Faisal successfully lobbied Muslim leaders about the need for a coalition of Muslim states (the Organization of the Islamic Conference [OIC]). It is through the OIC that international hajj quotas have been implemented. It was at the 2006 OIC meeting in Mecca that some Muslim leaders, outraged at cartoons of Muhammad published in a Danish newspaper, recalled their ambassadors to Denmark and called for a boycott of Danish products.

For some 20th-century intellectuals, the hajj is more a vehicle of resurgence and sociomoral reconstruction. For 'Ali Shari'ati, it is a prototype and metaphor for the individual, nonclerical production of religious knowledge. Muhammad Iqbal saw the hajj as a way to unite Muslims in order to destroy the indigenous idols of dogmatism and superstition and the Western idols of nationalism and consumerism.

Ziyāra

The veneration of deceased religious figures is widespread in the Islamic world, notably among Muslims who embrace Sufi practices. Pilgrims travel to seek blessings (baraka) from saintly figures' tombs and shrines, the custodians of which frequently wield power over pilgrims by controlling access.

Throughout Islamic history, however, many scholars have disputed the permissibility of such visits, holding that they are not part of prophetic practice (sunna) and thus constitute heresy and innovation (bid'a). Ibn Taymiyya, for instance, makes it clear that a visit to Muhammad's grave in Medina must be incidental to an 'umra or hajj, and several important reform movements have made opposition to ziyāra a major platform.

In Shi'ism, ziyāra is made to the graves of the imams and their significant relatives and companions. The most important of these is at Karbala in Iraq, where Husayn, Muhammad's grandson through his daughter Fatima and his cousin 'Ali, was killed by the forces of Yazid I. With the removal of the Sunni Iraqi leadership in 2003, restrictions on visits to Karbala were lifted, and it received a million pilgrims in 2004.

See also Pillars of Islam

Further Reading

Azyumardi Azra, "Networks of 'Ulamā' in the Seventeenth-Century Haramayn," in The Origins of Islamic Reformism in Southeast Asia, 2004; Robert R. Bianchi, Guests of God: Pilgrimage and Politics in the Islamic World, 2004; Amikam Elad, Medieval Jerusalem and Islamic Worship: Holy Places, Ceremonies, Pilgrimage, 1995; 'Ali al-Harawi, A Lonely Wayfarer's Guide to Pilgrimage: 'Ali ibn Abī

Bakr al-Harawī's Kitāb al-Ishārāt ilā ma'rifat al-ziyārāt, translated and with an introduction by Josef W. Meri, 2004; Muhammad Iqbal, Secrets of Collective Life, translated by A. R. Tariq, 1977; F. E. Peters, The Hajj: The Muslim Pilgrimage to Mecca and the Holy Places, 1994; 'Ali Shari'ati, Hajj, 1977; Christopher S. Taylor, In the Vicinity of the Righteous: Ziyāra and the Veneration of Muslim Saints in Late Medieval Egypt, 1999.

SHAWKAT M. TOORAWA

Pillars of Islam

In a well-known tradition, Muhammad explains that Islam is "built on five [things]." Sunni Muslims have come to represent these five principles as "pillars" (arkān), evoking a physical structure. Preachers throughout the Muslim world frequently remind listeners that just as pillars alone do not make a building, so too must Muslims adopt other acts and practices to complete the edifice of their belief.

The Sunni Pillars

The five Sunni pillars (arkān al-islām or arkān al-'ibāda) are (1) testifying or witnessing that there is only God and that Muhammad is God's messenger (shahāda), (2) establishing the ritual prayer (iqāmat al-ṣalāt), (3) giving alms (ītā' al-zakāt), (4) fasting in the month of Ramadan (ṣawm Ramaḍān), and (5) making the pilgrimage to the Ka'ba in Mecca (ḥajj al-bayt) if one is able. For Maliki Sunnis, jihad, or struggle in the cause of Islam, is the fifth pillar, the shahāda being the foundation on which the other five pillars rest.

The shahāda—Islam's fundamental doctrinal statement—must be uttered at least once in one's lifetime. Those born Muslim do this from early childhood. For converts, this testimony marks an entrance into and membership in the Muslim community and polity, resulting in the immediate obligation to practice the remaining four pillars (in the case of recognized monotheists [the People of the Book], the almsgiving tax [zakat] replaces the poll tax [jizya] assessed by the state).

"Salat" refers to the five daily ritual prayers prescribed by God. These prayers (and times) are known as fajr (predawn), ẓuhr (postzenith), 'aṣr (midafternoon), maghrib (postsunset), and 'isha' (nighttime). The specifics of the ritual prayer are derived entirely from prophetic practice. Most Shi'i denominations combine ẓuhr and 'aṣr prayers and maghrib and 'isha' prayers, leading many Sunnis mistakenly to believe that Shi'is ignore a basic pillar. Though not one of the five prayers, the Friday congregational prayer replaces the zenith prayer and is also an obligation—one that brings Muslims together in congregational mosques. This ritual prayer is preceded by a sermon (khuṭba) and therefore has often been used by political authorities as a platform for the promulgation of state ideology or political doctrines. In the 21st century, many Muslim governments control or provide the text of Friday sermons.

Zakat, repeatedly enjoined in the Qur'an, where it is often paired with the performance of ritual prayer, is a form of charity that embodies the believer's commitment to the well-being of the larger community. It is assessed as a 2.5 percent almsgiving tax on accrued wealth, goods, and stock (excluding certain items, such as jewelry). As its literal meaning—purification—suggests, this (re) distribution of wealth is not only an important communal, fiscal, and sociopolitical act but also one that "purifies" wealth and the wealthy. If one does not have the means to pay zakat, then one is entitled to receive it. Organized collection of zakat began under Muhammad himself. When tribes that had pledged allegiance to Muhammad refused to contribute zakat to his successor Abu Bakr, the latter regarded them as apostates; Shi'is too deem that zakat should be turned over to the appropriate authorities. In time, jurists, who elaborated the provisions regarding zakat in great detail, would formalize the handing over of zakat to the state treasury (bayt al-māl). This practice has continued into modern times: in some Muslim countries, ministries or departments are in charge of collection and distribution; in others, nongovernment organizations do so. Recipients include not only the needy but also sometimes poorer countries.

Obligatory fasting (ṣawm) takes place the entire month of Ramadan, the ninth month in the Islamic lunar calendar. There are very few sectarian differences concerning the proper fast—which lasts from daybreak until sunset—but there is considerable disagreement about the method(s) to be used to determine the beginning and end of Ramadan (or any month). The issue centers on the new moon and whether it is to be sighted with the naked eye or through predictive astronomical data. Related are questions about the jurisdiction of a given pronouncement: does a sighting in Mecca bind someone in Medina, and if so, is this predicated on the fact that they are both part of the same political entity? Several countries and communities follow Saudi Arabia's start- and end-dates for Ramadan. Critics view this solidarity as politically or ideologically motivated and at odds with established jurisprudence. There have been numerous international conferences on the moon issue, which has been divisive internationally and, in some areas, such as India and the United States, nationally.

The hajj is the pilgrimage to Mecca and its precincts, required of all Muslims who are physically and financially able to make the trip only once in a lifetime. It takes place between the 8th and 12th days of the 12th Islamic month, Dhu al-Hijjah, or "pilgrimage month," which together with the months preceding and following were regarded as a time of "sacred truce," during which none were permitted to bear arms in the sacred precincts (ḥaram). Muslim pilgrims in fact perform the rituals in a sacralized state (iḥrām), which include the wearing of the iḥrām, the name given to the two pieces of unsewn cloth worn by men and the simple cotton garments worn by women.

The Shi'i Pillars

Twelver Shi'is have ten pillars (furū' al-dīn), which they call "branches" or "practices" (furū'). The six additional ones are a 20 percent tithe on profits, payable to the religious authorities (khums); struggle in the cause of Islam (jihad); commanding right (al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf); forbidding wrong (al-nahy 'an al-munkar); loving the ahl al-bayt (tawallī)—namely, the Prophet and his family (Fatima, 'Ali, Hasan, Husayn); and antipathy for the enemies of the Prophet and his family (tabarru'). As is clear from this additional list, all have direct social and political implications, and none but the last is especially Shi'i in character, as Sunnis too embrace the other practices as duties. To the five Sunni/Twelver Shi'i pillars (ritual prayer, almsgiving, fasting, pilgrimage, struggle), the Isma'ili Shi'is add two—walāya, or the devotion to God, the prophets, and the imams, and ṭahāra, or spiritual and physical purity—again not especially denominational, except for the inclusion of love of the imams in walāya.

See also Friday prayer; pilgrimage

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2001; Frederick M. Denny, An Introduction to Islam, 2010; Moojan Momen, An Introduction to Shi'i Islam: The History and Doctrines of Twelver Shi'ism, 1987; Andew Rippin, Muslims: Their Religious Beliefs and Practices, 2011; Abu al-Hasan Sadeq, A Survey of the Institution of Zakah: Issues, Theories and Administration, 1994.

SHAWKAT M. TOORAWA

pluralism and tolerance

Pluralism and tolerance are considered constitutive elements of good governance, especially liberal democracy as it developed in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. For this reason they are widely debated among modern Muslims, including Islamists of various persuasions. For the same reason, this entry will focus largely on modern debates. Pluralism and tolerance are clearly related and both cover a broad semantic field. They concern relations within the Muslim community, as well as between Muslims and non-Muslims, and are closely tied to understandings of freedom, liberty, and citizenship. However, there is a difference of emphasis between the two: Pluralism is discussed mostly with regard to the Muslim community, or umma, especially concerning the plurality of political views and interests and their institutionalization within civil society and a multiparty system. Discussions of tolerance, on the other hand, tend to focus on relations between Muslims and non-Muslims—more specifically Christians and Jews as the prime representatives of the People of the Book (ahl al-kitāb)—within a Muslim polity, or within an Islamic state.

On Method

The issue of (religious) authority has been of great relevance to Muslims from an early date, and it has always been controversial. As a result of mass education and new forms of mass communication spreading from the late 19th century onward, individuals, groups, and institutions who previously would not have been considered qualified to speak on Islam have asserted their right to do so. As a result, an unprecedented variety of speakers have made statements of uncertain status on Islam in general and pluralism and tolerance in particular. The 'ulama' (religious scholars) have by no means disappeared from the stage. But next to them, and often in competition with them, other voices employ different modes of expression, some of them decidedly modern. These include Islamic activists and intellectuals who share what has become known as the "Islamic discourse" (al-khiṭāb al-islāmī).

Islamists (islāmiyyūn, uṣūliyyūn) are defined here as a discursive community sharing a number of claims and assumptions: that Islam provides a comprehensive set of norms and values ordering human life in all its manifestations; that this set of norms and values derives solely from the Qur'an and the Prophetic traditions (sunna) and that it is enshrined in the shari'a; and that to follow other sources of normative guidance, such as modern political ideologies, amounts to shirk, or "associating" other powers with God. From this they conclude that for Islam to be fully realized within a given community or territory, the shari'a must be "applied" exclusively and in its entirety, and that the application of the shari'a makes Islam into a unique, self-contained, and all-embracing "order" or "system" (niẓām) competing with other ideological systems. Islamists pursue various strategies to realize their goals, nonviolent as well as violent, in contrast to the majority of Muslims, who reject violence except in cases of legitimate self-defense. Distinctions among Islamists, Muslim scholars advocating an "Islamic solution," and other Muslims speaking on Islam are less clear when it comes to the precise shape of the "Islamic order" in general and definitions of pluralism and tolerance in particular.

Many of the positions reviewed here are not strikingly original. However, they illustrate a specifically modern legal-cum-political reasoning that aims to be true to the Islamic heritage (al-turāth) and at the same time fully attuned to present realities. Global power relations clearly affect the style of writing and the thrust of the argument, giving it a defensive ring. Even authors expressing themselves strictly in Islamic terms, condemning the adoption of un-Islamic concepts, do so against the backdrop of a challenge posed by the West and modernity as defined by the West. This includes understandings of pluralism and tolerance as core elements of modernity and good governance. At the beginning of the 21st century, debate has become overshadowed by the threat of militant Islamism and the fear of terrorism, calling forth attempts to define "true Islam," which is not what its enemies claim it to be. Opposition to Islamist violence also informs reflections on the status of pluralism and tolerance among Muslims and between Muslims and non-Muslims.

Faced with Western demands on the one hand and Islamist militancy on the other, Muslim scholar-activists have attempted to define a "middle ground," al-wasaṭiyya, a concept that came to the fore in the 1990s and is widely identified with the Egyptian-born scholar-activist Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926). The basis for this idea is Qur'an 2:143: "Thus, We have appointed you as a median nation (wa-kadhālika ja'alnākum ummatan wasaṭan), to be witnesses for mankind, and the Prophet to be a witness for you." Advocates of al-wasaṭiyya search for broader principles reflecting the essence of shari'a and at the same time responding to changing realities, enabling Muslims to find the "right place" between the extremes of Western demands for modernization in its own image and faith-based rejection of any kind of adjustment. Advocates of al-wasaṭiyya can build on solid support for the juste-milieu in classical Islamic scholarship and adapt key terms found in the turāth (the classical heritage), such as balance, moderation, and a pragmatic realism (tawāzun, i'tidāl, iḥsān). Men as different as Qaradawi and the Sudanese scholar-activist Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932) propagate a "new fiqh," or jurisprudence, that takes into account conditions in the real world (al-wāqi'iyya and al-maydāniyya), focusing on the need to balance different interests and aspirations (fiqh al-muwāzanāt) and to establish a list of priorities (fiqh al-awlawiyyāt) that privileges the essence of Islam and the shari'a over what they see as trivialities. At the same time, like prominent authors of the Salafi reform movement of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, they emphasize the "ease of Islam" (yusr al-islām) that aims to make life easy for Muslims as well as non-Muslims and not to impose hardship on them (yusr lā 'usr)—a view neatly opposed to the rigor exercised by certain traditionalist scholars and radical Islamists.

In the debate on pluralism and tolerance, proponents of different positions, "radical" as well as "moderate," basically adopt the same reasoning: selective reference to the Qur'an and sunna, supplemented by even more selective use of Islamic history on the one hand and the Islamic scholarly tradition on the other and expressed in the language of Islamic jurisprudence. In contemporary Islamic discourse, the theological dimension is generally weak, whereas political considerations loom large. Shifts of register from theology to history or from theology to law are frequent and are often made with little regard for either text or context. They are especially marked in the debate on the legitimacy of a multiparty system and concepts of citizenship that reinterpret traditional notions of religious tolerance (or toleration) to extend equal civic and political rights to all residents of the "Islamic homeland," irrespective of religious affiliation. This requires considerable investment in reinterpreting the sources as well as the scholarly tradition.

Muslims confront the basic challenge to all believers in a personal God who has revealed himself in scripture: the fact that according to their own normative tradition, revelation is precisely located in time and place and yet universally valid for all times and places, unbounded by the confines of origin. For virtually all Muslim authors engaged in the debate on pluralism and tolerance, revelation (waḥy) is enshrined in the Qur'an and the Prophet's example, or al-kitāb wa-l-sunna. They pursue a textual approach to certain knowledge—but textual does not necessarily mean literal.

Most Muslim authors regard the sunna as part of revelation and look to the Prophet as well as members of the early Muslim community, the salaf ṣāliḥ, as role models for Muslims. In spite of much critical scholarship on the sunna, especially among Western authors, the life of the Prophet and the Prophetic traditions continue to be among the most popular sources of inspiration to Muslims. The sunna documents (or purports to document) the social norms and practices of Arab tribal society in seventh-century northwestern Arabia—practices that were informed by the Qur'anic message but that cannot easily be transferred across time and space to be implemented in highly diverse sociocultural settings. Tribal factions in seventh-century Arabia are not the same as modern political parties, the treatment of Jews in the oasis of Khaybar cannot be taken as a timeless model of tolerance, and the so-called Constitution of Medina is no blueprint for organizing the state of law in the modern period. Many Muslims are aware of these facts. Yet only a minority hold that the exemplary practice of the Prophet is not just embedded in a particular "space" but also tied to it and thus not timelessly valid and binding. The issue is relevant to all conceptualizations of the Islamic state or order, including understandings of pluralism and tolerance.

Even more sensitive is the status of the Qur'an as the primary source of normative guidance for Muslims of all times and places. With regard to Qur'anic exegesis (tafsīr), modern authors can build on the classical tradition, but openly or tacitly many also go beyond it. Classical exegetes did recognize that the Qur'anic text is occasionally ambiguous and too complex to be ever fully exhausted by human minds; the Qur'an itself says so in more than one place. Certain features of the Qur'anic narrative and the hermeneutical strategies of Qur'anic exegesis, such as the use of metaphor, figurative speech, self-referentiality, and allegorical interpretation, are relevant to present discussions. However, these discussions are largely limited to academic circles. In a broader context, which tends to be more openly political, other methods of Qur'anic exegesis stand out more prominently, one based on contextualization and the other on abstraction. Both seek to define a hierarchy of commands and rules, one by placing them on a chronological scale, the other by assessing their validity within the overall context of revelation.

Contextualization includes, first, the exegetical subdiscipline of the "circumstances of revelation" (asbāb al-nuzūl), which aims to establish the context, or "seat in life," of all textual references, and second, abrogation (naskh, al-nāsikh wa-l-mansūkh), which seeks to ascertain their chronological sequence, with later revelations superseding earlier ones. Contextualization is a recognized element of both Qur'anic exegesis, tafsīr, and legal reasoning, fiqh, and indeed is indispensable to these disciplines. In contrast to most classical scholars, however, modern authors like the Egyptian lawyer Muhammad Sa'id al-'Ashmawi (b. 1932), an outspoken critic of the "application" of the shari'a, use contextualization as a tool not only to correctly locate specific rulings but also to restrict their binding force to this context. In doing so, they attempt to expand the scope of rational inquiry without abandoning the textual framework of the Qur'an (and sunna). There are obvious problems with this approach. One concerns history or rather historiography: the Qur'an does not represent a linear narrative and therefore does not establish an undisputed chronological sequence of divine commands and rulings. At best, this may be done with the aid of other materials, including the sunna and the Life of the Prophet (sīra), both of which, however, were not written down at the same time as the Qur'an. Very few Muslim scholars have ventured to deconstruct the historiography concerning the age of the Prophet and the early community. Seen from the perspective of modern historical source criticism, contextualization rests on shaky ground. Seen from the perspective of tradition-bound scholars, it threatens to undermine the foundations of Muslim belief.

Abstraction offers ample opportunities to rethink the Qur'anic message, especially when combined with contextualization, and it is widely employed in present debates on pluralism and tolerance. Here, too, modern authors can build on the Islamic scholarly tradition. A majority hold that the shari'a is divine law in the sense that it was laid down by God (or his messenger, Muhammad, which is generally less clearly stated), with respect to its fundamentals and certain specific rulings. The challenge is to identify these fundamentals, or universal principles, in order to do justice to the "spirit" of Islam and the shari'a rather than merely following its letter. These fundamentals or universal principles have been largely identified with the "objectives" of the shari'a (maqāṣid al-shari'a), or its "finality." They have also been linked to the concepts of the common good or public interest (in modern terminology, maṣlaha 'amma) and of certain underlying goods or benefits (maṣālih) to be protected by the shari'a: religion (i.e., Islam), life, offspring, property, and intellect; often honor has been included in the list as well. In ways that are not always clear, the distinction between fundamentals and nonfundamentals has also been related to the distinction between general and specific rules ('āmm and khāṣṣ). While the fundamentals or universal principles constitute the unchanging essence of Islam and the shari'a, their realization is contingent on time, place, and circumstance. As a result, the shari'a is considered fixed and unchangeable in its essence but flexible in its detailed rules and regulations.

The distinction between the fixed and the flexible (al-thābit wa-l-mutaghayyir), between the basics and secondary matters, and between universals and specifics is crucial to modern conceptions of an Islamic order and more particularly to discussions of tolerance, equality, and citizenship. According to some, universal principles carry greater weight than specific injunctions of the Qur'an and sunna, and in case of conflict, can even supersede or suspend explicit textual injunctions (naṣṣ) if this serves the common good. Reference to siyāsa shar'iyya, or governance in accordance with the shari'a, and to respected theoreticians of maṣlaha, from Ghazali (d. 1111) to Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi (d. 1388), cannot obscure the fact that modern interpretations are set in a context quite different from the one inhabited by Ghazali or Shatibi. The rationalist, if not openly utilitarian, logic employed by writers such as 'Ashmawi to root modern understandings of liberty, pluralism, and tolerance in the normative tradition renders them vulnerable to critique from Islamists and Islamic scholars alike, who defend what they see as unchanging "divine law" against human whims and interests, especially because those whims and interests seem to be inspired by foreign models.

The Unity of the Community

The crucial importance of unity (waḥda) to Islamic thought past and present is undisputed. There are numerous references to unity in the Qur'an, and they are liberally quoted by modern authors. At the core is Qur'an 3:103–5:

> O believers, fear God as He should be truly feared, and die not except as Muslims. And hold fast, all of you, to the rope of God and do not fall into dissension (lā tafarraqū). Remember God's bounties upon you, when you were enemies to one another, and how He brought harmony to your hearts so that, by His blessing, you became brothers . . . Let there be among you a group who call to virtue, who command the good and forbid vice. These shall indeed prosper. Do not be like those who scattered (tafarraqū) and fell into dissension (ikhtalafū) after manifest signs had come to them. These shall meet with terrible torment.

Qur'an 23:52 states simply, "This, your nation, is a single nation and I am your Lord. So fear Me." Qur'an 30:31–32 warns people not to be "among those who associate other gods with Him, those who have sundered their religion and turned into sects, each sect happy with what they have." Some modern authors refer to the doctrine of tawḥīd, denoting the unity of God, in order to explain the overriding need for the unity of the community, or al-jamā'a. Critics have spoken of "political tawḥīd." In legal theory (uṣūl al-fiqh) the emphasis on unity corresponds to the principle of ijmā', the consensus of the Muslim community as expressed by its religious scholars or the first generations of Muslims. (For Twelver Shi'is, or Imamis, consensus has to be endorsed by the imams.) Many modern authors leap from religious doctrine and legal principle to historical practice: virtually all believe that at the beginning there was unity—a community firmly united around the Prophet as its sole spiritual and political leader—and that only later did unity yield to differentiation, giving rise to theological, legal, and political schools (madhāhib), sects (milal), or parties (aḥzāb).

The unitary vision can entail the rejection of all divergence of opinion, critique, or opposition to the dominant doctrines and practices as a menace to and sin against not just the given sociopolitical system but the divinely ordained order at large. Many writers do indeed view differentiation as fragmentation, entailing a weakening of the community of Muslims, as exemplified by the first and second civil wars, or fitnas, of the first century after the hijra (the migration of the Prophet and his Companions from Mecca to Medina). If broad moral-cum-religious categories such as true and false (ḥaqq and bāṭil), right and wrong (ma'rūf and munkar), or permissible and forbidden (ḥalāl and ḥarām) are employed to evaluate political opinions and decisions; if there is only one truth and only one correct "position of Islam" on any given issue; and if this truth can be clearly identified by the community of Muslims or a given group of Muslims, then critique and diversity cannot be admitted as legitimate, nor can it be institutionalized. Legitimate plurality remains confined to what the powers-that-be define as consistent with the public order. Many would not rule out plurality and diversity altogether but still perceive them as destructive and divisive. There is a widely shared feeling that Muslims should overcome internal divisions and restore the pristine unity of the age of the Prophet. Attempts to bring about a rapprochement between Sunni and Shi'i Muslims (taqrīb) and to create a unified fiqh beyond the established schools of law and theology testify to this quest for unity.

The Logic of the Nation-State

Idealization of the early umma as an undivided community has been reinforced by the colonial experience and the opposition to Zionism, Israel, and the West as the perceived enemies of Islam. It has been further enhanced by the imprint of the modern nation-state. Modern authors are heirs to a legacy of conceptionalizing the community, homeland, and nation that was created by Salafi authors and activists, from Afghani (1838–97) to Hasan al-Banna (1906–49), largely in opposition to colonial domination. Even in the present era of globalization and mass migration, or perhaps precisely because of these phenomena, many (and not only Muslims) continue to think of Islam and the Muslim community in territorial terms, evoking the boundary between the "territory of Islam" (dār al-islām), in which the shari'a is enforced by the prince or state, and the "territory of war" (dār al-ḥarb), in which this is not the case, either because the rulers are not Muslim or because they, though nominally Muslim, fail to apply the shari'a. Even those who, in recognition of present realities, acknowledge a third category, the "territory of truce" (dār al-ṣulḥ) or the "territory of treaty" (dār al-'ahd), in which the state of war between Islamic and non-Islamic territories has been suspended, adhere to a territorial logic.

Building on the binary notions of dār al-islām versus dār al-ḥarb, Salafi authors have proposed a territorial concept of Islam as the homeland (waṭan) of all Muslims as well as of the non-Muslims living in their midst. Thus in 1934, Banna, the founder of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, wrote in a newspaper editorial that "every piece of land where the banner of Islam has been hoisted is the fatherland of the Muslims" (Krämer, 2010, p. 105). From earlier authors, he borrowed the neologism al-jinsiyya al-islāmiyya ("Islamic nationality") to describe the bond uniting all residents of the Islamic homeland. By the same token, earlier Salafi reformers had declared patriotism to be "part of faith" (ḥubb al-waṭan min al-īmān). Because of the close link between the Arabs and Islam in the formative period, relations between Arabism and Islam retained a special character throughout the 20th century. As a result, the vocabulary employed—especially in the context of tolerance and citizenship, with its characteristic combination of terms taken from the Islamic tradition (umma, jamā'a) on the one hand and modern political vocabulary (waṭan, jinsiyya) on the other—suggests a certain level of conceptual confusion.

From Plurality to Pluralism

In spite of the high value attached to unity (of both the Muslim umma and the modern nation-state), most contemporary Muslim thinkers acknowledge plurality and diversity as facts of life willed by God and sanctioned by the Qur'an..The recognition of plurality and diversity, however, does not necessarily entail a recognition of pluralism, which makes diversity into a founding principle of social and political organization and allows for its institutionalization through voluntary associations ("civil society"), political parties, and bodies of parliamentary representation. The important distinction between plurality and pluralism is not always made, though the key terms—difference or divergence of opinion (ikhtilāf), plurality (tanawwu'), and pluralism (ta'addudiyya)—permit such a differentiation. On the theoretical as well as the practical level, there exist a range of positions, even among Islamists, that can be roughly divided into two opposing camps: one deeply suspicious of, or indeed opposed to, plurality and pluralism as menacing to Muslim integrity, power, and unity, and the other supporting plurality and pluralism as contributing to Muslim strength and creativity, rendering Islam, as the well-known formula has it, valid for all times and places. Even among the latter, finer distinctions emerge as soon as the legitimacy of a plurality of interests rather than mere opinions is addressed.

Opposition to plurality and pluralism is characteristic of militant Islamic groups and their spokespersons, while support of plurality and pluralism is common among Muslim thinkers and activists advocating a moderate, pragmatic course. The most widely shared view would seem to be that plurality and diversity are legitimate as long as they involve nonantagonistic groups operating "within the framework of Islam." Put simply, Muslim society and the Islamic state are conceived of as plural but not pluralistic. Differing opinions and interests should be balanced and harmonized to reflect the ideals of the equilibrium and the juste milieu. This limits both plurality and pluralism, though the actual imposition of restrictions may be subject to pragmatic considerations, including political reason weighing the options in light of the public interest, or what is identified as such.

Advocates of pluralism point to the elements of diversity in the religious, legal, and historical heritage of the Muslim community as one of the very sources of its strength and resilience. They quote the Qur'an and sunna, and, like their opponents, they do not hesitate to translate ethicoreligious concepts into sociopolitical ones. The most popular reference is Qur'an 49:13: "O mankind, We created you male and female, and made you into nations and tribes that you may come to know one another. The noblest among you in God's sight are the most pious." Potentially more powerful, though less often cited, is Qur'an 5:48:

> For every community We decreed a law and a way of life. Had God willed, He could have made you a single > community—but in order to test you in what He revealed to you. So vie with one another in virtue. To God is your homecoming, all of you, and He will then acquaint you with that over which you differed.

In addition, there is a famous Prophetic saying (hadith) according to which the "diversity of opinion among [the learned of] my community is a blessing (ikhtilāf ['ulamā'] ummatī raḥma)." Though the hadith is considered weak, which restricts its legal force, it is often quoted in the literature on Islamic political thought, and pluralism and tolerance more specifically. The tradition of scholarly controversy, together with its specific body of literature (kutub al-ikhtilāf), is still known in erudite circles and serves to legitimize a plurality of views, even if antagonistic—provided they do not transgress the bounds of religion and morality.

As in other contexts, the shift from theology to law to politics is readily made. Thus the existence of the different Sunni and Shi'i schools of law (madhhab, pl. madhāhib) and of local legal practices ('urf, 'āda) are often assimilated to political parties. The same is not true of the theological schools, which, at least among modern authors, are widely seen as divisive. Thus Qaradawi insists on the need to transcend the boundaries of the established schools of theology and law in order to create an inclusive vision of Islam that is meaningful to all Muslims. In various contexts, he asserts that what he practices is ijtihād, or independent reasoning on the basis of the Qur'an and sunna, freed from the ties to any particular madhhab with its specific rules and assumptions. Qaradawi acknowledges the historical embeddedness of fiqh and the controversies of its practitioners. In contrast to many others, he welcomes the existing plurality of legal opinions found in the legal tradition, but he also considers them a matter of the past that is no longer a concern for present-day Muslims, who should harness their energies to make Islam relevant to their own lives and those of others.

In the domain of politics, even conservative authors who take care not to be seen as borrowing from outside the Islamic tradition advocate consultation, or shūrā, as a key principle of political organization, enjoined by the Qur'an and incumbent on Muslim rulers past and present. Shūrā is premised on a plurality of opinions, at least within the community and within what is generally referred to as the "framework of Islam." Shūrā is a flexible device that allows for a variety of interpretations, all relevant to the issues of pluralism and tolerance. Some see it as mere advice to the ruler, similar to "good counsel," or naṣīḥa; others view it as the foundation of multiparty parliamentary democracy. Definitions of shūrā can be purely pragmatic, but they can also be based on philosophical reflection, for even though there may be only one truth, there is no guarantee that humans will be able to attain it with certainty. The Tunisian Islamist thinker and activist Rachid al-Gannouchi (b. 1941) is a prominent champion of this line of thinking. It has also been put forth in the context of Islamist self-critique. The Qur'anic text permits more than one reading. Accordingly, no individual or group of Muslims can have a monopoly on truth, or exert a tutelage (wiṣāya) over their fellow Muslims. This argument, which for lack of a better term might be called egalitarian, is directed against all kinds of religious authorities, from the Sunni 'ulama' of Azhar University in Cairo to the Shi'i leaders of the Islamic Republic of Iran. It is also directed against Islamist movements, first and foremost the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, whose claim to leadership over the "Islamic awakening" (ṣaḥwa) has been squarely repudiated by Islamist leaders such as Gannouchi and Turabi. Both insisted that Islamist activists, like all Muslims, have to interact with local realities if they wish to make their vision of Islam relevant to their own societies. Interaction with local conditions necessarily results in a plurality of interpretations.

Debate is therefore legitimate and indeed necessary. Under the conditions of modern mass society, debate may have to be institutionalized in voluntary associations and political parties to become effective. However, there is little agreement even among Islamists concerning institutionalization. Views range from a grudging recognition of political associations and parties as the lesser evil (compared to clandestine activities of undesirable political forces) to full acceptance of political pluralism as healthy and legitimate. Some recognize voluntary associations or even trade unions but not political parties. Others express more liberal views. The names adopted by Islamist organizations reflect this diversity of opinions. Many call themselves jamā'a, jam'iyya, or tajammu', all derivatives of a verbal root stressing unison, to highlight their faith in unity; the Muslim Brotherhood (Jam'iyyat al-Ikhwan al-Muslimin) is a prime example. Some call themselves "front" (jabha), using a more openly modern label to transport a similar message; examples include the Algerian Front Islamique du Salut and the Sudanese National Islamic Front or the Islamic Action Front in Jordan. Yet others call themselves parties, such as the Islamic Liberation Party (Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami), founded in the early 1950s by the Jordanian Taqi al-Din al-Nabhani; the Malaysian Parti Islam Se-Malaysia (PAS), also established in the early 1950s; or the Tunisian Nahda Party (Hizb al-Nahda), founded in 1989 by Gannouchi.

However, the choice of the term "party" does not in itself signal an acceptance of political pluralism, as shown by the Hizb al-Tahrir or the Lebanese Hizbullah; at least in its early years, the latter was firmly opposed to a multiparty system. According to the binary vision adopted by both organizations, there are only two "parties" (or rather groups or communities): the party of God (ḥizb allāh) and the party of the devil (ḥizb al-shayṭān), or, with a significant change of register, the party of the downtrodden (al-mustaḍ'afūn) and the party of the arrogant (al-mustakbirūn). The former refers to Qur'an 5:56 ("Whoso takes God and His Messenger and the believers for allies, the party of God shall be victorious") and Qur'an 58:19, 22 ("They are the party of Satan and the party of Satan are assuredly the losers. . . . They are the party of God, and the party of God shall surely win through"). The latter uses categories popularized by the leaders of the Islamic Revolution in Iran. Here as elsewhere the argument rests on a transfer of ethicomoral notions to the sociopolitical field. Thus the Qur'anic condemnation of whims and desires (hawā, pl. ahwā') is used to denounce political parties and associations premised on a particular interest (maṣlaḥa) at the expense of the common good or public weal, resulting in a collective weakening of the Muslim community or the nation. Gannouchi is one of the few distinguished Islamist authors to defend interests as a legitimate component of political action and organization.

At one end of the spectrum, the prominent Egyptian lawyer and Islamist intellectual Muhammad Salim al-ʿAwwa (b. 1942) openly declared himself in favor of pluralism. In an article on "political pluralism" published in 1993, he wrote that pluralism means the recognition of diversity and that this diversity is an "expression of the marvelous divine achievement." With regard to political organization he argued that if one "recognises the pluralistic nature of humans, and recognises their rights to disagree and differ, one must inevitably, and without much effort, recognise pluralism in the political sphere." To reject political pluralism and to adopt monism, or a unitary vision, he continued, usually leads to an unjust despotic rule or tyrannical government. The reference to the Qurʾanic verses sanctioning plurality cited earlier comes out clearly, as does the seemingly effortless change of register from theology to politics.

In spite of some verbal stridency, pragmatism features prominently in modern Islamic discourse. The Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, for example, under changing conditions gradually moved from a principled rejection of multipartyism to an acceptance of a multiparty system—provided that it stays within the framework of Islam. In the face of British colonialism, the Muslim Brotherhood propagated national unity combined with the denunciation of party politics or factionalism (ḥizbiyya). Faith, Banna declared, is unity; fragmentation and disunity equal unbelief (kufr). Considering that in Egypt the interwar period has often been called the age of party politics, this was not a minor point. Yet the Muslim Brotherhood was not alone in criticizing "partyism" and partisanship. Sa'd Zaghlul, the leader of the Wafd Party founded in 1918, did the same, claiming for the Wafd the role of representative of the nation at large; by the 1930s, the critique had become commonplace. For Banna, politics (but not party politics) was an integral part of Islam. In 1938, he sent an open letter to the king and leading politicians, which was later published under the title Nahwa al-Nur (To the light), urging them to dissolve all parties and to create a united front. Still, there is no compelling link between this dualistic vision pitting right against wrong and the endorsement of a one-party system as it was espoused especially during the 1950s and 1960s by Islamists in particular communities and countries. Changed sociopolitical circumstances resulted in modified political thinking. By the mid-1990s, the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood had largely revised its earlier positions on multipartyism, exchanging earlier rejection for cautious endorsement.

At the same time, most authors would rule out the possibility that political parties explicitly representing non-Muslims (such as Christian parties) be recognized in the framework of an Islamic order. Lebanon, with its system of institutionalized confessionalism, or sectarianism (ṭaʾifiyya), is a special case; set quotas for non-Muslims and other minorities in countries such as Iran or Jordan do not allow for political parties to form on a confessional basis. The same applies to political parties based on what are labeled un-Islamic principles, such as Marxism, communism, or fascism. But this does not exclude the possibility of cooperation under certain circumstances, notably under conditions of duress, in which the established legal principle of necessity, or ḍarūra, can be invoked. Here the crucial distinction between the fundamentals of religion (aṣl) and its derivatives (furūʿ) comes into play. It allows for recognizing the existing plurality and diversity of opinion and interest without abandoning the ideal of unity. In a similar context, the noted Islamic scholar H.A.R. Gibb has spoken of "tolerance for the sake of unity" (Gibb, 1962, p. 15).

From Toleration to Tolerance

Tolerance covers a broad spectrum of positions, from toleration of the Other to respect for his or her beliefs and practices to the full recognition of these beliefs and practices as equally viable and legitimate. The Arabic tasāmuḥ does not distinguish between toleration on the one hand and tolerance on the other. Toleration can be based on pragmatic considerations and made contingent on certain conditions; it is thus revocable. It can be granted by autocratic rulers and authoritarian states irrespective of their own beliefs and ideologies. Toleration can also reflect philosophical insight into the impossibility of ascertaining truth, similar to the argument made by Gannouchi and others in the context of pluralism. Both pragmatic toleration and philosophical reflection can come together but need not do so. In modern debates, it is often conditional toleration that authors, especially Islamist authors, have in mind when they invoke tolerance as the distinguishing feature of Islam and any polity based on it. Respect for the Other as a different expression of toleration and tolerance presupposes a certain degree of familiarity among the different parties, especially concerning their religious beliefs and practices. However, respect need not translate into specific legal and political arrangements granting equal religious, civic, and political rights to the latter.

By contrast, tolerance in the sense of full recognition of the Other is inconceivable without such legal and political arrangements translating religious recognition into rights of citizenship. In the modern period, tolerance thus defined has been associated with human rights, freedom, and liberty. Tolerance entails recognition of individual self-determination in diverse fields of life, including the free choice of lifestyle and religion, the right to practice this lifestyle or religion, and the right to either change or relinquish them altogether. Tolerance thus bears on individual and collective rights and liberties in both the private and the public spheres and is premised on a differentiation between religion, morals, law, and the constitution. The distinction many authors make between the public and the private domain, with the private sphere protected against outside intrusion and intervention, is remarkable in light of contemporary debates on whether the distinction between public and private in Western contexts is relevant to Muslim contexts. Discussions of sexual freedom and apostasy suggest that it is indeed highly relevant to the latter.

Tolerance among Muslims

Even for innovative authors such as 'Awwa, there are limits to tolerance and diversity. These limits, defined by God's law and revelation, inform (or ought to inform) Muslim understandings of freedom, liberty, and tolerance. Freedom in its various dimensions—freedom of conscience, religion, thought, and expression; freedom of association; academic and artistic freedom—is widely discussed among contemporary Muslims. Personal freedom, entailing free individual choice, bears on concepts of tolerance and pluralism. With regard to personal freedom, 'Awwa, who supports political pluralism and tolerance toward non-Muslims that treats them as citizens, not as protected subjects, shows himself as much more conservative. In a monograph on Islamic penal law he argued that > the Islamic concept of personal freedom is entirely opposed to that of the post-war generation in the West. Personal freedom, according to the Islamic concept, is permissible only in respect to matters not regulated by the injunctions and prohibitions laid down in the Qur'an and the Sunna, which are expressions of the Divine Will. (El Awa, 1982, p. 18)

This does not address the question of how the community or the state should deal with transgression and whether under certain circumstances it might be tolerated, but it does underscore the necessity to distinguish among different fields to which individual groups and authors may apply different standards of rigor or leniency or toleration and tolerance.

The distinction between public and private is equally relevant to another key issue affecting tolerance among Muslims: the change of religion, which continues to be labeled as apostasy (ridda), suggesting the illegitimate nature of the act. Many would argue that within the Muslim community, public debate must fall short of any radical critique of religion or its dominant interpretations, which is readily denounced as blasphemy, heresy, or apostasy, raising the issue of takfīr, or the exclusion from the community of Muslims. Modern Muslim authors are concerned not so much with the theological dimension (the definition of apostasy and how it can be distinguished from sin, unbelief, heresy, or blasphemy) but with its impact on the body politic. Discussions of apostasy provide a striking illustration of territorial logic and the modern nation-state's impact on much of contemporary Islamic discourse. Thus in a tract devoted to the issue of apostasy, Qaradawi claimed that the Muslim who openly declares his apostasy transfers his allegiance from his own community and homeland to another and thereby threatens the foundation of collective identity.

According to him, the apostate does not simply abandon the community; he joins the enemy, an act not to be tolerated. Lacking compelling evidence from the Qur'an and sunna to support the identification of religious conversion and high treason, Qaradawi follows standard practice by invoking memories of the historical ridda, the secession of Arab tribes after Muhammad's death, which he describes as treason on both religious and political grounds. Like many others, Qaradawi looks at apostasy from the perspective of the community, not the individual making a personal choice, and he identifies Islam with individual and collective identity. This has obvious consequences for conceptions of religious tolerance and the status of non-Muslims in a Muslim polity or Islamic state.

The Status of Non-Muslims

The Qur'an describes other religions in its own terms, and these terms have been adapted by Muslim scholars of the formative and classical periods; modern Muslims still use basically the same vocabulary. Monotheism and a book of revelation are the crucial criteria by which the Qur'an distinguishes between several categories of believers (mu'minūn and muslimūn) and unbelievers (kuffār): the People of the Book, which include the Christians, the Jews, the Zoroastrians, and the mysterious Sabeans; the polytheists or pagans (mushrikūn); and the hypocrites (munāfiqūn), who pretend to be Muslims while actually conspiring against the Muslim community. Qur'anic rulings on the theological and legal status of non-Muslims as well as on how Muslims should interact with non-Muslims are not entirely consistent. Interpretation rests on the methods of contextualization and abstraction outlined earlier. Some Qur'anic verses describe the commonalities of all believers; others draw a clear line between Muslims, the People of the Book, and pagans. Thus Qur'an 109:6 states, "O unbelievers! I do not worship what you worship, nor do you worship what I worship; nor will I ever worship what you worship, nor will you ever worship what I worship. You have your religion, and I have mine." Qur'an 5:48 makes a similar statement. Both could be taken as the basis of respect and religious tolerance, although they are by no means unequivocal. As for the modes of interaction among the adherents of different faiths, Qur'an 2:256 famously decrees that "there is no compulsion in religion," whereas Qur'an 9:29 calls on Muslims to "fight those who do not believe in God or the Last Day, who do not hold illicit what God and His Messenger hold illicit, and who do not follow the religion of truth from among those given the Book, until they offer up the tribute, by hand, in humble mien." Several verses warn Muslims not to take non-Muslims as their friends and allies, while others instruct them to act justly toward them and to respect their treaties with them.

In view of such diversity, modern authors rely on classical theological and legal scholarship to put forth the position of Islam on the status and treatment of non-Muslims in Islamic or Muslim society. Modern authors still discuss dhimma, the protection granted to non-Muslims living permanently under Muslim rule; jizya, the poll tax to be paid by all able-bodied adult non-Muslim males in exchange for protection; the rules of interaction, including intermarriage, the possibility of sharing a table and of consuming foodstuffs produced or meat slaughtered by the non-Muslim Other, and the risks of ritual pollution; the freedom of religious practice, including the construction and restoration of sites of worship; and (partial) autonomy within the Islamic polity, best known from the late Ottoman Empire as the millet system. Most of these issues are dealt with in the so-called Treaty of 'Umar, attributed to the second caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), and possibly composed in the eighth century. Modern writings are often apologetic in nature; religious polemic informed by theological issues has become rare. According to prevalent perceptions, tolerance was practiced from the time of the Prophet and the pious ancestors (al-salaf al-ṣālih) up to at least Ottoman times. While early Muslim history is frequently invoked, the actual experience of coexistence, if not conviviality—not only in Andalus or in Fatimid Egypt but in various other times and places, too—is rarely explored. The conceptual framework is shaped by the territorial state, and the non-Muslims concerned are by and large local Christians. Muslim minority groups within Muslim-majority societies, such as Alevis in Turkey, Shi'is in Saudi Arabia or Morocco, or Sunnis in Iran, are hardly ever covered under the heading of tolerance. The status of Hindus and Buddhists is rarely discussed outside of South Asia and Southeast Asia, and contributions of South Asian or Southeast Asian Muslim intellectuals tend to be ignored by their Middle Eastern homologues. Reception is slightly better among Muslim intellectuals and activists residing in the West. New religious communities such as the Mormons or Jehovah's Witnesses are largely excluded from discussion and denied recognition and legal protection.

Discussions of tolerance accorded to non-Muslims under Islam, therefore, tend to be limited to the People of the Book in general and to Christians and Jews in particular. Within this narrow field, however, the range of positions is wide: At one end of the spectrum are those scholar-activists who are prepared to tolerate Christians and Jews as *dhimmī*s, subjects of the Muslim state or ruler protected on the condition that they acknowledge the superiority of Islam and the Muslim community and, as a token of this recognition, pay the jizya "with humble mien" (Q. 9:29). They exclude non-Muslims from political participation and representation as well as all positions involving power and authority over Muslims (wilāya), including the judiciary, the military, and high state offices, which are classified as religious because in one way or another, they are charged with applying the shari'a. The distinction between "religious" and "nonreligious" spheres and offices at work here is intriguing given the Islamist conviction that Islam does not separate religion from politics—the bedrock of antisecular argument. It appears that within the framework of Islamic rule, as exemplified by the application of the shari'a, distinct fields or domains operate according to a different logic, provided that this logic does not contradict the "fundamentals" of Islam and the shari'a. Still, this is a minority view, mostly to be found among militant Islamist groups and theoreticians. At the other end of the spectrum are those scholars, intellectuals, and political activists who recognize Christians and Jews as citizens of the (Muslim or Islamic) nation-state with equal rights and duties, grant them autonomy in personal-status matters, and bar them only from the office of president, to which only male Muslims can be appointed. This position is much more common than the former, though also more diversified. Statements on the status of Jews must be seen in light of political conflict with Zionism and Israel rather than the principle of religious tolerance only. The same applies to anti-Semitism, which in certain milieus has arisen mainly as an element of the critique of Zionism and Israel or Israeli state policies.

In certain contexts, non-Muslims residing in Islamic territory are described as *dhimmī*s of the Muslim community, enjoying protection (dhimma) against the payment of dues and taxes including the jizya; in other contexts, they are described as muwāṭinūn, variously to be translated as compatriots or citizens. According to classical fiqh, relations between Muslims and non-Muslims are based on a contract involving reciprocal rights and duties, which were unequal, reflecting the religious and political superiority of Muslims. Except for certain militant Islamist activists, modern authors commonly assert that non-Muslims enjoy essentially the same civic and political rights and duties as Muslims, referring to the formula "same rights, same duties" (lahum mā lanā wa-'alayhim mā 'alaynā), which is also known in classical fiqh, especially the Hanafi tradition. Accordingly, Islam guarantees non-Muslims protection of their lives, bodies, property, and honor as well as respect for their religious freedom, covering the fundamental goods or benefits (maṣāliḥ) protected under the shari'a. In the framework of the modern nation-state, it also offers them social benefits such as old-age pensions. It is only in the religious field that they cannot be considered equal.

With regard to politics, some authors argue that the protection accorded non-Muslims under Islam is the same as what is today described as nationality or citizenship (jinsiyya). They interpret the jizya as an equivalent of zakat or a substitute for military service. Accordingly, non-Muslims could not be expected to fight for Islam and the Muslim community, a fight identified as jihad, in the premodern era; however, the nature of jihad was transformed in the process of anticolonial struggle and modern nation building. Non-Muslims who joined their Muslim fellow countrymen in the fight against colonialism and for the nation earned the rights of citizenship, making special payment of jizya obsolete. Not all authors claim that the muwāṭinūn min ghayr al-muslimīn (non-Muslim countrymen and women) enjoy full equality with their Muslim compatriots in all spheres of life. Instead, they elaborate on justice, equity, and religious freedom properly understood, which does not force non-Muslims to convert but allows them to retain their cultural authenticity just as it protects the cultural authenticity of Muslims. In return, non-Muslims have to respect the religious sensibilities of the Muslims. Proselytizing missions among Muslims cannot be tolerated, highlighting once again the shifting meanings of toleration and tolerance.

See also minorities; modernity; revival and reform

Further Reading

S. Ghalib Khan al-Abbasi and A. de Zayas Abbasi, The Structure of Islamic Polity. Part I: The One-Party System in Islam, 1952; Mohammed Salim al-Awa, "Political Pluralism from an Islamic Perspective," in Power-Sharing Islam?, edited by Azzam Tamimi, 1993; Mark Cohen, Under Crescent and Cross, 1994; Hamid Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundation of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 1993; Mohamed S. El-Awa, Punishment in Islamic Law: A Comparative Study, 1982; Rainer Forst, Toleranz im Konflikt: Geschichte, Gehalt und Gegenwart eines umstrittenen Begriffs, 2003; Yohanan Friedmann, Tolerance and Coercion in Islam: Interfaith Relations in the Muslim Tradition, 2003; H.A.R. Gibb, Studies on the Civilization of Islam, edited by Stanford Shaw and William R. Polk, 1962; Bettina Gräf and Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen, eds., The Global Mufti: The Phenomenon of Yusuf al-Qaradawi, 2009; Gudrun Krämer, Gottes Staat als Republik. Reflexionen zeitgenössischer Muslime zu Islam, Menschenrechten und Demokratie, 1999; Idem, Hasan al-Banna, 2010; Birgit Krawietz, Hierarchie der Rechtsquellen im tradierten sunnitischen Recht, 2002; Johanna Pink, Neue Religionsgemeinschaften in Ägypten. Minderheiten im Spannungsfeld von Glaubensfreiheit, öffentlicher Ordnung und Islam, 2003; Josef van Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3 Jahrhundert Hidschra, vol. 1, 1991; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change, 2002.

GUDRUN KRÄMER

police

In the premodern Islamic world, responsibility for carrying out police functions for maintaining public safety and enforcing the law was distributed among several institutions and jurisdictions. The primary ones included the shurṭa (police, military, and prosecutorial arms of the ruling authorities); maẓālim (jurisdiction within institutions designed to offer recourse for injustices of public officials, redress contraventions of justice in the courts, and impose criminal sanctions); and ḥisba (jurisdiction whose officials had the mandate to inspect market practices, offenses against public morality, and the like). Though none of these institutions are mentioned in the Qur'an, the legal and theoretical basis for them is firmly entrenched in the Islamic tradition by a combination of practical necessity and scriptural interpretation. The Qur'an outlines a series of moral precepts for the Muslim community, commands Muslims to "obey God and his Messenger and those in authority over you" (4:59), and insists on a duty to command right and forbid wrong (amr bi-l-ma'rūf wa-nahy 'an al-munkar; 3:104). Through a doctrine called siyāsa, roughly the "governance of the public sphere," medieval Muslim jurists-cum-political theorists drew on such Qur'anic verses to accord Muslim rulers broad discretion over issues of governance in the public interest (maṣlaḥa), including matters of public safety and law enforcement. The idea was that the government had a basic obligation to uphold Islamic law as an expression of divine will for a moral and just society and that the ruler was best equipped to preside over this task.

The most common term used to discuss the police was shurṭa. The shurṭa carried out police functions from the earliest period of Islamic history. Early on, the shurṭa was evidently an elite military force, or special troops chosen specifically to serve the caliph or governor of a particular region. The second caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), reportedly employed a night patrol (called 'asas or ṭawāf), which performed a function later taken on by the shurṭa: policing and domestic military duties both day and night. The fourth caliph and first Shi'i imam, 'Ali b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61), is said to have employed a shurṭa as a military guard following the Battle of Siffin, where he fought Mu'awiya (r. 661–80), the first caliph of the Umayyad dynasty, in 657 during the First Civil War (fitna). Some historical sources report that the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56), had a shurṭa as a personal guard, though if he did, the guard was wholly ineffective in preventing his assassination.

By the time of Mu'awiya's reign, the shurṭa was an established institution that carried out recognizable police functions in Iraq's major regions. Historical sources report that in Kufa in 663, the shurṭa surrounded the house of a Khariji rebel leader, arresting him and his coconspirators; in Basra in 665, the governor Ziyad b. Sufyan established a shurṭa of 4,000 men responsible for enforcing law and order; and in Karbala in 680, the shurṭa played a leading role in the assassination of Husayn b. 'Ali, the grandson of Muhammad and the third Shi'i imam. The shurṭa in these later instances was distinguished from the ruler's personal bodyguard (ḥaras), which guarded the caliph or governor, and from the army (jaysh), which protected the community from external threats.

Under the Abbasids (r. 750–1258) and the Spanish Umayyads (r. 756–1031), the role of the shurṭa expanded. Its head, the ṣāḥib al-shurṭa (also walī al-jarā'im in Spain), was charged not only with maintaining law and order but also with helping to adjudicate it. He investigated crime, made arrests, and conducted pretrial interrogation procedures—alongside the muḥtasib (the agent responsible for market inspection)—for both the qadi and maẓālim courts; adjudicated misdemeanors over which the ruler had wide discretion (ta'zīr); supervised the imposition of retaliation for bodily injuries and homicides (qiṣāṣ); and sometimes imposed criminal sanctions (ḥudūd). In some instances, the shurṭa was subordinate to the local judge (qadi). For example, in 11th-century Córdoba, he attended the sessions (majlis) of the local judge, consulted him on major matters, and had deputies (a'wān) whom the local magistrate (ḥākim) helped select for judicial duties. Likewise, in Fatimid Cairo (r. 969–1171), the shurṭa was called ma'ūna (a helping body) for its role in aiding the magistrates in performing judicial tasks. In other instances, however, the shurṭa dispensed justice without recourse to the qadis. By the 10th and 11th centuries in both eastern and western Islamic lands, the shurṭa was divided into at least two different branches of jurisdiction—major (kubrā or 'ulyā) and minor (ṣughrā). Andalusian sources also identify a third area, the "intermediate" jurisdiction (wusṭā), beginning in the 11th century. The higher branches seem to have had expansive authority over all crimes among both notables and commoners, while the lower were confined to handling petty crimes among the masses; the middle jurisdiction was a bit obscure but perhaps handled issues and social strata in between the other two.

In addition to policing and judicial duties, the head of the shurṭa had other responsibilities. These included strategy consultations with the local ruler, diplomatic missions (e.g., accompanying Christian delegations wanting to meet with the caliph or an area governor), military activities, and executive duties (i.e., serving as acting governor in the ruler's absence). Thus the ṣāḥib al-shurṭa was also called ṣāḥib al-madīna in Spain, where he assumed governorship and diplomatic duties; in Mamluk Cairo and elsewhere, he was called wālī al-madīna (city chief), wālī al-qāhira, or walī al-shurṭa, where his role was more militaristic. During the time of the Crusades in 1169 in Damascus and Egypt, the police were called the shiḥna, and the chief helped combat Crusaders. During Ottoman times, the so-called police-chief (walī al-shurṭa) took on a more administrative role. In the modern Arab world, shurṭa is the common term for police.

See also governance

Further Reading

Fred M. Donner, "The Shurṭa in Early Umayyad Syria," in The Fourth International Conference on the History of Bilād al-Shām, edited by M. Adnan Bakhit and Robert Schick, 1989; Boğaç Ergene, ed., Judicial Practice: Institutions and Agents in the Islamic World, 2009; Hugh Kennedy, The Armies of the Caliphs: Military and Society in the Early Islamic State, 2001; Émile Tyan, Histoire de l'organisation judiciaire en pays d'Islam, 2nd ed., 1960.

INTISAR A. RABB

political ritual

The ceremonies and performances conducted by Muslim political leaders to demonstrate their authority and religious legitimacy became common under the Abbasid and Fatimid dynasties, especially rulers' titles, dress, and court and prayer ceremonies. These particulars are generally discussed under the rubric of adab (etiquette) and appear as distinct sections in larger works on Islamic government, Mirrors for Princes, and so on. Likewise, the terms rusūm or marāsim, defined either as "protocol" or as "ceremonies," are used in the main medieval works that document these practices.

Lineage was already important in pre-Islamic Arabia, and titles formed an integral part of a prominent figure's reputation. In the political context, lineage might also offer legitimacy. The descendants of the Prophet emphasized their pedigree by appending to their name the title of al-sayyid (the master) or al-sharīf (the noble). In the 11th century, the Buyids introduced the controversial titles malik (king) and malik al-mulūk (king of kings). The latter had particularly problematic connotations, since a famous hadith attributes to the Prophet the statement, "The most abhorrent of names before God is that of 'king of kings.'" Scholars have interpreted this gesture by the Buyids as an attempt either to revert to pre-Islamic Persian titulature or to distance the ruler from religious responsibility.

In the medieval period, several regular occasions provided opportunities for rulers to demonstrate their legitimacy. Perhaps the two most important such occasions were the Friday and holiday prayers, since it was customary to mention the ruler's name in the accompanying sermon (khuṭba). During the Friday sermon, the preacher would cite the current ruler's name and recite blessings for him. This invocation of the ruler's name parallels his mention in inscriptions on the coins (sikka) minted during his reign as well as his mention on textiles made in the ruler's atelier (ṭirāz). In the ninth century, it became customary for the ruler to lead prayers at the central mosque of his capital, thus displaying his religious and political clout, and for his name to be pronounced in the khuṭba of a secondary mosque.

Similarly, holidays proved fitting contexts for rulers to display their authority. For the Fatimids and Buyids, celebration of the festival of Ghadir Khumm was regarded as the most direct evidence of their legitimacy. On that day in the year 632, the Prophet was said to have pronounced his cousin and son-in-law, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, as his heir. Shi'i governments would mark the occasion by decorating the city and proclaiming 'Ali's special status as the Prophet's legitimate successor. Similarly, the Fatimid procession at the New Year's celebration was a powerful display of authority, particularly in the context of the contestation for power among the caliph, the army, and the vizier. The vizier would ride on horseback with his sons and brothers before him and would be followed by the caliph and his party. The caliph would be carried on a sedan chair and would exchange slight bows with the vizier toward the end of the procession. Their places in the lineup were said to have reflected their ranks. Medieval historian Paula Sanders notes that while the vizier's power stemmed from the caliph, his actual powers in terms of government emerged from the trust of his troops. Therefore, national and religious holidays served not only to legitimate the sources of power but also to restore and define the internal dynamics of the government.

Different religious rulers also demonstrated their legitimacy by wearing or displaying the Prophet's insignia when appearing in public. According to Dominique Sourdel, this tradition first became apparent during the Abbasid caliphate, when the caliph would wear the Prophet's cloak (burda), hold the Prophet's scepter (qaḍīb), and carry a copy of the Qur'an (muṣḥaf).

In the political context, pledges (bay'a) played an important role in articulating trust in a ruler. The bay'a was an important practice that dates from the death of the Prophet, when Abu Bakr assumed the caliphate, and the ceremony became a prominent feature in the assumption of Sunni caliphal rule. Under Shi'i governments, it served merely as a gesture of loyalty rather than an official marker of power. During the Buyid reign, pledges were the most prominent way for a ruler to informally obligate and instruct government functionaries regarding their tasks.

In the modern period, rituals are commonly performed by governments to articulate their connection to Islam. Iran confers the highest political and religious authority on the supreme leader (rahbar)—a position that has thus far been filled by descendants of the Prophet. They too adopt the title sayyid and wear a black turban as a sign of this pedigree. Strict enforcement of the dress code serves as an expression of the country's religious nature. Women are required to wear a chador, a concealing black cloak, and hijab, a headscarf, as an outward sign of the obligation to preserve modesty and piety.

In contemporary Morocco, the sultan also adopts certain traditional practices to display his legitimacy. In 1962 Sultan Muhammad V introduced the pledge, which subsequent leaders make upon assuming power. Moreover, since 1962, kingship is conferred upon descendants of the Prophet, and only sons may succeed the reigning king. The king's public ritual sacrifice of two sheep (one for himself and one for the Moroccan people) every year on the festival of sacrifice ('Id al-Adha) associated with the annual pilgrimage to Mecca is a powerful symbol of his sovereignty under the aegis of Islam.

Parallel to rituals of legitimacy, in the modern period certain novel rituals are introduced to maintain the religious spirit of the country. In Iran, the Basij, the official paramilitary group, plans religious events and suppresses opposition. In Saudi Arabia, the mutawwi'in are officially charged with ensuring prayer attendance—sometimes by harsh means—thus monitoring the nation's religious culture.

See also 'Ashura'; bureaucracy

Further Reading

M. E. Combs-Schilling, Sacred Performances: Islam, Sexuality, and Sacrifice, 1989; Jacob Lassner, The Shaping of 'Abbasid Rule, 1980; Andrew Marsham, Rituals of Islamic Monarchy: Accession and Succession in the First Muslim Empire, 2009; Roy Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society, 2001; Paula Sanders, Ritual, Politics and the City in Fatimid Cairo, 1994; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, Religion and Politics Under the Early 'Abbasids: The Emergence of the Proto-Sunni Elite, 1997.

JACOB OLIDORT

preaching

Announcing the message of Islam, which the Qur'an refers to as a call or an invitation (da'wa), represents preaching as an activity that all Muslims are expected to practice (Q. 16:125). In this broad sense, engaging in religious discourse in order to instruct, edify, admonish, exhort, counsel, inspire, or proselytize is understood to be identified closely with the general mission of the entire umma, or the community of the faithful. In some contexts, including both classical and contemporary works, this emphasis on the public presentation of Islam as a universal vocation is accompanied by the recognition that, formally speaking, Islam does not have a clergy, which therefore confers the duty of preaching, in a general sense, upon all believers.

Nevertheless, the emergence of preaching, in the narrower and more specialized application of the term, dates from the earliest period of Muhammad's response to God's revelation, since, to a large degree, much of what is contained in the Qur'an and the sunna might be characterized as constituting preachment. This diffuse work of addressing people in God's name, however, soon came to be framed in a particular ritual setting that fixed the standard occasion for delivering a sermon in the mosque, originally meaning the courtyard of Muhammad's house in Medina, at the Friday noon prayer, which free male Muslims were obligated to attend. This precedent has since been codified in the Islamic legal tradition that regards the Friday prayer service, including the valid performance of the sermon, as a defining feature of a properly constituted Islamic community.

Traditionally, the right to deliver this Friday sermon was specified as the prerogative of the Prophet's successor, who would either preach himself or delegate others to do so in his name. Accordingly, the content of the sermon was meant to embrace both sacred and secular issues. Likewise, over time, formal oratorical elements and a certain language style came to be incorporated into the practice that required considerable knowledge and skill, leading to the rise of scholarly professionals who tended to occupy the posts of preachers. Among the elements prescribed as necessary for the sermon was a formula of blessing that explicitly mentioned the name of the ruler, under whose auspices the preacher was presiding. This requirement came to take on exceptional importance at many points, especially in times of political instability, when a preacher was obliged either to confirm his old loyalty or to signal a shift of allegiance to a rival.

In nations with Muslim majorities, mosque preaching continues to have an inherent potential for addressing political as well as religious themes. Accordingly, various mechanisms are employed to regulate the conduct of preachers who, for the most part, comply with policies of the state whose institutions train, subsidize, and supervise them. Preachers expressing dissent, however, typically may still find relative freedom of expression in mosque preaching, which provides ample opportunity to convey critical views through such devices as selective omissions and leading rhetorical allusions.

See also commanding right and forbidding wrong; Friday prayer; mosque; propaganda; pulpit

Further Reading

Jonathan Berkey, Popular Preaching and Religious Authority in the Medieval Islamic Near East, 2001; Jacques Waardenburg, "Islam as a Vehicle of Protest," in Islamic Dilemmas: Reformers, Nationalists and Industrialization, edited by Ernest Gellner, 1985.

PATRICK D. GAFFNEY

privacy

The conceptual dichotomy of private and public life is anchored in the Western social sciences; no exact translation of this pair of opposites exists in any of the Islamic languages. As a minimal definition, privacy in the Islamic context refers to the right to remain concealed (ḥaqq al-sitr) and protected from unwanted intrusion. The inviolability of territory is only one of several dimensions in this definition. In addition, the concept of privacy in Islamic societies relates to the highly developed notions of the inviolability (ḥurma) of the human body, regardless of location, and of the inviolability of a person's or group's honor (sharaf) that is derived from moral and religious integrity ('adāla). Such rights protect a person's privacy even when he or she enters into the public sphere of government control. The line that separated private from public in traditional Islamic societies was defined by the social and historical context, and traditions of political thought about privacy in Islam likewise differed in important respects according to the various perspectives adopted in jurisprudence (fiqh); in the ethico-theological tradition; and by those writing under the patronage of political power, the authors of chancery documents, Mirrors for Princes, chronicles, panegyric poetry, and the like.

Political Elites as Private Bodies

Privacy as defined earlier could be claimed not only by the subjects of political rule but also by those in power. Medieval Islamic governments, especially after the militarization of society in large parts of the Islamic world beginning in the tenth century, were largely disconnected from their subjects. Political elites conceived of themselves as an autonomous and extrajudicial "private" body. The men of the regime (khawāṣṣ)—namely, all those who were distinguished (khāṣṣ) by their share in the task of governing—together inhabited a self-regulatory realm of reward and punishment that was strictly separate from the public arena of the commoners ('awāmm). The sphere of the khawāṣṣ was internally stratified according to closeness to the ruler who presided over it. Different degrees of proximity to the ruler included participation in court ceremonies and audiences, membership in the group of the ruler's boon companions and intimate advisors, and access to the ruler's harem (usually restricted to close relatives).

Political writers of the premodern period gave rulers the power to discipline the khawāṣṣ at their discretion; the ruler must educate (rawwaḍa) and lead (ūsa) them but at all times protect their privacy. The court secretary Ibn Hamdun (d. 1166) judged that an offense committed by a member in the private realm of the court (dhanb al-sirr) required a punishment meted out in private ('uqūbat al-sirr). Only on the extreme occasion when the khawāṣṣ fell from grace—for example, when they had revolted against their patron—could they lose the privilege of being disciplined within the confines of the court; medieval chronicles occasionally mention the ritual ejection and public display in the city of disgraced amirs after their execution at court.

Levels of Inviolability of the Ruled

Jurists and ethical writers of Islam defended the right to concealment of the subjects, which was always precarious under the conditions of military government in medieval Islam. The Qur'an (24:27) states, "Do not enter houses other than your own unless you have asked permission and greeted the inhabitants!" There is also a general injunction not to pry and spy on people (49:12). As Eli Alshech argues in his article on the evolution of the notion of the domestic sphere, around the tenth century, Islamic legal doctrine underwent a change from a mechanical, occupancy-based notion of privacy to the interpretation of privacy as a value in itself, regardless of legal claims to rightful tenancy. Transgressions against privacy, such as acts of voyeurism, were increasingly threatened with punishment. Jurists aimed such restrictions not only at ordinary citizens but also, and perhaps primarily, at the agents of the repressive state apparatus. Medieval legal manuals detailing the duties and prerogatives of the government-appointed market inspector and censor of morals (muḥtasib) specifically stipulate that the muḥtasib is entitled to prosecute only openly visible and apparent wrongdoings (munkarāt ẓāhira). He is not allowed to spy on people in their homes or violate their property rights (ḥuqūq al-irtifāq).

Islamic law also emphasizes the right and the duty to protect the inviolability (ḥurma) of the human body. A free man's "zone of shame" ('awra) is defined as the area between the navel and the knees; a free woman's is the whole body except the face and hands (and, according to others, the feet and forearms). These body parts are to be covered, but rules tend to be less strict in relation to family members. In general, among members of Muslim society, relational standing rather than the sanctity of specific places seems the key to understanding privacy in Islamic law. The jurists' concern for the inviolability of the human body can also be seen in their broad condemnation of punitive mutilation (tamthīl; with the shari'a punishments for theft and brigandage—namely, the amputation of hands and feet—as an exception) and in their refusal (with some post-Mongol exceptions) to allow judicial torture.

The ethos of protecting private behavior from the intrusive gaze of others, or even of keeping sins hidden and not divulging them to the public, is anchored in both the Qur'an and hadith; it is a hallmark of all later Islamic legal and ethical writings. On the other hand, discretionary state punishment based on the interest of the state (siyāsa), particularly the practice of ignominious parading (tashhīr), the medieval Muslim equivalent of the Western pillory, was often aimed directly at destroying the convicted person's honor and reputation. Jurists of the classical period usually opposed such transgressions against people's right of privacy, although they tended to distinguish between different levels of honorability: the less honor was at stake, the more public state punishments could be. According to the Hanafi jurist Abu Bakr b. Mas'ud al-Kashani (d. 1189), descendants of the Prophet and the jurists must only be made to suffer a private reprimand from the judge. Noblemen (ashrāf) are to receive a reprimand from the judge in the public setting of the court. The middle classes (awsāt) are punished with reprimand in the judge's court and with imprisonment. Finally, the nether classes (sifla) suffer public reprimand, imprisonment, and beating.

See also city (philosophical); commanding right and forbidding wrong; government; holy places; honor; household; human rights; individualism; Mirrors for Princes; patrimonial state; public interest; public opinion; quietism and activism; veil

Further Reading

Eli Alshech, "'Do Not Enter Houses Other Than Your Own': The Evolution of the Notion of a Private Domestic Sphere in Early Sunnī Islamic Thought," Islamic Law and Society 11, no. 3 (2004); Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong, 2000; Jans-Peter Hartung, Court Cultures in the Muslim World: Seventh to Nineteenth Centuries, 2010; Mohamed Kerrou, ed., Public et privé en Islam, 2002; Yaron Klein, "Between Public and Private: An Examination of Hisba Literature," Harvard Middle Eastern and Islamic Review 7 (2006); Christian Lange, "Legal and Cultural Aspects of Ignominious Parading (Tashhīr) in Islam," Islamic Law and Society 14, no. 1 (2007); Christian Lange and Maribel Fierro, "Spatial, Ritual and Representational Aspects of Public Violence in Islamic Societies (1st–19th Centuries CE)," in Public Violence in Islamic Societies, 2009.

CHRISTIAN LANGE

propaganda

Propaganda, defined as the systematic spreading of information, ideas, and rumors in the effort to help or harm a particular group or cause, plays an integral role in the activism of modern Muslim groups for social, religious, and political purposes. Their understanding and use of it is rooted in the classical concept of da'wa, which means "call or invitation" in the Qur'an and hadith (prophetic tradition) as well as in everyday parlance. The term da'wa is most commonly used to describe religious missionary activity, and a missionary or proselytizer is termed a dā'ī, or "one who calls or invites." In the modern period, state-sponsored da'wa has allowed certain interpretations of Islam, such as the Saudi version of the Salafi trend within Sunni Islam, to gain a global following. Muslim political groups, both religious nationalist and transnational, have adopted classical principles of da'wa and applied them to modern politics.

In the medieval period there are several examples of the use of da'wa to further political goals. In the mid-eighth century, Abu Muslim (d. 755) was sent to the region of Khurasan to propagate and plan a revolt on behalf of the Abbasids, a family claiming descent from the Prophet Muhammad, against the ruling Umayyad dynasty. Another notable example is the movement of the early Shi'i rebel Mukhtar (d. 687), who led a revolt against the Umayyads from 685 to 687 in the name of Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya, though the latter did not support it. In the second half of the ninth century, the Fatimids, a family claiming descent from the Prophet's family through his daughter Fatima, dispatched missionaries across the Muslim world to win converts for their cause—namely, the right to assume the roles of spiritual and temporal ruler, combining them into one position, that of "imam-caliph." By 875, Fatimid missionaries had established footholds in North Africa, Syria, Yemen, Iran, Bahrain, and Central and South Asia. The dā'ī Abu 'Abd Allah al-Shi'i converted the Kutama Berbers of North Africa to Fatimid Isma'ili Shi'ism, allowing the Fatimids to move from Salamiyya, Syria, where they were threatened by the Abbasid dynasty, to greater safety in Tunisia, where they built their empire.

Propaganda of many types allowed premodern rulers in Islamic societies to bolster legitimacy, mobilize the populace, and suppress dissent. Political propaganda often touted the outstanding qualities and accomplishments of the ruler, especially his generosity, charity, justice, clemency, piety, devotion, abstention from sinful behavior, dedication to the faith, bravery, and exertion in defending the Muslim community and in championing the believers. Authors often announced these qualities explicitly in panegyric poetry, court chronicles, campaign narratives, biographies, diplomatic correspondence, and the introductions and dedications of treatises on diverse topics. Rulers also implicitly propagated similar messages by the construction of mosques, colleges of Islamic law, Sufi centers, hospitals, and so on; lavish support of the annual pilgrimage caravan; and refurbishment of places of worship in the main cities of their realm and at prominent shrines such as in Mecca, Medina, Jerusalem, or Karbala. Public ceremonies on holy days or during the month of Ramadan, including donations or free banquets, served a similar role. Rulers also enhanced their images as pious by public acts of personal repentance, such as Shah Tahmasp's Edict of Sincere Repentance in 1556, when he swore off drinking wine, listening to music, and so on, or visible acts of devotion, such as Shah 'Abbas I's barefoot pilgrimage from Isfahan to Mashhad in 1601 or the contemporary Moroccan king's televised sacrifice of two sheep on 'Id al-Adha (the festival of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca), one for himself and one symbolically for the Moroccan people. Rulers also boosted their images as defenders of the faith by sponsoring campaigns against public immorality and heretical views, closing down brothels and wine taverns, executing or punishing heretics, or burning the books of the Shi'is and the Mu'tazilis, as occurred upon Mahmud of Ghazna's conquest of Rayy in 1029, and philosophy books, as occurred in the Andalus under the Almohads.

Propaganda denouncing enemies of the realm or the faith has often served for the establishment of political legitimacy, political mobilization, and social control. The Abbasids and the Seljuqs made use of propaganda in the form of sponsored polemics about their Isma'ili rivals, both Fatimid and Nizari. In formally signed public documents, they proclaimed that the Fatimids' genealogy was forged. They also propagated what are collectively known as the "black legends," which accused the Isma'ilis of involvement in black magic, sexual deviance, and heresy. Many Muslim rulers such as the Hamdanid Sayf al-Dawlah bolstered their legitimacy by touting their victories in warfare against the Christian Byzantines. When the Fatimids conquered Egypt and most of Syria in the mid-tenth century, they continually announced that the main purpose behind the occupation was their dedication to conducting jihad against the Byzantines, in contrast to the failure of the current rulers in the region to pursue it vigorously. Propaganda played an enormous role in mobilizing Muslim forces to combat the Crusades, and it resulted in the authorship of many works on the virtues of jihad and the merits of Jerusalem and other holy sites in the Levant. The Zengids, and particularly Nur al-Din, developed what has been termed the unified jihad, a vigorous propaganda campaign against not only the Crusaders but also the Shi'is, on the logic that the latter weaken the Muslim community from within and are potential allies with the enemy from without. A particularly striking act of Nur al-Din was his commission of a lavish minbar, the pulpit from which the Friday sermons were read, intended to be installed at the mosque at the Dome of the Rock upon the eventual reconquest of Jerusalem from the Franks. In the 16th century, the Twelver Shi'i Safavid dynasty, aided by religious scholars from Jabal 'Amil in Syria, used da'wa to convert much of Iran's Sunni majority to Shi'i Islam. They enhanced their legitimacy by denouncing their Sunni neighbors, the Ottomans and the Uzbeks, as heretical foes. The Ottomans and the Uzbeks reciprocated, having fatwas issued declaring the Safavid Shi'is heretics and denouncing them in many polemical works.

Contemporary propaganda, in the form of multimedia and written releases, is an integral political tool for Muslim political ("Islamist") groups. Religious-nationalist groups such as the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood (al-Ikhwan al-Muslimun) and the Lebanese Shi'i party Hizbullah have long used propaganda to build support for their social, religious, and political platforms. Transnational Islamist militants, popularly and self-referentially called jihādīs, have adopted media and propaganda tactics started by religious-nationalist groups and greatly expanded them to fit their own needs. From its founding in 1928, the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood has published newsletters, newspapers, and magazines to propagate the movement's views. The movement continues to publish such materials but has since also wholeheartedly adopted the use of new technologies such as the Internet, running Arabic- and English-language websites. As part of its Internet strategy, the Ikhwan employs a team of its younger members as bloggers.

Hizbullah, which began as a national resistance movement against Israel's occupation of a large swath of southern Lebanon in the 1980s and 1990s, has evolved into a sophisticated political movement with national and regional influence. The party's growth has been aided significantly by its media outlets, key among them its satellite television station Al-Manar (The beacon), which began broadcasting in 1991. Hizbullah also publishes the newspaper Al-Intiqad (Criticism) and runs a radio station, Al-Nur, as well as several websites in Arabic, Hebrew, English, Persian, Spanish, and French.

The earliest transnational jihādī literature was published in the 1980s by various groups participating in the war against the Soviet Union's occupation of Afghanistan (1979–89). Thousands of foreigners, many of them Arab Muslims, traveled to Afghanistan in order to aid the various factions of Afghan mujahidin, or warriors of the faith. One of the most influential of these was 'Abd Allah 'Azzam, a Palestinian Sunni religious scholar who had completed a doctorate in Islamic law at Egypt's famed Azhar University, who was a key fundraiser for the anti-Soviet cause. He founded the Markaz al-Khidmah li-l-Mujahidin al-'Arab (Service Bureau for Arab Mujahidin) in Peshawar, Pakistan, which aided Arab fighters going to Afghanistan, many of whom entered via Pakistan. 'Azzam and his supporters also published propaganda materials, including the magazine Al-Jihad (The struggle), in which the exploits of the mujahidin were recounted.

Al-Qaeda and many other transnational jihad groups have their own media outlets through which they produce and distribute propaganda materials. Since 2003–4, the majority of this material is distributed online through a handful of web forums and affiliated websites, including the Ansar al-Mujahidin (Partisans of the warriors of faith) forum. Releases are made available for download via file-sharing websites, where copies are uploaded dozens of times and the URLs published in the forums. Major releases are advertised with animated banners, and forum users then upload the files to non-jihad websites such as Internet Archive and YouTube.

Al-Qaeda Central's (AQC) al-Sahab (The clouds) Foundation for Media Production is the premier jihad media outlet and regularly produces sophisticated videos through which its leaders broadcast their ideology and address their supporters, potential supporters, and enemies. Among its most sophisticated productions is the video series Rih al-Jannah (Wind of paradise), which highlights the group's martyrs in Afghanistan and Pakistan. As of this writing, it consists of five installments. Jihad videos mesh image and spoken word, including martial music in the form of anāshīd (religious and political anthems).

Despite al-Sahab's preeminence, other major jihad media outlets connected to other groups, many of them al-Qaeda allies and affiliates, exist, including al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb's (AQIM) al-Andalus Media, al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula's (AQAP) Al-Malahim Media, and the Islamic State of Iraq's al-Furqan Media. Many of these groups publish monthly or bimonthly Internet magazines, including al-Samud (Afghan Taliban) and Sada al-Malahim (AQAP). Several major "independent" jihad media outlets and distribution networks also exist, chief among them the Global Islamic Media Front (GIMF) and the al-Fajr Media Center, which distributes releases from AQC, AQAP, and AQIM. The GIMF produces translations of Arabic and Urdu-language releases from various transnational jihad groups, including AQC, and publishes essays and monographs from a host of jihad scholars and ideologues. Jihad propaganda is regularly produced in Urdu, Pashtu, Uzbek, Turkish, Dari, German, Uighur, Russian, Chechen, and French, in addition to Arabic and English, by various groups, each of which favors the native language(s) of its key support bases.

See also fundamentalism; jihad; media; Pan-Islamism; preaching

Further Reading

Jarret Brachman, Global Jihadism: Theory and Practice, 2008; David Commins, The Wahhabi Mission and Saudi Arabia, 2006; Farhad Daftary, The Assassin Legends: Myths of the Isma'ilis, 1995; Sumaiya Hamdani, Between Revolution and State: The Path to Fatimid Statehood, 2007; Brynjar Lia, Architect of Global Jihad: The Life of Al Qaeda Strategist Abu Mus'ab al-Suri, 2008; Hanna Rogan, Al-Qaeda's Online Media Strategies: From Abu Reuter to Irhabi007, 2007; Devin R. Springer, James L. Regens, and David N. Edger, Islamic Radicalism and Global Jihad, 2009.

CHRISTOPHER ANZALONE

prophecy

Prophecy is one of the key facets of the Islamic creed. In a famous hadith report, belief in the prophets or messengers of God is assigned the fourth rank among the six main articles of faith: belief in God, angels, scriptures, prophets, Judgment Day, and destiny. According to the Qur'an, a prophet will be sent to each nation (10:47; 16:36). The function of the prophet (nabī) or messenger (rasūl), the definition of prophecy (nubuwwa), and the definition of a prophetic message (risāla) are among the central questions of Islamic theology, philosophy, and mysticism. Disagreements among scholars on these issues have had consequential bearings on their conception of key notions such as sin, free will, and human nature. Many theologians have argued that since the Qur'an stresses that God will not punish any nation until a prophet is sent to them (17:15), the nations in which no prophet has been sent are exempt from blame for sin on the grounds that they have not yet been informed of God's laws.

Defining the role of the prophet and the significance of prophecy was central to the development of Islamic political thought. Muhammad, the Prophet of Islam, was not only the spiritual and religious leader of the first Muslim community but also its political leader. Since emulating the customary acts of the Prophet (sunna) is one of the main principles of Islamic faith and practice, this twofold role led Muslim thinkers to inquire about the relationship of spiritual wisdom to politics and to develop an Islamic view of the ideal leader and the ideal political system. This interest made medieval Muslim scholars—especially philosophers—amenable to Plato's theory of the philosopher-king and his preference for a knowledge-based aristocracy as the ideal form of the perfect state. It also triggered many scholarly attempts, in both classical and modern eras, to interpret the dual role that the Prophet played in the course of his mission in order to show that the close relationship between politics and religion in Islam does not lead to theocratic despotism.

Interpretation of the spiritual and political leadership of Prophet Muhammad also played a decisive role in the formation of the doctrine of the imamate in Shi'i Islam versus the notion of the caliph in the Sunni tradition. For Shi'is, the Prophet's role as mediator and interpreter of the word of God is one of the key justifications of the doctrine. This conception radically contrasts with the Sunni notion of the caliphate, at least according to classical Sunni theology. According to most Sunni theorists, the caliphs did not lay claim to ultimate or divine authority. This allowed later Muslim thinkers to conceive of a historical bifurcation of his spiritual and political leadership and contributed, for instance, to the emergence of the notion of the shaykh or master in Sufism, the mystical tradition of Islam.

Muslim theologians treated the topic of prophecy under five main rubrics: the definition and function of prophecy, miracles and justifications of prophecy, the definition and function of divine messages, proof of Muhammad's prophecy, and the human nature of prophets. Prophecy is described in the Qur'an as an expression of God's mercy and compassion toward humankind. Because God cares for humans, the beings he chose to be his vicegerents on Earth, he sends messages to guide them to the absolute truth of all beings: himself. The prophet is the one who receives this message; thus anyone who receives the messages of God achieves a dimension of prophecy. The Qur'an mentions three main ways in which the message of God may be conveyed to humankind. The first is true vision (al-ru'yā al-ṣāliha), the second is God's direct speech to the messenger, and the third and most common way is through Gabriel, the angel of revelation.

Most Muslim scholars distinguish between the function of a messenger (rasūl) and that of a prophet (nabī). The messenger is sent with a specific scripture and preaches a specific religion, such as Moses and the Torah, Jesus and the Gospel, and Muhammad and the Qur'an. The prophet, in contrast, preaches only the general message of the unity of God and is sometimes sent to remind humanity of the messages conveyed to them earlier, through previous messengers. The famous Mu'tazili theologian 'Abd al-Jabbar (d. 1025) challenged this notion, arguing that the messenger and the prophet are essentially identical. However, the distinction between messenger and prophet afforded Muslim thinkers, and especially mystics, some freedom in dealing with the notion of prophecy (nubuwwa). Many mystics, for example, bolstered their claims regarding the authority of Sufi shaykhs because of their participation in prophecy through visions.

Like Jewish and Christian theologians, Muslim theologians considered miracles the absolutely crucial proofs of prophecy. 'Abd al-Jabbar defines four main characteristics of miracles in his theological manual Sharh al-Usul al-Khamsa (Commentary on the five fundamental principles). Miracles must point to the divine power underlying them, temporally follow the claim to prophecy, support the nature of the message, and violate the laws deemed natural and immutable. Miracles are generally divided into material and rational categories, and the miracle of Islam is of the second type. In Islam the miracle proving the veracity of the Prophet Muhammad's mission is the scripture itself, the Qur'an.

Muslim theologians addressed the proof of the prophecy of Muhammad in various ways. In Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs (The ladder to God in the plains of knowing one's soul), Ghazali (d. 1111) holds that while it is impossible to define a prophetic message exactly, the truth of a message can be proven both rationally and effectively. In Ghazali's view, God grants prophets the honor of receiving divine messages as a form of grace. A contrasting approach was primarily concerned with proving that Muhammad was necessarily and indisputably a messenger through a systematic rational analysis, taken up by 'Abd al-Jabbar in his lengthy work Tathbit Dala'il al-Nubuwwa (Confirming the evidence of prophecy).

Some of the most interesting contributions to the Islamic theory of prophecy are found in theological, philosophical, and mystical discussions of the human nature of the Prophet. The Qur'an's description of Muhammad as an ordinary man and its assertion that prophets are essentially a select set of people led Muslim thinkers to analyze prophets ontologically and psychologically as perfect humans. Muslim philosophers appropriated Platonic and Aristotelian psychology, ethics, and politics and sought to harmonize them with Islamic religious concepts, especially the concept of prophecy. According to Farabi (d. 950), the prophet, like the philosopher, seeks to actualize his humanity by acquiring both practical and theoretical wisdom. Since he, like the philosopher-king, is concerned mainly with the most exalted human activities, or in Aristotle's language, thinking the forms or universal ideas that are in fact divine thoughts, the prophet is capable of leading his community to perfection. In order to assume this role as guide, however, the prophet must have a unique imaginative faculty that allows him to represent universal rational ideas in an immediate, practical way so that his people might understand, even if they are incapable of the rational inquiry practiced by expert philosophers. Strong imagination is thus an essential dimension of prophecy.

This naturalistic view of prophecy and prophetic psychology led to a similar perspective on religion and its role in society. In Kitab al-Milla (The book of religion), Farabi uses the term ri'asa (leadership or rule) to refer to religion. Similarly, he refers to the Prophet as the first leader or ruler of the community. Practical and theoretical wisdom, the main components of philosophy, are both required for the preservation of the virtuous religion that was revealed to the first ruler, the Prophet. However, philosophy remains superior to religion, for what the Prophet merely received as revelation and represented to his people through his imagination can be demonstrated rationally through philosophy. For Farabi, the true heirs of the Prophet are philosophers, and the best extrapolation of prophecy is rational inquiry, on both theoretical and practical levels.

Adopting the same Aristotelian framework, Ghazali analyzes the psychology of the prophet in Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs. He argues that what sets the prophet apart from other humans is not only his possession of theoretical and practical wisdom but also his possession of a strong imagination that enables him to represent rational, universal ideas to his people in tangible, sensible terms. The prophet is thus a perfect human who can use all his faculties, especially the rational and imaginative faculties, in the best way possible to attain happiness and lead his community to its attainment as well.

In his seminal work Fusus al-Hikam (The bezels of wisdom), the mystic and philosopher Ibn al-'Arabi (d. 1240) addresses the concept of the prophet from a radically existential perspective as the perfect human (al-insan al-kamil). The first chapter of his work presents the human-divine relationship as the most fundamental ontological reality, for the divine cannot be divine unless his divinity is recognized as such by a being with free will. The fulfillment of humanity consists in letting the absoluteness of the divine manifest itself in all its possible forms—as absolute justice, absolute beauty, and so on. There are as many possible divine manifestations as there are divine names. Through spiritual, philosophical, and contemplative exercise, the perfect human manages to let the divine names manifest themselves in each and every experience of his or her life. Ibn al-'Arabi's distinctive use of the term walī (saint) to refer to the prophets stems from the essential equation of the two categories in his thought. The only difference between prophets and other saints is that they have special or exclusive prophecy (nubuwwat ikhtisas), whereas saints have general prophecy (nubuwwa 'amma). Special prophecy is the grace God bestows upon the prophets to convey His special messages and laws to mankind. In Ibn al-'Arabi's ontology, prophecy is the highest, most perfect level of being human, and he interprets the entire history of prophecy as a series of attempts to perfect the fundamental human–divine relationship that constitutes the essence of human existence. Ibn al-'Arabi associates each prophet with a specific wisdom that reflects the way in which that prophet managed to let the divine manifest Himself through his life. Muhammad is the seal of the prophets because he is the prophet whose life best manifested the divine attributes. In other words, Muhammad achieved the highest level of human perfection.

See also al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); free will; Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); human nature; philosophy; theology

Further Reading

Abu al-'Ila 'Afifi, The Mystical Philosophy of Ibn al-'Arabi, 1938; Muhyi al-Din b. al-'Arabi, Bezels of Wisdom, translated by R.W.J. Austin, 1980; Charles E. Butterworth, Al-Farabi: The Political Writings, 2004; William Chittick, Ibn al-'Arabi: Heir to the Prophets, 2005; Abu Nasr Muhammad al-Farabi, On the Perfect State: Ara' Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila, translated by Richard Walzer, 1986; Abu Hamid al-Ghazali, On the Soul: Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs, translated by Yahya Abu Risha, 2001; Al-Qadi 'Abd al-Jabbar, Tathbit Dala'il al-Nubuwwa, translated by Gabriel Reynolds, 2010; Muhsin Mahdi, Al-Farabi and the Foundation of Islamic Political Philosophy, 2001.

AHMED ABDEL MEGUID

public interest

Throughout Islamic history one finds tensions between political and religious leaders over the right to determine and enact the public interest—a question situated at the intersection of politics, law, and religion. Islamic political authorities have always been concerned with policies that serve the interest of society as a whole. The second caliph 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), for instance, justified keeping the conquered land of southern Iraq under state control and with a land tax (kharāj) because that would serve the public good (khayr, 'umūm al-naf'). During the first few centuries of Islam, political authorities controlled the discussion of the public interest—the Arabic word frequently used was maṣlaha, literally "well-being" or "welfare"; but with the weakening of the caliphate after the tenth century, Islamic legal scholars challenged the dominance of secular authorities by defining public interest in religious terms. Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111) was the first jurisprudent to articulate that the objective of the divinely revealed law is to protect humankind's maṣlaha by preserving their religion, life, intellect, progeny, and offspring; whatever benefits these five basic necessities of human existence constitutes a maṣlaha, and whatever does not runs counter to the interest of Muslim society. Grounding the determination of public interest in the religious law (i.e., the shari'a) meant not only that decisions by political authorities received legitimacy by being in agreement with the divine purpose of the law but also that religious scholars ('ulama') had greater say in the public policies of the state. Various jurists after Ghazali refined and enlarged his concept of public interest to the point that it became the overriding principle to determine all rulings not explicitly addressed in the revealed sources of Islamic law (cf. Shatibi [d. 1388]).

After about the 14th century, Muslim writings on public interest were dominated by the concept of siyāsa shar'iyya—articulated in detail by the Hanbali scholars Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) and Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350). This concept emphasizes that all political policies have to be governed by the religious law and that the political ruler and his functionaries have to implement policies and conduct state affairs in consonance with it. In contrast to the concept of maṣlaha, siyāsa shar'iyya envisions the whole of the political sphere to be guided by religious consideration and to follow the procedures of Islamic law (fiqh). This view leaves little room for the ruler to use purely political expediency in determining state policies in areas in which he hitherto was granted exclusive and discretionary authority—even if only by his de facto power—namely, extra-qadi jurisdiction, penal law (especially ta'zīr), and the administration of the state. While the regime of siyāsa shar'iyya provides religious scholars with greater power in political affairs and the ability to curtail governmental excesses, close cooperation between political and religious authorities also implicates the latter in state policies and allows for vesting laws promulgated out of political considerations with the mantle of religious legitimacy.

In the modern period, the tug of war between religious and political leaders over the sphere of law has been won mostly by the political authorities. Islamic law and its traditional practice have been marginalized in its application mainly to personal status law. In order to reinsert Islamic law into the public sphere, Muslim intellectuals have turned toward the concepts of maṣlaha and siyāsa shar'iyya to accommodate the desire of the state for all-inclusive authority while retaining an Islamic identity. The state receives its authority to legislate, administer justice, and implement its policies by doing so in the public interest (maṣlaha) within the limits of the shari'a. Depending on interpretation and political circumstances, maṣlaha may be optimistically seen as a check on unlimited state power or pessimistically viewed as a mere rubber stamp for its abuses. For instance, reinstating the Ottoman Constitution in 1908 was hailed as a way to uphold the people's maṣlaha; the abolition of polygamy in Tunisia in 1956 was justified in the name of public interest, serving the country on its way to modernization; and the Syrian jurist Muhammad Sa'id Ramadan al-Buti (b. 1929) supported the state's right to restrict freedom of speech with the argument that the maṣlaha of the people's intellect is thereby preserved from deviation and error.

See also Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); governance; Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); shari'a; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya, Muhammad b. Abi Bakr. The Legal Methods in Islamic Administration, translated by Alaeddin Kharofa, 2000;
Ibn Taymiyya, Ahmad b. 'Abd al-Halim. Ibn Taymiyya on Public and Private Law in Islam: or Public Policy in Islamic Jurisprudence, translated by Omar A. Farrukh, 1966; Abdullahi Ahmed An-Na'im, Islam and the Secular State: Negotiating the Future of Shari'a, 2008; Felicitas Opwis, "Islamic Law and Legal Change: The Concept of Maṣlaha in Classical and Contemporary Islamic Legal Theory," in Shari'a: Islamic Law in the Contemporary Context, edited by Abbas Amanat and Frank Griffel, 2007.

FELICITAS OPWIS

public opinion

In theory, Muslims have always been free to speak their minds. Islam grants individual believers the freedom to interpret God's commandments on their own, without the intermediation of a clerical class. Nevertheless, from the early days of Islam, Muslims have been pressured to weigh what they say and to refrain from expressing views liable to anger powerful groups. Consequently, in no Muslim-governed state has public opinion, which aggregates publicly expressed individual views, ever conveyed the distribution of actual thoughts and true preferences. It also has reflected the prevailing structure of political power. Incentives to avoid expressions unfavorable to the political status quo have been particularly strong and public opinion most heavily distorted under centrally controlled regimes.

On matters pertaining to religion, organized repression of Muslim masses has never assumed the extreme form epitomized by the Spanish Inquisition. Nevertheless, Muslim-governed states of the past discouraged, and also punished, nonconformist interpretations of Islam. Under the threat of persecution, even some of the greatest Muslim philosophers, including Ibn Rushd (Averroes), Ghazali, and Farabi, disguised their most controversial views, including those bearing on politics.

States of the Muslim world tend to be repressive by contemporary political standards. One indication is their poor standings in global indexes of political freedom prepared annually by Freedom House, an international nongovernmental organization that conducts research and advocacy on democracy, political freedom, and human rights. On a 0 (best) to 7 (worst) scale, the population-weighted average of the 2009 civil liberties index was 4.46 for the Organization of Islamic States (OIS) and 1.53 for the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the club of advanced industrialized countries. As for the press freedom index, which runs from 0 (best) to 100 (worst), it was 63.42 for the OIS and 25.35 for the OECD. Another indication of strong repression is that many Muslim states tightly restrict polls aimed at identifying public opinion scientifically through anonymous surveys. Still another indication is that individual citizens exercise great caution in speaking to reporters and researchers on politically controversial issues.

In countries with regimes exceptionally intolerant of dissent, such as Libya, Tunisia, and Syria, reliable opinion surveys are practically impossible. In less repressive Arab regimes, Arab Barometer, an organization led by American-based scholars, has started to conduct scientific polling. Beyond Arab countries, public opinion surveys have been conducted regularly in a few countries, including Turkey and Indonesia. On social, political, economic, and religious matters, surveys in both Arab and non-Arab countries point to substantial differences between the actual preferences of the masses and those of incumbent regimes.

Where pollsters have been able to inquire about political preferences, public opinion tends to be highly favorable to democracy. It has been suggested that this pattern, documented through the World Values Survey, an academic project that conducts periodic investigations to assess cultural trends around the world, reflects a yearning for religious freedom rather than for expressive liberties generally. Another hypothesis is that the surveys reveal not deep-rooted attitudes but marginal preferences, which are high precisely because of limited political freedoms.

In the Muslim world, freedom of speech tends to be especially constrained and public opinion particularly difficult to measure on matters related to Islam. Islamist violence against those considered hostile to Islam induces self-censorship even in secular states such as Turkey and Syria. In some countries, including Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Iran, states have a tacit bargain with religious bodies whereby the latter uphold religious taboos and persecute religious nonconformists with impunity in return for granting the political status quo Islamic legitimacy. Secular regimes of the modern Muslim world limit freedom of speech on religion in their own ways by punishing public challenges from Islamists to the secularist-preferred interpretations of Islam.

See also censorship; civil society; democracy; freedom

Further Reading

Timur Kuran, Private Truths, Public Lies: The Social Consequences of Preference Falsification, 1995; Kanan Makiya, Republic of Fear: The Politics of Modern Iraq, 1998; Mansoor Moaddel, ed., Values and Perceptions of the Islamic and Middle Eastern Publics, 2007; Trevor Mostyn, Censorship in Islamic Societies, 2002; Charles K. Rowley and Nathanael Smith, "Islam's Democracy Paradox: Muslims Claim to Like Democracy, So Why Do They Have So Little?" Public Choice 139, no. 3 (2009); Mark Tessler and Amaney Jamal, "Political Attitude Research in the Arab World: Emerging Opportunities," PS: Political Science and Politics 39, no. 3 (2006).

TIMUR KURAN

public sphere

The idea of the public sphere is Greco-Roman in origin, although its institutionalization in Western history is more specifically Roman, since it reflects the experience of the Roman republic. The Latin adjective publicus (public) and the simultaneously normative and material spaces it demarcates are framed in a polar relationship with privatus (private). Both refer, quite concretely, to a good or thing—that is, res. The Roman republic is the res publica (public good) or also, in one word, respublica. The Roman characterization of the "public" and its articulation in a social sphere delimit a new type of collective bond detached from the primordial forms of authority that singled out domains of exclusive possession and embodied the patriarchal origin of the private sphere.

The notion of the public was first Christianized in the European Middle Ages (respublica christiana) and then became a key idea within modern transformations, first through movements of reform within Christianity, then in the emergence of a bourgeois world spearheaded by the intellectual vanguards of the Enlightenment. In such narratives, the rise of a Western modern public sphere is tied to the formation of a civil society.

The best-known contemporary theorist of the public sphere, Jürgen Habermas, provides evidence that bourgeois gathered mostly for mundane and self-interested reasons rooted in private concerns—to discuss stock exchange trends or prices of colonial commodities, for example—in such places as English coffeehouses. But in debating such problems, they started to deliberate on ways to protect their private interests from potential abuses of the ruler. In the process, a modern public sphere emerged beyond the legalistic presuppositions of a classic res publica by carving out autonomous and potentially critical spaces of debate. Such dynamics emphasize rationality and openness in deliberation. The resulting crystallization of a "public opinion" facilitated by the diffusion of newspapers reflected the often conflicted yet broadly cohesive processes of forming a rational consensus about the common good within an increasingly differentiated modern society, with the bourgeoisie at its center.

The inclusiveness implied by such a narrative has been subject to criticism. The formation of public spheres also reflects patterns of exclusion—of workers, women, and other nonelite groups. Alongside a bourgeois, liberal-democratic public sphere, there have always been a plethora of "alternative" public spheres that challenged the former's hegemonic pretensions. This development also affected the colonial and postcolonial Muslim-majority world. The view of the modern state as representing the general interest of society is also the result of the process of emergence of public spheres. At this level, the Western prototypes and the Muslim colonial and postcolonial versions of the public sphere show a high degree of convergence. Voices in the public sphere might be critical of state policies, yet they are ingrained into its governance mechanisms through their contribution to the education of the responsible citizen, while they also try to make state policies more just, democratic, and egalitarian.

The notion of the public sphere rests, then, on the idea of arguing, acting, and deliberating in common through a rational pursuit of collective interest. Activity within such a sphere requires a fair degree of transparency of communication among the actors involved in the process. This is why the public sphere is a wider and, at the same time, more specific concept than that of civil society. While a civil society always produces a public sphere, the opposite is not necessarily true, because a public sphere can exist without a civil society—particularly because in some historical instances and contemporary cases the self-interested, liberal, and bourgeois type of agency that aids the formation of civil society is not a necessary condition for a public sphere to emerge and thrive. The public sphere is not just a site of fruitful communication and orderly representation of interests mediated by open communication; it is also an arena where inherited notions of social justice and social order are elaborated on and contested. Habermas underplayed the role of religious traditions, and in particular of radical protest movements, in the conflicted formation of modern public spheres. He neglected the mechanisms through which the social and communicative activity within public spheres reshapes traditional norms and concepts of justice and order.

The idea of the public sphere is therefore at the same time culturally embedded and comparable across various civilizations. Yet the way a sense of the public contributes to social life varies considerably, depending on several factors: modalities of transaction over the definition of the common good; the search for equitable solutions to collective problems; shifting boundaries of inclusion and exclusion; background notions of personality, responsibility, and justice; but also the degree of legitimacy of existing states and their capacity to control, manipulate, or repress autonomous public sphere dynamics.

An enlarged focus on the genesis of public spheres opens the door to a comparative look at various trajectories of their emergence within civilizations situated outside of the Western core of modernity. The ubiquity of public spheres and their autonomous dynamics outside of the West works against the idea of Oriental despotism, according to which the moral cohesion of a community is engineered by the despot. A sense of viable public spheres can be supported by Muslim identities in a variety of Muslim-majority societies. Islamic reformers have worked particularly well with the communicative instruments and normative tools of the public spheres since the end of the 19th century. The semiformal articulation of the public sphere through the press was particularly suitable to the reform discourse and to its ambivalent relationship toward the institutional structure of the colonial and postcolonial states. Islamist voices inherit this type of vocation and extend it to a wider circle of participants and activists.

A particular articulation of the public sphere in an Islamic context has been called "public Islam," whereby Islamic tenets are used to justify the cohesion of Muslim-majority societies irrespective of the whims of autocrats, whether traditional or modern. Many of the characteristics of traditional Muslim public spheres—their moral cohesiveness, the multiplicity of informal ties therein, or the possibilities of eruption of crowdlike confrontation—have persisted and evolved: given the basic premises of the modern state as well as of modern communication, they have undergone dramatic changes. New social actors such as professionals, intellectuals, and media experts have emerged, often in close relation with modern forms of collective action—whether social movements or political parties. Concomitantly several new religious groups or movements—from Sufi orders to modern Islamist networks—have carved out distinct public spaces by becoming largely disembedded from traditional Islamic institutions.

While the emergence of new cultural and political actors in a variety of public spheres attests to a potential of democratization, it can also exacerbate their confrontation with modern political regimes. As a result, the autonomy of the public spheres can be severely undermined. In this ambivalent process, Islam has often become the hub of a unique public sphere, based on a complex tradition, aware of the modern conditions of communication and connectedness, and nesting in spaces tensely coexisting with an official sphere dominated by the state and state-controlled media.

In sum, the public sphere cannot be understood as the exclusive prerogative of modern, Western societies or of mature democracies based on formalized templates of individual rights and political participation. Semiformal articulations of Muslim identities can also facilitate the emergence of public spheres, while the coercive and institutional power of the modern state may both further and limit this potential.

See also civil society; modernity

Further Reading

Michael Gasper, The Power of Representation: Publics, Peasants and Islam in Egypt, 2009; Charles Hirschkind, The Ethical Soundscape: Cassette Sermons and Islamic Counterpublics, 2006; Armando Salvatore and Dale F. Eickelman, eds., Public Islam and Common Good, 2004; Armando Salvatore, The Public Sphere: Liberal Modernity, Catholicism, Islam, 2007.

ARMANDO SALVATORE

pulpit

The traditional elevated platform specifically used by preachers in the Islamic tradition (minbar) has its origins in the example of the Prophet Muhammad, who customarily delivered his sermons while standing on a wooden dais located at the front of the mosque adjoining his house in Medina. This pulpit, which also contained a seat, is believed to have been associated with the raised ceremonial chair of a judge or the throne of a ruler. Thus, while it offered some practical benefit insofar as it enabled the speaker's voice to be better heard, it also expressed a symbolic statement of authority. This first pulpit was also apparently portable, as history records that later successors of the Prophet moved it so they could use it in other mosques.

The perceived importance of the pulpit increased with the continuing development of a fixed ritual order for the Friday noon prayer service, which included the delivery of a sermon from this special podium. Hence, the mere presence of the pulpit in a mosque announced its privileged status since, traditionally, the Friday noon prayer service was restricted to one location, or in a large city, perhaps including a few carefully distinguished central mosques. Likewise, the prestige and thus the influence of such a mosque was often enhanced by the size, shape, and artistic quality expressed in its pulpit. While the general contours of this mosque furnishing were defined by traditional precedent, the architectural ingenuity and skilled craftsmanship displayed in the execution of particular classical versions, in wood, stone, or ceramic tiles, have made an appreciation of their particular features a notable subcategory in the history of Islamic art.

Typically, in its classic form, a mosque pulpit is aligned against the wall that marks the direction toward which the congregation faces in lining up for prayer, usually to the left of the empty niche (miḥrāb) marking the orientation toward Mecca. The speaker mounts the pulpit by steps that lead to a flat base, behind which is a bench or seat that the preacher occupies briefly according to set rubrics. It is reserved for use at the Friday noon prayer and only by the designated preacher. Hence, access to the authoritative pulpit is often a matter of considerable political sensitivity, and its regulation is normally entrusted to a religious ministry in states with predominantly Muslim populations.

While Muslims still widely maintain a profound respect for the mosque pulpit and what it represents, the premise that the Friday noon prayer service, together with the sermon, may be conducted only in designated mosques has largely faded. In its place, a less formal view of the pulpit has emerged. Among many Muslims, a strong reformist impulse has arisen that favors a return to simplicity, which has led to a markedly diminished style of ceremonial furnishings. In this spirit, many new or recently remodeled mosques have installed merely token pulpits, or the preacher stands on the floor, although often equipped with a microphone.

See also Friday prayer; mosque; preaching

Further Reading

Richard T. Antoun, Muslim Preacher in the Modern World: A Jordanian Case Study in Contemporary Perspective, 1989; Asghar Fathi, "The Islamic Pulpit as a Medium of Political Communication," Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 20, no. 1 (1981).

PATRICK D. GAFFNEY

punishment

Punishment in an Islamic context is a crucial element within the larger notion of God's justice ('adl). For justice to prevail, evil must be punished just as good must be rewarded, both in this world and in the afterlife. God judges humankind on the Day of the Resurrection, while judges and rulers dispense punishments on Earth. Muslim conceptions of political leadership stress the leader's responsibility to maintain justice and uphold the law, which entails actively punishing wrongdoing. God's punishment of a disobedient life is internment in hell.

Even in the Qur'an, hell has many names, and later it was frequently described as having seven levels, reminiscent of the Inferno of Dante, who indeed cribbed his vision of hell from Islamic sources. Muslims who died with unrepented mortal sins (kabā'ir) spent a terminal period in hell before ascending to paradise; others became eternal denizens. Punishment in hell was imagined first as environmental. Hell was a vast, volcanic landscape full of fetid winds, acid rain, and burning brimstone. The hellbound were subjected to these conditions and harassed by serpents and scorpions. Hell was also a prison and torture chamber. Hell's wardens were gruesome angels (zabāniya) who busied themselves meting out punishments particular to the various sins of the damned.

In Islamic law, punishments can be divided into three separate categories: crimes with fixed penalties (hudūd), retaliation (qiṣāṣ), and discretionary punishment (ta'zīr). Crimes with fixed penalties are murder (qatl), theft (sariqa), brigandage or highway robbery (ḥirāba or qaṭ' al-ṭarīq), adultery and fornication (zinā), false accusation of adultery (qadhf), drinking wine (shurb al-khamr), and apostasy (irtidād or ridda). The punishments for these crimes are stipulated in the Qur'an or the sunna, and they are thus nonnegotiable and fixed, even though there are various positions on precisely what the punishments should be. Reciprocal retaliation (qiṣāṣ) for murder or injury is allowed, at least in principle, by Islamic law. However, the case of bodily injury even up to death is often treated as a tort, where the victim or the victim's family receives a settlement (dīya) from the perpetrator. Discretionary punishment covers all other kinds of crimes and torts. A judge adjudicates between the claimants and renders a judgment at his discretion; these punishments may include admonition, fines, public humiliation, incarceration, flogging, or even the death penalty.

Muslim legal theorists did not advance a distinct theory of penology, the study of crime and punishment, explicitly. The desirability of restitution and retribution certainly was prominent, given that achieving justice was the goal of punishment. However, deterrence can also be found mentioned alongside as a positive result of punishment, thought of as a contribution to social order. Rehabilitation of a criminal through punishment, while occasionally mentioned, was not a prominent dimension of Muslim legal thinkers' views on punishment.

See also apostasy; blasphemy; justice; rights

Further Reading

Mohamed S. El-Awa, Punishment in Islamic Law, 2000; Christian Lange, Justice, Punishment, and the Medieval Muslim Imagination, 2008; Rudolph Peters, Crime and Punishment in Islamic Law: Theory and Practice from the Sixteenth to the Twenty-First Century, 2005.

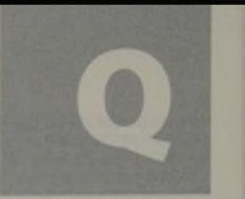
NICHOLAS G. HARRIS



Qadaris

The verb qadara in Qur'anic usage means God's power to determine all events; the noun qadar denotes the eternal decree of God. Oddly enough, the term Qadaris (qadariyya) was given in early sources to a group of theologians in the late seventh and early eighth centuries, mainly from Basra and Syria, who believed the opposite: that evil cannot be created by God but is determined by the human being, and accordingly, if humans have free will then God's foreknowledge is at variance with this freedom.

The debate on this subject has its roots in Qur'anic discourse, where it is ambivalent whether divine guidance entails enforcement: "God thereby leads many astray, and guides many. But the dissolute alone He leads astray" (Q. 2:25–26; 2:7; 4:109; 99:8). Moreover, it carries on the pre-Islamic fatalistic view—namely, that everything is predestined by the forces of time (dahr). But it also shows hints of the acculturation process of Muslims within the multicultural Hellenistic, Byzantine, and Iranian milieu. The Qadari movement could be seen both as a political reaction against the Umayyad dynasty, who maintained that their rule was decreed by God, and as a group of pious individuals reflecting on the design of God's salvation plan. Their doctrine spread in various centers of the empire and underwent a process of elaboration, ultimately leading to more intricate theological systems during the later part of the eighth century.

Hadith compendia attest to the existence of this group and the controversy over predestination or "free will" as early as the last quarter of the seventh century in Syria during the reign of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (r. 717–19). Ṭabaqāt books and history works from the early ninth century give the impression that these issues were ardently debated in Syria and in Basra before a consensus was reached concerning belief in divine decree and determination during the late eighth and early ninth centuries, mainly among Sunni scholars. Nevertheless, most of the material and reports are of doubtful authenticity and represent later views of historians and heresiographers.

The earliest advocates of the tenet of "asserting the value of human activity" (that evil cannot be created by God and thus the human being is responsible for his or her actions) include Ma'bad al-Juhani al-Basri (executed in 704), Hasan al-Basri (d. 728), Ghaylan al-Dimashqi and Salih b. Suwayd (both executed ca. 732), and Makhul al-Dimashqi (d. 731). Two of these thinkers are from Basra; the others are Syrians. The origins of this tenet are obscure. The Syrian religious scholar Awza'i (d. 773) claims that Ma'bad and Ghaylan were the first to speak of qadar and that this precept was formulated under Christian influence. Modern scholarship also argues to that effect, finding similarities with John of Damascus on the issue that human beings had been created with their own power by God.

All these names are related in one way or another to Hasan al-Basri and his circle. Yet Hasan al-Basri was a quietist, whereas Ma'bad joined the revolt of Ibn al-Ash'ath in 702, and Ghaylan and Salih b. Suwayd were politically active against Umayyad rule in Syria. The Qadaris did not form a homogeneous group but should rather be seen as a loose collection of political activists as well as early rational theologians.

The qadar controversy in Syria was seen primarily as a political movement calling for egalitarianism and for social and political justice, thus threatening the social order with its opposition to the Umayyad ideology. Later, the Umayyad caliph Yazid III (d. 743), who came to power as a result of an insurrection backed by the Syrian Qadaris, formulated a radical program that threatened the foundation of Umayyad legitimacy. However, Murad argues against an exaggerated association of Qadarism with political activism. In Basra, on the other hand, Qadari ideas spread mainly among pious ascetics; later, during the eighth century, it became to a large extent the "ideology of the middle class," as the prominent scholar of Islam Josef van Ess maintains.

Modern scholars agree that Hasan al-Basri held Qadari views, although later Sunni scholars made great efforts to rehabilitate his image by claiming that he held some Qadari ideas early in his life but that he turned away from them soon after. Later Mu'tazilis see him as their major forerunner. The alleged exchange of letters between Hasan al-Basri and some of his contemporaries concerning the issue of qadar are most probably a later forgery. The authorship of the two anti-Qadari epistles attributed to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz and Hasan b. Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya is also contested.

See also Mu'tazilis; theology

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Early Muslim Dogma: A Source-Critical Study, 1981; György Fodor, "Some Aspects of the Qadar-Controversy in Early Islam," The Arabist: Budapest Studies in Arabic 1, no. 57–65 (1988); Richard M. Frank, "The Structure of Created Causality According to al-Aš'arī," Studia Islamica, 25, 13–75 (1966); Suleiman Ali Mourad, Early Islam between Myth and History: Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (d. 110h/728ce) and the Formation of His Legacy in Classical Islamic Scholarship, 2006; Hassan Qasim Murad, "Jabr and Qadar in Early Islam: A Reappraisal of Their Political and Religious Implications," in Islamic Studies Presented to Charles J. Adams, 1991; Daud Rahbar, God of Justice: A Study in the Ethical Doctrine of the Qur'ān, 1960; H. Ringgren, Studies in Arabian Fatalism, 1955; Josef van Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3. Jahrhundert Hidschra: Eine Geschichte des religiösen Denkens im frühen Islam, vols. 1–4, 1991–96; William Montgomery Watt, The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, 1973; Idem, Free Will and Predestination in Early Islam, 1948; A. J. Wensinck, The Muslim Creed: Its Genesis and Historical Development, 1932.

MAHER JARRAR

Qaddafi, Muʿammar (1942–2011)

Born in the Libyan desert, Muʿammar al-Qaddafi was the only surviving son of a poor Bedouin family. With formal schooling available only in larger population centers, his early education was limited to traditional religious subjects taught by local tribal teachers.

Qaddafi finished his secondary schooling in the coastal town of Misurata, where he recruited like-minded students to a political philosophy based on Islam, social equality, and Arab unity. Realizing that the army was the only organization in the country capable of overthrowing the monarchy, Qaddafi enrolled in the Royal Military Academy in Benghazi, graduating in 1965.

Having become an admirer of Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser in the 1960s, Qaddafi formed the Libyan Free Unionist Officers, a group of some 70 army officers that overthrew the Libyan monarchy on September 1, 1969. Once they had seized power, Qaddafi became commander in chief of the armed forces and de facto head of state. The early policies of the revolutionary government reflected Qaddafi's deep Islamist roots, together with his strong support for Arab nationalism. The consumption of alcohol was banned, nightclubs were closed, churches were converted into mosques, Islamic punishment was adopted in principle if not always in fact, and Arabic was decreed the only language acceptable for official communications.

In late 1972, Qaddafi began to give his strain of Arab nationalism a theoretical underpinning in his Third Universal Theory, which advocated a third way between capitalism and communism, concluding that socialism was the optimal system for Libya.

In the first volume (1975) of The Green Book, Qaddafi's three-part political manifesto and ideological guide, he emphasized the role of religion in society without making any specific mention of the role of Islam. In the second volume (1978), he explored the economic dimensions of the Third Universal Theory, and in the third (1979), he developed its social concepts.

The reformist elements of Qaddafi's approach to Islam, including the revival of Islamic law, a rejection of the hadith, and the purely human role of the Prophet, were a deliberate attempt to reduce the role of the 'ulama' (religious scholars) in Libya. As the regime moved to make Islam a domestic and international instrument of the revolution, Qaddafi used the process of legal reform to centralize control over all aspects of religious life in Libya and to take control of the waqf property (religious endowments), destroying the cultural and political autonomy of the 'ulama' and reducing the influence of the Sanusi Sufi order that had been allied with the Libyan monarchy.

Qaddafi was largely successful in neutralizing the traditional religious leadership and the Islamist opposition to the regime fragmented under constant pressure from government security forces. Various Islamist opposition groups, including Excommunication and Withdrawal (al-Takfir wa-l-Hijra), Islamic Jihad, Islamic Liberation Party, Islamic Martyrs' Movement, Libyan Islamic Group, and the Muslim Brotherhood, continued to be active in Libya; however, none of them posed a serious threat to the Qaddafi regime.

On December 21, 1988, Pan Am Flight 103 from London to New York was destroyed by a bomb over Lockerbie, Scotland, killing 243 passengers, 16 crew members, and 11 people on the ground. Qaddafi's security forces were suspected of having planned the bombing and, on January 31, 2001, Abdel Basset 'Ali al-Megrahi, a Libyan agent, was given a life sentence for his involvement in the bombing. He was released, however, on August 20, 2009, by the Scottish government on humanitarian grounds. In 2007, Ayman al-Zawahiri, al-Qaeda's second-in-command, condemned Qaddafi as an enemy of Islam and announced that the Libyan Islamic Group had joined al-Qaeda.

See also North Africa

Further Reading

Mahmoud Mustafa Ayoub, Islam and the Third Universal Theory: The Religious Thought of Mu'ammar al-Qadhadhafi, 1987; George Joffé, "Qadhafi's Islam in Historical Perspective," in Qadhafi's Libya, 1969–1994, edited by Dirk Vandewalle, 1995; Ann Elizabeth Mayer, "Islamic Resurgence or New Prophethood: The Role of Islam in Qadhafi's Ideology," in Islamic Resurgence in the Arab World, edited by Ali E. Hillal Dessouki, 1982; Amal Obeidi, Political Culture in Libya, 2001; Muʿammar al-Qaddafi, The Green Book, 1975; Ronald Bruce St John, Libya: From Colony to Independence, 2008; Idem, Libya: Continuity and Change, 2011; Dirk Vandewalle, A History of Modern Libya, 2006.

RONALD BRUCE ST JOHN

al-Qaeda

Al-Qaeda (al-Qaʿida) is a militant Islamist network founded by Osama bin Laden (1957–2011) in Pakistan around 1988 or 1989. Its initial purpose was to provide moral and financial assistance to Afghani war veterans who fought against the communist Red Army and to pursue jihad after the retreat of the Soviets from Afghanistan. Its name comes from the Arabic word qā'ida ("the foundation" or "the base") and refers to a military base that would act as a vanguard to reach an ideal society where an Islamic state prevails. Al-Qaeda came to worldwide public attention after the deadly attacks of September 11, 2001, on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.

The Birth of al-Qaeda: The Afghan Volunteer Warriors

Al-Qaeda was born in the midst of the Afghan resistance to the Soviet invasion in the late 1980s. Its ideological founder was 'Abdallah 'Azzam (1941–89), a Palestinian political activist and member of the Muslim Brotherhood. 'Azzam grew up in the Palestinian territories and received a PhD in Islamic law from Azhar University in Cairo in 1973. He later taught at King 'Abd al-'Aziz University in Saudi Arabia and in Pakistan. When the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan in December 1979, 'Azzam issued a fatwa (legal opinion) declaring that jihad against an occupying power was a fard 'ayn (i.e., an individual obligation upon every Muslim) rather than a fard kifāya (an obligation falling upon the community as a whole). In Pakistan, he met with Bin Laden, a young and wealthy Saudi businessman who had relocated to the region to help organize the Arab Afghan volunteers for jihad. In 1984, both men founded the Maktab Khadamat al-Mujahidin al-'Arab (MAK, translated as "Afghan Services Bureau") to raise funds and recruit foreign volunteers for the war against the Soviets. The MAK, which was a forerunner of al-Qaeda, received considerable financial support not only from Bin Laden but also from other sources, such as the United States, the United Kingdom, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Pakistan, and other Muslim states. The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) in particular provided the group with covert funds to help defeat the Soviet Union in the context of the cold war. After the volunteer army eventually forced the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops in 1989, the MAK's agenda expanded globally, its name was changed to al-Qa'ida al-'Askariya (the military base), and its mission was redefined: to oppose the military and economic intervention of non-Muslim states in predominantly Muslim lands.

The Ideological Roots of al-Qaeda: Doctrine and Main Figures

Ideologically, al-Qaeda drew on a core of Islamic sources and scholars. The Egyptian scholar Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) had a significant impact on the founders of al-Qaeda. Bin Laden had read Qutb's works at a young age and had attended lectures by his brother, Muhammad Qutb, who at the time was a popular professor of Islamic studies in Saudi Arabia. By declaring that a Muslim leader who did not rule according to God's principles was an apostate, Sayyid Qutb framed an ideology of takfīr (excommunication) that became a cornerstone in al-Qaeda's doctrinal system; he is often considered to have established the theoretical foundations for radical Islamist organizations. Others who helped shape the ideology of the group include the aforementioned 'Abdallah 'Azzam and Ayman al-Zawahiri, an Egyptian surgeon and leader of Egyptian Islamic Jihad. The organization's ideology can be seen as a merger between Bin Laden's interest in expelling foreigners from Muslim lands (the far enemy) and Zawahiri's obsession with fighting off the Egyptian state (the near enemy). In 1988, Sayyid Imam al-Sharif (b. 1950), known as Dr. Fadl, provided the jihadist movement with a practical guide to prepare for jihad: Al-'Umda fi I'dad al-'Udda [li-l-Jihad] (The Essentials of Making Ready [for Jihad]). The book became one of the most important texts in the training of prospective jihadists.

Al-Qaeda has drawn on selective sources in the Islamic tradition, such as the early hadith scholar Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855) and the medieval jurist Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328). The group also endorsed certain doctrines of Salafism and Wahhabism. Because of its adoption of the concept of takfīr, al-Qaeda has often been compared to the early Kharijis.

Al-Qaeda also found theoretical and practical inspiration in several modern militant organizations that acted as its forerunners, such as the Ikhwan that rose against King 'Abd al-'Aziz b. 'Abd al-Rahman b. Sa'ud (1876–1953) in Saudi Arabia in the 1920s and the Egyptian al-Takfir wa-l-Hijra (Excommunication and Withdrawal), created in 1969 by Shukri Mustafa (1942–87).

Al-Qaeda's Organizational Development and Structure: A Cluster Network

Following the end of the Soviet-Afghan War (1978–89), Bin Laden returned to Saudi Arabia. When Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990, he offered his services to the Saudi government to organize volunteers to fight the Iraqi troops in Kuwait. Saudi Arabia turned down his offer and instead allowed U.S. armed forces to deploy into its territory. This decision, backed by the Saudi clerical establishment, radicalized al-Qaeda and shifted its focus: the Saudi government was declared apostate and became the first enemy. Bin Laden went into exile in Sudan, where he expanded the movement with new training facilities and infrastructure. In 1996, he was expelled from Sudan and returned to Afghanistan, then under the control of the Taliban. A declaration of war against the United States and its allies was issued in 1998 through a fatwa calling for their deaths in order to free Muslim lands. That same year Bin Laden created the World Islamic Front for Global Jihad against Christian Crusaders and Zionist Jews, an umbrella organization to bring together scattered jihadist groups. As a result of the attacks of September 11, 2001, the U.S. led a bombing campaign in Afghanistan in October 2001, which dispersed the movement's leadership and changed its tactics. Al-Qaeda continued to function as a decentralized cluster of various groups operating independently in different geographical locations.

Though the current structure of al-Qaeda remains a mystery, it is certainly a loose network, with a horizontal organizational structure composed of various cells that also operate vertically. Al-Qaeda has managed to make use of modern technologies for its recruitment and propaganda. It has created its own media outlet, As-Sahab Foundation for Islamic Media Publication, which distributes and promotes the group's messages. It has also achieved a wide Internet presence, reaching a global audience for its views and controlling its public image.

Al-Qaeda Today

Al-Qaeda is believed to have carried out several major terrorist attacks worldwide: on tourist resorts in Aden, Yemen (1992); on the World Trade Center in New York (1993); on two U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya (1998); on the U.S.S. Cole in Yemen (2000); and on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C. (2001). Al-Qaeda has achieved its goal of attracting world attention to its cause and spreading fear among its enemies. It has established bases in various parts of the world, such as North Africa and Asia. The Anglo-American invasion of Iraq in 2003 even created a fertile ground for recruitment for the network, which has not been dismantled since the beginning of the U.S.-led war on terror in 2001.

The network, however, demonstrates significant weaknesses. It remains a relatively small movement with no mass appeal. Its tactics, particularly the killing of innocents, have been condemned by Muslims worldwide. Al-Qaeda also suffers from steady internal dissensions. Sayyid Imam al-Sharif, a former member of the group, severely condemned its violent tactics in Guiding Jihad Action in Egypt and in the World Today, published in 2007. On May 1, 2011, U.S. president Barack Obama announced that Osama bin Laden had been killed in Abbottabad, in Pakistan, in an operation led by U.S. Navy Seals and CIA operatives.

See also Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011); fundamentalism; Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92); jihad; Kharijis; Mulla 'Umar (b. 1959); Muslim Brotherhood; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)

Further Reading

Fawaz A. Gerges, The Far Enemy: Why Jihad Went Global, 2009; Bruce Lawrence, ed., Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden, translated by James Howarth, 2005; Brynjar Lia, Architect of Global Jihad: The Life of Al-Qaeda Strategist Abu Mus'ab al-Suri, 2008; Laura Mansfield, His Own Words: A Translation of the Writings of Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri, 2006; Lawrence Wright, The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, 2006.

NASSIMA NEGGAZ

Qajars (1789–1925)

Under the Qajars, Iran was gradually transformed from a decentralized tribal monarchy into a modern secular constitutional state with a strategic and economic role in international politics.

The Turkmen Qajar tribe, thought to have settled in the Caspian coastlands during the Mongol period, first rose to prominence as part of the Turkmen tribal army known as the Qizilbash, or Redheads, that brought Isma'il I (r. 1501–24) to power as founder of the Safavid dynasty (1501–1722); Qajar khans subsequently occupied important positions in the Safavid state. After the disintegration of the Safavid empire in the early 18th century, the Qajar Qavanlu clan, led by Agha Muhammad (r. 1789–97), first expanded across northern Iran, proceeding to displace the Zands to the south and the Afsharids to the east. Qajar rule marked the first time since the Safavids and the brief rule of Nadir Shah (r. 1736–47) that Iran was united under one shah. Agha Muhammad moved his capital to Tehran in 1786.

The reign of his successor, Fath 'Ali Shah (r. 1797–1834), was characterized by courtly opulence and openness to European cultural, military, and economic influence. Fath 'Ali Shah entered into regular diplomatic relations with Britain and Napoleonic France, both of which had strategic interest in Iran, given its position as gateway to the east. His requests for aid against the advance of imperial Russia along Iran's northern borders were disregarded, however, and in the Treaty of Turkmanchay of 1828 Iran was forced to relinquish its claim to territories in eastern Armenia and the Caucasus and to facilitate Russian commercial interests in Iran. Efforts to reextend Iran's borders eastward into Afghanistan likewise failed due to the unwillingness of the British to compromise their buffer against Russian or French incursion into India. Throughout the Qajar period, Iran was politically and economically subject to shifting Russian and British interests; the nation's vulnerability was further compounded by royal extravagance, haphazard attempts at modernization, and financial and administrative mismanagement, which led to deep foreign indebtedness and economic strangling.

Recognizing this vulnerability, Nasir al-Din Shah (r. 1848–96) encouraged foreign powers to invest in Iran but failed to undertake the necessary financial and administrative reform to make such a policy successful. Various concessions (e.g., the Reuter concession, 1872–73; lottery concession, 1889; tobacco concession, 1890–92) granted to the British provoked popular protest and Russian intervention, leading to the cancellation of the Reuter and tobacco monopolies. Such protests, reflecting widespread resentment both of the corruption of the ruling elite and of foreign control, came to a head during the reign of Muzaffar al-Din Shah (r. 1896–1907) with the Iranian Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11, which resulted in a constitution limiting the powers of the monarch and a parliamentary system of governance. Its royal power thus circumscribed, the Qajar house became entirely dependent on Russian support in its efforts to counteract the new constitution.

During World War I, Russian and British troops occupied northern and southern Iran, respectively, further exacerbating the already debilitating political disarray in the country. This balance of power shifted with the Bolshevik revolution of 1917, which led to a temporary Russian withdrawal from northern Iran. British troops accordingly moved in from the south, and the Anglo-Persian Agreement of 1919 proposed Iran as a British protectorate; however, the treaty was highly unpopular in Iran and contested by the other Allied countries as granting the British an imperial monopoly, and it was never ratified. In 1921, during the rule of Ahmad Shah (r. 1909–25), the British backed a coup d'état by the Persian Cossack Brigade that successfully toppled the cabinet and formed a new government. Reza Khan, the commander of the Persian Cossacks, rose quickly in government as a virtual military dictator, becoming first minister of war and then prime minister; in the latter office he persuaded the National Assembly to depose the Qajars, with the intention of forming a republic on the model of Atatürk (r. 1923–38). The clerics, however, fearing the erosion of their influence as had happened to their counterparts in Turkey, prevailed upon Reza Khan to retain the monarchy, and he was accordingly elected the first shah (Reza Shah, r. 1925–41) of the Pahlavi line.

See also Mongols; Safavids (1501–1722)

Further Reading

Abbas Amanat, The Pivot of the Universe: Nasir al-Din Shah Qajar and the Iranian Monarchy, 1831–1896, 1997; Peter Avery, Gavin Hambly, and Charles Melville, eds., The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 7, From Nadir Shah to the Islamic Republic, 1991; Lord George N. Curzon, Persia and the Persian Question, 1892; Ann K. S. Lambton, Qājār Persia: Eleven Studies, 1987.

MATTHEW MELVIN-KOUSHKI

al-Qaradawi, Yusuf (b. 1926)

Yusuf al-Qaradawi, one of the most recognized and revered jurists of modern Sunni Islam, was born in a small village in Western Egypt on September 9, 1926. He moved to Cairo as a child and studied at Azhar's primary, middle, and secondary schools, and then at the faculty of religion at Azhar University. He excelled in his studies, which culminated in 1973 with a PhD. His dissertation was on the concept of zakat (charity) and is considered one of the best scholarly treatises on the subject. He visited Qatar in 1961 and eventually settled there, obtaining Qatari citizenship (he also retained his Egyptian citizenship).

Qaradawi is the author of more than a hundred works, many of which have had worldwide influence on Islamic political thought. His most popular book, al-Halal wa-l-Haram fi al-Islam (The lawful and prohibited in Islam), demonstrates some of the primary reasons for his appeal—namely, discarding antiquated rulings; concentrating on contemporary issues; and rewriting classical Islamic legal manuals in a modern, accessible style that is easily understood by readers. Another popular work, Islamic Awakening between Rejection and Extremism, outlines some of his critiques of the modern Islamist movements. One of his most recent works (some would argue his magnum opus) is the two-volume Fiqh al-Jihad (The legal rulings of jihad), in which he argues against a militant interpretation of jihad and presents a moderate view of the rules of warfare in Islam.

Along with his academic career, Qaradawi has excelled as a preacher and a leading public intellectual in all forms of media, including a popular television show called al-Shari'a wa-l-Hayat (Shari'a and life) on the Qatar-based Aljazeera channel and a website that documents his writings, appearances, fatwas (religious opinions), and other activities.

Qaradawi has participated in numerous Islamic academic committees throughout the world, appeared regularly at international conferences, and traveled to most Muslim (and many non-Muslim) countries. He has won many prestigious awards, including the King Faisal Award for Islamic Studies in 1994. He became the head of the European Council for Fatwa and Research and established a reputation as a leading jurist on modern Islamic economics.

Qaradawi's informal relationship with the Muslim Brotherhood led to his imprisonment by the Egyptian authorities on three occasions. He did not take an official role within the hierarchy of the movement, however, despite multiple offers to do so.

Qaradawi was banned from visiting a number of Western countries (including the United States and the United Kingdom) because of specific fatwas he issued—in particular, one that justified suicide bombings in Israel under certain circumstances. The Muslim world, however, widely views him as a moderate scholar who opposes religious extremism and senseless violence and a champion of positive reform.

See also jihad; media; revival and reform

Further Reading

Bettina Gräf, "Shaykh Yūsuf al-Qaradāwī in Cyberspace," Die Welt des Islams 47, nos. 3–4 (2007); Ana Belen Soage, "Sheikh Yūsuf al-Qaradawi: A Moderate Voice from the Muslim World?" Religion Compass 4, no. 9 (2010).

YASIR QADHI

al-Qarafi, Shihab al-Din (1228–85)

A major 13th-century Maliki scholar, Shihab al-Din al-Qarafi (Abu al-'Abbas Ahmad b. Idris) wrote on the relationship between law and political domination in early Mamluk Egypt. Though an Ash'ari in theology, he devoted little scholarly attention to rationalism and focused his major writings on law and legal theory: al-Dhakhira (The treasure), a massive compendium of Maliki fiqh (Islamic law); Sharh Tanqih al-Fusul (Examining Razi's chapters on legal theory) and Nafa'is al-Usul fi Sharh al-Mahsul (The precious principles in Razi's compendium on legal theory), both commentaries on Fakhr al-Din al-Razi's work on legal theory, al-Mahsul; and Kitab al-Furuq (The book of legal case studies), which focused on legal precepts. Beyond these, Qarafi's most significant (and unique) contribution to Islamic political thought was his Kitab al-Ihkam fi Tamyiz al-Fatawa 'an al-Ahkam wa-Tasarrufat al-Qadi wa-l-Imam (Distinguishing legal opinions from binding decrees and discretionary actions of judges and caliphs).

The premodern Islamic state had no law of its own and thus depended on shari'a to legitimate its use of power. Shari'a, however, was not a monolith but a composite of multiple, equally orthodox interpretations. This raised the question of the relationship between Islamic law, its authoritative interpreters, and the Muslim state, particularly where the latter favored one school of law over the others. For under such circumstances, the state's monopoly on executive authority threatened to denude the remaining schools of practical import. Qarafi's solution to this was essentially to cast each school of law as a corporate entity whose views were "constitutionally" protected as constituents of the larger composite of orthodox Islamic law. On this understanding, the state could not violate the views of any school without violating shari'a as a whole.

Qarafi recognized the state's prerogative to favor whatever school it saw fit. But it could not refuse to implement the rulings of those it appointed (e.g., a judge or alms collector from another school); nor could it impose the view of its favored school outside cases adjudicated by its judges in court; nor could it, generally speaking, standardize the religious law in areas where there were standing disagreements among the schools. None of this was to negate the rather broadly defined discretionary authority of the state; in fact, Qarafi not only recognizes but actually expands this authority. This, however, was for the purpose of denying the state's every proclamation the full force of law. On the one hand, he compares some state pronouncements to the nonbinding legal opinions (fatwas) issued by muftis, while he contrasts others with the binding decrees (hukm) of judges and other state officials. In this way, Qarafi asserts that one can challenge and ignore any number of state pronouncements, including declarations of jihad, on the grounds that such pronouncements do not constitute a hukm but are only nonbinding opinions or provisionally binding but legally challengeable dicta (tasarruf).

This counterintuitive move of granting the state the right to issue fatwas raised problems of its own. If state proclamations, having adopted a school of law, came to enjoy a presumption of authority and protected status, routine state operations could extend legal authority into virtually every aspect of life, producing in effect a "tyranny of law." In other words, while open to challenge, social, economic, cultural, political, and even practical views could be subjected to legal contemplation and presumed to admit of "correct" answers at shari'a. In the face of this, Qarafi set out to define the limits of law and the boundary separating law from nonlaw, so as to restrict the legal authority and jurisdiction of the state and the schools of law to that which could be genetically traced to the actual sources of the religious law. Based on this clarification, there could be no concrete, unassailably correct shari'a rule dictating, for example, economic policy, medical licensing, or speed limits.

A meaningful assessment of Qarafi's relevance to modern Islamic political thought might begin by considering the following. First, he seeks to protect the rights of individuals not as individuals but as members or followers of "corporate" schools of law. Second, he assumes legal pluralism (i.e., recognizing the application of different legal regimes to different segments of society) to be a normative arrangement that does not threaten the sovereignty of states. Third, his theory defines the ideal political order primarily in negative terms, in other words, what authority states (or jurists) are not authorized to claim. Finally, the "secular," or worldly, space opened up by his perspective on shari'a is clearly meant to serve and complement rather than challenge or impugn religion.

See also jurisprudence; al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din (1149–1209); shari'a

Further Reading

Sherman A. Jackson, "From Prophetic Actions to Constitutional Theory: A Novel Chapter in Medieval Muslim Jurisprudence," International Journal of Middle East Studies 25 (1993); Idem, Islamic Law and the State: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Shihāb al-Dīn al-Qarāfī, 1996; Idem, "Legal Pluralism and the Nation-State: Between Medieval Romanticism and Modern Pragmatism," Fordham International Law Journal 24 (2007); Idem, "Shari'ah, Democracy and the Modern Nation-State: Some Reflections on Islam, Popular Rule and Pluralism," Fordham International Law Journal 27, no. 1 (2004).

SHERMAN A. JACKSON

Qarmatians

A dissident faction of the early Isma'ilis, the Qarmatians (Arabic, Qarāmiṭa) were named after Hamdan Qarmat, the first chief Isma'ili dā'ī (missionary) in Iraq.

The early Isma'ili movement appeared in Iraq and many other regions of the Islamic world from the 870s. The primary revolutionary objective of the Isma'ilis, as millenarian Shi'i Muslims, was to uproot the Abbasids and bring about fundamental world change at the hands of the Mahdi, who would close the era of exoteric Islam, bring out the inner meaning of the law, conquer the world, and rule with justice. The Mahdi was Muhammad b. Isma'il b. Ja'far al-Sadiq, the seventh in a line of imams starting with 'Ali b. Abi Talib. The bulk of the early Isma'ilis denied his death and awaited his imminent return from hiding. The early Isma'ili da'wa (mission) was centrally directed by 'Alid leaders who later claimed to have hidden their correct identity. They acted as the chief representatives (hujjas) of the hidden Muhammad b. Isma'il. Qarmat, the chief dā'ī in southern Iraq and all other dā'īs propagated the da'wa on this basis. The Isma'ilis of Iraq and adjacent regions were called Qarmatians after their first local leader.

In 899, soon after his accession to the central leadership of the Isma'ili movement, 'Abdallah, the future founder of the Fatimid caliphate, claimed the imamate openly for himself and his predecessors. He later explained that to hide their identity, all the true imams in the progeny of Ja'far al-Sadiq adopted the name Muhammad b. Isma'il as a collective code name in addition to other pseudonyms while assuming the rank of hujja of the hidden Mahdi. The doctrinal reform of 'Abdallah split the Isma'ili movement into two rival factions. Some accepted the reform and acknowledged the imamate of 'Abdallah and his predecessors as well as his successors in the Fatimid dynasty. Others, including the communities in Iraq, Iran, Bahrain, and some of the Isma'ilis in Yemen, retained their original doctrine and prepared for the imminent return of the hidden Muhammad b. Isma'il. Henceforth, the term "Qarmatian" came to be more specifically applied to those dissident Isma'ilis who did not acknowledge 'Abdallah and the later Fatimid caliphs as imams.

The Qarmatians found their main stronghold in eastern Arabia, then called Bahrain. There, in the same eventful year of 899, the dā'ī Abu Sa'id al-Jannabi (d. 913) established a Qarmati state. He was succeeded by a number of his sons, including Abu Tahir al-Jannabi (d. 944). The Qarmatians of Bahrain engaged in pillaging raids into Iraq, as well as drawn-out hostilities with the Abbasids and the Fatimids. Abu Tahir's raids culminated in his attack on Mecca in 930 during the pilgrimage season. The Qarmatians massacred the pilgrims and carried off the Black Stone of the Ka'ba to al-Ahsa', their capital in Bahrain, to symbolize the end of the era of Islam. In 931, Abu Tahir recognized a young Persian as the expected Mahdi, to whom he turned over the reins of power. The early disastrous end of this episode weakened the doctrinal basis of the Qarmatians of Bahrain, also diminishing their influence over other Qarmatian communities.

The Qarmatians eventually returned the Black Stone in 950 in exchange for a large sum of money paid by the Abbasids and not, as held by some anti-Fatimid authorities, in response to the Fatimid caliph-imam al-Mansur bi-llah's request. The Qarmatians of Bahrain and elsewhere did not acknowledge 'Abdallah ('Ubaydallah) al-Mahdi (d. 934) as the expected Mahdi, nor did they regard any of his successors in the Fatimid dynasty as their imams. The Isma'ilis of the Jibal region in Persia continued to be a branch of the Qarmatians. There, the fifth dā'ī of Rayy, Abu Hatim al-Razi (d. 934), corresponded with Abu Tahir and like him expected the reappearance of Muhammad b. Isma'il as the Mahdi. In Khurasan and Transoxiana, too, the dissident Qarmatian view persisted after the advent of the Fatimids. The dā'ī Muhammad b. Ahmad al-Nasafi (d. 943) reaffirmed the Mahdiship of Muhammad b. Isma'il in his Kitab al-Maksul (Book of the yield), which also introduced a type of Neoplatonic philosophy into Isma'ili (Qarmati) thought.

By the time the Qarmatian state of Bahrain was finally uprooted in 1077 by local tribesmen, the Qarmatian communities elsewhere, which had continued to expect the return of the hidden Mahdi, had disintegrated or were won over to the side of the loyal Isma'ili da'wa propagated on behalf of the Fatimid caliph-imams. Condemned by the Muslim majority as unspeakable heretics or worse, the Qarmatians of Bahrain have also been praised in modern times for the communal and egalitarian principles that were important elements in the social and political organization of their state.

See also Isma'ilis; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Farhad Daftary, The Ismā'īlīs: Their History and Doctrines, 2007;

Heinz Halm, The Empire of the Mahdi: The Rise of the Fatimids, translated by M. Bonner, 1996; Wilferd Madelung, "The Fatimids and the Qarmatis of Bahrayn," in Mediaeval Isma'ili History and Thought, edited by F. Daftary, 1996.

FARHAD DAFTARY

quietism and activism

In premodern history, both Sunni and Twelver Shi'i attitudes toward illegitimate authorities were predominantly quietist. "Quietism" can be generally defined as passivism in politics, while its antonym, "activism," entails active involvement in the political affairs, thus affecting political power and its policy. In the Twelver tradition, the central symbol of political thought is the martyrdom of Imam Husayn, the grandson of Prophet Muhammad, who was killed along with his Companions and many of the Prophet's family members at the Battle of Karbala in 680 on order of the Umayyad caliph Yazid I (r. 680–83). This tragedy elicited profound emotions of grief and a deep conviction of historical injustice. As a result, many Shi'is believed that a ruler could not be powerful and moral at the same time, so they chose morality and renounced all political action. Convinced that political power is beyond reform, they practiced dissimulation (taqiyya), concealing their faith for self-protection from their non-Shi'i opponents. Government was to be accommodated, not overthrown. This attitude became consolidated in the Twelver tradition with the doctrine of the Occultation of the Twelfth Imam (ghayba). In 874 it was held that the Twelfth Imam, out of fear for his safety, had gone into occultation and could be contacted only by a representative; this came to be known as the Lesser Occultation (al-ghayba al-sughrā). In 941, after a series of four representatives, in what would be termed the Greater Occultation (al-ghayba al-kubrā), it was held that ordinary contact with the Twelfth Imam was no longer possible. Because the Twelfth Imam could no longer serve as a rallying point for rebellion, and because his explicit permission was held to be necessary for any uprising, the struggle to depose the illegitimate usurper of the imamate and install the rightful imam fell into abeyance.

In contrast, as the majority, Sunnis had no need to practice dissimulation. However, they also practiced a policy of quietism toward corrupt leadership. Sunnis thought that the proper response to an oppressive government was to endure it. A famous hadith of the Prophet instructed the Muslims to obey the leader, even if he were an Ethiopian slave. Another widespread maxim held that 60 years of tyranny was better than one hour of civil strife (fitna): God is the ultimate ruler of the community, and as long as guidance can be freely dispersed and practiced among the believers, which was the task of the 'ulama', it was more important to avoid conflict with power and keep the community together. They considered rulers to serve merely as shields for the umma (community of believers), protecting it against external enemies. An oppressive or sinful ruler was to be admonished or cajoled and ultimately could be deposed if he failed to uphold Islamic law, became physically disqualified, or lost his probity. However, there was no systematic means for deposing a ruler other than rebellion and strife. In that case, it was deemed preferable to endure the ruler's tyranny rather than inciting civil strife in the umma. If he failed to reform, however, it was deemed preferable to endure his tyranny or iniquity rather than rebel.

In contrast, the Kharijis and Zaydi Shi'is adopted an activist stance. Like the Twelvers, they denounced the current rulers as illegitimate, but they held that it was a fundamental obligation to remove usurpers and tyrants and to install a legitimate imam. The Kharijis were the most adamant in this regard, holding that the member of the community with superior merit should be elected to the caliphate. If someone else were in power, or even if the legitimate imam himself lost his superior status through sinful behavior, the current ruler should be removed, by open rebellion if necessary. The Zaydi view was somewhat similar, except that the legitimate imam had to be a descendant of the Prophet and learned in the religious sciences; rebellion and the establishment of a legitimate state was an absolute requirement for legitimate rule. The need to keep the community together was no reason to submit to oppressive rule. These positions had dire consequences for those who espoused them, and it is no accident that Khariji and Zaydi communities survived in remote regions, including Oman, Yemen, and the Mzab region in Algeria.

The 20th century witnessed a dramatic shift in the Shi'i position from quietism to revolutionary activism. The historical tragedy of Imam Husayn was reinterpreted as a revolutionary symbol for the struggle against oppression. The martyrdom of Imam Husayn set an eternal role model for the suppressed Shi'is and inspired an activist ideology that equated morality with political action, condemned the quietist tradition within Shi'i Islam, and culminated in the Iranian Revolution (1978–79). In 1971 and afterward, Ayatollah Khomeini (d. 1989) set forth the political doctrine of the guardianship of the jurist (wilāyat al-faqīh), which grants the Shi'i 'ulama', specifically the leading jurist (faqīh), the prerogative of the religious and political leadership roles that, according earlier Twelver doctrine, had been to a large extent restricted to the Hidden Imam. Khomeini's activist legacy may be seen outside Iran in the Lebanese Hizbullah, which started as a resistance movement against the Israeli occupation and then became a political party and joined the Lebanese national government in 2005.

The modern period has also witnessed Islamic activism among Sunnis, but it has most commonly targeted reform rather than the overthrow of current political orders. Sunni activist movements have developed in the context of decolonization as a reaction to oppressive regimes that tend to criminalize involvement in politics and use strategies of control, co-option, and repression to curb any resistance movement. Islamic activists react by submerged or hidden networking that aims mainly to bring about a change in the social and intellectual environment of the youth. Adherents to such movements frame activism as a moral obligation and embrace an ideology that mandates participation as a moral duty. Groups such as Jama'at-i Islami in India and the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt emphasize fairness and social justice and offer an image of a moral community living in accordance with God's rules. The Muslim Brotherhood has not openly fought the Egyptian regime and has not overturned existing relations of economic and political domination in Egypt. Rather, they accept the status quo with the hope of incremental, gradual change and focus mainly on social activities, because the latter represent a less risky alternative than directly confronting the state's oppressive power.

The year 2011 witnessed a tremendous change in the understanding of the concept of statehood and citizenship. For the first time, we witness citizens determined to actively topple oppressive regimes and have a direct say on the affairs and destiny of their state. Millions of people from different socioeconomic and religious backgrounds protested against dictatorships through organizing campaigns of civil resistance featuring peaceful demonstrations and labor strikes. The January 25 Egyptian revolution, which endured 18 days of clashes between state oppressive forces and civilians resulting in loss of life and great casualties on the latter's side, managed to overthrow President Husni Mubarak's regime. The success of the Tunisian revolution in December 2010 sparked the Egyptian uprisings whose success in return sparked a series of civil protests across the Arab world against oppressive regimes in Yemen, Libya, and Bahrain. While analysts are trying to uncover the reasons behind the revolutions, the fact that they were largely driven by a majority of Arab youth who saw themselves as "agents of change" reflects the success of Islamic activists in introducing the desired change in their societies from a passive quietist culture into an active self-determined one.

See also dissent, opposition, resistance; dissimulation; nonviolence; rebellion; violence

Further Reading

Rainer Brunner, "Shiism in the Modern Context: From Religious Quietism to Political Activism," Religious Compass 3, no. 1 (2009); Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam—Six Centuries of Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Mazen Hashem, "Contemporary Islamic Activism: The Shades of Praxis," Sociology of Religion 67, no. 1 (2006); Quintan Wiktorowicz, Islamic Activism: A Social Movement Theory Approach, 2004.

KATRIN JOMAA

Qur'an

The Qur'an, the holy book of Islam, is the most recent of the major sacred scriptures to have appeared in human history. It includes the prophetic proclamations of Muhammad (570–632) in Arabic, collected after his death in definitive written form and meticulously transmitted through the centuries. More than a billion Muslims around the globe consider the Qur'an to be the eternal word of God, who "sent down" the scripture as his final divine revelation and commissioned Muhammad to be the last prophet to proclaim his divine will for all of humanity to follow.

Muslims believe that as the most perfect and ultimate form of divine revelation, the Qur'an represents the final stage in a process through which divine speech is translated as scripture. In essence there is only one timeless revelation reiterated by the prophets, God's messengers throughout the ages, without any contribution of their own. From Adam, through Abraham, Moses, David, and Jesus, to Muhammad, the messengers are considered human beings as well as divinely chosen mouthpieces of revelation. God is the speaker of the Qur'an and Muhammad its recipient; the Qur'an itself is considered the verbatim word of God, revealed in clear Arabic to Muhammad.

Clearly understood, faithfully proclaimed, and accurately recited by Muhammad in historical time, the Qur'an, according to the normative Muslim view, was memorized with exact precision and also collected in book form by Muhammad's followers after his death. Then it was recited and copied with painstaking care in continuous transmission from generation to generation. Today, as in the past, the Qur'an is copied and recited in Arabic; it is pronounced only in Arabic in Muslim ritual worship by Arabs and non-Arabs alike. It cannot be rendered adequately into any other tongue, and, in the Muslim view, all translations are crutches, at best helpful explanations of its original intention and at worst doubtful makeshifts, obscuring its true meaning. Inasmuch as Muslims believe that the Qur'an has been preserved unchanged over time in its pristine Arabic, they also believe that it is superior to all other scriptures solely because of the faulty form in which other scriptures have been transmitted and preserved by their respective communities.

The Qur'an exhibits a significant relationship to the biblical tradition and echoes themes found in the epigraphical writings of Judaism and Christianity. No single collection of normative, midrashic, or apocryphal biblical writings, however, has been identified as the major source on which the Qur'an might directly depend. There is no evidence that this tradition had been translated into Arabic by the time of Muhammad, either as a whole corpus or in the form of single books. It is the widely shared view among historians of religion that Muhammad's knowledge of the biblical tradition came principally, if not exclusively, from oral sources. This oral lore, enriched by extrabiblical additions and commentary, was communicated to Muhammad in his mother tongue. However, it ultimately originated in traditions recorded mainly in Syriac, Ethiopian, and Hebrew, as evidenced by the vocabulary of foreign origin to be found in the Arabic Qur'an. Mainly, this foreign vocabulary had already been assimilated into the Arabic religious discourse of Muhammad's native environment.

The Qur'an is the first book-length production of Arabic literature and as such stands at the crossroads of the pre-Islamic oral, highly narrative, and poetical traditions of the Arabic language and the written, increasingly scholarly prose tradition of the subsequently evolving civilization of Islam. The beginnings of this transition in the Arabic language from the oral to the written tradition can be tied to the time and person of Muhammad and are clearly reflected in the rhymed prose style of the Qur'an. This rhymed prose (saj'), the mode of speech of the oracles uttered by the pre-Islamic soothsayer (kāhin), is a characteristic of the Qur'an, the first Arabic document of any length to exhibit this form of speech in written form. The roots of the Qur'an as the first Arabic book may also be detected in its content. In its verses, the Qur'an captures many topics that had formed an important part of the worship and cult of the nonscriptural tribal religion practiced in pre-Islamic Arabia. There is no doubt that the religious practice of Mecca exerted the most influence on the vision of Arab tribal religion that Muhammad acquired in his early life.

The Qur'an exerts a powerful spell on its listeners. It has a presence in everyday Muslim life, with its verses visible on the walls of mosques or inscribed in the hearts of men and women. For centuries, it has been copied in precious manuscripts and printed in definitive editions published all over the Islamic world. The Qur'an accompanies the Muslim believer from birth to death, and a copy of the book is kept in a special place in Muslim households. Words of the Qur'an are whispered into the ears of newborn children, daily prayers are taken from its verses, and particular words of its praise of God are exclaimed at set points in the daily routine of Muslims. All Muslims learn to recite essential passages of the Qur'an by heart from an early age and turn to them throughout their adult life. Some scholars commit its entire text to memory, and blind men often make it their profession to recite the Qur'an by heart at funerals and other special occasions.

Historical Origin and Development of the Qur'an

The most common translation of the Arabic word qur'ān is "recital," connoting that Muhammad heard the words from God and recited them without specific reference to a written text. If understood as rooted in a Syriac loanword, qur'ān would mean "a reading," such as a reading aloud of scripture in a liturgical context. In the actual text of the Qur'an, the word qur'ān refers to separate revelations made piecemeal to Muhammad or, more generally, to the revelation (tanzīl) that was sent down by God (specifically in the month of Ramadan). When it is understood to mean a book, the word kitāb (scripture) is used synonymously with "the Arabic Qur'an" that was revealed or, generally, as the manifest scripture that includes the wondrous "signs" (āya) sent down to manifest and expound God's power. The Qur'an calls itself a dhikr (admonition) and hikma (wisdom) as well as a furqān (salvation, discrimination) and even sūra ("section," i.e., a piece of revelation). Originally referring to component parts of the revelation, the terms sūra and āya eventually were chosen to denote "chapter" and "verse" of the Qur'an, respectively.

According to Qur'anic evidence, Muhammad understood his revelations as coming from a heavenly archetype, called "the mother of the scripture" (umm al-kitāb), that is described in the Qur'an as a well-guarded tablet, to be touched only by the pure angels—lofty leaves in the hands of noble scribes, unrolled sheets of parchment inscribed by the reed pen, a holy writ comprising all happenings in the universe. This heavenly scripture contains not only what is revealed through the Qur'an but also what previously has been revealed through the law (Tawrat) of Moses and gospel (Injil) of Jesus. Jews and Christians—"the people of the Scripture"—altered their own holy books, effecting serious discrepancies between their scriptures and the authentic Qur'an. Muhammad did not read this heavenly book but rather received words of revelation from it that no one may alter. They were brought down by the "spirit of holiness" (identified with the angel Gabriel) and induced trancelike moments of meditation or ecstatic states in which the shaken Muhammad had to be wrapped in a mantle. The words that he received were predominantly auditions rather than visions, some traces of visions in a few suras notwithstanding. The promptings came piecemeal and were couched in verses of rhymed prose. Some of these verses were clear and obvious, others obscure and ambiguous, but all of them were clearly distinct from Muhammad's ordinary words.

It is widely assumed that Muhammad proclaimed the Qur'an in the dialect of the people of Mecca and that the language of the Qur'an and its style originated from one particular person, Muhammad, rather than from a group of disparate individuals. Because Muhammad would add new revelations to the earlier ones throughout his career, when he died, there was not yet a collection of revelations in final form. Muslim tradition records the names of Ubayy b. Ka'b (d. between 640 and 656) and Zayd b. Thabit (d. between 662 and 675) as two followers who served Muhammad as scribes in Medina. In addition, Muhammad's wives Hafsa and Umm Kulthum could write, while his wives Umm Salama and 'A'isha could read but not write. Tradition also mentions that 'Abdallah b. Abi Sarh, foster brother of the third caliph 'Uthman b. 'Affan, claimed to have served Muhammad as a scribe and induced him on occasion to change the wording.

The actual collection of the Qur'an in book form was principally the work of Zayd b. Thabit, who knew Syriac and arithmetic. He was an expert on the division of inheritances during the time of Muhammad. He collected ransoms and calculated taxes during the caliphate of Abu Bakr, prepared written orders for the distribution of supplies during the caliphate of 'Umar b. al-Khattab, and oversaw the treasury during 'Uthman's caliphate. He was given the task of collecting the material that existed on various primitive writing materials and in the memoirs of men and wrote it down on "sheets" of uniform size (suhuf). Though there is some conflict in the traditions on this point, this collection seems to have been a process that may have begun during the caliphate of Abu Bakr and was furthered by the caliph 'Umar, whose daughter Hafsa (d. 665), a widow of Muhammad, is portrayed as the guardian of the suhuf. This process of collection came to a head during the caliphate of 'Uthman, who entrusted a commission, headed by Zayd b. Thabit, with the standard collection of the Qur'an in its rudimentary book form, considered the original copy of the Qur'an. It is known as the 'Uthmanic codex (mushaf) and was established about 15 to 20 years after the Prophet's death.

Next to this standard codex established in Medina, tradition also attributes particular collections of the Qur'an to Companions of Muhammad that showed a somewhat different order of suras. Ubayy b. Ka'b's collection had two additional suras and 'Abdallah b. Mas'ud's (d. 652) lacked the last two suras of the 'Uthmanic codex. For a short time, these private collections enjoyed a measure of authority in Syrian towns of Damascus and Homs and in the Iraqi towns of Kufa and Basra. They disappeared, however, after the 'Uthmanic codex had imposed uniformity as the authoritative standard, a standard in which Zayd's commission seems to have made the final order of the suras, many of which existed in a set order since the time of the Prophet while others show marks of having been put together in the final redaction. The order of the suras, 114 in number, was based on the principle of roughly decreasing length, which had the longest chapters in the beginning of the book and the shortest at its end. The short first sura, al-Fatiha ("the Opening"), numbering seven verses, was placed at the head of this authoritative standard, on which all Qur'ans are based.

Each of the individual chapters of the Qur'an is introduced by the formula, "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate" (except for the ninth sura, which might originally have formed a unit with the preceding chapter). The formula is also found once in the body of the Qur'an, at the head of Solomon's letter to the queen of Sheba. Immediately following this formula at the head of 29 suras, there are mysterious letters that are disconnected and convey no obvious meaning. Some of them occur only once and others are put together in patterns of two to five letters. Scholars have suggested a great variety of explanations about the meaning of these letters, but none of them has been accepted as probable, although they belong to the earliest stage of the Qur'anic redaction and cannot be explained as additions by later hands. The Qur'an does not refer to its suras by numbers; rather, each chapter has a particular name (or in some cases is known under a few different names). These names are clearly later additions to the Qur'an and were derived from catchwords that figure in the first few verses of a sura or are derived from a characteristic or odd word in the body of a sura. The division of the chapters into numbered verses, mainly based on rhyme, is likewise a later phenomenon that was not yet in use in the early centuries of the transmission of the Qur'an. The numbered verses, just like the numbers of the suras, have become standard, however, in the Qur'an copies in print today, although Muslims prefer to quote the suras by their names rather than their numbers.

The Analysis of the Qur'an in Scholarship

The 'Uthmanic codex established by the commission headed by Zayd b. Thabit was written in a rudimentary form, a "scriptio defectiva" constituting merely a consonantal skeleton lacking diacritical marks that distinguish certain Arabic consonants from one another. Oral recitation was needed to ascertain the intended pronunciation of the text by the addition of short vowels for its vocalization. As the Qur'anic orthography developed incrementally over more than two centuries and as the linkage between the consonantal skeleton and the oral recitation became increasingly robust, the deficiencies of the Arabic script were gradually overcome. The variants of recitation, the vast majority being of a minor nature, were either reconciled or accommodated, and the written text became increasingly independent of its linkage to oral pronunciation. This process culminated with the scriptio plena, the fully vocalized and pointed text of the Qur'an. This text may be considered a textus recepetus, ne varietur with the proviso that no single clearly identifiable textual specimen of the Qur'an was ever established or accepted with absolute unanimity.

The final, fully vocalized and pointed text of the Qur'an, accepted as normative and canonical, may best be understood as a construct underlying the work of Abu Bakr b. Mujahid (d. 936), who restricted the recitation of the Qur'an to seven correct readings, termed ahruf (literally, "letters") on the basis of a popular tradition. Ibn Mujahid accepted the reading (qirā'a) of seven prominent Qur'an scholars of the eighth century and declared them all to be based on divine authority. In 934 the Abbasid establishment promulgated the doctrine that these seven versions were the only acceptable forms of the text and all others forbidden. Nevertheless, "three after the seven" and "four after the ten" ways of reading were added somewhat later to form, respectively, 10 or 14 variant readings. Finally, each of the ten ways of reading was eventually accepted in two slightly varying versions (riwāya), all of which, at least theoretically, belong within the spectrum of the textus receptus, ne varietur. For all practical purposes, only two versions are in general use today—that of Hafs (d. 805) from 'Asim (d. 744), that is, Hafs's version based on 'Asims's way of reading, which received official sanction when it was adopted by the Egyptian standard edition of the Qur'an printed in 1924, and that of Warsh (d. 822) from Nafi' (d. 785), that is, Warsh's version based on Nafi''s way of reading, which is followed in North Africa with the exception of Egypt.

From the mid-19th century, Western scholars began to engage in serious literary research on the Qur'an, linking the scholarly findings of traditional Muslim scholarship with the philological and text-critical methods that biblical scholarship was developing in Europe. An intensive scholarly attempt was made to arrive at a chronological order of Qur'anic chapters and passages that could be correlated with the development and varying circumstances of Muhammad's career. This Western chronological approach to the Qur'an achieved its climax in the highly acclaimed Geschichte des Qorans (History of the Qur'an) by Theodor Nöldeke (1860), which was later revised and expanded by F. Schwally (1909 and 1919) and again by G. Bergsträsser (1938). The chronological sequencing of the suras elaborated by Western Qur'anic scholarship largely adopted the distinction of traditional Muslim scholarship between Meccan and Medinan suras already worked out in the Itqan fi 'Ulum al-Qur'an (Securing Qur'anic exegesis) by Jalal al-Din al-Suyuti (d. 1505), the major Muslim reference work on the Qur'anic sciences. However, it further subdivided the Meccan phase of Muhammad's proclamation of the Qur'an into three distinct periods. R. Bell, in his The Qur'ān and, posthumously, A Commentary on the Qur'an, took a radically different approach. He abandoned the chronological division into Meccan and Medinan periods and designed a disjointed dating system for individual verses in the Qur'an taken as a whole.

The overriding goal of the chronological framework of the Qur'an as elaborated in Western scholarship was to divide the Qur'anic proclamation into four distinct periods—Mecca I, Mecca II, Mecca III, and Medina. It linked these periods with a vision of the gradual inner development of Muhammad's prophetic consciousness and political career that Western scholarship had determined through biographical research on the life of Muhammad in conjunction with its research on the Qur'an. In general, the fourfold division of periods of the Qur'anic proclamation proceeded on the basis of two major principles. It related Qur'anic passages source-critically to historical events known from extra-Qur'anic literature, and it systematically analyzed the philological and stylistic nature of the Arabic text of the Qur'an passage by passage. It also placed clear markers between the Meccan periods at the time of the emigration to Abyssinia (about 615) and Muhammad's disillusioned return from Ta'if (about 620), and it retained the emigration in 622 as the divide between Meccan and Medinan suras.

The group of 48 short suras classified as belonging to the first or early Meccan period were identified by a similarity of style that gives expression to Muhammad's initial enthusiasm in a language that is rich in images, impassioned in tone, uttered in short and rhythmic verses, marked by a strong poetic coloring, and containing about 30 oaths or adjurations that introduce individual suras or passages. They are driven by a heightened awareness of the apocalyptic end of this world and God's final judgment of humanity. They include Muhammad's vehement attacks against his Meccan opponents for adhering to the old Arab tribal religion and his vigorous rebuttals to their damaging accusations against his claim of divine inspiration when they dismissively characterized him as a soothsayer (kāhin), sorcerer (sāhir), poet (shā'ir), and a man possessed (majnūn).

The suras of the second or middle Meccan period, 21 in number, have longer units of revelation, which are more prosaic and do not exhibit a clearly distinct common character. They mark the transition from the excitement of the first phase to a Muhammad of greater calm who aims to influence his audience by parenetic proofs selected from descriptions of natural phenomena, illustrations from human life, and vivid depictions of paradise and hellfire. The stories of earlier prophets and elements from the story of Moses in particular are cited as admonitions for his enemies and as encouragement for the small group of his followers. The place of the oath is taken by introductory titles such "This is the revelation of God!" and by the frequently recurring "Say!" (qul), the divine command for Muhammad to proclaim a certain Qur'anic passage. The name al-Rahmān (the Merciful), a name for God in use prior to Islam in southern and central Arabia, although rejected by the pre-Islamic Meccans, is frequently employed yet dies out in the third period.

The suras of the third or late Meccan period, also 21 in number, cannot be seen as standing in any kind of inner chronological order. They exhibit a broad prosaic style with rhyme patterns that become more and more stereotyped, frequently ending in -ūn and -īn. In addressing his followers as a group, Muhammad frequently employs the formula, "O you people" (yā ayyuhā al-nās). Muhammad's imagination seems to be subdued; the revelations take on the form of sermons or speeches and the prophetic stories repeat earlier ideas. Overall, this group of suras could be understood to reflect Muhammad's exasperation at the stubborn resistance to his message on the part of his fellow Meccan tribesmen.

The suras of the Medinan period, 24 in number, follow one another in a relatively certain chronological order and reflect Muhammad's growing political power and his shaping of the social framework of the Muslim community. As the acknowledged leader in spiritual and social affairs of the Medinan community that had been torn by internal strife prior to his arrival, Muhammad's Qur'anic proclamation becomes preoccupied with criminal legislation; civil matters such as laws of marriage, divorce, and inheritance; and with the summons to warfare against opponents. Various groups of people are addressed separately by different epithets. The believers, the Meccan emigrants (muhājirūn) and their Medinan helpers (anṣār), are addressed as "you who believe," while the Medinans who distrusted Muhammad and hesitated in converting to Islam are called "hypocrites" (munāfiqūn). The members of the Jewish tribes of the Qurayza, Nadīr, and Qaynuqa' are collectively called Jews (yahūd), and the Christians are referred to by the group name of Nazarenes (naṣārā). More than 30 times—and only in Medinan verses—the peoples who have been given a scripture in previous eras are identified collectively by the set phrase "the People of the Book" (ahl al-kitāb). They are distinguished from the ummiyyūn (gentiles) who have not been given a book previously but from among whom God selected Muhammad, called al-nabī al-ummī (the "gentile" prophet) in a late Meccan passage, as his messenger. A significant group of Qur'anic passages from Medinan suras refers to Muhammad's break with the Jewish tribes and his subsequent interpretation of the figure of Abraham, supported by Ishmael, as the founder of the Meccan sanctuary. Abraham is henceforth depicted as the prototypical Muslim (ḥanīf) who represents the original pure religion designated "the religion of Abraham" (millat Ibrāhīm), now reinstated by Muhammad.

The most radical chronological rearrangement of the suras and verses of the Qur'an, undertaken by R. Bell, concluded its elaborate hypothesis with many provisos. Bell suggested that the composition of the Qur'an followed three main phases: a "sign" phase, a "Qur'an" phase, and a "book" phase. The earliest phase of sign passages (āyāt) represents the major portion of Muhammad's preaching at Mecca, of which only an incomplete and partially fragmentary amount survives. The Qur'an phase included the later stages of Muhammad's Meccan career and about the first two years of his activity at Medina, a phase during which Muhammad was faced with the task of producing a collection of liturgical recitals (qur'ān). The book phase belonged to his activity at Medina and began at the end of the second year after the emigration, from which time Muhammad set out to produce a written scripture (kitāb). In the present Qur'an each of these three phases, however, cannot be separated precisely, because sign passages came to be incorporated into the liturgical collection and earlier oral recitals were later revised to form part of the written book. Regarding the redaction of the Qur'an during Muhammad's lifetime, the starting point for the Qur'an as sacred scripture, in Bell's view, had to be related to the time of the Battle of Badr in 624. For Bell, this was the watershed event, while the emigration did not constitute a great divide for the periodization of the suras.

None of the systems of chronological sequencing of Qur'anic chapters and verses has been accepted universally by contemporary scholarship. Nöldeke's sequencing and its refinements have established a rule of thumb for the approximate order of the suras in their chronological sequence. Bell's hypothesis has established that the final redaction of the Qur'an was a complex process of successive revisions of earlier material, whether oral or already available in rudimentary written form. In many ways, Western Qur'anic scholarship reconfirmed the two pillars on which the traditional Muslim views of Qur'anic chronology were based. First, the Qur'an was revealed piecemeal, and, second, it was collected into book form on the basis of both written documents prepared by scribes on Muhammad's dictation and Qur'anic passages preserved in the collective memory of his circle of Companions. All methods of chronological analysis, whether traditional Muslim or modern Western, agree that the order of the suras in Muhammad's proclamation was different from the order found in the written text we have today, where, in general, the suras are arranged according to decreasing length.

Political Elements in the Qur'an

As can be seen from his prophetical career, Muhammad's political actions were directed by an instinct for pragmatism. The Prophet did not act on the basis of preset principles of political theory but rather demonstrated a flexible and adaptable political practice. Examples of Muhammad's political documents are the Constitution of Medina, the treaty of Hudaybiyya, and the documents of alliances with Arab tribes. The Qur'an, however, is foremost a religious message rather than a document of political theory. The Qur'an is an expression of Islamic beliefs, doctrines, rituals, laws, and practices; it is not a textbook of political theory, nor does it provide a system for political thought. Rather, it offers certain themes that constitute scattered building blocks for the eventual historical development of political thought in Islam. These elements do not represent a complete foundation or an articulated framework for the emergence of a systematic political vision in Islam, although some of them became cornerstones in the eventual political theories developed by Muslim thinkers over the centuries. The number of such elements is small, and, compared to the weight they carry in contemporary Islamic political thought, they appear to be at best stepping stones for political theories.

The core of the Islamic creed, the twofold Muslim profession of faith (shahāda)—"There is no god but God, and Muhammad is God's messenger" (lā ilāha illā Allāh wa-Muhammad rasūl Allāh)—is intensified by the Qur'anic command, "Obey God and obey the messenger" (Q. 4:59) that is also embedded in the most articulate passage of the Qur'an on obedience and authority (Q. 24:47–56). The Shi'is augment this profession of faith by adding "and 'Ali is God's guardian" (walīy Allāh) and interpret the Qur'anic phrase "and those in authority among you" (Q. 4:59) as validating the authority of their imams as rulers of the community after the Prophet. The categorical command of obedience implies two basic dimensions for Islamic political thought. It defines the vertical axis of authority that intrinsically links obedience to God with obedience to the Prophet, intertwines the power of divine rule with human governance, and requires unquestioning submission to God combined with absolute allegiance to the Prophet. Furthermore, it marks the horizontal axis of an inextricable interrelation of religion and politics in Islam, the immutable religion (al-dīn al-qayyim, Q. 12:40) that the Prophet perfected (Q. 5:3) and proclaimed as the religion of submission to God, Islam.

The crux of the creed is Muhammad's self-perception as a prophet that developed from his early preaching in Mecca, where he presented himself as the reformer of the pre-Islamic tribal religion. He believed himself a "messenger" (rasūl) called by God for an Arab monotheistic and revealed religion that confirmed the revelations other peoples had received in their languages. In proclaiming his message, he drew inspiration from the example of earlier messengers (rusul), prophets (nabīyyūn), and biblical patriarchs, as well as leaders known from old Arab lore. Established in Medina after the hijra (emigration), he applied the term "prophet" (nabī) consciously to himself. Henceforth he had himself addressed as "O Prophet!" (yā ayyuhā al-nabī, Q. 33:45), and he understood himself as al-nabī al-ummī (Q. 7:157–58), the final prophet, and "the seal of the prophets" (khātam al-nabiyyīn, Q. 33:40). The authority of the earlier biblical prophets, who founded a community, was rooted in the covenant (mīthāq, 'ahd) God had made with them. Yet only one passage, based on the small phrase "and with you" (wa-minka, Q. 33:7), refers to a covenant relationship with God on the part of Muhammad. Post-Qur'anic traditions recognized the tenuousness of this basis and tried to bolster it through legends such as the angelic cleansing of Muhammad's chest and his miraculous ascension to heaven (mi'rāj), symbols of a divine covenant with Muhammad.

The biblical background of the covenant is evident in Qur'anic references to God's covenant with pivotal prophetical figures of the Qur'an. On the day of the primordial covenant (Q. 7:172), humanity professed monotheism as its pledge in response to God's self-disclosure as their Lord at the dawn of creation. Since the dawn of creation, according to the Qur'an, God has made a covenant with humanity that is reinstituted from prophet to prophet throughout religious history. Although they are recipients of a covenant for their people, in the Qur'an the prophets are not immune to sin. Adam, "the father of the human race," carries in his loins the symbol of God's covenant, his progeny, the human race, as "the children of Adam," until the Day of Resurrection (Q. 7:172). Yet Adam broke the covenant together with Eve by eating from the tree of paradise (Q. 20:115)—an act, however, for which he repented. The symbol of Noah's covenant is the ark in which he is rescued together with his people (Q. 33:7). Abraham, the prototype of the true Muslim (hanīf, Q. 3:65–70), abandons the worship of astral deities (Q. 6:76–79), breaks the idols (Q. 21:58–67), builds the Ka'ba, and institutes the pilgrimage as the symbol of his covenant but violates the covenant through three lies: feigning illness (Q. 37:89), denying culpability (Q. 21:63), and passing his wife off as his sister (according to tradition). Joseph, whose mark of the covenant is his inspired ability to interpret dreams, showed his readiness to commit sin with the wife of the Egyptian (Q. 12:24) but was divinely protected from acting on it. Moses, in his encounter with God on Mount Sinai, receives the tablets as the symbol of his covenant (4:142–45), and in his desire to see God, he falls to the ground as if struck by lightning as the mountain is crumbled to dust (4:142–45). But he breaks the covenant by slaying another human being without any right to blood revenge, while his followers, "the Children of Israel," break the covenant made at Sinai through their idolatry of the calf (Q. 2:63).

David, who represents the covenant in his receiving the psalms (Zabur), slaying of Goliath, and appointment as God's viceroy (khalīfa) to dispense justice, asks for God's forgiveness (Q. 38:24). Solomon, heir to David's throne, receives as a symbol of his covenant immense knowledge and wisdom, giving him power over humans and demons (jinn) and the capacity to understand the speech of birds and command the wind. Solomon had to repent for idolatry (Q. 38:34). Jesus, the son of Mary, the Messiah and the recipient of the Gospel (Injil), is spirit from God (rūḥun minhu) and his word (kalimatuhu, Q. 4:171) as well as God's servant ('abd Allāh). He has his symbol in the power to give life by raising the dead and breathing life into figures of clay (Q. 3:47; 5:110). The Qur'an rejects the crucifixion of Jesus but accepts the ascension in an earthly body: "They did not kill him nor crucify him, but it was made to seem so to them" (shubbiha lahum, Q. 4:157). His death on the cross as a sign of defeat is therefore denied in the Qur'an, but his being raised to life directly from the cross is granted (Q. 4:158). It is God Himself who says in the Qur'an, "O Jesus, I am going to take you and raise you to Me" (mutawaffīka wa-rāfi'uka, Q. 3:55). This position resembles the Gnostic Christian belief that only a counterfeit (simulacrum) of Jesus was crucified.

In the Qur'an, Muhammad stands in the line of the prophets, who are human beings with all their foibles and flaws and their sins and acts of disobedience before God. In the Qur'an Muhammad expressly states, "I am only a mortal like you" (Q. 18:110), who receives forgiveness for all the sins of his life, "may God forgive you your past sin and your sin that is to come" (Q. 48:2). Tradition explains that Muhammad was "erring" (Q. 93:7) when he toyed with a compromise of his monotheism by accepting three Meccan female deities as divine intercessors next to God, sacrificed to a heathen goddess before his call, and married Zayd's wife. The Qur'an portrays Muhammad as a human being as well as the carrier of a revelation and leader of his community. In post-Qur'anic literature, he was put on a pedestal; ranked above all other prophets before him; and attributed the power of intercession on the Last Day, sitting next to God on the divine throne. In his ascension to heaven, he passes beyond the other prophets who each rule one of the seven spheres. His colloquy with God, associated with his ascension to heaven and linked with his encounter of God's presence at the Lote Tree of the boundary (Q. 53:13–18), becomes the symbol of his covenant through the divine institution of the five daily prayers. Through association with the famous light verse (Q. 24:35), Muhammad is perceived created as "light from light" and taking the place of Adam—the last prophet taking the place of the first—as he swears his oath of fealty to God on behalf of all of humanity. His message, reconfirming the religion of Abraham, surpasses it by reflecting most perfectly the light of the innate primal religion (fitra, Q. 30:30), enshrined in all human beings since the dawn of creation.

There is hardly any emphasis in the Qur'an on Muhammad as a political leader or lawgiver. The Qur'an, however, juxtaposes the background of the history of the prophets and their covenants with the oath of allegiance, a ceremony rooted in a pre-Islamic tribal institution. Obedience to God is linked with obedience to the Prophet, and obedience to the Prophet is made manifest through entrance into the community by an oath of allegiance. The formal gesture of the oath of allegiance (bay'a) was the ceremonial handclasp. Exchanged with the Prophet, it implied a pledge of fealty to God (Q. 48:10). The bay'a guaranteed the gift of God's protection and reward, mediated by the Prophet, in exchange for the loyalty of the person who joined Muhammad's community and surrendered to God. It possessed the character of a contractual agreement rooted in the ceremonial of pre-Islamic commercial transactions. In this sense, submission to God became symbolized by "grasping the firmest handle" (al-'urwa al-wuthqā, 2:256), an act that meant abandoning idolatry and doing good works. "Whoever surrenders his face to God and does good, has grasped the firmest handle" (Q. 31:22).

New converts to Islam enter into the community by swearing allegiance to the Prophet, who represents the covenant humanity made with God at the dawn of creation and the fashioning of Adam as father of the human race. Sworn by an individual entering the fold of Islam, this oath manifests two aims. It recognizes the authority of the person to whom it is given and expresses the adherence to the message of the person who represents and proclaims it. On the power of this oath, the Qur'an prescribes fighting to Muhammad's followers in Medina and demands that military commands be obeyed (Q. 22:39–40). When decisive action had to be taken during crucial moments of his cause, formal oaths of allegiance were made to Muhammad (Q. 48:10). Such vows of obedience became the norm when Muhammad's polity in Medina grew in numbers (Q. 9:11–12), although the Qur'an indicates that Muhammad did not always find it easy to enforce compliance (Q. 9:38–57; 9:81–106). A particular case is the oath of allegiance to the Prophet sworn by women, traditionally linked with the treaty of Hudaybiyya that includes as its conditions the core commands of the Decalogue (Q. 60:12). The treaty made between Muslims and pagans at the sacred mosque of Mecca, however, is a pact ('ahd) and hence does not imply an oath of allegiance (Q. 9:7).

Three particular terms in the Qur'an, umma, khalīfa, and jihad, have become highly valued fulcrums of Islamic political thought in Islamic history, although they do not appear in a prominent position in the Qur'an itself. The term umma (community), appearing about 60 times in the Qur'an, is a loanword from Hebrew and Aramaic that refers to groups of people who are included in the divine plan of salvation. In the view of the Qur'an, humanity consists of a plurality of communities, each to whom God sends messengers to guide and test them (Q. 6:42), but the messengers are usually attacked and accused of lying. When each umma is brought to judgment on the Last Day, God will call upon their respective messengers to give witness against those who did not follow their message (Q. 4:41). The Qur'an explains the plurality of the communities from the divine will. Originally, God created one umma (Q. 10:19), but humanity became disunited because of their malice and rancor. In the Meccan suras, the Qur'an envisages the Arabs of Mecca as forming an umma; in the Medinan suras a new "community surrendering to God" (umma muslima, Q 2:213) is founded on a religious basis that bids to honor and forbids dishonor (Q. 3:104, 110). The famous statement of the Prophet, "My community (umma) will never agree upon an error," is a post-Qur'anic tradition. Only twice does the Qur'an mention the related term, "the party of God" (hizb Allāh, 5:56; 48:22), and the term jamā'a, later so prominent and used to denote the whole body of the believers as a unified "community," does not appear in the Qur'an at all. The Qur'anic term, milla (religious community), an Aramaic or Hebrew loanword, appears 15 times in the Qur'an and 8 times as "Abraham's religion," in which sense it is applied to Muhammad's community. As such, however, it means "religion" and does not imply the aspect of solidarity and unity that is so predominant in Islamic political thought.

Another Qur'anic term that has only tenuous Qur'anic moorings with regard to political authority is the notion of khalīfa, which appears only twice in the singular in the Qur'an and seven times in the plural. With reference to Adam, the Qur'an says, "I am setting a viceroy in the Earth" (Q. 2:30), and with reference to David, the Qur'an says, "We have appointed you a viceroy in the Earth" (Q. 38:26). The Qur'anic reference to Adam represents a divine address to the angels who are being told by God that Adam, and with him the human race, will be their "successor" (khalīfa) inhabiting the Earth. The passage about David as "successor" has a political and juridical meaning in that David is commissioned by God to judge justly between people. The notion itself does not imply the idea of the caliph, conceived as representative of God's messenger or even as shadow of God on Earth, although in later political theories the term took on a politically charged meaning and, in Sunni interpretation, became the key term for the caliph as head of the Muslim polity, called somewhat ineptly the "vicar of God's messenger" (khalīfat rasūl Allāh). For their idea of supreme leadership, the Shi'is have erected impressive theological theories around the term "imam" (leader), which appears in the Qur'an seven times in the singular and five times in the plural. It refers to Abraham as "a leader for the people" (Q. 2:124); to the Book of Moses as "a model" (Q. 11:17; 46:12); to the prophets raised from the progeny of Adam, who will give witness about the conduct of their communities on the Day of Judgment (Q. 17:71); to pious Muslims as leaders in faith; and to both righteous and unjust leaders. Both Sunnism and Shi'ism employed the term imāma (leadership, imamate) for their theological discourse on leadership and authority.

Similarly, in the Qur'an, jihad, a highly prominent slogan of Islamic political thought, means "struggle" or "striving," which, coupled with the notion of fighting "in the path of God" (fī sabīl Allāh, Q 2:190; cf. 9:24; 60:1), gained its predominantly political meaning of "warfare" through post-Qur'anic interpretation. As used in the Qur'an (the verbal noun, jihād, occurs but four times in the Qur'an: 9:24; 22:78; 25:52; 60:1), only a small portion of the term's semantic range can be linked with warfare. On the contrary, the majority of the relevant passages point to an origin in the pre-Islamic tribal perception that one must demonstrate oneself deserving of the deity's reward through hardship, pilgrimage, poverty, and perseverance in trials and tribulations. Rather, the Qur'an expresses warfare mainly by employing a semantic field that expresses the order to fight and slay the infidels (qitāl), as exemplified in Qur'an 9:1–14. There is no doubt that the Prophet encouraged his followers to fight and proclaimed fighting as a divine command, and Qur'an 22:40 may be the first Medinan verse that deals with fighting the unbelievers. Many other verses exhort the believers to fight "with their possessions and their selves." Those who "are slain or die in the path of God" (Q. 3:157–58) are promised eternal reward—they will be "living with their Lord" and rejoicing "in the bounty that God has given them" (Q. 3:169–70), while those who are not willing to fight are threatened with hellfire (Q. 9:81). Exhortations to fight and participate in warfare can be found many times in the Qur'an (e.g., Q. 4:84; 8:65), but it was not the term "jihad" that was their standard Qur'anic expression.

There is no one coherent doctrine of warfare in the Qur'an, and exegetes found it difficult to reconcile ambiguous and contradictory verses given both the inconsistent Qur'anic terminology on warfare and Muhammad's increasingly hostile relations with the Meccans that developed into open warfare after his emigration to Medina. Muslim exegesis tried to resolve these ambiguities and contradictions through the use of certain methodological techniques, particularly theories of abrogation and specification that regarded Qur'an 9:5 and 9:29 as ultimately superseding earlier verses. The basis for these theories may be found in the Qur'an itself in a passage (Q. 4:76–77) that implies an inner-Qur'anic evolution with regard to warfare. When relevant Qur'anic verses are read chronologically, one may construct four stages in the evolution of Qur'anic exhortations to warfare. Before his emigration to Medina, Muhammad was instructed by God to pardon the unbelievers and to desist from engagement in warfare. After the hijra, however, his followers were given permission to retaliate for injustices they had suffered from the Meccans (Q. 22:39–40). As the altercations with the Meccans increased, they were exhorted to fight against unbelievers as long as they observed certain conditions. Then they were given the divine command to rescind all treatises with the unbelievers and fight them unconditionally (Q. 9:1–4). Finally, God's ultimate and unconditional command to engage in warfare was given expression in the "sword verse" (Q. 9:5) with regard to the unbelievers and the "poll tax verse" (Q. 9:29) with regard to "the People of the Book." A group of Qur'anic verses (Q. 2:216; 4:71; 9:38–41; 9:120–22) provide the basis for the legal definition of jihad as a collective duty (farḍ kifāya) and not an individual obligation (farḍ 'ayn) that became the normative principle elaborated by the scholars of Islamic law.

The Qur'an not only exhorts to warfare but also stipulates a series of specific conditions that served as the basis for later Islamic thought on the purpose of warfare and the definition of a just war. A good number of Qur'anic verses counsel patience and forbearance with respect to the unbelievers, warn Muslims to avoid fighting, recommend forgiveness and generosity, and advise arguing with opponents in a peaceful manner, while other verses warn unbelievers of God's vengeance (Q. 3:19). Warfare against idolaters who are to be converted to Islam is differentiated from fighting against the People of the Book—whether they are Jews, Sabians (i.e., Manicheans or Mandeans), or Christians (Q. 2:62; 5:69,82)—who are identified as enjoying a measure of tolerance. The famous and oft-quoted verse, "There is no compulsion in religion" (lā ikrāha fī al-dīn, Q. 2:256), however, does not proclaim the principle of tolerance as the Qur'anic ideal—it simply states that compelling acceptance of religion must prove a futile exercise in the face of obstinacy. As purposes for warfare other than subjection and nominal conversion, the Qur'an mentions revenge for violation of treaties and retaliation for attacks of adversaries as well as self-defense and the defense of weak members of the community. Exemption from warfare is granted to the physically handicapped (Q. 4:17). Other verses deal with the treatment of prisoners and safe conduct. Qur'an 8:67 exhorts the Prophet not to take prisoners—a norm judged to be abrogated by Qur'an 47:4, which accepts ransom for prisoners or offers outright pardon. Other very specific stipulations would be added in Islamic tradition, such as the interdiction against killing enemy noncombatants (women, children, and the elderly); mutilating bodies; harming infrastructure such as buildings and fruit trees; and embezzling spoils. The idea of "holy war," however, is not present in the Qur'an at all, although warfare may be considered sacred to a certain extent because it is commanded and rewarded by God under certain conditions.

The Legacy of the Qur'an

Throughout its entire text, the Qur'an intertwines two basic traditions, the pre-Islamic tribal and the Judeo-Christian, through loanwords drawn from Aramaic, Syriac, or Hebrew and assimilated by the Arabic of the Qur'an. This power of association has been noted earlier in the typological history of messengers and prophets that include central biblical figures next to leaders and heroes of pre-Islamic Arabian lore. Similarly, the celestial messengers among the angels show an association with the spirits and demons (jinn) of tribal Arabia, as can be seen in the figure of the devil that merges Shaytan with Iblis (i.e., diabolos), the fallen angel. The intertwining of these traditions can also be seen in some of the central rituals of the Qur'an, the "pillars of religion," as for instance the daily ritual prayer, the obligation of almsgiving, the month of fasting, and the yearly pilgrimage. Ritual prayer (salat) combines recitation of scripture and liturgical worship at precise times of the day with gestures of submission offered in the direction of the sanctuary of the Ka'ba. The twin institution of almsgiving (zakat) links the practice of benevolence and charitable righteousness toward the poor and needy with taxes levied on property, crops, and merchandise, and it is collected for the necessities of warfare and from the dues paid by tribes adopting Islam. The ritual obligation of fasting (sawm) assimilates aspects of monastic asceticism and abstinence with the Arab month of Ramadan, established in the tradition of sacred months during which bloodshed was prohibited in pre-Islamic tribal Arabia. The Muslim pilgrimage (hajj) merges tribal festival traditions at the Meccan sanctuary and on the hill of 'Arafat with the story of Abraham and his sacrifice.

At the death of Muhammad, Abu Bakr (d. 634), the first caliph and Muhammad's direct successor, is said to have coined the slogan "Whosoever has worshiped Muhammad—Muhammad is dead. Whosoever has worshiped God—God lives and will not die." His message was that although Muhammad had died, God's word would endure. No new prophet was required to come and renew his message.

What counted throughout history was the membership in the community based on the Qur'an and the memory of the Prophet's sayings and actions, as demonstrated by two early monuments of Islam. The construction of the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem in 692 was established as a sign of triumph over the power of the Byzantine Empire, facing the ruins of the Christian landmark, the Church of the Sepulchre, on the opposite hill of the city. Inscribed on the Dome's walls were words taken from sura 112, the Qur'anic manifesto aiming at Christianity: "Say, He is God, One. God, the Impenetrable, who has not begotten, and has not been begotten, and equal to Him is not any one." The Umayyad Mosque of Damascus, standing in the place of the destroyed church of John the Baptist, would bear the inscription of the year 706, "Our Lord is God alone, our religion is Islam and our Prophet is Muhammad," where the person of the Prophet seems to overshadow his message, the Qur'an. Although the Prophet proclaimed the Qur'an, Islam became supremely a religion of the book. The word of the Qur'an has a much greater weight in Islam than the New Testament does in Christianity, for in Islam the dogma of incarnatio, the Word become flesh, is transformed into the belief of inlibratio, the Word become book. Jesus did not manifest the urge to compose a book; Mani (216–76), the founder of Manicheanism, had done so, and Muhammad would proclaim the final holy book. The Qur'an was not "good news" proclaimed by a group of narrators but instead God's own speech, warning and reminding humanity of God's presence in his word.

The Qur'an came into being at a time of a paradigm shift in human history when myth was overtaken by history, and when, in Arabia, a book of parchment overpowered graffiti on the rocks. Breaking into the bright light of history from the dark ages of the Arab past, the Arabic language of the Qur'an became the idiom of a newly arrived "third world," pushing a wedge between the Greco-Roman and Indo-Persian culture zones. When the Qur'an entered the scene of world history, Judaism and Christianity read their respective Bibles in translations, rather than in the original idioms of Moses or Jesus. The Arabic Qur'an, however, has remained steady and fixed until the present in the idiom of its messenger and the language of the listeners to whom it had been addressed. Although the Qur'an was not a wholly coherent book, with its evidence of abrogation, and had weaknesses of repetition, it became understood as eternal by virtue of being the divine speech. It came to be regarded as the normative scripture of Islam, possessing inimitability (i'jaz) and rhetorical superiority even if linguistic elegance was granted to Arabic poetry.

As scripture the Qur'an was identical with the word of God recorded since eternity and, in the view of some, known in its entirety by Muhammad even before he was called to come forth as a prophet. By reproducing the word of God in this world, prophecy separated it from God as his revelation. As text it recorded the trace (rasm) that divine speech left in this world through its letters and consonants, distinguished by diacritical marks and carrying vowel signs. As divine speech it was considered the actual inner speech of God, eternal in nature and revealed from on high as sounds that were God's own voice (sawt) and his own pronunciation (lafz). God's speech, which had been heard in different historical epochs by other prophets, now was spoken forth by Muhammad, either directly as God's mouthpiece in the ecstatic utterances of the early Meccan period or mediated by Gabriel, the angel of revelation who "brought it down upon your heart" (Q. 2:97), in the extended passages of the Medinan period of its proclamation. The stage was thus set for the "Trial" (mihna, 833–48), the great theopolitical struggle about the nature of the Qur'an defined by the antagonists as centering on the issue of the "created" versus "uncreated" nature of the word of God, a divisive contention Muhammad himself had neither anticipated nor offered guidance in either direction.

See also exegesis; Muhammad (570–632)

Further Reading

R. Bell, The Qur'ān, 2 vols., 1937–39; Idem, A Commentary on the Qur'ān, 1991; J. Burton, The Collection of the Qur'ān, 1977; M. Cook, The Koran: A Very Short Introduction, 2000; J. Jeffery, The Qur'ān as Scripture, 1952; J. D. McAuliffe, The Cambridge Companion to the Qur'ān, 2006; A. Neuwirth, Der Koran als Text der Spätantike: Ein europäischer Zugang, 2010; R. Paret, Der Koran: Kommentar und Konkordanz, 1977; F. Rahman, Major Themes of the Qur'ān, 1980; N. Robinson, Discovering the Qur'ān, 1996;

J. Wansbrough, Quranic Studies, 1977; W. M. Watt, Introduction to the Qur'an, 1970; S. Wild, The Qur'an as Text, 1996.

GERHARD BOWERING

Quraysh

Quraysh is the name of the tribe in Mecca to which the Prophet Muhammad belonged. (The adjectival form is "Qurashi," though modern authors often use "Qurayshi.") Quraysh were genealogically related to the Kinana, whose pedigree went back to the Mudar, a branch of the north Arabian tribes. One of their pre-Islamic ancestors, Qusayy b. Kilab, is said to have united them five generations before Muhammad and to have established their supremacy in Mecca, securing the guardianship of its shrine, the Ka'ba, for them. Quraysh and some other tribes were grouped together under the term hums, said to refer to their observance of certain religious taboos; tribes not observing these taboos were termed hilla. After Qusayy's death, conflict reportedly broke out between his sons over the sacred offices of the Ka'ba, resulting in the formation of two opposed alliances: the Ahlaf around 'Abd al-Dar and the Mutayyabun around 'Abd Manaf. The tradition wavers between exalting Quraysh as the ancestors of Muhammad and denigrating them as infidels who fought against him, with the result that they are presented both as proto-Muslims who kept monotheism alive when the rest of Arabia was sunk in polytheism and as rank pagans who put the deity Hubal and a plethora of other idols in and around the Ka'ba. The name "Quraysh" occurs only once in the Qur'an, in the short sura 106, which mentions their "winter and summer journeys" (traditionally interpreted as trading journeys) and alludes to a hunger and a fear from which God has freed them. The name also appears in the so-called Constitution of Medina, which was drawn up in Medina a few months after Muhammad's hijra (emigration). Here it stands not only for those who still resisted him as unbelievers but also for the Muhajirun.

The tradition presents Quraysh as making a living as traders in pre-Islamic times. The trade was founded by Hashim, Muhammad's great-grandfather, who secured permission to trade in Syria from the Byzantine emperor (more probably a local governor) and negotiated agreements with the tribes on the way. They supplied many of the goods, described as leather, hides, and other pastoralist products, as well as perfume. In addition to Syria, Qurashi traders are said to have been active in Yemen, Iraq, Ethiopia, and Egypt. They played a leading role in the rise of Islam, both as supporters and as enemies of Muhammad, and after his death they took over the leadership of the community he had founded. All the caliphs down to the Mongol conquest of Baghdad in 1258 were drawn from Quraysh, in conformity with an expectation that appears to have been established early and that was soon formulated as a legal requirement. The requirement was disputed by the Kharijis and some groups of south Arabian (Yemeni) descent. Supporters of the doctrine affirmed the special status of Quraysh in traditions from the Prophet and his Companions, which extolled their virtues and asserted that "the imams are of Quraysh." In other traditions Quraysh appear as true heirs of Abraham and Ishmael and as divinely chosen from among the rest of the Arabs. The traditions also reflect conflicts within Quraysh over the issue of Muhammad's successor and the right to the caliphate. Sunni traditions extol the virtues of Abu Bakr and 'Umar b. al-Khattab, while Shi'i hadith disparage them in favor of 'Ali b. Abi Talib. The rise of the Abbasids is reflected in traditions that denigrate the ancestor of the Umayyads, Umayya b. 'Abd Shams b. 'Abd Manaf, stressing his inferiority to Hashim.

Though the rule that the caliph must be of Quraysh was upheld even after the Abbasids had been reduced to puppet rulers in Egypt, many jurists from the 11th century onward were willing to consider the possibility of a non-Qurashi caliph, and the Zaydi Maqbili (d. 1696) explicitly ruled that choosing a Qurashi was merely a custom, not a legal requirement. In practice the caliphal title had by then been adopted by rulers who were not even Arabs, let alone Qurashis (notably the Seljuqs and the Ottomans). Later, Javanese, Indian, and African rulers were also to style themselves caliphs. Today, "Qureshi" is a common surname, especially in Pakistan, and numerous families all over the Muslim world, including the Hashimites to whom the king of Jordan belongs, claim descent from 'Ali and the Prophet's daughter Fatima, but as a tribe Quraysh have disappeared. That the caliph need not be a Qurashi was endorsed by the Egyptian legal scholar Abu Zahra in 1976.

See also caliph, caliphate; genealogy; tribalism

Further Reading

P. Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Eadem, "Quraysh and the Roman Army: Making Sense of the Meccan Leather Trade," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 70 (2007); M. J. Kister, "Mecca and Tamīm," Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 8 (1965); Michael Lecker, The "Constitution of Medina": Muhammad's First Legal Document, 2004; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate, 1997; Uri Rubin, Between Bible and Qur'ān: The Children of Israel and the Islamic Self-Image, 1999.

PATRICIA CRONE

R

racism

Racism, or the belief that race is a primary determinant of human abilities and that racial differences produce an inherent superiority of a particular race over others, is foreign to Islam as a proselytizing religion that spread to all corners of the world with an essentially egalitarian and meritocratic spirit: "We have created you all out of a male and a female, and have made you into nations and tribes, so that you might come to know one another. Verily, the noblest of you in the sight of God is the one who is most deeply conscious of Him" (Q. 49:13).

Historically, however, there is ample evidence of prejudices directed by Muslims against particular groups of people, such as in the environmental explanations of human traits in the work of Sa'id al-Andalusi, who asserted in 1068 with regard to sub-Saharan Africans that "because the sun remains close to their heads for long periods, their air and their climate have become hot: they are of hot temperament and fiery behavior. Their color turned black, and their hair turned kinky. As a result, they lost the value of patience and firmness of perception. They were overcome by foolishness and ignorance. These are the people of Sudan who inhabited the far reaches of Ethiopia, Nubia, the Zanj, and others."

Another way of justifying prejudices directed against Africans was by reference to the "curse of Ham." In the Book of Genesis (9:20–27), Noah gets drunk one day after the flood and falls asleep naked in his tent. Ham, the son of Noah and father of Canaan, sees his father naked and tells his two brothers outside. Shem and Japheth take a cloak, lay it on their shoulders, walk backward, making sure that they would not see Noah naked, and cover his body. When Noah wakes up and learns what Ham has done to him, he says, "Cursed be Canaan, a slave of slaves shall he be to his brothers." This curse, which is apparently a product of the Hebrews' conquest of the "land of Canaan" around 1200 BCE and the subsequent enslavement of the Canaanites, evolved into new forms as Middle Eastern societies started to use African slaves. By the sixth century, both Christian and Jewish traditions in the Middle East had added blackness to Noah's curse. In the Muslim adaptation of the story, the curse fell on Ham, Canaan's father, who was regarded as the ancestor of all Africans in Muslim sources. Blackness was added to servitude in some Islamic versions of the story as well.

A vocal response to these environmental and Biblico-exegetical attempts to justify racial prejudices came from, among others, an African-Ottoman jurist Mullah 'Ali (d. 1622–23). According to 'Ali, the diversity of human skin colors is not a matter of accident; thus it is neither environmental nor punishment for a deed but stems rather from the beginning of the creation: "Among [other] signs of [God] is the creation of the heavens and the Earth, and the variety of your languages and of your colors" (Q. 30:22). Blackness was inherent in the essence of Adam, not unlike the blackness that is inherent in white sugar, as suggested by the Persian Sufi Najm al-Din Razi (d. 1256): "From the first state of raw sugar to that of treacle, lucency and whiteness gradually decrease until only darkness and blackness remain. He who is unaware of the art of the sugar merchant will not know that he obtains these several and different products from the same sugar; he will deny the fact and say that black treacle could never have emerged from the white, translucent sugar. He will not know that blackness and darkness were inherent in the particle of the sugar."

While these discussions suggest the existence of racial prejudices and an intellectual discourse both in support of and in opposition to them, it is much harder to decide whether it was race and racism—as contemporary readers understand them—that were at stake. Although there are studies that attempt to make a case for an ancient origin for racism (such as Benjamin Isaac's The Invention of Racism in Classical Antiquity), there is a major qualitative difference between ethnocentrism and xenophobia, which have existed in many societies since ancient times, on the one hand, and modern racism, which crystallized in the "scientific racism" of physical anthropology in the late 19th century, on the other.

Broadly speaking, while there is overwhelming evidence for the existence of racial prejudices in the medieval and early modern Islamic world, the continuing access of Africans to major leadership roles in what one would today call "majority white" Muslim societies (as in the case of the aforementioned Mullah 'Ali, who became chief justice of the European provinces of the Ottoman Empire in 1621–22) suggests that race was not understood as a rigid biological category that would disqualify one from equal membership in society.

See also East Africa; genealogy; North Africa; Ottomans (1299–1924); slavery; South Africa

Further Reading

Sa'id al-Andalusi, Science in the Medieval World: Book of the Categories of Nations, edited and translated by Sema'an I. Salem and Alok Kumar, 1991; Bernard Lewis, Race and Slavery in the Middle East: An Historical Enquiry, 1990; 'Abd Allah ibn Muhammad Najm al-Din Razi, Path of God's Bondsmen from Origin to Return, translated by Hamid Algar, 1982; Baki Tezcan, "Dispelling the Darkness: The Politics of 'Race' in the Early Seventeenth Century Ottoman Empire in the Light of the Life and Work of Mullah Ali." in Identity and Identity Formation in the Ottoman World: A Volume of Essays in Honor of Norman Itzkowitz, edited by Baki Tezcan and Karl K. Barbir, 2007.

BAKI TEZCAN

Rahman, Fazlur (1919–88)

Fazlur Rahman was one of the 20th century's foremost Muslim intellectuals and scholars whose ideas on modern Islamic thought reached a global audience of elites through his prolific and courageous writings. He was born on September 21, 1919, to the Malik family in the Hazara district of British India, now part of Pakistan. On his death on July 26, 1988, in Chicago, Fazlur Rahman was described by Wilfred Cantwell Smith, the doyen of western Islamicists with strong ties to South Asia, as "a person of integrity; a religious man with a brilliant mind using it as part of his religion. He was a moral person; a serious Muslim motivated by deep concern for his culture and his people."

Fazlur Rahman's father, Mawlana Shihab al-Din, had orthodox leanings and was associated with the anticolonial scholar-activist Mawlana Mahmud al-Hasan (d. 1920), better known as "Shaykh al-Hind." Mawlana Mahmudul Hasan was affiliated with the Deoband madrasa now located in India. The young Fazlur Rahman studied the traditional Muslim scholastic texts that were featured in the traditional Nizami curriculum with his father, including law (fiqh), dialectical theology (kalām), prophetic traditions (hadith), Qur'an exegesis (tafsīr), logic (manṭiq), and philosophy (falsafa). He then attended Punjab University in Lahore, where he received a BA and an MA in Arabic. In 1946, he went to Oxford to work with Professor Simon van den Bergh. His dissertation was a translation, critical edition, and commentary on a section of Ibn Sina's work on psychology, Kitab al-Najat (Book of salvation). In 1950 Fazlur Rahman began teaching Persian and Islamic philosophy at Durham University, and in 1958 he left England to teach at the Institute of Islamic Studies at McGill University in Montreal.

Three years later, Fazlur Rahman embarked on an ambitious project. Pakistan under General Ayyub Khan had renewed its efforts at state formation with plans to revive the national spirit with political and legal reforms. Fazlur Rahman was asked to lead the project. At the newly formed Central Institute of Islamic Research, he first became a visiting professor and later director over a seven-year period, from 1961 to 1968. The policy side of the job meant that Fazlur Rahman's views were often open to public scrutiny, and his intellectual labor in the service of social reform was thus drawn into the messy political fray of Pakistan in the 1960s. Political parties and religious groups opposed to Ayyub Khan targeted Fazlur Rahman's scholarly views in order to scuttle the proposed social and cultural reforms. Some of the critical legal and religious issues he attempted to redress involved the status of interest on deposits in banks, zakat (the compulsory alms tax), the mechanical slaughter of animals, family law, and family planning. But his views on the authority of prophetic reports (hadith) and prophetic practice (sunna) and his reflections on the nature of revelation drew the greatest ire. After a turbulent period that adversely affected his health and his leadership role at the Central Institute for Islamic Research and the Advisory Council for Islamic Ideology, Fazlur Rahman resigned. After a short spell as visiting professor at the University of California, Los Angeles, he was appointed in 1969 as professor of Islamic thought at the University of Chicago, where he stayed until his death, having been named as of 1986 the Harold H. Swift Distinguished Service Professor.

Fazlur Rahman's intellectual legacy is captured in his prolific writings ranging from philosophy to contemporary questions in Islamic thought such as human rights, women's rights, education, religion and politics, law and ethics, medicine, and the role of history and hermeneutics, all of which culminated in his efforts to make the Qur'an the centerpiece of a Muslim interpretative framework. Continuing the modernist tradition of Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) of Egypt and the poet-philosopher of prepartition India, Muhammad Iqbal (d. 1938) was in his view a worthwhile cause. In the Western academy, especially in North America, Turkey, Indonesia, and of late in parts of the Arabic-speaking world, his views and interpretations have become the subject of scholarly debate and are used for the purposes of social reform.

See also modernism; Pakistan; revival and reform

Further Reading

Frederick Mathewson Denny, "Fazlur Rahman: Muslim Intellectual," Muslim World 79, no. 2 (1989); Ebrahim Moosa, "Introduction," in Revival and Reform in Islam: A Study of Islamic Fundamentalism, edited by Ebrahim Moosa, 2000.

EBRAHIM MOOSA

al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din (1149–1209)

A leading proponent of the late Ash'ari theological school that developed in Iran and Central Asia in the 12th through 16th centuries, Muhammad b. 'Umar Fakhr al-Din al-Razi is known primarily for his contributions to Sunni theology and Qur'anic exegesis, on which he wrote prolifically, in addition to writing on jurisprudence, philosophy, medicine, and astrology. He was born in Rayy, Iran, and after studying in Maragha he spent the remainder of his life debating with intellectuals of various types throughout Central Asia. He received patronage from both the Khwarazmshahs and the Ghurids, dynasties that were hostile to one another.

Although Razi did not compose a work on rulership or governance, he did address various political issues in his works on theology, philosophy, and Qur'an commentary. In so doing, he made significant contributions to the development of Islamic political thought. His views in this area were influenced by those of the Mu'tazilis as well as of the philosopher Ibn Sina.

The central concept of Razi's political thought is prophecy. Following the basic principles of Muslim theology, he held that prophets are human beings through whom God communicates with humankind. Among these prophets are messengers who bring new versions of God's laws, and thus new religions. Razi wrote that the prophets who communicate God's laws should be invested with political authority. He also argued that prophets are infallible, although he admitted that they could commit major sins before, and unintentional sins after, their prophetic missions.

Razi's political theory, which he discussed under the rubric of "practical science," was shaped by the philosophical tradition in Islam. In accordance with Ibn Sina's teaching on prophecy, he held that prophets are a sociopolitical necessity, since only prophets are capable of introducing laws that organize human life. Also following Ibn Sina, he defined prophecy as a perfection of the human soul. According to this teaching, a prophetic soul is one that has developed its imaginative and intellective faculties such that it may receive intelligible forms from the higher heavenly souls. It is the prophet's intellectual perfection that places him in a position to legislate and direct the Muslim community.

On the issue of the leadership of the Muslim community and the political concept of the imamate, topics that he addressed in his Compendium and Book of Forty Questions, Razi polemicized against the postulates of Twelver Shi'i theologians. These theologians have argued that the imamate is a logical consequence of God's benevolence or grace, and it is incumbent upon God by virtue of his benevolence to invest mankind with an imam, just as it is incumbent upon God to send prophets to humankind. Following his Ash'ari colleagues as well as many Mu'tazili scholars, Razi held that the imamate is necessary only as a matter of tradition and scripture. Also in opposition to Twelver Shi'i ideas, Razi held that it is incumbent upon the intellectuals of the Muslim community, not upon God, to designate an imam, by way of election.

Razi addressed the issue of the moral status of jihad against non-Muslims in his commentary on the Qur'an. In his milieu, many saw a tension between supporting jihad against non-Muslims and maintaining the Qur'anic precept that "there is no compulsion in religion" (2:256). The great majority of scholars interpreted this verse to mean that, while compulsion in religion was valid at the political level, it was inappropriate and futile to attempt to compel inner conviction. Under the influence of the Mu'tazilis, Razi interpreted the verse to mean that God intends that individuals have choice in religious belief. He argued that this world is an abode of trial or testing and that compulsion in religion at the level of conviction would nullify this idea. The use of compulsion in conversion, he argued, is incompatible with the moral responsibility that has been granted by God to human beings in this world.

See also Ash'aris; caliph, caliphate; Central Asia; exegesis; Ghurids (1009–1215); Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (980–1037); imamate; jihad; jurisprudence; Mu'tazilis; philosophy; Shi'ism; theology

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Fathulla Kholeif, A Study on Fakhr al-Din al-Razi and His Controversies in Transoxiana, 1966; Ann Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam, 1981.

TARIQ JAFFER

rebellion

Rebellion is action undertaken by a group aiming to replace the government in a state or to secede from the state to form a new one. Direct references to rebellion are not found in the Qur'an, but there are numerous references to hypocrites (munāfiqūn) in Medina who publicly accepted Islam while continuing to oppose Muhammad, more through subversion than in open revolt. The Qur'an (9:107) alludes to a "mosque of dissension" (masjid al-dirār) erected on the outskirts of Medina "by way of mischief and infidelity—to disunite the believers." This building was demolished on Muhammad's orders before the plotters' schemes could materialize. Rebellions marked the caliphates of Abu Bakr, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, and 'Ali b. Abi Talib. The Umayyad dynasty lasted barely 90 years before it was overthrown by an Abbasid revolt, and the Abbasids themselves had faced numerous rebellions already by the late ninth century.

Rebellion was, therefore, a timely and troubling issue for classical political and legal theorists. With the goal of preventing civil strife (fitna) and disorder or corruption (fasād), the theorists banned nearly all challenges to the established ruler. Qur'an 4:59, which reads, "Obey God and obey the Messenger and those in authority among you," along with numerous hadith reports, was marshaled by scholars to prohibit revolt against the caliph or the sultan, regardless of how he had come to power. Disobedience to a ruler's commands was permitted only when the ruler contravened Islamic law in accordance with the hadith that states, "No obedience to the created in opposition to the Creator." An errant ruler should be admonished, counseled, and suffered patiently by his subjects rather than challenged by force. Only in extreme circumstances, such as when a ruler abandoned Islamic law altogether or committed apostasy, should the Muslim subjects overthrow him. Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), for example, declared jihad obligatory against the Mongol conquerors of the Abbasid Empire, who, despite their conversion to Islam, ruled by the Yasa, the Mongol tribal law, rather than the shari'a. He castigated rebellion, however, against Muslim rulers over mainly political grievances.

Classical sources generally treat rebellion (baghy) as a type of criminal activity along with apostasy (ridda) and brigandage (hirāba), yet they devote considerable attention to differentiating the way rebels are to be treated compared to apostates, highway robbers, or pirates. People were deemed rebels if they formally withdrew from the Muslim community (khurūj) by disavowing allegiance to the ruler, provided a reasonable religious pretext for their disobedience (ta'wīl), and constituted a group with demonstrated power to challenge the state (shawka). If they met these criteria, they were subject to treatment under the laws governing the suppression of rebels (ahkām al-bughāh). Because these laws were based largely on precedents set by 'Ali in dealing with his enemies, especially the Kharijis, there was general agreement between Sunni and Shi'i legal schools on these matters. As Mawardi writes in al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government), fighting rebels differs from fighting infidels, apostates, and brigands in eight ways: the intent is to deter rather than kill rebels; they should not be pursued when they are retreating; their injured may not be killed; captured rebels may not be killed; their property may not be seized and their women and children may not be enslaved; the aid of dhimmīs (protected communities) cannot be sought in fighting rebels; the Muslim commander may not give them assurances of an indefinite truce or conclude a peace treaty in return for monetary payment; and their homes and farms may not be despoiled. Clearly, the goal of these strictures was to rehabilitate rebels back into the body politic as quickly and completely as possible.

The political quietism proposed in the classical theory was always in tension with more popular themes of renewal (tajdīd) and reform (iṣlāḥ), which led periodically to violent movements aimed not only at overthrowing corrupt rulers but also at purifying society. One such insurrection was the Wahhabi revolt in 19th-century Arabia that in many ways laid the intellectual basis for the Muslim revivalist movements of the 20th century. To the Wahhabi creed of purging Islam of internal, heretical innovations (bid'a), 20th-century activists added the goal of thwarting Western political and cultural domination of Muslim countries. Thus modern writers espouse not so much rebellion but revolution, in the sense of a thoroughgoing sociopolitical change in norms and institutions.

Sayyid Qutb, in his influential essay Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Milestones), never openly declares jihad against the Egyptian or any other Muslim government, but his argument that Muslim societies are in a state of jāhiliyya (ignorance) akin to that against which the Prophet fought has obvious revolutionary implications. 'Abd al-Salam Faraj, the author of al-Farida al-Gha'iba (The absent duty), the manifesto of Anwar Sadat's assassins, took Qutb's views to their logical conclusion. Citing Ibn Taymiyya, Faraj declared the Egyptian government to be an apostate regime; thus rebellion against it was a religious obligation. In responding to this document, the 'ulama' (religious scholars) of Azhar University denounced Faraj's justification of tyrannicide by resorting to classical arguments that so long as a ruler was a Muslim and did not interfere with the performance of Islamic obligations in the country, rising up against him was prohibited.

A number of Shi'i theorists also figure prominently in contemporary debates on the legitimacy of rebellion. For centuries, Shi'i 'ulama' generally espoused dissimulation (taqiyya) and compliance with political authorities, tracing this policy back to the views of the sixth imam, Ja'far al-Sadiq. The views of Ayatollah Khomeini fundamentally challenged this legacy. Beginning in the 1940s with criticism of the two Pahlavi shahs, Khomeini moved to open defiance and by the late 1960s called for the regime to be overthrown. In Hukumat-i Islami (Islamic government), published in 1970, Khomeini outlines his theory of wilāyat al-faqīh (guardianship of the jurist). At the end of the treatise, he calls for tyrannical rulers (tāghūt) to be overthrown through civil disobedience and for the creation of parallel Islamic institutions. Similarly, the most prominent lay intellectual of the revolution, 'Ali Shari'ati, focused on mobilizing a grassroots movement led by the youths. Shari'ati criticized what he labeled "Safavi Shi'ism," after the Safavid dynasty, characterizing it as an ideology of quietism and political repression. True Shi'ism, Shari'ati argued, was "'Alavi Shi'ism," after 'Ali b. Abi Talib: a dynamic, politically active faith that required action to implement a just Islamic order.

See also coup d'état; dissent, opposition, resistance; quietism and activism

Further Reading

Khaled M. Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; J.J.G. Jansen, The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins, 1986; Ruhallah Khomeini, Islam and Revolution: Writings and Declarations of Imam Khomeini, translated by Hamid Algar, 1981; J. L. Kraemer, "Apostates, Rebels and Brigands," Israel Oriental Studies 10 (1980); Fazlur Rahman, "The Law of Rebellion in Islam," in Islam in the Modern World, edited by Jill Raitt, 1983.

SOHAIL H. HASHMI

representation

As a concept in political analysis, "representation" can refer to a variety of forms of decisions, judgments, and actions made on behalf of a larger group of persons by a smaller group (including a group of one). For the term "representation" to be appropriate, there must be some sense not only that the decisions of the smaller group are binding on the larger group (a relationship better expressed by the idea of "authority") but also that the smaller group is making decisions for the larger group by appointment or designation, or in the best interests of the larger group. Nonetheless, representation and authority are clearly companion concepts as long as the decisions of representatives are enforced on the larger population as legitimate, binding rules.

In classical Sunni political thought, perhaps the predominant emphasis was on communal unity (ahl al-sunna wa-l-jamā'a) and the avoidance of the twin evils of sectarianism and civil strife. This pragmatic conception of political life is consistent with a willingness to accommodate a great many departures from the ideal, as long as social life is preserved and no heterodox doctrine is imposed on the populace. Here, the only conception of legitimacy or representation in operation is that of a man with the capacity to redeem the populace from uncertainty and disorder. However, this bare-bones Sunni quietism is not, perhaps, most characteristic of the Sunni political vision. That vision is itself a realistic one in that it is nonutopian and noncharismatic, but its primary features are a concern for legitimacy in the wielding of power by some humans over other humans. This is Sunnism as a justificatory project, according to which the highest social goal to which humans can strive in this life is to govern their affairs with as much certainty as possible that this is the way required by God.

The caliph, or imam, is the primary representative institution in this vision. The concern with its legitimacy is shown by the efforts made by classical and medieval jurists to prove its necessity by both reason and revelation. Tellingly, Mawardi (974–1058) refers to the imamate as a "collective duty" (farḍ kifāya), like going to war or pursuing religious knowledge, "according to which the mass of people are exempted once it is undertaken by someone with the proper qualifications." This reveals that the caliphate was regarded as a representative institution and also something about the concept of representation in classical Sunnism: acting "on behalf" of someone is seen not only as a principal-agent relationship according to which the principal is owed something but also as a way of discharging something that the principal himself owes.

Of course, the representative nature of the imamate was linked not only to what the imam was doing and how (e.g., Mawardi's list of "ten public duties" that the imam must discharge, including the general duty of "enforcing [not creating] the law") but also to how he came into office. The Sunni scholars came to describe the imamate as "elective." Of course, in reality, this was a pious fiction designed to distinguish Umayyad and Abbasid dynastic rule from Shi'i claims. However, the origins of that fiction were in the institution of the ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd, the "people who loosen and bind." These were the notables who acted as representatives of the community of the Muslims, who act on their behalf in appointing (and deposing) a caliph or another ruler. Their necessary qualifications were to be Muslim, male, mature, free, "just" (sufficiently pious and trustworthy), and capable of judging who is best qualified to hold the office. Sometimes this body of men was referred to as a shūrā (council), according to the pre-Islamic Arabian tradition. A shūrā can refer more broadly, however, to any council of advisors around a decision maker, such as a ruler, judge, or military commander. A permanent assembly of such representative advisors is often called a majlis al-shūrā, especially in modern times.

But if Sunnism is to be understood as defining political legitimacy and authority mostly in terms of fidelity to law, then the representative class par excellence is that of the 'ulama' (religious scholars). They are regarded as the guardians, transmitters, and interpreters of religious knowledge, of Islamic doctrine and law; the term also embraces those who fulfill religious functions in the community that require a certain level of expertise in religious and judicial issues, such as judges and preachers.

The 'ulama' can be regarded as a representative class in a number of important ways. First, as with the caliphate, the pursuit of knowledge—specifically knowledge of the divine law—is a collective obligation. In devoting themselves toward the search for God's law, the scholars are discharging this obligation on behalf of the entire Muslim community. Second, in defining the content of law independently from the executive authority, the scholars are, in fact, representing the masses in the articulation of the limits of executive political authority. Third, to the extent that Sunnism sees religious knowledge as dispersed throughout the community (rather than concentrated in an imam), the scholars are the articulation and realization of this claim. Fourth, in practical terms, the scholars were often seen as the de facto voice of the people against the corruption (political and moral) of the elites. Fifth, in constituting themselves as a class, the scholars established themselves through public institutions extended through time, such as the legal schools and the madrasas (religious seminaries).

In the modern Islamic world, of course, it is harder to distinguish Islamic political thought from actual political practice. Representative bodies of various kinds have been established in all postcolonial contexts, usually with reference to shūrā when the aim is to suggest continuity with Islamic traditions (and to limit democratic expectations), or "delegates" (nuwwāb) when the aim is to suggest democratic constitutionalism. Among revivalist or Islamic thinkers, it is common to find calls for some kinds of representative institutions alongside calls for the full restoration of the shari'a and "God's sovereignty." Thus, in the works of such thinkers as Mawdudi (d. 1979), Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932), and Rachid al-Ghannouchi (b. 1941), one finds the endorsement of elections for those entrusted with implementing the shari'a and even for representatives to "legislative" bodies to form policies on matters not settled by revelation.

See also elections; government; parliament

Further Reading

Raja Bahlul, "People vs. God: The Logic of 'Divine Sovereignty' in Islamic Democratic Discourse," Islam and Muslim-Christian Relations, 11 (2000); Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam: Six Centuries of Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2005; Wael Hallaq, Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Abu al-Hasan al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government: A Translation of al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyya w'al-Wilāyāt al-Dīniyya, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 1996; Bernard Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change, 2007.

ANDREW F. MARCH

republicanism

Republicanism is a relatively new term in Islamic philosophical discourse. The idea of a representative government resembling what today is called a republic (jumhūrīyya) first appeared in 19th- and 20th-century Islamic thought. The term "republic" was first used to refer to a Muslim-majority country with the establishment of the Republic of Turkey in 1922–23.

Muslim thinkers who argue in favor of republicanism as a preferred political system justify this relatively new idea with reference to classical Islamic sources and doctrines. The most important of these doctrines is the Qur'anic principle of shūrā (consultation). Sura 42 of the Qur'an, called al-Shura, encourages mutual consultation. Elsewhere in the Qur'an (3:159), Muhammad is urged to consult with the members of his community (in spite of their faults) when making important decisions. This principle of consultation has become a primary justification for the arguments of prorepublican Muslims.

Early proponents of republican government in Muslim-majority countries included the Young Ottomans, who operated in Turkey in the late 19th century. One of their most common strategies was to demonstrate support for more democratic forms of government in Islamic teaching by identifying parallels between Qur'anic teachings and the terms familiar to liberal political discourse. Namık Kemal (1840–88) was a member of the Young Ottomans who argued that the principle of shūrā could be used to justify representative forms of government. Another early supporter of republican principles was Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), who argued that consultation is crucial for a just government, as it provides individual rulers with access to the greater intelligence that comes from the collective community. Muhammad Rashid Rida (1865–1935) was more explicitly republican in his adoption of the principle of shūrā. Rida proposed a group of representatives of the general population to choose, consult with, and have the power to remove the ruler. Rida argued that this model was fully compatible with the traditional Islamic caliphate, as the caliph could benefit from consultation with community representatives and Muslim jurists, so long as their advice did not contradict Qur'anic teachings.

The rise of republican discourse among Muslim thinkers was also connected to Arab nationalist and Pan-Islamic movements. Afghani (1838–97), a major figure in the history of Pan-Islamism and of modern Islamic thought more generally, argued that Muslims could seek truth in both revelation and reason. Afghani argued that a revival of Islam, uniting all Muslims in one community, would include a revival of reason as a source of guidance and also of more representative forms of government. Rida also argued strongly in favor of a united Islamic community; the collective intelligence of the Muslim community as a whole would far outweigh any national grouping.

Many contemporary Islamic countries are called republics, including Turkey, Lebanon, Syria, and Indonesia, among others. In 1956, Pakistan was the first country to adopt the title of "Islamic Republic," which subsequently was used by many other nations including the Shi'i-dominated Islamic Republic of Iran, established in 1979, and the post-Taliban Islamic Republic of Afghanistan. The legal structures of these countries are characterized by a high degree of variety, demonstrating the wide array of possibilities that can be captured by republicanism in the Islamic context.

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); democracy; elections; Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935)

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought: From the Prophet to the Present, 2001; Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 1982; Sylvia G. Haim, ed., Arab Nationalism: An Anthology, 1962; Malcolm H. Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida, 1966.

ROSEMARY B. KELLISON

revival and reform

Revival and reform, tajdīd and iṣlāḥ, are terms widely disseminated across a range of genres in Muslim literature. They are found in commentaries of prophetic traditions, political discourses, debates about shari'a, and the integrity of learning and scholarship. Often these key words are rhetorically invoked in exhortations of moral awakening in order to advance a Muslim social and political gospel. Over time, these terms have been used together to represent a concept that links newness and creativity (renewal/revival) to wholeness and integrity (iṣlaḥ, reform). Whether the "renewal and reform" is aimed at the collective or the individual or both, the discourse of revival and reform addresses stability and change, the mutable and immutable in Muslim thought. In this larger semantic framework, two things loom large: political theology and the integrity of the learned tradition. Renewal and revival (tajdīd) stem from the root j-d-d, to make new, to innovate, to refresh and resuscitate. One may think of reform as a discourse of improvement, recovery, and healing. Indeed, iṣlāḥ (repair) is derived from the Arabic root ṣ-l-ḥ, which means to mend, restore, and improve.

Plain readings of the proof texts suggest that renewal will not only resuscitate the body politic of both community and society but also heal and restore the brokenness of the moral order. This restorative aspect made this conceptual category attractive and appealing to all kinds of public actors who advanced a political, spiritual, and intellectual agenda for the betterment of both individuals and society.

The key report attributed to the Prophet Muhammad on the question of renewal states, "Indeed, at the beginning of every century God dispatches to this confessional community (umma) a person who will renew its dīn—salvation practices (religion)." Another report on the topic says, "God shows benevolence to the people who are part of His order of dīn at the beginning of every century by dispatching a man from my family who will clarify to them matters related to their salvation practices (dīn)."

Paradox, however, lies at the heart of the renewal-reform concept. A countervailing concept, called illicit innovation (bid'a), appears to ascribe dire consequences to expressions of newness and creativity. Generally, the prophetic statement "all innovation leads to misguidance" is understood to suggest that innovation in matters of dīn were forbidden. Thus alterations to normative standards of behavior (sunna) as well as those concepts associated with these normative practices were viewed as an egregious disruption of the paradigm of salvation. Even supplementing or altering the practices of dīn, without reference to the broader purposes of the Islamic ethics (shari'a), was frowned upon. Over time new paradigmatic shifts occurred that tolerated alteration to the practices of dīn, provided that they cohered with the overall goals of the shari'a. The tension generated by the enthusiasm to promote renewal-reform, on the one hand, and the proscription of illicit innovation in matters of dīn, on the other, required some explanation. The two conceptual categories were not polarities but rather mutually constitutive. Renewal and reform was a providential promise for the continued betterment of God's approved faith community. This forward-looking momentum was sustained by traditions attributed to the Prophet, which said, "The parable of my community is like that of rain. It is not known whether the best part is when it begins to rain or when it ends." Twelver Shi'i Islam has a strong messianic dimension in the expectation of the return of the political-spiritual leadership of the imam who went into occultation, but it has no tradition of centennial renewal. Sunni Islam, however, rooted its notion of perpetual low-key messianism in the idea of centennial renewal. Coupled with the sentiment of a melancholic exilic framework (namely, "true" Islam's estrangement in the world), this cluster of concepts constituted Sunni Islam's political theology.

Political theology, in the words of contemporary theorist Jan Assmann, is the "ever-changing relationships between political community and religious order, in short, between power [or authority: Herrschaft] and salvation [Heil]." Muslim thinkers such as Mawardi articulated a similar idea somewhat differently through the prism of leadership and governance: "Leadership (imāma) was designed in order to succeed the role of prophecy by protecting the order of salvation (dīn) and managing the affairs of the world." There was a conjunction of the religious order and the political order for these Muslim thinkers, too. But what made Muslim political theology so different from its counterpart in Christianity was that the political-theological in Islam was intimately related to the idea of prophecy. With the death of the Prophet Muhammad, the responsibility of his mission passed on to those who were designated as the guardians of the knowledge produced by prophecy, namely revelation. Since salvation was a core idea of Islam, the knowledge of practices was integral to the order of revelation. The semi-sacrosanct character of the discursive tradition, in turn, elevated the status and power of the scholars ('ulama'), the mediators of the learned tradition. The learned in Islam were seen as the true heirs of prophetic charisma. Statements attributed to the Prophet suggested that the learned "were analogous to the prophets among the Israelites." Given the equivalence between the learned and the prophets of yore, the power and authority of tradition was inseparable from Muslim political theology. And given this rather elevated status of the learned, the tradition that they managed and interpreted also acquired a certain semi-sacrosanct status.

Another way of putting this was that the Prophet in Islam had two bodies that paralleled his two primary earthly roles. The first was the Prophet's political body in his capacity as God's messenger, who established a political order that favored the transcendent good. The second was his moral body in his role as teacher of wisdom and the transcendent good (yu'allimuhum al-kitāb wa-l-hikma), whose embodied life (sunna) became the reference point of imitation. After Muhammad's death, the political body was continuously articulated through the concept of stewardship (khilāfa in Sunnism or imamate in Shi'ism), and the body of knowledge provided by the Prophet lived on in the Islamic knowledge tradition.

Reform and the Meaning of Tradition

The concept of reform was put to different uses by a range of Muslim actors and social movements. One can thus pose several questions: What do Muslims mean by revival and reform across time? What are the goals of revival and reform? Did revival and reform resonate differently over time and serve different functions at distinct periods of Muslim history?

Any conception of Muslim reform was intimately connected to tradition. To reform a tradition was to recover it, in order to rehabilitate it to its original form. If one understood tradition as a continuing moral argument that authoritatively connected a community's memory of the past to its present and future, then reform was the process of restoring that tradition, of sustaining the promise of its continued repetition and also inventing it simultaneously. Reform in Islam, therefore, did not have a singular meaning or trajectory. Modernist presumptions about reform imagined it to be progressive and incremental. To the contrary, apart from some recent modernist discourses, reform in Islam was usually mobilized to "re-form" what was already in place, to restore the original form of a practice or an idea to shield it from the specter of change and newness. Any attempt to restore an original form, however, was always vulnerable to the possibility of creating something new instead of restoring the original. Therefore reform, even when it ostensibly sought to resist change, could not escape the inherent dynamism of creativity and change.

In order for a project of reform to authorize itself, it had to identify an object of reform, a fractured object that was available and in need of healing, mending, and improvement. In that sense, reform was integral to the story of Islam from its very beginnings. Reform was in many ways at the heart of Prophet Muhammad's career.

Moreover, the divine revelation transmitted through the Prophet told a particular story of moral fracture, disintegration, and chaos about the place and time in which it was revealed. The seventh-century Arabic context, so the story went, was enveloped by the corruptions of unbelief, polytheism, and idolatry. People valorized ancestral authority over divine command, tribal customs over divinely sanctioned law. The revelation of the Qur'an, as embodied in the figure of the Prophet, intervened to mend, resolve, and reform that disorder.

The philosopher/historian Quentin Skinner wrote that certain modes of inquiry rest on what he called "a question and answer space." Skinner maintained that a proposition was only properly understood if the question that elicited an answer was properly identified and articulated. The meaning of a proposition, in other words, was relative to the question it answered and could not, as a consequence, be discovered by lifting it out of the discursive process or milieu of which it was a constitutive part. In order to conceptualize the narrative plot of Muslim reformist discourses, one must examine the nature of the questions the reformists imagined alongside the answers they provided. More precisely, the moral argument for submitting to the absolute sovereignty of the divine represented an answer to a society crippled by polytheism and idolatry. This original story of contestation between those who affirmed and detracted from divine sovereignty served as the paradigmatic narrative plot that haunted almost all subsequent moments of Muslim reform, in both the premodern and modern periods.

Indeed, the authority of any project of reform depended on its ability to establish the relevance of its own question and answer space within the context of the Prophet's time. Reform then emerged as the trope of reenacting the narrative drama of prophetic time in a new context or present. Such instances of narrative "translation" populate the intellectual history of premodern Islam.

Ibn Khaldun: History and Change

In his magnum opus, the Muqaddima (Prolegomena), the historian and polymath Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406) demonstrated that apocalyptic narratives in the prophetic traditions were by and large not reliable. Often the predictions made about the end times in the prophetic traditions were of a political character. Reports predicted the political fate of pious and impious rulers and the rise and fall of dynasties with great specificity and detail. Ibn Khaldun treated many of these reports as spurious. He used his skills as a historiographer of the hadith literature to show that some of the material recorded in the books of prognostications (malāḥim) were either weak reports or tied to the sectarian conflicts endemic to early Islam.

Acutely aware that many of these discourses were constructed, Ibn Khaldun then examined some of the narratives that explained the messianic coming of the guide or Mahdi before the apocalypse. Often these narratives, he stated, were deeply coded with political agendas that gave power to those who wielded them: "The time, the person, place, everything is indicated in these many spurious and arbitrary proofs. Then the time passes without a trace of the predictions coming true. Then they fabricate another narrative replete with linguistic equivocations, along with imaginary and astrological claims!" The idea of the imminent advent of a person who would renew both the moral values of the faith community (aḥkām al-milla) and the principles of truth (marāsim al-ḥaqq) was prevalent among his Sufi contemporaries, Ibn Khaldun wrote. He claimed to have been in touch with relatives of some saintly figures who expected the arrival of such a renewer at the beginning of the eighth Islamic century, corresponding to the 14th century on the Gregorian calendar. Ibn Khaldun did not cite any authority, such as a prophetic report about the centennial renewer from the collection of Abu Dawud, a collection with which he was familiar. Rather, Ibn Khaldun implied that such activities of renewal were part of the practice of the Sufis. He reminded his readers that charismatic authority on its own was insufficient to gain power. One needed something more fundamental in order to institutionalize change: hegemonic power. He explicitly stated, "No religious or political propaganda can be successful, unless hegemonic power (shawka 'aṣabiyya) prevail in order to support such religious and political aspirations and to defend them against adversaries until God's will materializes in these matters." Central to Ibn Khaldun's theory for any religious or political transformation to successfully occur was the need to be in a position to wield what he called group solidarity ('aṣabiyya): in other words, the acquisition of hegemonic power was necessary in order to make things happen. Any religious call or political mission had to be backed up by a form of social solidarity that became the basis and vehicle for the transmission of ideas.

Religion, in Ibn Khaldun's view, played a central role in leavening the hegemonic political power he regarded as fundamental to social organization. Political authority, what he called royal authority, needed some kind of compelling appeal that was provided by religion, which held people together. In fact, one might say that Ibn Khaldun used the notion of religion in the sense of an ideology. Arabs in their state of nature were uncontrollable, he said, and their traits were tailor-made for anarchy and the ruin of civilization. Then something transformative happened that rendered them capable of governance. That elixir, in his view, was dīn, a set of practices and behaviors central to salvation, which transformed the community that adopted it. He described the way dīn shaped both the individual subject and the community attached to it. Inspired by a Qur'anic expression of sibghat Allāh (the color of God), Ibn Khaldun freely used the expression sibgha dīniyya (religious coloration) to describe the deep transforming experience a people derived from prophecy or from their engagement with religion. "Arabs are by nature remote from political leadership," he said. "They attain power only once their nature has undergone a complete transformation under the influence of some religious coloring that wipes out all such [negative qualities] and causes the Arabs to have a restraining influence on themselves."

Even though Ibn Khaldun did not give much weight to prophetic materials, he was aware of the potential and limits of social reform based on religion. He was aware of reform initiatives taken by figures in North Africa whose theopolitical platform was to propagate the truth and reestablish the prophetic traditions. Ideally, such changes required the moral correction of humanity (iṣlāḥ al-khalq), but often such efforts, he claimed, resulted in superficial changes. The rhetorical keystroke of the reform initiatives was to connect people to the sunna of the Prophet Muhammad and to instruct them to desist from living a life of sin, he said. The rate of successful change in some of the folk he had observed, he admitted, was limited. Some merely desisted from a life of highway robbery and brigandage without really changing their conduct when they adopted a religious ethic. While such cessation of sin was by all accounts noteworthy, Ibn Khaldun's larger point was that internalizing a religious ethic required additional education. Merely raising the standard of the sunna and rooting out the wrongs were not sufficient.

Premodern Imaginaries of Reform

The sunna played a key role in the earliest discourses on renewal and the healing of the faith community. A report in the book of Abu Dawud stated, "Indeed, God deputes to this faith community (umma) at the beginning of every century one who will renew its salvific practices (dīn)." This pithy statement captured the redemptive utopia of Islam and also structured its sense of history. Not only did providence play an important role in the self-understanding of the faith community, human agency was explicitly affirmed in the renewal process. Furthermore, temporality and human agency were inseparable, while Islam as a faith was equipped with a reformist gospel. In other words, Islam as a discursive project was a human-God partnership or covenant. In order to keep the faith community vibrant and to render it temporally relevant, it would require a regular process of renewal—but the nature of this process and the spheres in which it would take place were points of contention among Muslims.

Given that the idea of revival and reform animated the Muslim moral and political imagination from a very early period, it also produced an illustrious genealogy of actors and players who had occupied the role of "renewer(s) of the age." The career of the jurist and eponymous founder of the Shafi'i school of Sunni law, Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi'i (d. 820), was one such example. Shafi'i's project of reform was animated by his desire to fashion the model of the Prophet into a coherent, universal, and consistent object of knowledge. Shafi'i's offer of a system and a method to retrieve the epistemological body of the Prophet—namely, the sunna—catapulted him into prominence as a centennial renewer (mujaddid). His principal intervention was to introduce a hermeneutical understanding to the prophetic reports (hadith) and to end the reign of crass literalism perpetrated by the partisans of hadith. Moreover, he sought to counter the unbridled rational opinion advanced by the advocates of rationality—namely, the Hanafi scholars of Iraq. Shafi'i's dissatisfaction was directed at what he perceived to be the potential ethical chaos that might result from a plurality of models or bodies of the Prophet. The central dilemma that Shafi'i sought to address was this: how must a community affirm and embody the memory of the Prophet's model in a world that was becoming more and more distant from that prophetic past? Fashioning an answer to this question was central to multiple projects of reform, revival, and ethics in Islam. Moreover, with the movement of time, this question became increasingly pressing, and it engaged several Muslim scholars in the generation following the foundational architects of Islamic law and moral reasoning such as Shafi'i. Among the Shafi'is, Ibn al-Surayj (d. 918), Juwayni (d. 1085), and Ghazali (d. 1111) all became known as centennial renewers for their labors in recasting the body of knowledge in the Muslim tradition.

An excellent illustration of this trend can be found in the reformist project of Ibrahim al-Shatibi (d. 1388), the 14th-century Andalusian jurist aligned with the Maliki School of law. If Shafi'i's signature achievement was to systematize the knowledge of prophetic norms, then for Shatibi it was the elucidation of the underlying objectives that sustained the philosophical and doctrinal dimensions of Islamic law. Shatibi's most meticulous treatment of this project was found in his well-known magnum opus al-Muwafaqat (Concordances), although almost all his works were inspired by this central theme in some way.

Shatibi's conception of reform was driven by his attempt to align the practical implementation of law to its moral foundations. He argued that divine law could not be divorced from a larger program of ethics. For Shatibi, divine revelation was not a composite of haphazard discourses that lacked any cause or intentionality. On the contrary, revelation and the order that it generated were grounded in certain indispensable deeper objectives (maqāṣid), such as the safeguarding of life, property, salvational potentiality, intellect, and lineage. When law became separated from these objectives, Shatibi argued, it ceased to serve the welfare of the people for whom it was intended. In that situation, law no longer performed its primary purpose, to serve human interests in both this life and the next. Shatibi elaborated on this principle in his work that is now known as the discourse on the "objective-driven understanding of law and jurisprudence" (al-fiqh al-maqāṣidī). At the heart of Shatibi's legal reform, as exemplified in the category "objectives of the law," was his desire to establish a correlation between the values attached to particular practices and the higher ethical objectives that those values were supposed to foster and fulfill. Shatibi perhaps most emphatically articulated the foundational premise that informed his understanding of reform in Islam when he wrote, "[Divinely revealed] laws have all been established to preserve human beings' interests both in this life and the life to come." He further elaborated this principle when he said, "Normative rulings are intended to realize the welfare [of a community] and to repel harm and corruption. These, then [i.e., the realization of welfare and the repelling of harm], are the desired effects of normativity." To be engaged in reform signified, for Shatibi, the labor of preserving the synchronicity between the normative limits of the law and the ethical objectives that those limits were intended to secure. In other words, Shatibi sought to protect the marriage between law and ethics in Islam from separation or divorce.

But what kind of narrative about the past's relationship to the present (and the future) enabled the urgency of such agendas of moral reform? Shatibi provided some clues in his highly poignant introduction to his most extensive work on the concept of heretical innovation (bid'a), al-I'tisam (The adhering). Here Shatibi told a particular story about the tension produced by the polarities of normativity versus heresy in Islam through a narrative about becoming estranged from the world. Shatibi's prophetic report has a melancholic mood. "Islam began as a stranger and will return as a stranger like it began, so blessed were the strangers." Shatibi narrated his own struggles against the heretical innovations prevalent in his time, such as offering a benediction (du'a) after formal prayers, and his resultant marginalization from the mainstream of his society. His suffering was unmistakably similar to the Prophet Muhammad's estrangement from society in the early years of his mission as God's messenger. In confronting heresy and adhering to the sanctioned path, according to Shatibi, one also became estranged from the sinful society.

In his political and theological writings in the 14th century, Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) used the hadith about the coming of a centennial renewer as a sign of the promised awakening and renewal of the din in two slightly different contexts. In a letter to the Crusader leader of Cyprus, he explained the virtues of Islam and commented on a number of practices and recent experiences of the Muslims. The Mamluk sultans, he explained, routed the Mongols, who had declared their loyalty to Islam but then reneged in their conduct and obstinate pagan beliefs. In terms of the providential promise, Ibn Taymiyya stated, God sent the "armies of God" in the shape of the Mamluks in order to protect the community of Muslims from sure destruction. In this instance he invoked the hadith about awakening and renewal after the Muslim political entity was saved from destruction at the hands of enemies. In another citation of the same hadith, Ibn Taymiyya talked about messianic times, when Islam would become estranged from the world for some time until it was announced again to the world. Under such conditions, according to the authority of another hadith report, the true people of faith would stand up for the truth, fearless of the consequences and suffering they might endure at the hands of their adversaries. Ibn Taymiyya then cited the hadith that promised the revival of Islam in every century, creating an association between the estrangement of Islam and the parallel awakening and renewal. In other words, the symbolism of the rise and fall or the decline and renewal of Islam as a faith community was not absent from the historical narrative of Muslim thinkers themselves.

The tradition of renewal was connected to one of the central functions of prophecy: to share divine wisdom with humanity. Often the prophetic report about renewal of religion was connected to the traditions of learning and the discursive practices of Islam. Hence the learned of Islamdom were on par, in terms of function and service rendered, with the prophets of the children of Israel.

All commentaries on the centennial renewal report insisted that the primary function of the act of renewal was to ensure that the sunna displaced the heretical innovations (bid'a) that had superseded it in social practices and customs. Semantically, the concept of sunna was a continuation of the pre-Islamic sensibility or custom. After the advent of Islam, all customs pointed toward monotheism. Yet the sunna was a serious element of continuity in the Muslim community, for whatever was true and just was embodied in the sunna. As Ignaz Goldziher described the sunna in relation to the Arabs, "The sunna was their law and their sacra." Sunna could be understood as tradition, provided the latter also signified a strong sense of obligation. So when the sunna was tied to the person and identity of the Prophet Muhammad as the lawgiver and moral exemplar for Muslims, it also signified the completion of an ideal. As an ideal, the sunna represented how Muslims felt about the Prophet Muhammad. Imitating Muhammad was thus an essential part of proper Islamic living to simulate the representative feelings for the charismatic authority. Since the sunna became the accepted model of proper living, displacing the sunna was a sure sign of delinquency and signaled an intent to disavow the life practices ushered in by Islam.

Yet Muslim jurist-theologians quickly realized that idealizing the sunna as a cultural phenomenon was not practical. The sunna had to be sifted from the amalgam of reports gathered over time, then understood, rationalized, and turned into an interpretive logic as well as a charismatic reference point. One outcome was fiqh, literally the task of understanding the statements of the sunna and the Qur'an to constitute the core teachings of Muslim practice. Simultaneously, Islam's scriptural statements had to be understood in the light of changing times. This became one of the most challenging tasks for Muslims over the centuries and became especially acute in the rapidly changing historical period of modernity.

Reform in Modernity

It is now well accepted among scholars of Islam that tradition and modernity are not inherently opposed. Instead of approaching tradition as a field of discourses, types of knowledge, and norms that became irrelevant or outdated in the wake of modernity, it is more accurate to approach tradition as a continuing moral argument that has undergone particular shifts and transformations in new political and institutional conditions. Indeed, it might be most accurate to think of modernity also as a particular kind of tradition with its own expectations, sensibilities, and dreams of a good life. Some characteristics of modernity include the valorization of a "rational" subject unencumbered by the burden of myth and superstition, a renewed emphasis on the capacity of the individual to attain knowledge, and the articulation of a political theology that resists hierarchies and that champions the promise of a radically egalitarian ethos. Western colonialism transformed the discursive terrain in which Muslim actors and discourses could advance their projects of reform. Indeed, the career of the Muslim reform tradition also transformed in dramatic ways while it confronted the new conceptual and discursive terrain of Western colonial modernity. Most significantly, the modern episode in the tradition of Muslim reform took place in a postimperial context, when Muslim political power in various parts of the world, from the late 18th century onward, either had collapsed or was steadily dwindling. But ironically, this loss of political power served as a major catalyst for the intensification of intellectual activity among reform-minded Muslim scholars. Contrary to a rise-and-fall model of history that equated political loss to intellectual decline, the reformist tradition in Islam showcased a remarkable degree of intellectual fermentation during periods of political decline. Various reformist movements in such regions as Central Asia, the Middle East, and South Asia attest to this trend.

A hallmark of the Muslim reform tradition in the modern era was a renewed emphasis on protecting the absoluteness of divine sovereignty not only as an incontrovertible theological dogma but also as a moral imperative in everyday life. Several devotional practices, such as seeking the intercession of the Prophet and saints, visiting shrines of deceased saints in order to seek redemptive intercession, and attending birth and death ceremonies of charismatic pious figures, all emerged as objects of intense polemics and contestations. The legitimacy of these practices had been debated before the modern period: even in the premodern era, the problem of how a community should guard divine sovereignty from all potential human competitors produced much debate and differences among Muslim scholars. The political and institutional conditions in which these battles were fought in modern times, however, had almost entirely changed. There were two main traditions or thought styles that most decisively shaped the contours of Muslim reformist thought in the modern era. Broadly conceived, these traditions can be called Muslim modernism and Muslim maximalism, or what is generally known as the Salafi tradition. Although the sources of knowledge that informed these two traditions were different, the recipe for religious and social reform offered by the custodians of these traditions shared certain key ingredients.

Perhaps most significantly, each placed a renewed emphasis on the Qur'an and the sunna as the only authentic sources of religious practice. They offered a scathing critique of devotional and popular practices that threatened divine sovereignty. There were perhaps two defining features of Muslim reformist thought in modernity. Remarkably, on these two foundational points, Muslim modernist and Salafi thinkers seem to be in total agreement. The famous 20th-century Indian poet-philosopher Muhammad Iqbal (d. 1939) was unambiguous in his chastisement of a worldview that placed antinomian mysticism above a commitment to treating the social and moral ills of this world. Iqbal reminded his readers in his classic The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam that, after having received ultimate proximity with the divine during his famous ascension, the Prophet chose to return to this world. What the modern Muslim needed, Iqbal pleaded, was precisely this spirit of return to the world in order to address its challenges. Such a spirit was only possible, Iqbal argued, with an attitude that was inspired by the revolutionary ethos of the Qur'an. The reinvigoration of the self, the elevation of the self, required a renewed emphasis on the primacy of the Qur'an as the foundational source of Islamic practice. If such a project of reform required that certain nonessential rituals and customary conventions be jettisoned in order to serve moral and social change, then Iqbal was prepared to sacrifice them. "This one prostration which you consider to be a burden, relieves a person of a thousand other prostrations," Iqbal famously wrote. Iqbal's view, shared by several other Muslim modernists of his generation, emphasized transcendence articulated in a rationally grounded idiom. The way to confront the crisis of meaning caused by Western modernity, colonialism, and the larger processes of industrial capitalism was to recover that spirit of submission to a transcendent authority that had enabled Islam to emerge as a revolutionary ideological force at its beginnings.

Similarly, the famous 19th-century Egyptian reformer Muhammad 'Abduh's (d. 1905) conception of reform focused on retrieving an egalitarian ethos of a transcendent authority that for him had become corrupted by an overweening degree of dependence on hierarchies of human authority. As he stated most clearly in his well-known work Risalat al-Tawhid (The epistle on unity), his primary objective was "freeing the minds of Muslims from the chains of belief in authority because God has not created humankind in order to be led by a halter." 'Abduh's primary target was the principle of conforming to canonical authority (taqlīd), which, in his view, had vitiated the capacity of the ordinary believer to apply his reason and intellect in interpreting the foundational sources of religion. Unlike Iqbal, 'Abduh was trained in the traditional canonical sources of law at the prestigious Azhar University in Cairo. Despite, or perhaps because of, his traditional training, however, 'Abduh was convinced that in order to challenge the looming threat of Westernization (taghrīb) and colonialism with any integrity, it was imperative to reject any practice that did not value rational inquiry over dogmatic following, egalitarianism over submission to authority.

The Algerian thinker Malek Bennabi (d. 1973), building on the intellectual threads spun by Afghani, 'Abduh, and Iqbal, offered a critique of both Salafist and modernist reform projects. Bennabi lamented that the drive of Salafist reformism adopted a retrograde character, directing its intellectual energies to the past and providing imprints and templates that were "incompatible with the exigencies of the present and the future." The modernist reformers, he complained, uncritically adopted European ideas; they were obsessed with how they could be acquired but lacked the curiosity to know "how they were created." What Bennabi found lacking in all Muslim reformist thought was the absence of a doctrine of culture. Without developing a sense of culture, he believed that all "Islāhism [reformism] propagates a complacent symbolism that dreams of transforming the condition of life by communicating, above all, the taste for 'Muslim things' and Arab 'belles-lettres.'" The reformist movement did not know how to "transform the Muslim soul or to translate into reality the 'social function' of the religion." However, reformists were successful, he wrote, in making Muslims realize their position in the world, what he called the "secular drama." He argued that only by posing the problem of culture generally could the Islamic renaissance emerge from its embryonic state.

Apart from South Asia and the Middle East, a similar trajectory of Muslim modernist reform is found in Soviet Central Asia. In the 19th century, a small number of intellectual elites in such urban centers as Bukhara, Tashkent, and Samarqand established what came to be known as the Jadid (new) movement. At the heart of this movement was an attempt to establish the compatibility of scientific rationality and the foundational sources of Islam, mainly the Qur'an and sunna. Moreover, in ways similar to their modernist counterparts in South Asia and the Middle East, the Jadids sought to eradicate the influence of local customs, conventions, and rituals that in their view lacked a precedent in the Qur'an and sunna. Again, reform for them involved the separation of "local culture" from "authentic religion."[1] The most crucial variable in enabling such a process of reform, for the Jadids, was education of both the religious and secular varieties. Therefore, prominent 19th- and 20th-century Jadid thinkers such as Munawwar Qari (d. 1933) and Mahmud Behbudi (d. 1919) were defiant in their call to adopt "new methods" of education in both secondary schools and institutions of higher learning. Their vision for Central Asian Muslims was unabashedly modern; the cultivation of a new civil society required discarding old myths, rituals, and superstitions and the need to embrace a rationally sound subjectivity. The enlightenment project of relegating older traditions to irrelevance seemed very real and possible to Jadid scholars like Qari and Behbudi. Their project of reform not only took place in the shadow of Soviet hegemony but also was heavily inspired by the Marxist-Communist narrative of progress and modernization in society. But they differed from the Soviet model in their belief that Islam was inherently compatible with scientific rationality. Hence they resisted the Soviet drive to completely eradicate religion from the public sphere.

Apart from these modernist discourses that emerged either as a response to or in the shadow of Western colonialism, another major trend of Muslim reform in the modern period was the maximalist or puritanical tradition, usually called Salafism. Literally, the term "Salafism" referred to the argument that only the body of norms that originated during the patristic community of the Prophet could be regarded as authoritative in Islam. In a move not all that different from Muslim modernist thinkers, puritanical reformers such as the well-known Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab (d. 1787) in Arabia and the lesser-known Shah Isma'il (d. 1831) in India also argued for a return to the Qur'an and the sunna as the exclusive reservoirs for an authentic religious normativity. What distinguished these puritanical reformers from their modernist counterparts was the degree to which they conceived of reform as equivalent to guarding the absoluteness of divine sovereignty. A mindset of constant rivalry between human and divine norms was central to their social imaginaries (norms regulating social existence), much more pronounced than in modernist thinkers like Iqbal or 'Abduh. A significant part of the reform project advanced by thinkers like Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab and Shah Isma'il centered on such issues as the limits of prophetic intercession, the legitimacy of visiting shrines of dead saints, and the capacity of the Prophet to know the unknown, among other doctrines.

On each of these issues, their position was informed by a political theology that amplified divine sovereignty, even if that meant casting the humanity of the Prophet as a fallible subject. Theirs was a larger program to perpetuate social egalitarianism. They downplayed the Prophet's miraculous qualities and emphasized that his prophetic authority was enabled by the perfection of his humanity. Similarly, the authority of saints and other pious figures to perform such acts as interceding on behalf of sinners also had to be restrained in order to preserve a radical difference between divine and human authority. The zeal of such thinkers to guard the absoluteness of divine sovereignty not only inspired a number of important movements within Muslim reformist thought but also generated a great deal of controversy, polemics, and a fair number of rebuttals.

One of the more interesting developments was the emergence of traditionalist reform-minded scholars who inhabited seemingly antithetical genealogies of Islamic thought. On the face of it, it appeared as certain reform-minded scholars were bringing together new hybrid traditions and incommensurable discourses. Among them is Ibrahim b. al-Hasan al-Kurani, but one can also include Shah Waliullah of Delhi and also later Indian traditional scholars such as Anwar Shah Kashmiri, among others, who were strong admirers of Ibn Taymiyya and also liberally drew on, and defended, the teachings and insights of Ibn al-'Arabi. Ibn Taymiyya's salafist-nominalism combined with Ibn al-'Arabi's dizzying immanentist metaphysics would appear to be strange bedfellows. But some reform-minded scholars including the Ghumari brothers ('Abdullah and Ahmad Ghumari) of North Africa combined their reverence for the family of the Prophet (ahl al-bayt) with their Sunni traditionalism. All this suggests that multiple logics (heterologies) were at play in certain reformist strains of thought that might be antithetical to more systematic thinkers of reform. But it might well be that these contradictions are the product of a larger modernist template in which things that appear to be antithetical can have perfect synchrony in practice.

Contemporary Debates on Reform

In late 20th-century India, the rector of the Darul Uloom of Deoband, Qari Muhammad Tayyab (d. 1988), offered a narrative of revival and reform that represented a traditional perspective of the 'ulama'. Tayyab argued that there were two means by which the path of dīn was providentially protected. The first was through powerful personalities who represented the preservation of dīn. The second was through the inner spirit of dīn, which naturally shielded it from any subversive threat.[2]

Tayyab argued that human mentality changed over the duration of a century and that significant intergenerational changes had occurred. As a result, he wrote, new modes of thinking and new experiences unfolded in a progressive manner. In every generation, therefore, was a risk and a legitimate fear that the next generation of the Muslim community might jettison the imprint of the previous generation. The primary concern, Tayyab explained, was to prevent the original and traditional imprint from becoming anachronistic for the new generation. For this reason the teachings of the faith had to be continuously explained and interpreted in the light of the new and altered mentality, and for this reason individuals were providentially deputed to the world to serve as centennial renewers.

Anwar al-Jundi (d. 2002), a prominent Egyptian advocate of revival and reform in the tradition of major reformers such as Ibn Hazm, Ghazali, Ibn Taymiyya, and Ibn Khaldun, described each of these figures as "correctors of concepts and renewers of Islamic thought." Each one had made a specific methodological intervention to the intellectual tradition that gave integrity to the teachings of Islam in terms of the challenges of their respective times. Ibn Hazm, said Jundi, combated the distortion produced by the overuse of analogy and paved the way back to the straightforward and plain meaning of the Qur'an. The prevalent predisposition toward blind imitation of authority (taqlīd) was another distortion that Ibn Hazm opposed. Ghazali chose to work in the area of education and culture, Jundi explained, and brought the spiritual and legal into a meaningful integration. At the same time, Ghazali also combated the excessive claims of philosophy and the Muslim philosophers. Ibn Taymiyya, in turn, evaluated all Islamic thought on the touchstone of the truth of the Qur'an. Whatever could not sustain the scrutiny of the Qur'an and the sunna could be discarded, according to Jundi's reading of Ibn Taymiyya. Ibn Khaldun turned against the empty verbal polemics of his day that contributed to the lack of originality in Islamic thought. Ibn Khaldun's intervention was to give empirical observation a respectable place in the epistemological framework of religious thought, Jundi argued.

For Jundi and many advocates of reform in the modern period, the rebuttal of the idea of following ancient discursive authority of the law schools (taqlīd) was one of the most important rhetorical markers of the reform movement. Instead of following authority, they advocate ijtihād, or independent thinking. However, often ijtihād meant following a variety of legal opinions instead of one law school. And instead of following the canonical authority of a law school and its interpretations, in the sphere of moral teachings and ethics, the reformists sometimes resorted to plain readings derived from the Qur'an and sunna but more often fell back on the opinions of ancient schools.

The U.S./European wars in Afghanistan and Iraq against a range of Muslim groups from terrorists and militants to religious revivalists and pietists has had a major impact on the discourse of revival and reform. If certain Muslims in the 19th and 20th centuries were suspicious of the agenda of revivalism and reform as a vehicle for Westernization advanced by European colonizers, then in the early 21st century, discourses of revival and reform have become deeply politicized and polarizing within Muslim societies where some see revival and reform as a bridgehead for new crusades against Islam. For instance, after the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, the Egyptian public intellectual Muhammad 'Imara wrote a pamphlet titled Religious Discourse: Between Islamic Reform and American Subversion (al-Khitab al-Dini bayna al-Tajdid al-Islami wa-l-Tabdid al-Amrikani), in which he identified himself as a protagonist of an Islamic reformist agenda. Renewal was not only a rational necessity, said 'Imara, but also a part of the "tradition (sunna), necessity (darūra) and universal rule (qānūn)." He argued that without renewal, the chasm between "thought (fikr), ethics (fiqh), Islamic discourse (al-khiṭāb al-Islāmī)," which represent the shari'a on the one hand and the demands of societal change on the other, would only widen. 'Imara also argued that a unifying agenda of reform was impossible, and hence diversity would be a hallmark of any such project. However, he was highly skeptical of what he called the American-financed reform projects that supported Muslim secularists, Marxists, and mercenaries, whose purpose he viewed as the replacement of Muslim religious discourse with secularism. 'Imara's rhetoric, however exaggerated, has gained traction in contexts where conflict with the West has reached new levels of antagonism.

'Imara's focus was on the disagreement within Muslim circles over the rights to and limits of reform. But 'Imara chose a demonic rhetoric to describe his Muslim intellectual adversaries, similar to the way anthropologist Saba Mahmood charged certain Iranian and Arab Muslim thinkers of tailoring their reforms to American imperial designs. Among the targets of these critics were figures such as Nasr Hamid Abu Zayd (d. 2010), Hasan Hanafi, Khalil 'Abd al-Karim (d. 2002), and the pivotal Iranian reformist thinker Abdolkarim Soroush, who were engaged in fairly far-reaching criticisms of traditional Muslim discursive and interpretative paradigms. 'Imara invoked the authority of Afghani and 'Abduh in order to distinguish genuine reform from what he suspected was the bacillus of subversive reforms. This overheated debate has echoes of early and mid-20th-century debates in Egypt, where such thinkers as Taha Husayn (d. 1973), 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq (d. 1966), Qasim Amin (d. 1908), and Muhammad Ahmad Khalafallah (d. 1977) were demonized as hostile and subversive elements who attempted to undermine the authentic inherited narrative of Islamic thought. One of the perpetual challenges for Muslim reformers was to know where to draw the line in the realm of ideas.

Revival and reform also became the pretext for a largely sterile but earnest debate among academics in the Western academy during the 1980s over the larger political implications of revival and reform. Fazlur Rahman, the Pakistani scholar and émigré to the United States, observed a neo-Sufi revivalist tradition that in his view combined spirituality with activism, a move away from the passive, world-denouncing, ascetic Sufism of old. While some scholars, such as John Voll, agreed with him, others, including Rex O'Fahey, Bernard Radtke, Reinhard Schulze, and Ahmad Dallal, voiced alternative viewpoints. Their fundamental disagreement with the Fazlur Rahman and Voll thesis was that it tried to explain a range of revivalist Sufi practices under a singular rubric—neo-Sufism—whereas the actual story was much more complex. Rahman and Voll's detractors argued that Muslim intellectuals and social reform movements in the 18th century were generating revivals independent of European influences in creative and innovative ways that defied the charges of decline.

Conclusion

Revival and reform have been integral to Islam from its very beginnings. The idea of reform relates to mending a fractured present in order to generate something entirely new or to rehabilitate an original form. Whether reform seeks to renew or rehabilitate, it is always a creative and dynamic process that produces change and newness. The various projects of reform in the intellectual and social history of Islam both converged and diverged on important points. Almost all moments of reform engaged with certain authoritative discourses and bodies of knowledge such as the Qur'an, sunna, and traditions of canonical law. However, every moment of reform articulated varied points of emphasis on what reform entailed. For example, the conception of reform for premodern luminaries Ibn Khaldun and Shatibi was very different compared to later figures. Ibn Khaldun was captivated by the necessity of cultivating social solidarity, while Shatibi's concern was to synchronize the law with its fundamental objectives. Both of these thinkers engaged in what might be called reform, but the specific trajectories of reform differed significantly. Reform in Islam remains variegated, diverse, and unpredictable.

Fundamental to thinking about the question of reform in Islam is the role of memory and how that memory relates to the founder, the Prophet Muhammad, and the revelation, the Qur'an. The "body" of the Prophet, whether discursive, political, or mystical, remains a central reference point. In order for reform to be credible, however, reformers often strive to connect the memory of the past with the fractured and the always incomplete present. But a set of contentious and hotly debated questions remains. How much of the past should inform a project of reform and recovery? Can reimagining, reforming, and reviving political theology be constrained by boundaries and limits? How does the knowledge of the tradition relate and converse with modernity? Answers to these fundamental questions have varied significantly, depending on the individual agents of reform, as well as specific political, cultural, and material conditions. Therefore, in the modern period, developments such as colonialism and the eventual rise of the nation-state, the emergence of print, and the consolidation of such institutions of state building as the census all transformed the Muslim reform tradition in profound ways. These shifts in the political and institutional terrain enabled new trajectories of reform and brought into central view particular questions of authoritative debates (such as the humanity of the Prophet) with an unprecedented intensity and vigor. Like any other aspect of Islam, the Muslim reform tradition is neither monolithic nor predictable. Rather, reform in Islam is continually invested with and divested of particular meanings, knowledge, and aspirations at specific junctures in history.

See also fundamentalism; messianism; modernity

Further Reading

Charles Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt: A Study of the Modern Reform Movement Inaugurated by Muhammad 'Abduh, 1968; M. Bennabi, Islam in History and Society, translated by A. Rashid, 1991; David Commins, Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria, 1990; A. Dallal, "The Origins and Objectives of Islamic Revivalist Thought, 1750–1850," Journal of the American Oriental Society 113 (1993): 341–59; Samira Haj, Reconfiguring Islamic Tradition: Reform, Rationality, and Modernity, 2009; B. Haykal, Revival and Reform in Islam: The Legacy of Muhammad al-Shawkani, 2003; N. Levtzion and J. O. Voll, ed., Eighteenth-Century Renewal and Reform in Islam, 1987; B. D. Metcalf, Islamic Revival in India: Deoband, 1860–1900, 1982; R. Peters, "Idjtihad and Taqlid in 18th and 19th Century Islam," in Die Welt des Islams (2000); Fazlur Rahman, Revival and Reform in Islam: A Study in Islamic Fundamentalism, edited by Ebrahim Moosa, 2000; J. O. Voll, "Foundations for Renewal and Reform," in The Oxford History of Islam, edited by J. Esposito, 1999.

EBRAHIM MOOSA AND SHERALI TAREEN

revolutions

Revolution is a transformation of the social, political, economic, or religious structures in a society, carried out, most frequently, by revolts of the less powerful or disenfranchised against ruling authorities. This transformation can occur in a single locale over a period of days or extend across a wide geographical region over a period of decades. Revolutions signal or embody a crisis of the status quo. Revolutions may involve a political crisis for existing regimes of power and authority that cannot respond effectively to challenges from external or internal actors or coalitions of actors. Sometimes revolutions are led by intellectuals, elites, military cadres, or members of the middle class, but quite often, revolutions begin at the grassroots level through the discontent of the masses or dispossessed.

Revolutions and revolutionary thinking have had a place within Islamic thought since the Prophet Muhammad first overturned the prevailing cultural, political, and religious status quo of the Arabian Peninsula by establishing new institutions of governance, law, and society in Medina in 622. The boundaries of revolution in Islam are defined, first and foremost, by Qur'anic injunctions, regardless of the ideological commitments of the various Muslim revolutionary thinkers. There is a revolutionary quality to the Qur'an itself: beyond being the direct word of God, the Qur'an offers itself as a witness to itself, as revelation and instruction unlike any other, and as reliable guidance for the purpose of establishing a righteous social and political order under the specific theological, ethical, and human framework of belief in the one God. Muslim revolutionaries throughout history have cited various verses of Islam's sacred text in order to justify and validate revolution as authentically Islamic and have rejected the admonitions attributed to the Prophet Muhammad regarding the fitna (trial) of rebellion against unjust rulers. According to many of these thinkers, the mission of Qur'anic revelation is to provide a revolutionary ideology, sufficient unto itself, that can transform people and free them from the shackles of unjust cultural and social practices. Modern-day Islamic revolutions of revolutions of Muslims in their various locales have therefore been influenced significantly by the early establishment of the Islamic social order under Muhammad and his successors; the ideology of revelation as revolutionary; Marxist thought; and to a lesser extent, the revolutionary ethos ushered into the modern world by the peasantry overthrowing of the old aristocratic order during the French Revolution. Early theorists of revolution in Islam include Ibn Khaldun, who proposed the Mahdist theory, which argues that at the end of time, after a period of social and moral disorder and crisis, a redeemer or guide called the "Mahdi" will arrive who will lead a revolution of justice and reinstitute the Islamic Golden Age. This theory is shared by Shi'i and Sunni Islam, and there have been numerous Mahdist movements throughout history, which have been led by charismatic leaders proclaiming themselves as the Mahdi. Other theorists of revolution include Afghani, who endorsed an early form of Islamic liberation theology. Some of the most influential 20th-century revolutionary thinkers include 'Ali Shari'ati, Sayyid Qutb, Ayatollah Khomeini, Muhammad 'Abduh, Sultan Galiyev, and Mawdudi.

Within Islamic political thought are two general streams of revolutionary writings and activities: one that relies on the principle of Islam as a comprehensive system, often as a reaction to Western colonialism (realized, for example, in the writings of Qutb or the activities of the Muslim Brotherhood), and one that employs Islamic thought while appropriating Western notions of revolution and political-economic transformation (along the lines of Marxist or socialist thought). The latter stream may be found, for example, in the writings of Shari'ati, who provided some of the ideological basis for the Iranian Revolution of 1979, which witnessed the collaboration of Marxist and Islamic activists in overthrowing the Western-backed, secular regime of Shah Muhammad Reza Pahlavi.

Inspiration for the revolutionary trend that seeks to establish an Islamic state or caliphate derives from several ideas: (1) the eternal and absolute sovereignty of God, who liberates Muslims from human bondage, guarantees the victory of believers and affirms their brotherhood, and gives Muslim authorities the power to administer the laws of God; (2) the divine origin of the Qur'an, which ensures the truth and eternal status of Qur'anic revelation and the guidance of Muslims; (3) the unique status of the Islamic umma (community of believers), which will lead society to righteousness and justice because it has a mandate from God; (4) righteousness as a precondition of vicegerency and success in administration (the word khilāfa, "caliphate," referring to morally upright practice and trusteeship of society); (5) Islamic consciousness, which entails recognition of the superiority of Islam compared to all other ways of life and necessitates refusal of, or even rebellion against, defeatism, colonial appropriation of land and people, subservience, irrelevance, injustice, and evil; (6) the necessity of establishing a political and religious order on Earth that ensures the worship of God alone; and (7) the comprehensiveness, uniqueness, and sufficiency of the Islamic system for all humanity. When Muslim societies fall into decadence, foreign rule, economic servitude, or faithless disorder, for example, change in the form of revolution is necessary to restore God's will on Earth and the ideal of a just social order. The rule of righteousness and justice is achieved through political appropriation of power to oversee and implement the social, cultural, and economic transformation of society. An influential verse of the Qur'an that commands people to accept responsibility and accountability for every action has served as the basis for much Islamic revolutionary thinking on the logic that God will not change the condition of a people until they strive to change their own conditions (Q. 13:11; see also 8:53). The oppressed are, therefore, responsible for their condition and are accountable for their weakness in the face of their oppressor, whom they have enabled. The revolutionary process is made possible through commitment, collective work or collaboration, education, conviction, purity of thought and action, and jihad (struggle; activity and devotion to transformation). Struggle is necessary and violence potentially unavoidable for the achievement of justice.

Revolutions in Islamic history have included the Abbasid revolution that overthrew the Umayyad caliphate in the eighth century; the Sufi revolution of Shaykh Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi, who aided the spread of Sufism and brought political legitimacy to Sufism in the 13th century; the Islamic revolution of the Songhay Empire beginning in the 11th century; the Algerian War from 1954 to 1962; and the Iranian Revolution of 1979. The puritan elements in the Iranian Revolution—a noteworthy revolution for the current generation—sought to replace the morally lax and disordered political system with a new moral order and parochially rejected cosmopolitanism and Western culture. Some modern-day Islamist groups, such as Hizbullah in Lebanon and Hamas in Palestine, view their struggle against occupation and political corruption as revolutionary work that employs a type of Islamic liberation theology toward the ends of social, political, and economic freedom from Western-backed interventions in the Islamic world.

See also coup d'état; fundamentalism; jihad; military; quietism and activism; rebellion

Further Reading

Said Amir Arjomand, "Iran's Islamic Revolution in Comparative Perspective," World Politics 38, no. 3 (1986); Idem, "Revolution in Early Islam: The Rise of Islam as Constitutive Revolution," in Islam in Progress: Historical and Civilizational Perspectives, edited by Johann P. Arnason, Armando Salvatore, and Georg Stauth, 2006; John Foran, "Theories of Revolution Revisited: Toward a Fourth Generation?" Sociological Theory 11, no. 1 (1993); Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad, "Qur'anic Justification for an Islamic Revolution: The View of Sayyid Qutb," Middle East Journal 37, no. 1 (1983); Thomas Hodgkin, "The Revolutionary Tradition in Islam," Race and Class 21, no. 3 (1980); Jacob Lassner, "The 'Abbasid Dawla: An Essay on the Concept of Revolution in Early Islam," Shi'ism, edited by Etan Kohlberg, 2003; Roberto Marin-Guzman, "Arab Tribes, the Umayyad Dynasty and the 'Abbasid Revolution," American Journal of Islamic Social Sciences 21, no. 4 (2004).

MELISSA FINN

Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935)

A Syro-Egyptian publicist, publisher, and anticolonial activist of the Arab Renaissance (al-nahḍa), Rida founded the influential Cairo-based Pan-Islamist journal al-Manar (The lighthouse; 1898–1935) as well as a host of educational societies and political organizations, both public and secret. Known as an Islamic reformer, he was the self-proclaimed heir and biographer of Muhammad ʿAbduh (whose partial exegesis of the Qur'an he edited and serialized as Tafsir al-Manar) and the frustrated disciple of Afghani (who died before Rida could join him). While his sociopolitical commitments were enactments of the reforms called for in his journal, his trademark advocacy of a critical return to the Qur'an and prophetic traditions (the so-called Method of the Pious Predecessors, manhaj al-salaf al-ṣāliḥ, which earned him his Salafi designation) evolved no scholarship. Rather, it laid the discursive foundations of the emerging public sphere of his time.

Born to a Sunni family of Sayyids in the coastal town of Qalamun near Tripoli in the then-Syrian province of the Ottoman Empire, Rida learned to read and write and memorized the Qur'an at the local school before briefly moving to Tripoli's Turkish-language government school. He then spent eight years at the private school of the Azhari shaykh Husayn al-Jisr, which offered a blend of the Islamic and positive sciences, graduating in 1892. Prior to his emigration to Cairo (1897), he contributed to several Tripolitan and Beiruti newspapers while furthering his education both at the hands of scholars and in the columns of scientific popularization journals such as al-Muqtataf (The selected).

It was the reading of Afghani's and ʿAbduh's subversive and short-lived Parisian newspaper al-ʿUrwa al-Wuthqa (The firmest bond) that ultimately gave him a sense of purpose, inspiring him to publish a reformist journal that would guide the world's Muslims on the path of unity, progress, and civilization. From Ghazali's Ihya' ʿUlum al-Din (The revivification of the religious sciences), the second most influential reading of his youth, Rida retained a commitment to reorganize Islamic sciences but disowned Sufism, which he squarely equated with devious popular religiosity in the wake of a traumatic experience with the Naqshbandis.

Rida grew up witnessing the gradual encroachments of the Western powers on the territories of Islam. While missionarism and colonialism were the biggest external foes, the servility toward the past of the 'ulama' and the uncritical emulation of the West by the Europeanized (mutafarnijūn) constituted the biggest internal ills and were subsumed by the double-edged concept of imitation (taqlīd). When it came to combating missionarism, however, Rida had no qualms with imitation. He thus pioneered an Islamic missionary institute (Dar al-Da'wa wa-l-Irshad, 1912), which included in its curricula the sociology of the papacy and the patriarchate, and he oversaw the establishment of a Muslim replica of the Young Men's Christian Association (Jam'iyyat al-Shubban al-Muslimin, 1927). A fervent Ottoman constitutionalist, Rida saw in the caliphate the only defense against the increasing powers of the nation-state with its reliance on foreign legal codes. Up until ʿAbduh's death (1905), he therefore relentlessly exhorted the 'ulama' to codify the shari'a and advocated a synthesis in legal rulings among the four Sunni schools of law (talfīq). After ʿAbduh's death, Rida's pledge not to engage in politics ('Abduh's condition for supporting al-Manar) became obsolete, and he openly thrust himself into the fray. At the heart of Western civilization and progress, Rida had recognized the power of organizations.

In 1905, he organized the Ottoman Society for Consultation (Jam'iyyat al-Shura al-ʿUthmaniyya). In 1908, he spared no speeches or articles in favor of the reinstated Ottoman Constitution. In 1911, however, despairing of the anti-Arab policy of the Committee of Union and Progress, he founded the Society for Arab Union (Jam'iyyat al-Jami'a al-'Arabiyya), a Pan-Arab secret society that defended the interests of the Arab provinces of the Ottoman Empire. In 1912, he cofounded the Party for Ottoman Decentralization (Hizb al-la Markaziyya al-Uthmaniyya). Although he was on the margins of Egyptian politics, he played an active role in Syrian politics, from the Young Turk Revolution (1908) until his death (1935). As president of the Syrian Congress (1920), he negotiated Syrian independence with the British and the French. He was a member of the Syrian-Palestinian Delegation in Geneva in 1921, sat on the political committee in Cairo during the Great Syrian Revolt of 1925–26, and participated in the Islamic Conferences of Mecca (1926) and Jerusalem (1931).

Perceived as a crucial opinion maker by contemporary political players, he was contacted by the British during World War I to spread the idea of independence among the Arabs. He also communicated the Arab opposition to the creation of an independent Jewish state to the representatives of the Egyptian and Levantine Jewish communities and corresponded with Chaim Weizmann, the first president-to-be of Israel. He even managed to remain on good terms with both Sharif Husayn of Mecca and ʿAbd al-ʿAziz b. Sa'ud, envisioning the latter as the most capable leader of a revived caliphate (and a much-needed patron for a permanently indebted al-Manar).

Rida's later shift from Ottomanism to Wahhabi Arabism was more pragmatic than doctrinal—his publication of Hanbali authors such as Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) notwithstanding. More broadly, his championing of premodern scholars, whose ideas he selectively paraphrased or flagrantly distorted, was consistently elusive. An example of selective paraphrase is his treatment of Najm al-Din al-Tufi (d. 1316) and Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi (d. 1388), the most radical exponents of the legal theory concept of public interest (maṣlaha), while distortion is evinced in his portrayal of the 18th-century Yemeni reformer Muhammad al-Shawkani as a supporter of legal analogy (qiyās). A new professional in search of legitimacy, Rida affiliated himself with authorities who afforded him the concepts needed to mold public opinion and to push for political institutions that would resist wholesale Westernization: maṣlaha allowed him to speak in the name of the public good and qiyās to justify all-out legislation on an Islamic basis. By "journalizing" not only Islamic legal concepts but also genres such as the fatwa, Rida ultimately severed a formidable jurisprudential corpus from its procedural basis, reducing it to a limited and ready-to-use lexicon. A pragmatic move aimed at confronting external and internal challenges to Muslim society in a colonial setting, Rida's "Salafi turn" in effect empowered the future postcolonial literate masses to Islamicize indefinitely.

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); Syria

Further Reading

Ahmad Dallal, "Appropriating the Past: Twentieth-Century Reconstruction of Pre-Modern Islamic Thought," Islamic Law and Society 7, no. 1 (2000); Mahmoud Osman Haddad, "Arab Religious Nationalism in the Colonial Era: Reading Rashīd Ridā's Ideas on the Caliphate," Journal of the American Oriental Society 117, no. 2 (1997): 253–77; Dyala Hamzah, "Muhammad Rashid Rida or: The Importance of Being (a) Journalist," in Religion and Its Other: Secular and Sacral Concepts and Practices in Interaction, edited by Heike Bock, Jörg Feuchter, and Michi Knecht, 2008; Albert H. Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939, 1983 [1962]; Malcolm H. Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida, 1966; Umar Ryad, Islamic Reformism and Christianity: A Critical Reading of the Works of Muhammad Rashīd Ridā and His Associates (1898–1935), 2009; Simon Wood, Christian Criticisms, Islamic Proofs: Rashid Rida's Modernist Defense of Islam, 2008.

DYALA HAMZAH

Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61)

The first four rulers after Muhammad's death in 632 came to be regarded in later (Sunni) historiography as the "Rightly Guided Caliphs" (al-khulafā' al-rāshidūn). They comprised Abu Bakr (r. 632–34, allegedly the first male Muslim after Muhammad); 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44, who introduced the Islamic calendar starting with the Prophet's emigration from Mecca to Medina, i.e., the hijra); 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56, to whom Sunni tradition ascribes the compilation of the text of the Qur'an); and 'Ali b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61, who became the progenitor of Shi'ism). They not only belonged to the same tribe as the Prophet (the Quraysh) but were also closely related to him by marriage: Abu Bakr and 'Umar were his fathers-in-law, and 'Uthman was the Prophet's son-in-law, as was 'Ali, who also was his cousin. The era of the Rightly Guided Caliphs is marked by two main characteristics that had a decisive influence on Islamic history: a rapid expansion of Islamic rule on the one hand and a severe crisis of legitimacy on the other, which finally led to the split of the Muslim community into religiopolitical factions that only later became tangible as Sunnis and Shi'is.

Within a few years after Muhammad's death, the Islamic realm underwent a geographical expansion beyond the Arabian Peninsula that is largely unparalleled in history. By the year 661, Muslims ruled over Mesopotamia (conquered in 633), Palestine and Syria (634–40), Iraq (636–41), Egypt (639–42), Persia (640–42), parts of North Africa (647), Armenia (652), and Cyprus (654) and had laid the foundation for the later Muslim empire stretching from Andalus to Central and South Asia. The military activities, however, did not take place under a central supreme command. None of the early caliphs distinguished himself as an army leader, and the title amīr al-mu'minīn (Commander of the Faithful), which was first assumed by 'Umar, always remained more of a claim than a reality. Instead, the conquests were carried out by local leaders such as Khalid b. al-Walid, and the tribal entities acted largely on their own authority. Being rulers without sufficient troops of their own, the caliphs could never be sure of the loyalty of these armies; not even the provincial governors were reliable in this regard. It is not by chance that 'Uthman was defenseless in the face of opposing tribal groups and was finally murdered in 656.

The early conquests entailed two other developments with long-standing consequences. One was the establishment of a central administrative system begun under 'Umar, who formed an institution for the distribution of the incoming booty, the so-called dīwān. The other was the shift of the center of gravity away from the Arabian Peninsula: 'Ali moved the capital from Medina to Kufa in southern Iraq, and later, under the Umayyads and Abbasids, it was transferred to Damascus and Baghdad. Henceforth, the Arabian coastal area of the Hijaz as the cradle of Islam fell into political oblivion and remained present in Muslim memory only as the spiritual center and the site of the annual pilgrimage.

Following Muhammad's death in 632, not only did prophetic guidance of the nascent Islamic community come to an abrupt halt, but the political leadership also had to be reformulated, as the Prophet had apparently not left any explicit instructions on how to organize his succession. The so-called wars of apostasy (ridda) immediately after his death, when several tribes broke away from Medina and counterprophets appeared on the stage, were easily halted by Abu Bakr, but the ensuing crisis of legitimacy left far more enduring marks on the Muslim community. Throughout the early period, there was no unanimity on how the leader should be elected or what the basis of his legitimacy should be. (Abu Bakr was appointed by acclamation, 'Umar by designation, and 'Uthman by consultation.) In general, the genealogical tribal principle was predominant, while outstanding service to Islam played only a secondary role.

The crisis came to a head when 'Uthman was killed by his opponents, who had not acknowledged the legitimacy of his rule and accused him of favoritism and other transgressions. His murder provoked what came to be known as the First Civil War (fitna, lit. "affliction, trial"), the single most crucial event in Islamic history in that it was the starting point of the deep split within the Muslim community. It was only later that the emerging two main parties could be identified as Sunnis and Shi'is; in the context of the early period it is more appropriate to define them as adherents of 'Uthman and adherents of 'Ali, respectively. The two groups represented contrasting approaches to the question of the legitimacy of succession. The adherents of 'Uthman recognized the third caliph's rule as legitimate, denying that he had forfeited his position by his transgressions and stressing that he was elected by a council (shūrā) after 'Umar's death. The followers of 'Ali, who seem initially to have stressed 'Uthman's transgressions, soon came to narrow the circle of claimants to the caliphate to the direct descendants of the family of the Prophet (ahl al-bayt), which eventually came to mean descendants of 'Ali and Fatima, daughter of the Prophet. The power struggle was finally decided in favor of the adherents of 'Uthman. 'Ali's brief rule, which bore the marks of a countercaliphate, was challenged by a number of oppositional currents and was finally replaced by the Umayyad dynasty, which restored the claim to 'Uthmani leadership. By then the adherents of 'Ali had split by the defection of the so-called Kharijis, who rejected 'Ali as no better than 'Uthman and who were willing to accept as leader of the community only the most meritorious Muslim, disregarding ancestral affiliations. Around 700 another party emerged in the Murji'is, who suspended judgment with regard to the relative status of 'Ali and 'Uthman without accepting the Umayyads.

The concept of the Rightly Guided Caliphate is a later construction of Islamic theology based on the retrospective need for a unified community. It was only in the formation of the hadith in the ninth century that the thesis of four primary caliphs was finally acknowledged and 'Uthman and 'Ali were equally regarded as legitimate rulers; this process coincided with the general canonization of the Companions of the Prophet (ṣaḥāba) and even entailed occasional attempts to add a fifth ruler to the Rightly Guided Caliphs (either Hasan b. 'Ali or 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz). Nevertheless, it was too late by then to reverse the basic split of the community: the 'Alids that evolved into Shi'ism rejected the legitimacy of the first three caliphs (as well as the testimony of most ṣaḥāba) by claiming that the Prophet himself had designated 'Ali as his successor and that caliphal rule had therefore been usurped. Finally, the era of the Rightly Guided Caliphs was completely transfigured in modern Islam (especially after the formal abolition of the caliphate in 1924) when Islamist currents in particular started defining it as the golden age of Islam, which they planned on restoring. An epoch that had been highly controversial (three of the four caliphs died at the hands of a murderer) now acquired a normative character.

See also Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634); 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); succession; 'Uthman b. 'Affan (ca. 579–656); 'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644)

Further Reading

Asma Afsaruddin, The First Muslims: History and Memory, 2008; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Fred McGraw Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 1981; Safu Khuluṣi and Sabiha al-Dabbagh, Al-Khulafa' ar-Rashidun: The Rightly-Guided Khalifs, 1990; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad: A Study in the Early Caliphate, 1997; Albrecht Noth, The Early Arabic Historical Tradition: A Source-Critical Study, 1994; Abu Ja'far Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari, The History of al-Ṭabarī (Ta'rīkh al-rusul wa'l mulūk), vols. 10–17, 1985–98.

RAINER BRUNNER

rights

Rights exist de facto as social norms in any society with a minimum of social differentiation or hierarchy, whether such societies have developed concepts of rights or not. Premodern Islamic legal thought developed a concept of rights in a technical legal sense. Premodern Islamic political thought also recognized certain rights, though these are distinct from legal rights in the sense of specific, enforceable obligations. The extent to which premodern Islamic religious discourses contributed to modern rights discourses among Muslims is debatable, but the two trends reveal a complex and sometimes productive fusion of Islamic and Western notions of rights.

Legal Rights

Islamic law, like any sophisticated legal system, confers many different kinds of rights, such as those regarding property, the sanctity of the person, marriage, and access to courts. Such rights, like rights found in other legal systems, comprise privileges, claims, powers, and immunities, each of which has a correlative (no claim, duty, liability, and disability, respectively) and an opposite (duty, no claim, disability, and liability, respectively). For example, under Islamic sales law (buyūʿ), a buyer's right to rescind a sale upon visual inspection of the sales goods (khiyār al-ruʾya) includes the privilege not to purchase the goods—that is, the buyer has no duty to purchase the goods and the seller has no claim against the buyer for not doing so. It also includes the claim against the buyer to sell the goods if they meet the buyer's approval upon such inspection, which entails the seller's correlative duty to sell them to the buyer. The Islamic legal system also recognizes procedural rights of litigants in civil matters and of defendants in criminal matters, and these can have important substantive consequences. Such rights include the impartiality of the judge and of witnesses and in criminal matters the requirement that the court fully observe strict evidentiary rules and exculpatory doctrines.

Islamic law classifies certain kinds of claim rights, which imply a duty or liability on the part of someone other than the holder, under the term ḥaqq (pl. ḥuqūq; compare Hebrew ḥuqqīm, "laws," as in Exodus 18:16, "God's laws"). The word ḥaqq appears very frequently in the Qur'an in the sense of "truth" or "what is correct." Sometimes it is also used in ways that are relevant to a concept of rights: it can refer to certain claims against believers for the performance of duties (Q. 2:180, 241, concerning bequests and divorce, respectively) and against their property (Q. 17:26; 51:19; 70:24, concerning claims of the poor to charity). In two closely related passages, it refers obliquely, in a prohibition against homicide, to the right to impose capital punishment (Q. 6:151; 17:33). It can also refer generally to the authority to engage in certain acts, though in such passages it is always used in a negative construction to indicate that the behavior in question was engaged in unlawfully or without right. For example, several persons or groups are said to have behaved arrogantly—in other words, contrary to God's injunctions—without right or justification (Q. 7:146; 10:23; 28:39; 42:42; 46:20). Others are accused of having killed the prophets without right or justification (Q. 2:61; 3:21; 3:112; 3:181; and 4:155; see also 5:116; 7:33; and 11:79, which contain similar negative constructions in other contexts).

In post-Qur'anic Islamic law, ḥuqūq in the sense of claim rights fall into three distinct groups. Some of these rights are private (i.e., held by individuals); some are owed to God, being claims against humans to avoid matters that are divinely prohibited and to perform acts that are divinely commanded; and some straddle both categories. In regard to all three categories of rights or claims, judges have jurisdiction, on behalf of the state, to award recovery or punishment, as appropriate, depending on the right involved. As Ibn Rushd (Averroes, d. 1198) puts it, "It is widely agreed that the judge can rule in regard to any kind of right, whether it be a right of God or a right of individuals, and that he is the representative of the supreme political leader in that regard." Private rights, or the rights of individuals (ḥuqūq al-ādamiyyīn or ḥuqūq al-'ibād), generally arise where there has been a civil wrong, such as a breach of contract. They entitle the holder to seek recovery or redress through litigation. Such rights constitute claims against other private individuals. The rights of God (ḥuqūq Allāh) may be divided into two kinds: those that arise from violations of Islamic criminal law and those that reflect God's claim against humans that they perform certain religious obligations. In the former case, God's rights extend specifically to the small number of crimes described in Islamic law, especially those mentioned together with a specific punishment in the Qur'an, referred to collectively as ḥudūd (limits): theft (Q. 5:38); unlawful sexual intercourse (Q. 4:15–16; 4:25; 24:2); false or unsupported accusation of unlawful sexual intercourse (Q. 24:4); and "brigandage" (ḥirāba), a residual category that covers other transgressions against persons and property, especially outside of urban areas (Q. 5:33). Others that are implied by the Qur'an, mandated in prophetic tradition, or historically viewed as theologically serious violations of public order, such as wine drinking, apostasy, refusal to pray, and insulting the Prophet or his Companions, may be included here as well. The right in such cases is God's claim against the defendant for corporal or capital punishment. Such punishment, even capital punishment, is thought by some to expiate the crime, which is considered to be a sin. The fact that the state has the right to enforce these criminal laws and so to inflict punishment on God's behalf has suggested to some that these are public rights exercised by the state on behalf of the community. These divine public rights also resemble private rights to the extent that they arise from the commission of an offense.

The state also retains a right—strictly, a power—to inflict a lesser discretionary corporal punishment called ta'zīr, which may not exceed the lowest of the prescribed ḥudūd-based corporal punishments. Such discretionary punishment may be meted out in cases where conviction for a ḥadd offense is impossible because of exculpatory doctrines or strict evidentiary requirements or for general transgressions of public order not addressed by the law. It is unclear whether this residual right to punish, in either case, inheres in the state or is exercised by the state on God's behalf. Whether ta'zīr is God's right or simply the state's exercise of a de facto power (entailing the perpetrator's correlative liability for punishment), it owes its existence in part to the difficulty of obtaining criminal convictions under Islamic law. This difficulty could be characterized as a right of defendants that involves an immunity and a correlative disability on the part of the state.

In contrast to the claims of God that arise from behavior that God has prohibited, other claims of God pertain to the performance of religious obligations, behavior that God has mandated. In such cases God enjoys the right to expect positive compliance with the mandated conduct and thus has a claim right against believers, all other things being equal, for the successful performance of such acts. Although such divine claims may pertain to private worship, such as prayer, they are also connected with the public sphere, and the creation of appropriate conditions for their successful performance are thus viewed as the responsibility of the state, as in the case of the collection of canonical taxes (zakat), making provision for holding the Friday congregational prayer (ṣalāt al-jum'a), infrastructural initiatives that ease or assist with the pilgrimage (hajj), or the prosecution of holy war (jihad). An individual's failure to perform such obligations is not usually something over which courts have jurisdiction unless accompanied by public disavowal of the obligations themselves, which could subject the person in question to liability for ta'zīr.

Whether a given obligation is classified as a duty pursuant to a right of God or of humans can have consequences. For example, in the case of zakat, whose proceeds are distributed to the needy, there is a disagreement over whether paying the tax is a religious obligation (and thus one of God's rights) or a claim held by the poor against those with sufficient wealth (and thus a right belonging to humans). In the former case, as a religious obligation, the right could only be "enforced" against those otherwise endowed with the legal capacity to perform religious obligations in general: sane adults, but not, for example, minors. If the right is one that belongs to humans, then the restrictions related to the capacity to perform religious obligations would not apply, and a larger class of persons would be subject to the tax (e.g., minors).

The Islamic law of torts—jināyāt (offenses) or often simply diyyāt (blood money payments)—gives rise to rights that encompass both a private and a public or divine dimension. Private right holders in such cases (certain injured persons or heirs of victims of wrongful killing) enjoy a right to retaliation in serious cases and to compensation in less serious cases. The right of retaliation includes the power to waive infliction of equivalent physical harm or to accept compensation in lieu thereof. Such retaliation is generally carried out by the state in order to satisfy the private claim and also to satisfy the public claim against the defendant on God's behalf, as well as to discourage resort to self-help and vigilantism.

Is there a coherent, even if latent, conception or philosophy of rights under Islamic law, whether such rights are designated as haqq or merely de facto recognized under law? Since the huqūq are viewed primarily as claims that, if proved, lead to the restoration of something, they do not fit easily within the "will theory of rights," according to which an individual's rights carve out a sphere of choices and freedom of action. It may be that they accord better with an interest or benefit theory, in which rights further the interests of, or benefit, their holders—for example, by restoring a claimant, after a wrong, to the previous status quo, but even this is difficult to decide with certainty. On the other hand, God—who is omnipotent, transcendent, and utterly self-sufficient—has neither interests nor a need for rights to enjoy absolute sovereignty, at least according to premodern Islamic theology. Nor does it seem reasonable to speak of God as a beneficiary of legal remedies. It has been noted that religious legal systems pose problems for the analysis of rights in terms of interests or will.

If the latent underpinning of rights in Islamic law is closest to an interest theory of rights, does that mean that there are "natural rights" in Islamic law? The question has become controversial in the field of Islamic studies. Islamic legal theory (uṣūl al-fiqh), both Sunni and Shi'i, is highly positivist in the sense that answers to legal questions are grounded in specific passages in revealed texts (Qur'an, prophetic traditions). For Sunnis, rights and obligations are created by God and spelled out, in varying degrees of clarity, in texts sent down by God. The criterion for the validity of such rights is, for most Sunni jurists, simply their existence in or link with those texts. Shi'is, however, inherited much of their theology from the early rationalist movement of the Mu'tazilis, who held, as Shi'i legal theorists do, that reason may be used to discover the law—a view that is at least compatible with a notion of natural rights. It has been argued that Islam in general, or Sunni Islam in particular, has neither a theory of natural law nor a theory of natural rights. Recent scholarship has begun to reexamine this claim. A. Kevin Reinhart argues, based on an examination of legal theory texts, that the existence of a range of views makes the question at least nuanced. Anver Emon, who reexamines Sunni legal theorists and expressly equates huqūq al-ādamiyyīn with "interests," argues that despite Sunni denials of the force of natural law arguments, juristic discretion rested on assumptions compatible with or even informed by ideas of natural law and natural rights.

Rights of Those Disadvantaged by the Law

Islamic law expressly recognizes that persons and other beings who lack full legal capacity or may be otherwise legally or socially disadvantaged—for example, the disabled, women, minor orphans, slaves, non-Muslims, and even animals—nonetheless enjoy rights. Such rights are not, however, necessarily defined as huqūq or separately conceptualized as rights. Although the physically disabled are only rarely expressly disadvantaged by Islamic law, Muslim jurists did recognize that they were entitled to accommodations in many though not all instances in regard, for example, to religious obligations that otherwise presuppose full physical capability. However, according to Mawardi (d. 1058) in his treatise on government, physical disabilities do prevent otherwise qualified candidates from becoming or remaining caliph. Those with mental disabilities are precluded under Islamic law from engaging in financial transactions for their own protection, but the mentally retarded (ma'tūh, as opposed to the insane, majnūn) are allowed to marry according to some modern fatwas. Perhaps these accommodations can be regarded as rights in view of modern legislation specifically conferring rights on the disabled such as the U.S. Americans with Disabilities Act or the UN Declaration on the Rights of Disabled Persons. Although women suffer from certain legal disabilities under Islamic law—a diminished capacity to testify, asymmetrical divorce rights, certain rules of ritual purity, diminished inheritance rights, and others—they also enjoy certain express protections under Islamic law. For example, even though rules of marriage and divorce disadvantage women in important respects, women enjoy specific rights as spouses, including the right to material support (nafaqa, which extends to food, lodging, and clothing). It has been argued that informal but consistent judicial cognizance of women's disabilities under Islamic family law contributed to an increased willingness to enforce strictly those marital rights that women did have. Orphaned children, though lacking full legal capacity as minors, are protected against predations on their property by ethical injunctions in the Qur'an requiring fair dealing by their guardians (e.g., Q. 6:152). Slaves also enjoy certain rights even within the context of servitude, including the de facto ability to own property, the right to resist forced conversion to Islam, and the right not to be married to someone against their will. Non-Muslim subjects of Muslim-ruled states are generally considered protected persons (*dhimmī*s) and are, within certain limits, entitled to practice their religion without undue interference and free from forced conversion, in exchange for the payment of a special tax. Enforcement of such protections varied with political circumstances; conversely, *dhimmī*s could forfeit their protections by failing to observe the restrictions to which they were subject. Non-Muslims suffered other specific legal disabilities as well, such as being precluded from inheriting from their Muslim relatives according to Islamic inheritance law (though, according to some jurists, they could receive otherwise lawful bequests) or, in the case of men, from marrying Muslim women (though non-Muslim women could, under Sunni law, marry Muslim men). In light of emerging contemporary concerns about animals' welfare, it is worth mentioning that the law also allowed for legal intervention in cases of animal mistreatment. This responsibility belonged to the muhtasib, an inspector in charge of public health, safety, and morals whose jurisdiction extended to market practices and public works. Certain pietistic currents in religious thought and the depiction of apparently sentient animals in the Qur'an (e.g., sura 27, "The Ants") also engendered reflection on whether human dominion over animals, though widely assumed to be divinely imposed, was justified.

Political Rights

Political rights as conceived by premodern Muslim thinkers involved limitations on state power and as such perhaps imply a will theory of rights, in contrast to the legal rights previously discussed. For the most part, such political rights did not involve participation in political decision making but instead rested on the idea that free subjects of Muslim-ruled states were entitled to two things: the application of Islamic law and otherwise to be left alone by the state. Government by rule of law, independent of an individual ruler's whim, would contribute to the realization of a just social, legal, and political order. Conceptions of the rule of law were thus related to the full recognition, application, and enforcement of divine public and private huqūq.

The "right" to live under a government that applied and enforced Islamic law was expressed early on as a result of disputes, including civil wars, over legitimacy of rule and attendant doubts about rulers' claims to religious authority. Such doubts contributed in part to the emergence of private specialists in piety who gradually evolved into the separate class of religious scholars ('ulama'), who focused, among other tasks, on the development of criteria for evaluating behavior in religious terms, for example, by systematically formulating theological criteria for salvation and the rules of Islamic law. The resulting bifurcation of temporal and religious authority led to a lowering of expectations in regard to rulers and a strengthening of the idea that the scholars' discourse was the primary site of relevant concepts of ethics. It undoubtedly also contributed to the formulations of some ideas about limits on state (or the ruler's) power. Several modern scholars (e.g., Noah Feldman, Wael B. Hallaq) have suggested that the distinctive relationship between the state and the clerical institution in premodern Islamic societies evolved, after early disappointments, into a system of checks on government, grounded in the scholars' moral authority, that could perhaps be construed as further implying some individual political rights and even a kind of constitutional order.

As early as the mid-eighth century, the Iranian political advisor and litterateur 'Abdallah b. al-Muqaffa' (d. ca. 756) noted the currency of the phrase "No obedience to any creature who is disobedient to the Creator" (lā ṭā'ata li-makhlūq fī ma'ṣiyat al-khāliq). The phrase was understood to mean that no obedience was required toward impious rulers, at least in regard to their impious acts, and thus expressed the idea that a ruler could be disobeyed, and perhaps deposed, on religious grounds. Although countertendencies urged obedience even to impious Muslim rulers under the theory that political stability could be more important than the adherence to principle, the phrase discussed by Ibn al-Muqaffa' implies increasing recognition of the zone between private conduct and state authority and of refinements in religious and ethical criteria for assessing the rectitude of state action.

There were generally four hallmarks of right rule, which entailed obedience to political authority: enforcement of criminal law (iqāmat al-ḥudūd), prosecution of jihad, preservation of sexual morality (furūj), and protection of private property (ḥurmat al-amwāl). These may be restated as rights: free Muslim citizens have the right to expect that government will enforce God's law. This expectation may be related to concerns about personal or communal salvation, but one can imagine more specific concerns as well. For example, the protection of private property expresses the specific concern that the government will not unlawfully confiscate the private property of Muslims except according to law—this is the right to be free from unlawful misappropriation (ghaṣb) by political authorities. After all, the persons and property of free Muslims are inviolate (ḥarām) under Islamic law. Such inviolability (ḥurma) may be expressed as a right (either a privilege or an immunity for individuals) and its correlatives (either no claim or a disability on the part of the state). Such ideas accord well with a will theory of rights.

Against this background, it is possible to isolate some additional discrete ideas in Islamic legal and political thought that perhaps deserve the term "right." Elites, especially scholars, claimed for themselves the right (and sometimes the duty) to provide ethical advice (naṣṭḥa) to rulers. Indeed, according to one maxim, "Religion consists of the provision of sound advice" (al-dīn al-naṣṭḥa). In addition, all subjects were, at least in theory, entitled to appeal directly to the ruler or his representative for the redress of wrongs (maẓālim). In regard to the enforcement of the law, limits were placed on the state's ability to invade private property to make arrests for crimes of morality, in other words, those involving intoxicants, frivolous entertainment (e.g., music or dancing, in the view of the socially conservative), and sexual immorality. Jurists also sought to impose limits on the state's power in regard to certain armed rebellions that had a plausible claim of theological support (ta'wīl). Such rules allowed the state to fight the rebels but required that property and even weapons be returned to rebels once order had been restored. This could be characterized as the rebels' immunity from, and the state's correlative disability in regard to, gross mistreatment exceeding the minimum force required to restore civil order.

Some Contemporary Notions of Rights

Modern conceptions of rights, which rest on the idea that individuals have inherent rights of various kinds, especially political rights consisting mostly of privileges and immunities against the state, are indebted to the American and French revolutions. In Muslim-ruled states of the early modern period, ideas of liberty and equality factored into a number of programs of constitutional reform, occasionally justified under principles of Islamic law. Throughout the 19th century, the greatest of the Muslim absolutist empires, the Ottomans, extended state power into the lives of individuals, bypassing those intermediary groups through which the Ottoman state had traditionally ruled and fostering ideas of social and legal equality, at least for males, and perhaps of individual duties and protections. The Tunisian statesman and reformer Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi (d. 1890) argued for constitutional liberties, portrayed as shari'a-compliant, as part of a program of political and religiocultural renewal. The Iranian Constitution of 1906, which took aim against local autocratic government and external imperialist threats, established procedures for electing a representative assembly, including a right to vote for men of certain social classes. Although modeled on the Belgian Constitution of 1831, it was supported by Muslim clerics and required that legislation adopted by the assembly conform to Shi'i interpretations of Islamic law. Such trends—in combination with experiences of colonialism, incipient nationalisms, projects of Islamic reform, modernization, modernity, and the emergence of the post–World War II world order that included international agreements enshrining individual rights under international law—all contributed to modern rights discourses in the Islamic world. It should be emphasized that not all such rights discourses are "Islamic," though some are self-consciously so.

In the modern period, the term haqq has come increasingly to translate the word "right" (and the French droit) in all the latter's various connotations, so that the term's semantic field has changed to some degree in Arabic. That change has affected usage within both secular and Islamic discourses on rights more generally. The semantic proximity of the Arabic word haqq to the English word "right" is nonetheless suggested by the ease with which the Modern Standard Arabic phrase huqūq al-insān (lit. "rights of the person") translates to the English phrase "human rights." The term figures prominently in the names of two of the oldest human rights organizations in the Arab world: the Palestinian human rights organization Al-Haq (al-Haqq) and the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights (al-Munazzama al-Misriyya li-Huquq al-Insan), both of which seek to ensure adherence to international standards of human rights and humanitarian law.

The internationalization and universalization of the concepts of rights—civil, human, and political—have also affected Islamic rights discourses. For example, in the 1990s a Saudi organization that protested against government policies called itself in English the Committee for the Defense of Legitimate Rights and in Arabic al-Lajna li-l-Difa' 'an al-Huquq al-Shar'iyya. In Arabic, the adjective shar'ī is ambiguous and can mean "legitimate," either in the sense of "according to law" or in the sense of "according to the shari'a." This ambiguity was useful in the group's attempt to portray itself to a religious, Saudi constituency as urging the impartial application of Islamic law and to Western observers as a Saudi human rights organization. The term "rights" (huqūq) apparently made sense to both audiences. In recent decades, too, movements to reform family law as it affects women have appealed simultaneously to international law and shari'a as binding transnational standards mandating equality of treatment in domestic legal systems. Islamicizing constitutions have offered a particularly interesting arena for official rights discourses that deploy a language of both liberal and Islamic legitimacy. The preamble to the Iranian Constitution (Qanun-i Asasi) of 1979 (as amended in 1989), for example, speaks of women's rights as human rights (huqūq-i insānī-yi khud) and proclaims in Article 3.14 that a goal of the state is to secure the rights of all men and women (ta'mīn-i huqūq-i hamah-yi jānibah-yi afrād az zan wa-mard).

The governments of some Muslim-majority states, aided in some cases by religious scholars, have also attempted to generate international human rights instruments that adhere to what are claimed as Islamic standards. These have been promulgated in response to international human rights discourses that expressly or implicitly call into question certain rules of Islamic law, such as those that expressly disadvantage women in areas of family law. These efforts have resulted in documents such as the 1981 Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights and the 1993 Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam. The documents in question have not been adopted by any Muslim-majority country but seem instead designed to provide a rhetorically useful, politically advantageous, and theologically satisfying response to perceived competition from secularizing international human rights discourses. In such documents, as in Islamicizing constitutions, unqualified affirmations of rights are usually qualified by reference to unspecified Islamic principles so that the scope of the rights in question remains unclear. As Mohammed Arkoun has noted, such documents underscore a "very confused ideological situation" in which "the colonial fact poses problems for both the West and Muslim countries," making it "difficult to speak to a Muslim audience today about the Western origin of human rights without provoking indignant protests." Still, as Arkoun points out, the fact that such efforts are undertaken is itself potentially significant and could yet form part of a "critical reexamination and reworking of the concept of Truth-Right (al-haqq) and of its foundations" in order to "go beyond the mimetic competition, essentially ideological, between traditional religion and civil religion."

See also hadith; punishment; shari'a; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; Al-Haq, accessed March 30, 2010, http://www.alhaq.org; Mohamed Arkoun, Rethinking Islam: Common Questions, Uncommon Answers, 1994; Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Egyptian Organization for Human Rights, accessed March 30, 2010, http://en.eohr.org; Anver Emon, Islamic Natural Law Theories, 2010; Noah Feldman, The Fall and Rise of the Islamic State, 2008; Wael B. Hallaq, Shari'a: Theory, Practice, Transformations, 2009; Internetprojekte, "Iran—Constitution," accessed March 30, 2010, http://www.servat.unibe.ch/icl/ir00000.html; Abu al-Hasan 'Ali al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government, translated by W. Wahba, 1996; Ann Mayer, Islam and Human Rights: Politics and Tradition, 2006; Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Islamic Republic of Iran, "Constitution," http://www.mfa.gov.ir/cms/cms/Tehran/fa/Tourism/Constitution.htm; A. Kevin Reinhart, Before Revelation: The Boundaries of Muslim Moral Thought, 1995; Judith Tucker, In the House of the Law: Gender and Islamic Law in Ottoman Syria and Palestine, 1998.

JOSEPH E. LOWRY

royal court

The royal court in Islamic societies encompasses bureaucracy, literary production, public display of sovereignty, and the patronage of arts, sciences, and religious institutions. One of the earliest models for the organization of an Islamic "royal court" comes from the Abbasid caliphate. Under the caliph Abu Ja'far al-Mansur (r. 754–75), an elaborate bureaucratic system of government offices (dawāwīn) was established that would allow for the successful government and financial administration of his burgeoning empire. By the time of the caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809), this system had expanded to include a flowering court culture with the caliph at its center. Texts such as the 11th-century Rusum Dar al-Khilafah (The Rules and Regulations of the Abbasid Court) outline in great detail the extent of these bureaucratic responsibilities, as well as the colorful experience of everyday life at court. The royal court was governed by strict rules of behavior dictating highly controlled access to the caliph or ruler. Surrounding him were a number of figures (often formally employed as bureaucrats) such as the nadīm, or drinking companion, who joined the ruler in entertainments such as chess games and hunting. The adīb, an erudite man well read in science, culture, history, and languages, is perhaps best exemplified by the famous al-Jahiz (d. 868). Some of these men could be called ẓarīf to note their elegance and refinement. Over time, as Islamic societies began to expand into areas increasingly distant from the Hijaz, foreign court customs, notably Persian, were absorbed into the Islamic paradigm.

The royal household included numerous pages, servants, entertainers, cooks, and craftsmen. The palace of the Islamic world thus became an increasingly complex space, evolving from the early Umayyad dār al-imāra (palace of government) model into the more elaborate and formal dār al-khilāfah (caliphal palace) model. Architecture played an important role in court life as a means to regulate access to the ruler, as a public display of sovereignty, and as a locus for royal ceremonies. The Ottoman Topkapi Saray, constructed on the order of Mehmed II to be built on top of the Byzantine acropolis, provides an excellent example of these functions, with its multiple gates and courtyards and increasingly restrictive access to royal spaces culminating in the royal harem at the heart of the complex.

Artistic patronage was another important aspect of the outward expression of the royal court. Courtly patronage of the arts and sciences could include undertaking monumental building projects such as the Süleymaniye Mosque in Ottoman Istanbul or the Taj Mahal in Mughal Delhi. But while pious projects such as Qur'an manuscript production or the construction of a new mosque were important undertakings, all manner of luxury items were commissioned under the auspices of the royal court. Costumes, ceremonial weapons, poetic anthologies, culinary utensils, and jewelry were presented as gifts at court and produced in royal workshops closely associated with the palace. Luxury manuscripts of Abu al-Qasim Firdawsi's Shahnama (Book of kings) demonstrate the central role that Persianate models of kingship and courtly life played in the development of the Islamic royal court. Examples such as the Safavid Tahmasp Shahnama or the Ilkhanid Demotte Shahnama lavishly depict the contemporary courtly milieu as the setting for historical episodes, thus creating a connection with the imagined royal past while underscoring the magnificence of the ruler's court.

See also bureaucracy; Mirrors for Princes; political ritual

Further Reading

Abu al-Qasim Firdawsi, Shāhnāmah, edited by Jalal Khaliqi Mutlaq, 8 vols., 1987–2002; Hilal al-Sabi', Rusūm dār al-Khilāfah: The Rules and Regulations of the 'Abbāsid Court, translated by Elie A. Salem, 1977; Ahmad b. al-Rashid b. al-Zubayr, Book of Gifts and Rarities, translated by Ghada al Hijjawi al-Qaddumi, 1996.

ROSE E. MURAVCHICK

S

al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir (1935–80)

Born in 1935 to a leading Shi'i clerical family in Iraq, Sadr studied with the leading mujtahids (jurists) in the holy city of Najaf, notably Abu al-Qasim Kho'i and Muhammad Reza al-Muzaffar, and began to teach in Najaf in 1963. Sadr had to be careful about politics under Saddam's repressive regime, and his relations with Ayatollah Khomeini, who was then in exile in Najaf, were cordial but not close. After the Islamic Revolution, however, Iran's Arabic radio broadcasts referred to him as the "Khomeini of Iraq." Saddam Hussein ordered the execution of Sadr and his sister Amina, known as Bint al-Huda, on April 8, 1980.

In 1959, at the high point of the Iraqi Communist Party's influence, Sadr, a seminarian at the time, entered the public sphere with the publication of his Falsafatuna (Our philosophy). He emerged as a leader of the Shi'i reform movement with the publication of another widely circulating book, Iqtisaduna (Our economics), in 1968. These two books were written in response to the Marxist challenge, and probably also that of Sunni ideologues, notably Mawlana Abu al-A'la Mawdudi, and demonstrated Sadr's fascination with ideology and Marxist-inspired system-building. In Iqtisaduna, Sadr seeks to identify the principles of the Islamic economic system in point-by-point contrast to capitalism and socialism. Sadr justified private property as the fruit of labor and offered a sharp distinction between worked land and dead land. Public property occupied the predominant position in his economic system, and the state was assigned the function of exploiting natural resources and implementing large-scale economic projects for the benefit of the entire society. Similarly, in his writings on Islamic interest-free banking, Sadr advocated state control of the banking sector, where the forbidden category of ribā (interest) is replaced with modified forms of the permissible principle of muḍāraba (joint ventures between capital and enterprise).

The Marxist influence is also discernible in Sadr's political thought. He characterized the traditional Shi'i marja'iyya (being an authoritative source of imitation) as "ideological leadership" and the jurist holding this position as "the supreme representative of Islamic ideology." In Iqtisaduna, Sadr conceived of a discretionary area subject to the (legislative) authority of the ruler, since Islam allowed the walī al-amr (the person invested with authority) to exercise ijtihād according to the needs and interests of society. Sadr divided the rules of the shari'a into four categories in 1976. Sadr identified the last of these categories as the rules pertaining to public conduct; the rules covered the conduct of the walī al-amr according to the principles of wilāya al-'āmma (general mandate). Sadr deftly avoided the thorny discussion of the referent of the term walī al-amr; we are left to guess whether the walī al-amr is the ruler (sultan) of the medieval jurists, or the (Hidden) Imam. At that stage, he did not accept Khomeini's theory of wilāyat al-faqīh, though later the term could be equated with Khomeini's theocratic faqīh, as is the case in the Islamic Republic of Iran. In a note proposing a constitution for an Islamic republic in Iran, written a week before the final collapse of the monarchy, Sadr put the general deputyship (al-niyāba al-'āmma, of the Hidden Imam) that pertains to the supreme jurist (al-mujtahid al-muṭlaq) in place of wilāya al-'āmma as the mandate to rule, and the supreme jurist as marja' in place of the ruler (walī al-amr) of his earlier writings. He thus offered a clear legal formulation of the wilāyat al-faqīh as the mandate of the jurist to rule, one that is more precise than the vague statement put forward by Khomeini a decade earlier. As an Islamic legislature for Iran, Sadr proposed a majlis ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd, to function in conjunction with the principle of constitutional supervision of the walī al-amr, who was the "deputy of the [Hidden] Imam."

See also Iraq; revival and reform; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Chibli Mallat, The Renewal of Islamic Law: Muhammad Baqer as-Sadr, Najaf and the Shi'i International, 1993; Muhammad Baqir as-Sadr, Lessons in Islamic Jurisprudence, translated by R. P. Motahhedeh, 2003.

SAÏD AMIR ARJOMAND

Safavids (1501–1722)

The Safavids originated as the leaders of a Sufi order named after its founder, the mystic Shaykh Safi al-Din (1252–1334) and centered in Ardabil in Azerbaijan. Originally apolitical Sunnis, they became involved in politics and turned Shi'i in the 15th century, when they began to recruit followers among the Turkoman tribes of what are now the borderlands of Turkey, Syria, and Iran. These followers, known collectively as "Redheads" (Qizilbash), were extreme Shi'is, and it was with them that Isma'il, the founder of the political dynasty, conquered Tabriz in 1501. They constituted the main military force of the Safavids throughout the 16th century and remained powerful (though decreasingly so) throughout the lifetime of the dynasty.

Isma'il succeeded in establishing an empire that stretched from the Euphrates to the Oxus (or Amu Darya), but his defeat by the Ottoman sultan Selim I at the Battle of Chaldiran in 1514 brought an end to expansion. A long series of Ottoman-Safavid wars ensued until 1639, when the Treaty of Zuhab confirmed the surrender to the Ottomans of the original Qizilbash heartland in Anatolia and also of Baghdad and Iraq. The Safavids were generally outmatched by the Ottoman armies and on more than one occasion lost large swaths of territory, including Tabriz, their capital. The Ottomans' extended lines of communication from their capital in Istanbul constrained their capacity to conduct campaigns so far to the East. This allowed the Safavids repeatedly to survive, regroup, and reconquer lost lands. Tahmasp I (r. 1524–76) transferred the capital from Tabriz to Qazvin, which was farther from the Ottoman threat, and in 1598 'Abbas I (r. 1587–1629) moved it again to Isfahan in central Iran, farther still from the Ottoman frontier.

In the east the Safavids were engaged in frequent warfare with the Shaybanids for control of Khurasan and, in the first half of the 17th century, with the Mughals, with whom they contested Afghanistan and especially Qandahar. Territorially, the Safavid Empire was the first polity whose shape broadly resembles that of modern Iran. Like most medieval Iranian dynasties, the Safavids governed through a combination of Turkish military strength and Persian (or Tajik) administrative know-how.

The most significant long-term outcome of Safavid rule was their forcible imposition of Imami or Twelver Shi'ism. Initiated by Isma'il, this policy remains a puzzle. Other than Isma'il's boyhood exile in Gilan, the Safavids had no previous connection with Imami Shi'ism, whose beliefs and practices differed from both the extreme Shi'ism of the Qizilbash (and the young Isma'il himself) and the Sunnism of the vast majority of Iranian Muslims. No previous Muslim ruler, whether Sunni or Shi'i, had ever imposed his own religion on the general populace. The Qizilbash maintained their extreme Shi'i beliefs and practices, but the Iranian population they had conquered was coerced into adopting Imamism, a lengthy process that resulted in the emigration from Iran (mostly to India) of a considerable number of clerical and intellectual elites and the suppression of most Sufi orders. Successive Safavid shahs patronized a new Shi'i religious establishment, endowing shrines, mosques, and madrasas, especially the shrines of the eighth imam Reza in Mashhad and of his sister Fatimah in Qum. The religious differences between the Shi'i Safavids and the Sunni Ottomans, Shaybanids, and Mughals figured prominently in propaganda, while religious affinity played a role in the Safavids' alliance with the Shi'i Deccan Sultanates.

Many Twelver Shi'i 'ulama' remained ambivalent toward Safavid claims to legitimacy, for in principle, a legitimate government could be exercised only by the imam, and the Safavids could not claim to be imams, since the 12th and last of them had gone into hiding long ago and would remain there until the Day of Judgment. The Imami 'ulama' fully acknowledged the need for government, but however meritorious its dispenser, he could never be more than a sultān jā'ir, a wrongful or illegitimate ruler. Basing their ideas partly on the supposed descent of the Safavids from 'Ali b. Abi Talib and partly on their support of Shi'ism, a sufficient part of the clerical establishment supported Safavid claims to the right to rule. The technical illegitimacy of the Safavids nonetheless had important implications. In the absence of the imam, his functions were widely held to be suspended. The shah could not take over these functions, and the Imami 'ulama' had not previously claimed them either. Endowed with political support, however, they began to envisage themselves as representing the imam in some respects. This line of thinking eventually culminated in Ayatollah Khomeini's theory of wilāyat al-faqih, or the government (or guardianship) of the jurist.

For much of the 16th century, the Safavid state was threatened by a series of internal conflicts among the Qizilbash tribes and by succession disputes; these allowed the Ottomans and Uzbeks to invade virtually unopposed. The 42-year reign of 'Abbas I marked both a turning point and the apogee of the Safavid era. He succeeded in restoring internal order, defeating external enemies, and making Isfahan one of the most magnificent capital cities of the age. He curbed the power of the Qizilbash by relying increasingly on Georgian and Armenian ghulāms (royal slaves) in both the army and administration; concentrated royal control over revenues by converting lands from state (mamālik) to royal (khāṣṣah) status; and promoted trade by establishing security on the roads, investing in infrastructure, and co-opting the services of Armenian merchants (forcibly transported to Isfahan) and the West European merchants and companies that visited Iran in significant numbers during his reign.

Artistic and cultural life, especially painting and architecture, flourished in the Safavid state down to the reigns of Sulayman (r. 1666–94) and Sultan Husayn (r. 1694–1722), when problems mounted. In 1722 a rebellion by the Sunni Ghilzai Afghans in Qandahar brought down the dynasty, but it did not restore Sunnism in Iran. During two centuries of Safavid rule, Imami Shi'ism apparently had taken firm root.

See also 'Abbas I (1571–1629); guardianship of the jurist; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Norman Calder, Interpretation and Jurisprudence in Medieval Islam, 2006; Peter Jackson and Laurence Lockhart, eds., The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 6, The Timurid and Safavid Periods, 1986; Rudolph Matthee, The Politics of Trade in Safavid Iran: Silk for Silver, 1600–1730, 1999; David Morgan, Medieval Persia, 1040–1797, 1988; Andrew Newman, Safavid Iran: Rebirth of a Persian Empire, 2006.

EDMUND HERZIG

Sa'id Nursi (1877–1960)

Born in eastern Anatolia and of Kurdish descent, the Qur'anic exegete and theologian Bediüzzaman Sa'id Nursi lived through the final decades of the Ottoman Empire, its collapse and dissolution after World War I, and the first 37 years of the secular Turkish Republic. It was an era during which the Muslim world faced major intellectual and political challenges, including secularization, colonization, and failure of traditional structures. Nursi's scholarly writings and public engagements throughout his life reflected a deep concern for Islamic revival.

Referring to an inner transformation he went through around age 45, Nursi divided his life into "Old Sa'id" and "New Sa'id" phases. In the "Old Sa'id" phase (1890–1922), Nursi was a public intellectual and an erudite scholar who taught and wrote about Qur'an interpretation (tafsīr) and theology (kalām). While critical of nationalism, Nursi supported the constitutional government that sought to limit the sultan's power. He argued that the era of one caliph acting on behalf of the entire community is over and that a representative government is needed. Nursi also supported the abolishing of the special status of religious minorities, a change that made all citizens equal before the Ottoman state. Though committed to a religious revival of the caliphate, he distinguished between its religious foundations and day-to-day transactions of governance and argued that, according to the shari'a, minorities may become governors and have equal say in the parliament.

Old Sa'id was also enthusiastic about progress in the sciences and what he considered as the end of dogmatism in Europe. He proposed educational reforms to the Ottoman sultans Abdülhamid (d. 1918) and Mehmet Reshad (d. 1918), aiming at putting the traditional madrasa (seminary) training, Sufism (tasawwuf), and the modern sciences in dialogue with each other. But the eruption of World War I interrupted his endeavors: the Russians invaded his town, and he lived for two years as a prisoner of war in Russia.

In 1922 when many were celebrating Turkish nationalist victory over European colonial powers, Nursi wrote about a serious danger infiltrating the community: the positivistic attitude, which pretended to explain the world in materialistic terms, would soon undermine the faith of many. His understanding of Islamic revival radically shifted with this birth of the "New Sa'id." He now argued that revival was not about sociopolitical reform or establishing a caliphate capable of uniting Muslims across the globe. Rather, the urgent task was reviving the hearts and minds of Muslims in the light of the Qur'an. He argued that belief based on imitation will not survive in the modern age, and to ensure the happiness of the people in this world and the next, belief based on investigation had to be expounded and put forth.

New Sa'id forbade himself any political engagement. He found it harmful to have any political agenda while trying to serve the Qur'an. While he admitted that political power could be useful for restraining evil people from corrupting society, Nursi contended that such people were a minority; the majority of people who strayed from the "truth" were actually willing to find a way out of their confusions but did not know how. The "light" of the Qur'an had to be made available to them without any connection to politics, lest they think that the call to the Qur'an was a means for gaining power. According to Nursi, even if the majority chooses to apply the social aspects of shari'a as a collective, the service to belief should continue relentlessly, as it is the most important and yet the most neglected aspect of the religion.

New Sa'id lived much of his life in prison and in exile (1925–56), persecuted by the secularist state for having invested in religious revival. During this difficult period, Nursi composed the Risale-yi Nur (literally, "Epistle of light"), a 6,000-page collection seeking to expound the Qur'an and nurture a life infused with belief and love of God. He also sought to revive kalām and offer a Qur'anic theology that speaks to the modern age. His writings, banned by the state, were secretly disseminated and hand-copied by thousands of people, many of whom were also persecuted.

After decades of political disengagement, in 1950 Nursi voted for the Democratic Party in the first multiparty elections in Turkey, signaling his support for the relaxation of state despotism, which led to the lifting of the ban on his writings in 1956. This was also a period when most Muslim countries were gaining independence from colonial rule. Nursi encouraged solidarity across Muslim communities in the world. He also called for an interfaith solidarity to uphold faith in God and resist moral collapse, which he felt was demonstrated by the horrors of the two World Wars.

The grassroots movement founded around Risale-yi Nur, the Nur movement, continued to grow after Nursi's death in 1960, and the Risale found an international audience in translation.

See also revival and reform; Turkey

Further Reading

M. Said Ramadan Al-Buti, "Bediuzzaman Said Nursi's Experience of Serving Islam by Means of Politics," in Proceedings of Third International Symposium on Said Nursi: The Reconstruction of Islamic Thought in the Twentieth Century and Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, 1997, 105–14; Ahmet Davudoglu, "Bediuzzaman and the Politics of 20th Century Muslim World," Proceedings of Third International Symposium on Said Nursi: The Reconstruction of Islamic Thought in the Twentieth Century and Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, 1997, 286–311; Zeynep Akbulut Kuru and Ahmet T. Kuru, "Apolitical Interpretation of Islam: Said Nursi's Faith-Based Activism in Comparison with Political Islamism and Sufism," Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations 19, no. 1 (2008): 99–111; Nursi Studies, http://www.nursistudies.com; Ibrahim Abu Rabi', Islam at the Crossroads: On the Life and Thought of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi, 2003; Risale-i Nur: A Contemporary Interpretation of the Qur'an, http://www.saidnur.com; Colin Turner and Hasan Horkuc, Makers of Islamic Civilization: Said Nursi, 2009.

ISRA YAZICIOGLU

Saladin (1138–93)

Abu al-Muzaffar Yusuf b. Ayyub, known in Europe as Saladin from his honorific title Salāh al-Dīn (Reformer of the Religion), was the founder of the Ayyubid dynasty, which ruled over Egypt, upper Iraq, most of Syria, and Yemen during the 12th and 13th centuries. He acted as the vizier of Egypt between 1169 and 1171, and sultan between 1174 and 1193. He is known, particularly in the West, for being the most prominent opponent of the crusaders and for the capture of Jerusalem from the Kingdom of Jerusalem in 1187.

A Kurd from Dvin, in Armenia, he was born in Tikrit, near Baghdad, where his father, Najm al-Din Ayyub, was governor and his uncle, Asad al-Din Shirkuh, a state functionary for the Seljuqs. Following an incident involving Shirkuh's killing of a Christian, the two brothers left Tikrit for Mosul in 1138 and started working for the Zangids. After serving at the court of Zangi, the amir of Mosul, the brothers worked for Nur al-Din Mahmud, Zangi's son and ruler of Damascus.

Saladin spent his formative years in Damascus and participated in several Syrian military expeditions in Egypt to defend the Fatimid caliphate against the forces of the Kingdom of Jerusalem. After the death of his uncle Shirkuh in 1169, he was appointed commander of the Syrian forces and vizier of Egypt. Saladin gradually secured his position in Egypt, both against the external threats of the crusaders' armies and the internal threats of the partisans of the Fatimid dynasty. In 1171, after consolidating his power base, he officially abolished the Shi'i Fatimid caliphate of Egypt and proclaimed the return to Sunni Islam. Upon the death of Nur al-Din in 1174, Saladin extended his rule to Damascus, Homs, and Hama. He further consolidated his power over the remainder of Syria following the death of Isma'il al-Malik al-Salih, Nur al-Din's heir, in 1181. By 1186, he had unified the Muslim territories of Egypt, Syria, and Mesopotamia under his rule and was ready to face the crusaders' threat.

The motives behind Saladin's expansionist policy have received numerous and often contradictory interpretations in both contemporary and later accounts. While some saw in that policy an attempt to unify Muslim territory against the existing threats of the crusaders in preparation for jihad, as Qadi al-Fadil (d. 1199) believed, others denounced it as an act of betrayal on the part of a self-promoting Kurd who turned against his own masters, as one sees it described in Zangid sources.

In 1187, Saladin gathered all his Muslim allies and declared a jihad against the Christian crusaders who had invaded parts of the Middle East, including the Holy Land. As commander of the Muslim forces, he soundly defeated the crusader states at the Battle of Hattin in July 1187 and regained large parts of the territory invaded, except for the city of Tyre. On October 2, 1187, Saladin entered the besieged city of Jerusalem with no significant resistance and restored Muslim rule. The civility of his army has been contrasted with the crusaders' brutality eight decades earlier. The capture of Jerusalem would trigger the Third Crusade and a series of new attacks launched by the Christian armies in the Middle East. In 1192, after long negotiations, Saladin signed a peace agreement with the king of England, Richard the Lionheart, recognizing the Frankish coastal gains between Acre and Jaffa. He died a few months later in Damascus, in March 1193, after a serious illness.

Saladin's legacy is marked both by his military achievements against the crusaders externally and by his socioreligious policies internally. In the Muslim territories under his rule, Saladin created a considerable number of institutions of learning, such as religious schools (madrasas), legal colleges, hospitals, and Sufi retreats. He founded several pious endowments to encourage religious learning and to promote Sunni orthodoxy, particularly in post-Fatimid Egypt. In Jerusalem, he restored the Dome of the Rock and the Aqsa Mosque to Muslim use.

Saladin has become the object of myths in both the West and the Muslim world. The abundant literature encompasses exalted descriptions on the part of his admirers and more hostile views on the part of his opponents. A number of features are, however, widely recognized and mentioned in the literature: his chivalry, his generosity, and his fair treatment of religious minorities, notably the Christian population of Jerusalem. Saladin's legacy is still alive in the contemporary Arab and Muslim world. Twentieth-century Arab nationalism and modern Islamic movements have used him as a symbol and a source of inspiration for his successful unification of the Muslim territories.

See also Ayyubids (1169–1250); Crusades; Fatimids (909–1171); jihad; madrasa

Further Reading

Abdul Rahman Azzam, Saladin, 2009; Hamilton Gibb, The Life of Saladin: From the Works of 'Imad al-Din and Baha' al-Din, 1973; Margaret Jubb, The Legend of Saladin in Western Literature and Historiography, 2000; Malcolm Cameron Lyons and D.E.P. Jackson, Saladin, the Politics of the Holy War 1982; Hannes Mohring, Saladin: The Sultan and His Times, 1138–1193, translated by David S. Bachrach, 2008; D. S. Richards, The Rare and Excellent History of Saladin, translated by Baha' al-Din Ibn Shaddad, 1964.

NASSIMA NEGGAZ

Salafis

The Salafi designation is contested in the scholarly literature as well as among some Muslims, and because of this there is considerable confusion about to whom it applies and the nature of its doctrines. A historically grounded definition maintains that Salafis adhere to a literalist theology that rejects allegorical interpretation and reason-based arguments and claim to be faithful to the teachings of the theological Hanbalis or the ahl al-hadith. Salafis insist that their beliefs are identical to those of the first three generations of Muslims, al-salaf al-salih (pious ancestors), from whom they take their name. Their attention is directed at convincing other Muslims of the superiority of Salafi teachings and of the need to abandon reprehensible innovations (bida') allegedly not rooted in Islam, such as superstitious beliefs and the intercessionary practices associated with the cult of dead saints. Sufis and Shi'is in particular are the target of Salafi polemical attacks for partaking in forms of unbelief (kufr) by not being faithful to a strict conception of God's oneness (tawḥīd). Salafism's most prominent premodern authorities are Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), his student Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350), and a number of reformist scholars who followed in their footsteps, such as Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab (d. 1792) and Muhammad al-Shawkani (d. 1834), among others. Because Salafis are concerned with theological purity, they engage in exclusionary practices that can attain the level of excommunication (takfīr) of fellow Muslims, and embedded in this is the potential for direct action against individuals or institutions.

In legal matters, Salafis are divided between those who, in the name of independent legal judgment (ijtihād), reject strict adherence (taqlīd) to the four Sunni schools of law (madhāhib) and others who remain faithful to these. All Salafis, however, claim that an ijtihād based on a probative proof text (dalīl) that contradicts an established school's opinion is to be accepted as superior. Moreover, they insist that the canonical hadith corpus, which provides the vast majority of proof texts, is to be considered unconditionally authoritative. In the realm of politics, Salafis do not adhere to any particular ideology—some are quietists whereas others are activists. A commitment to a distinctive creed is Salafism's most characteristic and unifying marker of identity in addition to its followers' effort to reform the beliefs and practices of other Muslims.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the label Salafism was applied to a group of modernizing and rationalist scholars, such as Afghani (1838–97) and Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905). These scholars, however, did not share the literalist theology of the premodern Salafis and were engaged in a project of uplifting Muslim society from a state of decay by finding the philosophical resources that would accomplish this. Legal reform through ijtihād formed part of this effort, but not the puritanical theology that lies at the core of Salafi teachings. Furthermore, while the relationship with the West that Afghani and 'Abduh expressed was rivalrous, it also involved adopting and learning from the West's intellectual and scientific achievements.

Salafis are closely identified with the Wahhabis of Saudi Arabia because of a shared theological orientation and because the Wahhabis have claimed to be Salafis from the early 20th century, if not before. The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia adheres to a Salafi interpretation of Islam, and its promotion and defense have been a source of legitimacy for its ruling family since the mid-18th century. From the 1920s Saudi monarchs regularly patronized Salafis in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, South Asia, and elsewhere and subsidized the publication of this movement's books. Independent of the Saudi connection, Salafis have also had an autonomous history and presence in several countries where they formed associations to promote their respective projects, which tended to focus on religious reform rather than an activist political agenda. In India, for example, the Salafis established the Jam'iyyat Ahl-i Hadith (1906), whereas in Egypt they established the Jama'at Ansar al-Sunna al-Muhammadiyya (1926). Similar Salafi organizations exist in a number of other countries, including in the West.

The development of a distinctive Salafi political ideology has been in progress since the mid-20th century and has yet to coalesce into a dominant current. This began with the government of Saudi Arabia's promotion of Pan-Islamism against the ideologies of communism and Arab nationalism that threatened its legitimacy while also funding institutions and programs that spread globally a Salafi interpretation of Islam. New self-declared Salafi groups emerged in the 1970s, some of which combined Salafi theology with tenets of the Muslim Brotherhood to form new hybrid ideologies and programs for political action. The more radical of these groups argued on the basis of their interpretation of Ibn Taymiyya that it is permissible to engage in takfīr against individuals and groups and, if necessary, to rebel against a state that is not ruling in accordance with the shari'a. From the Muslim Brotherhood, especially the works of Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), they obtained a conceptual framework and organizational strategies with which to launch attacks on governments that do not base their rule and laws on Islamic foundations. In Egypt, one such group was the Islamic Jihad (Jama'at al-Jihad al-Islami), which was established in 1979 by Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam Faraj (d. 1982, author of The Neglected Duty [al-Farida al-Gha'iba]). In Saudi Arabia, Juhayman al-'Utaybi's group, al-Jama'a al-Salafiyya al-Muhtasiba, was formed in 1975 and led a millenarian revolt that included the brief seizure of the great mosque in Mecca in 1979. Since then a plethora of Salafi political groups has been formed, including al-Qaeda and its various affiliates.

Not all Salafi groups preach violent action. Most, in fact, reject the forms of violence advocated by al-Qaeda, and Salafism can best be described as politically fragmented. Three streams can be distinguished in terms of political engagement: (1) the Salafi jihadists, who advocate direct action against the dominant order, including specific states, and wish to re-create the historic caliphate (al-Qaeda exemplifies this tendency); (2) the activists (Harakis), who engage in nonviolent political activism in order to advance specific goals (the Ahl-i Hadith in India and the "Awakening Islamists" in Saudi Arabia [Sahwis] are typical of this stream); and (3) the traditionalists (Taqlidis), who, as quietists, shun all forms of overt political action and argue for obedience to Muslim rulers in order to avoid civil strife (fitna). Most Salafis tend to belong to the last group, seeking to transform society through the purification and education of individuals and not through the toppling of the established political order.

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92); Pan-Islamism; Saudi Arabia

Further Reading

David Commins, The Wahhabi Mission and Saudi Arabia, 2006; Johannes J. G. Jansen, The Neglected Duty, 1986; Malcolm Kerr, Islamic Reform, 1966; Roel Meijer, ed., Global Salafism, 2009; Madawi al-Rasheed, Contesting the Saudi State: Islamic Voices from a New Generation, 2006.

BERNARD HAYKEL

Samanids (819–1005)

The Samanid dynasty was the most important political power of the eastern Islamic world between the years 900 and 999. The Samanid family originated with their eponymous eighth-century founder, Saman-khuda, who was apparently one of the local landowning gentry of the Balkh region in northeastern Khurasan. The family first rose to political prominence in the early ninth century, when the four grandsons of Saman, having won the caliph Ma'mun's favor, were appointed to senior governorships, three of which were located in the neighboring Central Asian border province of Transoxania.

It was in Transoxania during the following generation that the founder of the dynasty emerged as a major power: Isma'il b. Ahmad (r. 892–907), great-grandson of Saman and a noted ghāzī (border warrior against the infidels), unified the entire province under his rule. In the year 900 Isma'il conquered the Saffarids, which until that time had been the major power of the eastern Islamic world, and subsequently incorporated virtually all the Islamic lands of that time from Khurasan eastward into his realm. The dynasty continued to dominate the eastern Islamic world until the dismembering of its realm in 999 at the hands of the ethnically Turkic Qarakhanids and Ghaznavids.

The Samanid dynasty occupies a critical place in Islamic history and political thought. First, the Samanids presided over the revival of the Persian language, culture, and political tradition and their incorporation into Islamic political discourse. Thus the Samanids were responsible not only for the literary and administrative revival of the Persian language but also for having made it into one of the classical Islamic languages, alongside Arabic, and the primary language of government in the Islamic world from Iran eastward. The Samanids also revived pre-Islamic Persian political ideals and concepts, adapting them to the new Islamic norms and culture. Thus, for example, it was the Samanids who imparted Islamic respectability to ancient Iranian regal titles such as shāhānshāh (king of kings), the title of the ancient pre-Islamic Iranian monarchs.

Second, the Samanids established the model of Islamic governance and political legitimization for every succeeding premodern Muslim polity that arose in the wake of Abbasid political dissolution, particularly the precedent of establishing one's legitimacy as ruler through assuming and executing the dual core duties of a ruler in Islamic political thought: namely, "commanding right and forbidding wrong" within the borders of the Islamic world and waging jihad against the non-Muslims, both inside and outside of those borders. In the Samanid case, this jihad was directed primarily against the Turkic peoples to their north and east. As a result, the Samanid model of government became paradigmatic in Islamic political thought. Isma'il b. Ahmad is portrayed as the ideal Muslim ruler in many classic medieval Islamic literary works, including Nizam al-Mulk's famous Mirror for Princes.

Third, the dynasty is, correctly, viewed as a bulwark of political Sunnism—in fact, virtually the only significant Sunni dynasty in the entire Middle East at this time—in an age of Shi'i political ascendancy. Throughout much of the tenth century, the other major Muslim political powers were the Shi'i Buyid and Fatimid dynasties. Moreover, the Samanid realm was the bastion not only of Sunnism but also of autochthonous Iranian political rule; its downfall inaugurated a millennium of Turkic domination of the eastern Islamic world.

Finally, the Samanid dynasty played a leading role in the Islamization of Central Asia—an effort that was crowned with success in the mid-tenth century when a mass conversion of the Turkic peoples bordering the Samanid lands occurred. This enduring Samanid legacy secured the dominance of Islam in the Central Asian steppes and ensured that the first invading waves of Turco-Mongol nomads, beginning with the Qarakhanids and then the Seljuqs, entered the Islamic world as Muslims.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); commanding right and forbidding wrong; ghāzī; Seljuqs (1055–1194); shāhānshāh

Further Reading

Vasilii Vladimirovitch Barthold, Turkestan Down to the Mongol Invasion, 1968; Richard N. Frye, Bukhara: The Medieval Achievement, 1965; Idem, "The Sāmānids," in The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 4, edited by R. N. Frye, 1975; Numan N. Negmatov, "The Samanid State," in History of Civilizations of Central Asia IV. Part One: The Historical, Social, and Economic Setting, edited by M. S. Asimov and C. E. Bosworth, 1999; Jürgen Paul, "The State and the Military: The Samanid Case," Papers on Inner Asia 26 (1994); Deborah G. Tor, "The Islamization of Central Asia in the Sāmānid Era and the Reshaping of the Muslim World," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 72, no. 3 (2009); Eadem, "The Mamlūks in the Military of the Pre-Seljūq Persianate Dynasties," IRAN: Journal of the British Institute of Persian Studies 46 (2008); W. Luke Treadwell, "Shāhānshāh and al-Malik al-Mu'ayyad: The Legitimation of Power in Sāmānid and Būyid Iran," in Culture and Memory in Medieval Islam: Essays in Honour of Wilferd Madelung, edited by Farhad Daftary and Josef W. Meri, 2003.

D. G. TOR

Saudi Arabia

Saudi Arabia has been an important locus and sponsor of Islamic reformist thought and activism since the 1920s, even before the kingdom was officially established in 1932. Its founder, King 'Abd al-'Aziz b. 'Abd al-Rahman Al Sa'ud (Ibn Sa'ud, d. 1953), saw himself as heir to the Wahhabi movement that had emerged in central Arabia in the 18th century and dominated much of the Arabian Peninsula until the state it helped create was destroyed by the Ottomans in 1818. Wahhabism, which Ibn Sa'ud labeled Salafism from as early as the 1910s if not before, is the religious ideology in whose name he united the disparate regions and tribes of Arabia. Its sponsorship by the state and the claim to implement Islamic law represent the bases for the legitimacy of the Al Saud dynasty into the early 21st century. Wahhabis seek to reform "errant" Muslims, leading them away from the reprehensible innovations (bid'a) and superstitious practices that they are accused of having adopted. In Arabia, these involve beliefs and practices that Wahhabis deem to be polytheistic (shirk) and to contain elements of unbelief (kufr). They include such practices as worship at certain trees and the graves of holy men, as well as seeking the intercession or aid of dead or living persons and abandoning the ritual obligations of the faith (e.g., prayer, fasting, alms, pilgrimage). Wahhabi scholars argue for a return to the original teachings of the Qur'an and the sunna of the Prophet Muhammad, which they claim are embodied in the Wahhabis' strict monotheistic creed centered on God's unicity (tawhid). Wahhabis have not hesitated to use excommunication (takfir) of persons accused of deviating from tawhid or to engage in armed struggle against them (jihad). In addition, Sufis and Shi'is, and to a lesser extent Ash'aris, have been singled out by Wahhabis as theological deviants and are regularly attacked in polemical writings, sermons, and various other media. It is the Wahhabi practice of takfir and the potential violence it entails that have engendered the ire of other Muslims and their condemnation of the Saudi Arabian government.

While sponsoring Wahhabi scholars and teachings, the Saudi royal family has continuously had to balance the religious zeal of its foundational and legitimating doctrine with the pragmatic constraints of ruling a territorial nation-state. The first test of this came when the Bedouin-origin paramilitary force called the Ikhwan (Brotherhood) rebelled against Ibn Sa'ud's rule in the late 1920s, accusing him of not being faithful to the tenets of Wahhabism. He crushed this movement militarily because its repeated acts of violence on the frontiers of Iraq, Kuwait, and Jordan threatened retaliation from imperial Great Britain. But he also dispensed with the Ikhwan because their value as shock troops of an expanding Saudi state had diminished by the late 1920s and because their leaders were challenging his authority. Through the late 1960s, Saudi Arabia's religious scene was dominated by traditional Wahhabi scholars, led by the mufti (legal specialist) Muhammad b. Ibrahim Al al-Shaykh (d. 1969), who deferred to the dictates of the royal family.

In the 1950s a new threat emerged for Saudi Arabia in the form of Arab nationalism and republican socialism, as promulgated by President Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–70) of Egypt. The Egyptian government's persecution of members of the Muslim Brotherhood led many of them to seek refuge in Saudi Arabia in the 1950s and 1960s, and here they found employment in the then-nascent administrative bureaucracy and in teaching and religious institutions. Accused by Nasser of representing backward and reactionary forces, Saudi Arabia, under the rule of King Faisal b. 'Abd al-'Aziz Al Sa'ud (d. 1975), developed and sponsored Pan-Islamic ideologies and institutions to ward off the threats from Nasserism and socialism. This effort, which became known as the Islamic Solidarity Movement (Harakat al-Tadamun al-Islami), led to the establishment of the Islamic University in Medina (1961) and the Muslim World League (1962), among other Islamic missionary, educational, and religious institutions. Saudi Arabia, especially after accruing massive wealth from the oil booms of the 1970s, devoted considerable resources to these institutions with the aim of promoting a Salafi brand of Islam and emphasizing the Islamic legitimacy of its ruling family and political regime.

In 1979 three critical events took place that intensified Saudi Arabia's effort to bolster its Islamic legitimacy. Two of these, the Iranian Revolution under the leadership of Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) and the seizure of the great mosque in Mecca by a group of millenarian Sunni zealots, directly threatened the religious legitimacy of Saudi Arabia. The third, the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, provided an opportunity for Saudi Arabia to burnish its Islamic credentials by financially and politically supporting the Afghan resistance.

In the 1980s the Saudi government adopted more austere social and religious domestic policies, and this period corresponded with the rise of a more politicized generation of Saudi Islamist activists and thinkers. These Islamists were strongly influenced by the teachings of the Muslim Brotherhood and subscribed to a new hybrid ideology—one that combined the activism of the Muslim Brotherhood with the theological zeal of Wahhabism. Labeled Sahwis (Awakeners), they began a campaign of criticism of the Saudi regime's pro-Western political orientation, especially after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1990 and the arrival of hundreds of thousands of U.S. troops to defend Saudi Arabia. The official Saudi religious establishment, which was led by Grand Mufti 'Abd al-'Aziz b. Baz (d. 1999), had issued a fatwa (religious opinion) legitimizing the foreign military presence, and this led to a steady decline in its prestige and authority in the eyes of many in Saudi Arabia as well as among Salafi and Islamist networks abroad. Concurrently, certain circles of Sahwis and Salafis became increasingly radicalized, and a number of these rallied to the call of al-Qaeda and joined its ranks in Afghanistan. The latter declared the Saudi royal family to be "apostate" rulers who should be toppled through violent means, and its religious leaders were described as corrupt and unprincipled lackeys and labeled pejoratively "scholars of the sultan."

The events of 9/11 represented a watershed in Saudi Arabia's religious politics, especially after al-Qaeda took aim at Saudi Arabia in a series of suicide bombing attacks in 2003. Since that time a change in rhetoric, religious appointments, funding, and policies has occurred. The effort aimed at tempering the intolerance and zeal of Wahhabism and its representatives while attacking al-Qaeda and its affiliates as an "errant group" that has many of the attributes of the heretical Kharijis.

See also Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92); Mecca and Medina

Further Reading

David Commins, The Wahhabi Mission and Saudi Arabia, 2006; Thomas Hegghammer, Jihad in Saudi Arabia, 2010; Stephane Lacroix, Awakening Islam, 2011; Madawi al-Rasheed, Contesting the Saudi State, 2006; Joshua Teitelbaum, Holier than Thou: Saudi Arabia's Islamic Opposition, 2000.

BERNARD HAYKEL

Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98)

There are three main categories under which Sayyid Ahmad Khan, or "Sir Sayyid," as he is known in South Asia, can be classified: as an architect of the Two-Nation Theory, which led to the partition of India and the creation of Pakistan; as a great "modernist" thinker who interpreted Islam in a rational, scientific manner and established a college to foster Western sciences among Muslims; and as a "deviant" or "heretic," since he emphasized, inter alia, direct recourse to the Qur'an, bypassing the weighty institution of hadith (prophetic tradition), and held that heaven and angels were mere metaphors. Broadly, these categories also characterize his roles respectively as a political activist, educator, and theologian. However, it is his image as an architect of the Two-Nation Theory and of "Muslim separatism" that has probably been the most controversial over the decades. All such classifications of Khan, however, reflect more about analysts' understandings and ideologies than about the figure himself.

Born in Delhi, Khan had a prestigious lineage, as members of his paternal and maternal families enjoyed high positions under the Mughal Empire. Khan's mother's family admired Shah ʿAbdulaziz (d. 1824), a key reformist figure and the son of Shah Waliullah (d. 1762), who Shaikh Muhammad Ikram, author of Muslim Civilization in India, called "the greatest Islamic scholar India ever produced." Khan thus grew up in an environment of deep piety, free from superstition and local customs then prevalent among what his associate and biographer Altaf Husain Hali called "ignorant Muslims." Early on, he read books by Shah Isma'il (d. 1831) that liberated him from, according to Hali, the "fetters of taqlid (imitation)." At the age of 20, and against his elders' wishes, Khan joined the service of the British and became a subjudge in 1841. In 1844 he wrote Archeological History of the Ruins of Delhi, which won him a fellowship from the Royal Asiatic Society. While Khan was posted at Bijnaur, the 1857 anti-British revolt erupted and crucially shaped his thoughts.

In 1858 Khan wrote The Causes of the Indian Revolt, in which he criticized the nonrepresentation of Indians in the Legislative Council of India, the British government's support of the Christian missionaries in India, and the law necessitating the resumption of revenue-free land. This pamphlet may be described as a call for democracy, for Khan wrote in it, "This voice . . . can never be heard, and this security never acquired, unless the people are allowed a share in the consultations of the Government." Two years later, Khan published The Loyal Mohammedans of India, and it was clear that, in the aftermath of the revolt, his concerns about Muslims only sharpened. Given the havoc inflicted on Muslims by the British after the revolt, and the British portrayal of Muslims as disloyal and fanatic (by such people as W. W. Hunter in his The Indian Musalmans: Are They Bound in Conscience to Rebel against the Queen?), Khan aimed at fashioning a nonantagonistic atmosphere between the British and Muslims. In order to allow India's Muslims to improve their lot, he established in 1875 a "Muslim Cambridge," the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental (MAO) College. He also took on the charges of violence and barbarism leveled against Islam by the missionaries, who, according to Hali, believed that it was "their natural right to spread Christianity in British India." These missionaries considered Muhammad's biography, as authored by Sir William Muir, the basis for disgracing the Muslims' faith and for converting Muslims to Christianity. As a rebuttal to Muir, Khan published his Life of Mohammad in 1870, demonstrating in it his immersion in both Western scholarship and comparative theology, as well as classical Islam. In this tract, as in others, his main addressee was not the community of Muslims per se but "human society in general." He also wrote commentaries on the Bible and the Qur'an.

Khan considered the traditional Muslim educational system as almost redundant. His intellectual project—exemplified in MAO—was to craft an Islamic theology in consonance with European rationalism. Islam, he averred, is in line with modern science and "nature" and its laws. While he advocated the cause of modern education, he was also aware of its foul sides, particularly with regard to its impact on religion. And it was the modern educated stratum of society that he viewed as his main audience. In this regard, Hali narrates that a traditional theologian came to him once desiring to see his commentary on the Qur'an. Khan told him that if he believed in monotheism, the prophecy of Muhammad, and life in the hereafter, he did not need to see his commentary, since it was meant for the modern educated Muslims who had developed doubts about the fundamentals of Islam.

The ethos be and his colleagues helped fashion—through activism, speeches, print circulations, and a variety of other institutional mechanisms—is known as the Aligarh Movement. This novel ethos, or the perception thereof, left a deep impact in multiple arenas: historiography, Urdu language and literature, Western education, the conduct of public debates, and so on. The sine qua non of this ethos was a distinct way of dealing with the mythological to foreground that which is human. For instance, Khan urged Urdu poets to go past "love and imagination" and address "real events" and "visible objects." He favored "natural poetry," which "contained criticism of life and was purposeful." It is this aspect of Khan's momentous and multifaceted life that is probably far more significant than the twin labels of an "architect of the Two-Nation Theory" and "a British loyalist"—after all, the so-called nationalists, from Surendranath Banerjee and Tarakrishna Haldar to Mohandas Gandhi, have all been British loyalists.

Given his rational interpretation of Islam, Khan is often described as a Muslim Martin Luther. One can begin to appreciate the irony of such a description from the fact that Gilbert Genebrard accused Luther and other German reformers of introducing Islam into Christianity, and Martinus Alphonous Vivaldus likened Lutheranism to Muhammadenism because, like Muhammad, Lutherans rejected saint worship and allowed divorce. As for Khan's modernism, Hali held that his ideas were barely new: Khan only spread that which was common in the history and traditions of Islam among the most learned few scholars.

See also Aligarh; modernism; revival and reform

Further Reading

G.F.I. Graham, The Life and Work of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, 1974; Altaf Husain Hali, "Sayyid Ahmad Khān aur Mazhab," Aligarh Magazine (1971); Shaikh Muhammad Ikram, Muslim Civilization in India, 1964; Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan, Intekhaab Mazaameen: Aligarh Institute Gazette, edited by Asghar Abbas, 1982; Idem, Life of Mohammad, 2002; David Lelyveld, Aligarh's First Generation: Muslim Solidarity in British India, 1978; Idem, "Disenchantment at Aligarh: Islam and the Realm of the Secular in Late Nineteenth Century India," Die Welt des Islams 22, no. 4 (1984); Hafeez Malik, "Sayyid Ahmad Khan's Contribution to the Development of Muslim Nationalism in India," Modern Asian Studies 4, no. 2 (1970).

IRFAN AHMAD

Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)

Sayyid Qutb was one of the most influential Islamists of the 20th century. He was born in 1906 in a village in Asyut Province in Upper Egypt and attended the recently established government school there. In 1921, he went to Cairo to attend secondary school and later enrolled at Dar al-'Ulum, a teacher training institute, graduating in 1933. He then joined the Ministry of Education, working as a teacher and then as an official until 1952. In 1936, he was transferred from the provinces to Helwan, near Cairo, where he established a home and brought his mother, brother, and two sisters to live with him. He was thus responsible for a family although he never married. His brother, Muhammad Qutb (b. 1912), was to become a well-known Islamist in his own right.

In Cairo, Sayyid Qutb became active on the literary scene and was for some time a disciple of the prominent writer 'Abbas Mahmud al-'Aqqad (1889–1964). Between 1924 and 1954, he published about 125 poems and almost 500 articles on literature, social and political issues, and education in various newspapers and literary journals. Among these articles was a series in the 1930s defending 'Aqqad from his conservative critics and a long article in 1939 critiquing Taha Hussein's book, The Future of Culture in Egypt, a well-known defense of Westernization. In his critique, he stressed the need to retain and renew Egyptian and Arab culture. During this period, he showed concern for social problems but was not revolutionary or particularly anti-Western.

After the end of World War II, Qutb, like many others, began to write passionately against European and American imperialism and the political corruption and economic inequality that afflicted Egypt. In the late 1940s, he also published a number of books, including a book on literary criticism and an account of his childhood (translated as A Child from the Village). In 1945 and 1948, he published two books dealing with the literary style of the Qur'an but not passing judgment on religious issues.

Through 1947, Qutb's writings were consistently secular and nationalist with a strong concern for social justice. Religion appears as a necessary and potentially positive force but not as a comprehensive guide for society. This changed abruptly in 1948, when he began to write clearly Islamist articles and also wrote a book, Social Justice in Islam. Little is known of the immediate reasons for this change.

From late 1948 to mid-1950, Qutb was in the United States on a government-sponsored study tour. He was impressed by American technology but horrified by the people's moral and cultural level.

Returning to Egypt, he began to cooperate with the Muslim Brotherhood but apparently became a member only in 1953. He wrote for Islamist and secular journals, revised Social Justice, and wrote two other Islamist books. In 1952, he began writing his commentary on the Qur'an, In the Shade of the Qur'an. When he joined the Muslim Brotherhood, he became one of its leading spokespersons and edited its journal for a time. Qutb now expressed his concerns for social justice and independence from imperialism mostly in Islamic terms but was willing to cooperate with secularists for common goals. While he criticized the political leaders, he considered Egyptian society as a whole to be Islamic. He also looked for an "Islamic bloc" of nations that would counterbalance capitalism and communism.

When, in July 1952, the Free Officers under Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–70) took power, both Qutb and the Muslim Brotherhood at first supported them but soon withdrew this support. In October 1954, after an attempt to assassinate Nasser, the Muslim Brotherhood was banned, some of its leaders were executed, and many were imprisoned, including Qutb. He spent almost all of his prison time in the prison hospital because of poor health and was allowed to continue his writing and to have contact with fellow Muslim Brothers in prison.

His Islamism now became much more radical, and it is generally assumed that the harsh treatment that he and others suffered was a major reason for this. He completed In the Shade of the Qur'an in 1959 and then began to rewrite it in a more radical form, completing it through al-Hijr (sura 15) before his death. He also wrote other books during this period, including Islam and the Problems of Civilization (1962) and Characteristics of the Islamic Worldview (1962).

In May 1964, he was released from prison, and in November he published his best-known book, Milestones, which was considered a call for Islamic revolution and was soon banned. A new and more radical edition of Social Justice was also published the same year. He became the guide of a secret group of young Muslim Brothers not only to direct them in a program of intellectual and moral preparation but also to help them procure weapons claimed to be for self-defense. In August 1965, he was arrested and convicted of plotting against the government. The main evidence against him appears to have been Milestones. He was executed on August 29, 1966, thus becoming a martyr in the eyes of many.

Qutb's later Islamist writings are more radical than his earlier ones in several ways. They are more uncompromisingly theocentric. Only God's will counts, and only God has sovereignty (hākimiyya). Society is either ruled according to God's shari'a or it is jāhiliyya, actively opposed to God. There is no middle ground, no room for cooperation with secularists, and no room for compromise on social institutions. They must be based purely on God's laws and not on human ideas. In fact, Qutb considers all the societies of the time to be jāhiliyya. Islam must therefore be started over again, as it was in the time of the Prophet Muhammad, by small groups that will devote years to absorbing the basic truths of Islam, and then will confront jāhiliyya. Jahiliyya will almost certainly respond with violence and God will determine the outcome.

Qutb has influenced later generations, both through his example as a martyr and through his writings, which have been widely translated and disseminated.

His later ideas divided the Muslim Brotherhood in the 1960s, with the majority rejecting them but smaller and more violent offshoots, such as the so-called Takfir wa-l-Hijra, Jihad, and al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya in Egypt continuing his legacy in varying ways. He has influenced al-Qaeda, especially through Ayman al-Zawahiri (b. 1951), its deputy leader. Whether he would have approved of their more violent tactics is hard to say but seems doubtful. Radical groups in other countries have also reflected his influence, and more moderate Muslims also read and appreciate his writings, especially his Qur'an commentary.

See also al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); Egypt; Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam (1954–82); fundamentalism; al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya; jāhiliyya; Muslim Brotherhood; al-Qaeda; al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)

Further Reading

Adnan Musallam, From Secularism to Jihad: Sayyid Qutb and the Foundations of Radical Islamism, 2005; Sayyid Qutb, A Child from the Village, translated by John Calvert and William Shepard, 2004; Idem, Social Justice in Islam, translated by John Hardie, translation revised by Hamid Algar, 2000; Idem, In the Shade of the Qur'an, 18 vols, translated by M. A. Salahi et al., 1999–2009.; vol. 30, 1979; Idem, Milestones, translated by M. M. Siddiqui, 1990.

WILLIAM E. SHEPARD

secularism

Controversies surrounding secularism in Islamic political thought are often exacerbated by the ambiguity and different understandings of the concept.

Secularism is usually understood to mean the institutional separation between religion and state or, according to a common expression in the West, between church and state. The latter formula might suggest that secularism is irrelevant to Islam because Islam, in principle, has no equivalent to a church. But in theory as well as in practice, the separation between religion and state can take on various forms that do not hinge on the typical historical background of Christian societies. It can mean, for instance, that the state has to remain neutral toward religion and should refrain from favoring one particular faith. In that sense, whether Muslim societies have ecclesiastical institutions that resemble a church is beside the point—even when the answer is far from self-evident—because the goal of secularism is simply to create or preserve autonomous political spaces that are free from religious regulation, influence, or interference. The key here is the profane or worldly character of these spaces. Indeed, the dominant translation of "secularism" in Arabic is 'almāniyya, which is believed to derive from the word "world" ('ālam). But to define secularism in terms of neutral spaces and institutional separation leaves much room for debate. How much state neutrality or autonomy is necessary to warrant the use of the term "secular"? The institutional definition of secularism is thus, in some measure, a matter of opinion and perspective.

Secularism has also been defined as the process whose aim is to expose the growing irrelevance of religious traditions in the face of rationality and the scientific method. While this understanding of secularism entails the reduction of religion's role and importance within society, it often assumes that religious beliefs and practices will recede as well. For this reason, it has been a source of great concern among a wide range of Muslim activists and has sometimes been dubbed "irreligiousness" (al-lā dīniyya). Here positivism and the competition between religion and science are key: the second translation of secularism in Arabic is 'ilmāniyya, which derives from the word "science" ('ilm). But despite their differences, the scientistic and institutional conceptions of secularism are not mutually exclusive. They can easily intersect, and both have been used to justify anticlerical and antireligious measures, as was the case in Turkey under Atatürk (1881–1938). Hence, it is easy to understand why many Muslim opponents of secularism have mixed up 'almāniyya, 'ilmāniyya, and irreligiousness, out of either genuine confusion or rhetorical strategy.

Some scholars speak of secularism to refer to the modern sociological phenomenon whereby traditional religious beliefs, practices, and identities are reconstructed and individualized. This can lead to the idea that religious belief has become an option rather than a given. Although some have argued that this aspect of secularism does not exist in Muslim societies, certain thinkers, such as the Egyptian judge and writer Qasim Amin (1863–1908), have in fact recognized the right not to believe in God. Yet such ideas never gained wide acceptance socially and politically. Even the liberal Egyptian constitution of 1923 fell short of enshrining this type of secularism.

In view of these difficulties, an obvious question arises: is there—or can there be—an Islamic notion of secularism? Those who answer in the negative often argue that Islam covers all facets of life, including state and politics, and that anyone who challenges this axiom should not be considered Muslim. In their view, secularism is a modern concept that first emerged in Europe and did not become an object of debate until after Western political ideas started to gain ground in Muslim societies in the 19th century. Secularism, they argue, is the product of Westernization and intellectual colonialism; it is foreign to Islamic authenticity.

Muslim proponents of secularism argue that Islamic history is replete with examples of de facto secularism. In the Middle Ages and early modern period, the state often failed to abide by all religious norms, it was unable to control all religious scholars and their sources of revenue, wars were regularly fought for nonreligious reasons, and extracanonical laws and taxes were commonplace. Traditionally, however, Muslim scholars either turned a blind eye to the gaps between the ideal and the actual or called for the reconciliation of state policies with Islam. The Egyptian scholar 'Abd al-Raziq (1888–1966) caused a shock when he broke with this tradition in 1925. In his Islam and the Principles of Governance, 'Abd al-Raziq argued that the Islamic political ideal was not the fusion but rather the separation between religion and state. The formative texts of Islam, he maintained, did not dictate a particular form of governance or polity. As for the Prophet, his political actions and decisions were responses to specific circumstances that should not be confused with his religious mission.

In the 21st century, a number of Muslim thinkers continue to defend the validity and even the necessity of institutional secularism. The Iranian thinker Abdolkarim Soroush argues that political norms and institutions should be open to rational evaluation and removed from the realm of the sacred to prevent rulers from turning their understanding of politics into religious dogma. A similar desire to free Islam from the grip of political arbitrariness can be found in the work of the Sudanese-born scholar Abdullahi An-Na'im, who maintains that the coercive enforcement of religion contradicts the nature of Islam. Therefore, he believes that the establishment of a neutral secular state, combined with the use of civic reason and the promotion of autonomous religious spaces, constitutes the best means to guarantee an Islamic way of life.

See also civil society; public sphere

Further Reading

Abdullahi An-Na'im, Islam and the Secular State: Negotiating the Future of Shari'a, 2008; Olivier Roy, Secularism Confronts Islam, 2007; Abdolkarim Soroush, Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam: Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush, 2000; Charles Taylor, A Secular Age, 2007; Nazik Saba Yared, Secularism and the Arab World (1850–1939), 2002.

HENRI LAUZIÈRE

Seljuqs (1055–1194)

The Seljuqs were the ruling family of a band of Turkish tribal nomads that seized power in the Islamic heartlands after defeating the Ghaznavid ruler and his forces in battle (1040). During its zenith in the 11th century, Seljuq rule was acknowledged in most of the Islamic world, from the Mediterranean Sea to the Indian borderlands, and from Anatolia to the Persian Gulf.

The Seljuq dynasty reached its height during the reigns of Sultan Alp Arslan (r. 1063–72) and his son Malikshah (r. 1072–92), largely due to the skill and extraordinary abilities of their vizier, Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092). During Alp Arslan's reign, the Seljuqs inflicted a crushing defeat on the Byzantine Empire at the Battle of Manzikert (1071). As a result of this victory, Anatolia was flooded with waves of Turkish nomads, beginning the process of the Turkification of Anatolia, which eventually led to the downfall of the Byzantine Empire and its replacement by the Muslim Ottomans. Among the most important of the Muslim polities established in Anatolia as a result of Manzikert was the Seljuq sultanate of Rum (1081–1307), which formed a separate polity from that of the eastern or Great Seljuq sultanate and was ruled by a rival branch of the Seljuq family.

After the death of Malikshah in 1092, the Seljuq empire began unraveling due to infighting among the various Seljuq princes, although in the early 12th century the empire experienced a revival in the East under the strong rule of Sultan Sanjar b. Malikshah (r. 1097–1157), who emerged as supreme sultan in 1118; he was widely recognized as the most powerful Muslim ruler of his time. Sanjar met his downfall in 1153, when he was defeated and subsequently taken prisoner by the unruly Turkish nomads who had originally elevated the Seljuqs. After this event the Great Seljuq realms disintegrated, breaking into a number of petty states ruled by atabegs, Seljuq military commanders who had been given charge of a young Seljuq prince, until the final extinction of the Seljuq sultanate in 1194.

The Seljuq period wrought profound political changes and, in consequence, significant developments in Islamic political thought. As the rulers of the first massive Turkish tribal migration, the Seljuqs faced the difficult task of balancing the role of tribal chieftain with that of a settled ruler in the Perso-Islamic tradition, a problem they never satisfactorily resolved and one that was to confront all subsequent Turkic rulers up to and including the Ottomans.

The Seljuqs were long portrayed as champions of Sunni Islam for several reasons. They constituted a bulwark against the rival Isma'ili Shi'i Fatimid caliphate, the predominant power in the Muslim lands from Syria westward. Further, they put an end to over a century of Shi'i Buyid control of the Abbasid caliphate. Finally, they subsidized Sunni madrasas (religious seminaries) while also engaging in brutal military campaigns to combat both covert Isma'ili proselytizing and the open revolt of the Isma'ili Assassins, which threatened to destabilize the Seljuq lands.

At the same time, the experience of conquest by nomads was a bitter one for all Muslims, and, instead of restoring political power to the Abbasid caliphate, the Seljuqs continued to hold the reins of power. This caused great tension between the Abbasid caliphs and the Seljuq sultans throughout the 11th and 12th centuries, resulting in political murder on several occasions. Power in the hands of the Seljuqs also posed an unprecedented difficulty for political theorists, among religious jurisprudents and Seljuq administrators alike, who were forced to elaborate new theories regarding the theoretical bases of the sultan's authority and to redefine the proper relations between caliph and sultan. Thus, the Seljuq era produced some of the classic manuals of medieval Islamic political thought, in both the Mirrors for Princes (statecraft advice manuals) and religious genres, written by figures such as Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111), Juwayni (d. 1085), and Nizam al-Mulk.

Perhaps the most important development in both political theory and practice that occurred under the Seljuqs was the sea change in relations between the government and the Sunni religious scholars. Whereas the original Sunni ideal was the complete independence, even aloofness, of the 'ulama', or religious clerics, from the government, the Sunni 'ulama' of Seljuq times, panicked by the Isma'ili threat, were glad to accept Seljuq patronage. This growing dependence of the 'ulama' on the government led to the gradual subservience of the 'ulama' and their subsumption under state control. Over the centuries, this state of affairs was sometimes seen as discrediting the 'ulama' and played a role in modern times in the birth of the Salafi movement, which, among other tenets, disavows any religious scholar who maintains ties with the government.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Fatimids (909–1171); Isma'ilis; madrasa; Sunnism

Further Reading

C. E. Bosworth, "The Political and Dynastic History of the Iranian World (A.D. 1000–1217)," in The Cambridge History of Iran, Volume 5: The Seljūq and Mongol Periods, edited by J. A. Boyle, 1968; Claude Cahen, The Formation of Turkey: The Seljukid Sultanate of Rūm: Eleventh to Fourteenth Century, translated by P. M. Holt, 2001; Carole Hillenbrand, "The Power Struggle Between the Seljūqs and the Isma'ilis of Alamūt, 487–518/1094–1124: The Seljūq Perspective," in Medieval Isma'ili History and Thought, edited by Farhad Daftary, 1996; George Makdisi, "The Sunni Revival," in Islamic Civilisation 950–1150, edited by D. S. Richards, 1973.

D. G. TOR

al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820)

Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi'i is important for the large corpus of early legal texts preserved in his name, for central contributions to early Islamic legal theory, and as the namesake of the Shafi'i school of legal thought (madhhab). He is not known as a political theorist, but his placement of hadiths (traditions from the Prophet, the main source of Islamic law together with the Qur'an) at the center of the law's structure contributed to the process by which scholarly authority supplanted that of the caliphs. Scholarly control over the study, transmission, and elaboration of the sources of Islamic law—especially the hadith—allowed scholars to become the exclusive discoverers and formulators of that law and to attribute its authority to God and the Prophet.

Indirect glimpses of Shafi'i's political views occasionally surface in his writings. In his Risala (a work on legal theory) he justifies juristic reliance on the khabar al-wāḥid (a hadith report transmitted by only one person in Muhammad's generation) by analogizing from the fact that the earliest Muslims delegated political authority to individuals, and he names, presumably with approval, the caliphs Abu Bakr, 'Umar b. al-Khattab, and 'Uthman b. 'Affan. Some of his views on positive law place constitutional limits on caliphal authority (e.g., in dealing with rebels), but they are well within the mainstream of proto-Sunni legal thought.

The tradition preserves hints of an inclination toward Shi'ism. In the chapter on Muslim rebels (ahl al-baghy) of his Kitab al-Umm (his main work on positive law), Shafi'i cites a tradition favoring lenient treatment, the isnād (chain of transmitters), which consists of three Shi'i imams: Ja'far al-Sadiq, Muhammad al-Baqir, and 'Ali Zayn al-'Abidin. The tradition itself has Marwan b. al-Hakam (Umayyad caliph, r. 684–85) praise another Shi'i imam, Husayn b. 'Ali. Mild sympathy for Shi'i political aspirations would be consistent with the views of other early heroes of Sunnism, such as the Medinan jurist Malik b. Anas (d. 795). Shafi'i's most important teacher (in terms of both fame and frequency of citation in Shafi'i's works) and namesake of another of the four Sunni madhhabs.

Like most other aspects of his life, details of Shafi'i's contacts with the holders of power remain murky. According to some traditions, he traveled to Yemen, possibly assisting a local judge, but other traditions portray him as traveling there for study or even for pro-Shi'i agitation. A state connection is possible, since he seems to have discussed the taxation of non-Muslim communities while there. One cluster of narratives portrays him in Baghdad displaying his wit before the caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809), but this may be a literary topos. He does seem to have traveled to Egypt in the company of the Abbasid governor's son in 814, but evidently this contact did not avail him, and he was compelled to rely on the generosity of a colleague when he settled in Egypt shortly thereafter. While in Egypt, Shafi'i seems to have been active in local politics in regard to the appointment of local officials. The student who became the primary transmitter of Shafi'is writings, Rabi' b. Sulayman al-Muradi (d. 884), was employed by the state as a prayer caller (muezzin). After Shafi'i's death, during the continuing prosecution of the Mu'tazili-inspired inquisition (mihna) under the caliph Wathiq (r. 842–47), it is reported that his students were barred from the congregational mosque in Old Cairo (Fustat). However, in a typical portrait of a proto-Sunni religious figure, Shafi'i's earliest biographer, the hadith scholar Ibn Abi Hatim al-Razi (d. 938), emphasizes neither political views nor political (or any other of his worldly) entanglements, concentrating instead on piety and commitment to Prophetic tradition as a source of law.

See also caliph, caliphate; hadith; imamate; jurisprudence; Malik b. Anas (712–95); shari'a; Shi'ism; sunna; Sunnism; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Kecia Ali, Imam Shafi'i: Scholar and Saint, 2011; Eric Chaumont, "al-Shāfi'i," in Encyclopaedia of Islam, 2004; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph, 1986; Majid Khadduri, Islamic Jurisprudence, 1961; Joseph E. Lowry, Early Islamic Legal Theory, 2007; Christopher Melchert, The Formation of the Sunni Schools of Law, 1997; Ibn Abi Hatim al-Razi, Adab al-Shafi'i wa-Manaqibuhu, 1953; Joseph Schacht, "On Shāfi'i's Life and Personality," in Studia Orientalia Ioanni Pedersen . . . Dicata, 1953; Idem, The Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, 1967; Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi'i, al-Risala, in Kitab al-Umm, edited by 'Abd al-Muttalib, 2008; Idem, Kitab al-Umm, 1990.

JOSEPH E. LOWRY

shāhānshāh

Used by the Achaemenid, Parthian, and Sasanian kings, shāhānshāh, an ancient Iranian title meaning "king of kings," fell into a centuries-long abeyance with the Muslim conquest of Iran in the seventh century. In the ninth century, however, the collapse of the Islamic form of government, the universal caliphate, forced the new rulers and dynasties that arose to look for alternative political models outside the Islamic tradition; thus, throughout virtually the entire Islamic world, including the non-Iranian lands, the Sasanian model was embraced as the paradigm of rulership.

This phenomenon included among its manifestations the revival, in the early tenth century, of the ancient title of shāhānshāh, which at that time was still considered impious by many clerics, since it recognized someone other than God as the "king of kings." The first to adopt it were heterodox Daylamite dynasties, the Shi'i Buyids among them. The greatest ruler of this dynasty, 'Adud al-Dawla, dubbed himself "King of Islam shāhānshāh." But Sunni dynasts, too, embraced the title, even in an official context as in the case of the Samanids, and the Ghaznavid rulers were addressed as shāhānshāh by their court poets.

In the 11th century, under the Seljuqs, the title became an integral part of the ruler's nomenclature; on their coins the Seljuqs arrogated to themselves both the formerly caliphal title of "sultan" and the Sasanian imperial title shāhānshāh, frequently modified by the Buyid-era addition "King of Islam." As a result, general use of the title shāhānshāh became widespread throughout the Persianate world, including India, from the later Middle Ages through the modern period, and was adopted at various times by the rulers of such major dynasties as the Mughals, Safavids, Qajars, and Pahlavis.

Some scholars have viewed the recrudescence of this and other aspects of the ancient Iranian political heritage as an alien and essentially inassimilable element in Islamic political thought. Others maintain that the incorporation of the ancient Persian ideal of rulership into Islamic political thought after the ideological failure of the caliphate was a successful adaptation and that these neo-Sasanian political ideals were assimilated harmoniously into Islamic culture and political life.

See also Buyids (945–1062); Mughals (1526–1857); Safavids (1501–1722); Seljuqs (1055–1194); sultan

Further Reading

C. E. Bosworth, "The Heritage of Rulership in Early Islamic Iran and the Search for Dynastic Connections with the Past," Iran 11 (1973); D. G. Tor, "The Long Shadow of Pre-Islamic Iranian Rulership: Antagonism or Assimilation?" in Late Antiquity: Eastern Perspectives, edited by Teresa Bernheimer and Adam Silverstein, 2011.

D. G. TOR

Shahnama

Abu al-Qasim Firdawsi's Shahnama (Book of kings) is a Persian poem of about 50,000 lines completed in 1010 and dedicated to Sultan Mahmud of Ghazna. Though the story, written by a Shi'i Muslim, culminates in the death of the last Sasanian king and the conquest of Iran by Muslim Arab armies, the Shahnama is not an overtly Islamic text. It concerns the "matter" of Iran, its pre-Islamic myths, legends, and history, as translated from Middle Persian texts into Arabic and New Persian prose. Firdawsi began the work of versifying this material circa 977.

In the tenth century, Persophone courts at the edges of Abbasid territory established Persian as a vernacular literary language. In heroic and archaizing style, Firdawsi memorialized the mythical and epic history of imperial Iran, celebrating Achaemenid-Parthian-Sasanian traditions of kingship and statecraft, martial and aristocratic values, and the continuity of an Iranian polity. Firdawsi claimed to bring Persia to life through his Shahnama. The work came to function as an icon of legitimate political authority with dynasties ruling in Persia proper (the Ilkhanids, Timurids, and Safavids) and well beyond (the Seljuqs, Ottomans, and Mughals), who commissioned lavishly illustrated copies of the text. In constructing a 20th-century nation-state, the Pahlavi dynasty also mined the Shahnama for symbols of Iranian nationalism and imperial continuity.

The Shahnama begins with the primordial Pishdadian dynasty, whose nine kings rule for over two millennia, engaging in cosmic combat to defeat the minions of Ahriman (in the reign of Kiumars), discover fire (reign of Hushang), tame the demons (reign of Tahmures), and build a cultured Edenic civilization (reign of Jamshid) before hubris leads to the usurpation of the Iranian throne by an Arab (reign of Zahhak). Zahhak succumbs to satanic temptation and becomes an oppressive tyrant, until freedom and justice are restored by Feridun. Feridun's sons fall into conflict over the succession, embroiling Iran and Turan in an unending feud. Rustam, a princely warrior of Zabolestan, stalwartly defends the Iranian throne during the wars with Turan and helps establish the legendary Kayanid dynasty, which merges, after the advent of Zoroaster (or Zarathustra, the founder of the dualistic Iranian religious tradition, Zoroastrianism) and the demise of Rustam, into the quasihistorical Achaemenid kings, Darius II (Darab) and Darius III (Dara). Alexander the Great is revealed to be the son of Darab; thus his victory over Persia does not constitute foreign conquest but continuity. He was followed by the last 30 kings of the Shahnama, which briefly mentions the Parthians before turning its focus to the Sasanians.

The prelapsarian king, Jamshid, is presented as establishing a static and hierarchical social structure (actually Indo-Iranian in origin), consisting of four classes: priests, warriors, farmers, and artisans. Cosmic retribution is exacted from those who would attempt to overturn this "natural" order (e.g., Mazdak), or to kill kings (e.g., Mahuy) or crown princes (e.g., Rustam). Even the evil king Zahhak, once overthrown, is protected from execution by an intervening angel, who orders the Iranians to chain Zahhak in a mountain cave. Authority to rule derives from royal descent, defined primarily through the father (many of the queen mothers are non-Iranian). But the ruler must also possess the royal farr, a supernatural charisma that manifests itself as a halo, light, or totemic animal and may disappear if the king succumbs to sin or hubris (as did Jamshid). Dynasties may change when the farr alights upon royals not born in the reigning bloodline who are nominated to the throne by the nobility (e.g., Kay Qobad) or who usurp it (e.g., Sasan). The Shahnama states that rule by women will not go well, but in fact the queens (Homay, Puran, Azarm) do prove able and just monarchs.

The ideal royal virtues include wisdom, honor, equanimity, bravery, and martial prowess, but Firdawsi often depicts something rotten in the state of Persia. He does not glorify the kings but shows their character flaws, which frequently lead to tragedy for those around them. The best princes (Siawash, Isfandiar) die before taking the throne, and the ideal king (Kay Khusraw) abdicates for fear of succumbing to hubris and abusing his power. The Shahnama worldview is thus deeply pessimistic, even tragic: though the creator God gives humankind the gift of mind/wisdom, it is rather fate and the relentless maw of time that govern human history.

See also Ghaznavids (977–1086); Samanids (819–1005)

Further Reading

Olga Davidson, Poet and Hero in the Persian Book of Kings, 1994; Dick Davis, Epic and Sedition: The Case of Ferdowsi's Shāhnāmeh, 1992; John Miles Foley, ed., A Companion to Ancient Epic, 2005; Theodore Noeldeke, The Iranian National Epic, or the Shahnamah, 1930; A. Shahpur Shahbazi, Ferdowsi: A Critical Biography, 1991.

FRANKLIN LEWIS

Shah Waliullah (1703–62)

One of the most important religious scholars of Muslim South Asia, Shah Waliullah was a prolific writer in both Arabic and Persian. His political theory is largely found in two comprehensive works—Hujjat Allah al-Baligha (The conclusive argument from God) and al-Budur al-Bazigha (Full moon appearing on the horizon)—and in a third book about the caliphate, Izalat al-Khafa' 'an Khilafat al-Khulafa' (Removing rancor in issues concerning the caliphate), written near the end of his career. Waliullah was a synthetic thinker, and his political ideas reflect the Islamic tradition of idealistic works, such as Farabi's Virtuous City, and are based on Platonic ideas of the ideal state as well as classical Islamicate works on government, such as Mawardi's rules for the caliph. On occasion, he offers practical observations and critiques of existing policy and governance in response to circumstances of later Mughal rule in India.

A notable and original feature is Waliullah's formulation of human civilization as developing through four stages of sociopolitical order, for which he coined the term irtifaqat. These progressive stages are described as (1) humans following natural and instinctive patterns in primitive groups, (2) the emergence of orderly family life and rules for social exchange in communities, (3) the rise of the division of labor and local political systems of kingship, and (4) the highest political order based on a single caliph dominating regional rulers. In Hujjat Allah, the qualifications for the caliph are initially discussed in pragmatic terms (vol. 1) and later in symbolic and religious terms (vol. 2). In Izalat al-Khafa', Waliullah takes up the discussion of the caliphate of the first four Islamic rulers in greater detail, in part to refute Shi'i claims, perhaps as a response to an ascendancy of Shi'i power in his contemporary North India.

In this work Waliullah defines three categories of the caliphate in terms of language drawn from a hadith report:

The khilafa khassa, the "elite" or special caliphate, is ultimately restricted to the period of the first four successors of the Prophet. Their rule was marked by (1) the actual presence of the caliph as the authority and (2) the achievement of complete control over the umma (community of believers). Because 'Ali b. Abi Talib's rule was marked by dissent, his stature is somewhat ambiguous here; in another section, a distinction is made between the first three caliphs who ruled at a time of "mercy" (raḥma), as opposed to the crisis and dissent (fitna) that emerged during 'Ali's rule.

The khilāfa 'āmma, or "general" type of caliphate, either lacks the consensus of the entire Muslim community, fails to achieve its internal quality of embodiment of (tashabbuh) of the Prophet's model in responding to people's needs and implementing the divine mandate, or has a ruler that is deficient in his knowledge of the shari'a. Still, external elements of establishing the religion may effectively be fulfilled by the "general" caliph, although this ruler is not at the same level in tashabbuh of the prophetic legacy that marked the initial phase. This general level of the caliphate is required for two beneficial aims (maṣāliḥ): one political, in other words, for the sake of defense and justice, and the other to enforce compliance with the shari'a. There is also the suggestion that consensus (ijmā') on matters of policy and religion emerges institutionally from the ruler's decree, with or without scholarly consultation. During this period following the tenure of the Rightly Guided Caliphs, the ruler is not envisioned as coming from the 'ulama' (religious scholars) class, although according to certain passages in Waliullah's works, al-Taftihmat al-Ilahiyya (Divine instructions) and Fuyud al-Haramayn (Visions received in the two holy cities), the religious scholars are the bearers of an "inner" caliphate (al-khilāfa al-bāṭina), continuing the Prophet's teaching role in the sense of transmitting religious learning as well as moral and spiritual exhortations and authority. Meanwhile, the "external" caliphate (al-khilāfa al-ẓāhira) is fulfilled by the political ruler who exercises the aforementioned functions of defense, control, and enforcement.

The final type of caliphate, the khilāfa jābira, or "oppressive" caliphate, is undesirable, although quietism on the part of the populace is generally enjoined unless the ruler goes so far in injustice or apostasy that he must be resisted and overthrown.

Waliullah's more practical discussions of the necessary infrastructure, policies of remuneration, fair taxation, and so on occur both in some of his political letters and in specific passages in his longer works. In his discussion of rules for kings, he draws on Islamicate advice or wisdom literature to treat topics such as the superior qualities possessed by an ideal ruler and the ruler's need to recognize and reward competence and to weed out treachery.

Waliullah's criticism of economic and social injustices have been seized on by thinkers such as the Pakistani scholar 'Ubaydallah Sindhi (d. 1944), who casts Waliullah as an economic reformer promoting social justice or even a socialist agenda. Waliullah has also been construed as an incipient Islamic political activist and a progenitor of the 20th-century freedom movement in India. This latter image has been contested across Indian and Pakistani scholarship. He certainly lived in turbulent times: after the death of Aurangzeb, the last strong Mughal emperor, in 1707, a sequence of ten kings occupied the throne during the remainder of Waliullah's life. In 1739, Delhi was sacked by the Persian Nadir Shah. When Delhi and the rest of northern India were subsequently threatened by the rise of Hindu clans known as Jats and Marathas and by the Sikhs, Waliullah tried in his letters to encourage Muslim notables to take a stand. Most successful among these were Ahmad Shah Abdali, an Afghan king, and Najib al-Dawla, the leader of a Pathan clan, the Rohillas, who joined forces to decisively defeat the Marathas at the Battle of Panipat in 1761.

Khaliq Ahmed Nizami (d. 1998) published Shah Wali Allah ki Siyasi Maktubat (Political letters of Shah Wali Allah), in which he collected the messages written by Waliullah to various Muslim rulers of his age, requesting them to come to the aid of Indian Muslims against non-Muslim forces in India. Waliullah did not address the threat from the British East India Company, although the British were to rule Delhi within a few decades of his death. Later, his son and successor, Shah 'Abd al-'Aziz (d. 1823), issued two notable fatwas (religious opinions) that were accommodating to British rule. The first declared India to be dār al-harb (the abode of war), since it facilitated Indian Muslims' adapting to new rules of interest-based finance and land tenure. The second fatwa permitted Indian Muslims to work for the British.

Waliullah was a noted scholar and teacher with a wide circle of pupils, some of whom are linked directly with the establishment of the Deoband madrasa. His grandson, Shah Isma'il Shahid (d. 1831), is known primarily for his involvement in the Mujahidin movement against the Sikhs led by Sayyid Ahmed Barelvi (d. 1831). This has led some scholars to conclude that a "Waliullahi" movement for political and religious reform inspired later Muslim nationalist and reformist trends in the subcontinent.

See also India; revival and reform

Further Reading

Aziz Ahmed, "An Eighteenth Century Theory of the Caliphate," Studia Islamica 28 (1968); J. M. S. Baljon, Religion and Thought of Shah Wali Allah Dihlavi, 1986; Ahmad Dallal, "The Origins and Objectives of Islamic Revivalist Thought, 1750–1850," Journal of the American Oriental Society 113, no. 3 (1993); Muhammad al-Ghazali, The Socio-Political Thought of Shah Wali Allah, 2001; Marcia K. Hermansen, trans., The Conclusive Argument from God: Shāh Walī Allāh of Delhi's Ḥujjat Allāh al-Bāligha, 1996.

MARCIA HERMANSEN

Shamil (1797–1871)

Shamil was the third and most successful imam (r. 1834–59), or leader of the Muslim resistance to the Russian conquest of Chechnya and Daghestan and ruler of the imamate (Islamic state) it established.

Born in the a'ul (village) of Gimry, Shamil displayed from early childhood interest in religious studies. He, together with his older friend and distant relative Ghazi Muhammad (the future first imām), studied with various 'ulama' in Daghestan, the most famous of whom was Sa'id al-Harakani (d. 1834), and then joined the Khalidi branch of the Naqshbandi-Mujaddidi Sufi brotherhood. Both he and Ghazi Muhammad were disciples (murīds) of Jamal al-Din al-Ghazi-Ghumuqi (1788–1869) but were given licenses (ijāza) to propagate the brotherhood (tariqa) by his master, Muhammad al-Yaraghi (1770–1838). Shamil remained loyal and obedient to Jamal al-Din until his last day in the Caucasus. He married his mentor's daughter and gave two of his daughters to Jamal al-Din's sons. Jamal al-Din, on his part, supported Shamil in his bid for leadership and during the entire period of his rule.

During his first three years as imam, Shamil was busy establishing his authority over rival claimants to leadership and the population at large. Here, his master's support was of crucial importance. So was the imam's low profile in his negotiations with the Russians. In 1837 the Russians tried to destroy him but were forced to sign a truce. Two years later Shamil escaped a crushing defeat with his family and a few followers, but he rose to new heights of power and success in the following years.

At the peak of his power, Shamil controlled most of Daghestan and Chechnya and sent nā'ibs (lieutenants) to the Circassians in the Western Caucasus, the most successful of whom was Muhammad Amin (active 1848–59). In 1845, Shamil dealt a painful blow to a huge Russian expeditionary force under Count Vorontsov, and in the following year he tried to join forces with the Circassians. He repeated such attempts up to, and during, the Crimean War (1853–56).

Understanding the odds he was up against, Shamil, like his predecessors, tried to secure Ottoman assistance, but the Sublime Porte denied it. During the early 1840s, however, assistance came from Muhammad 'Ali, the pasha of Egypt. In the period leading to the Crimean War it seemed as if both Shamil and the Ottomans were moving toward cooperation. Shamil's serious attempts to join forces with the Ottoman army at the beginning of that war, however, were met with a feeble Ottoman response. The Ottomans abandoned such attempts completely following their defeats on the Anatolian front and pressure from the British ambassador.

With the lessons of the Crimean War in mind, the Russians concentrated on conquering Chechnya and Daghestan. The Chechens and Daghetsanis were in the meantime greatly demoralized after the Ottomans failed to join them during the war and thereafter abandoned them in the Paris peace treaty of March 1856, which concluded the Crimean War. Beginning in 1857, successive Russian offensives from three sides gradually reduced Shamil's imamate, which collapsed in 1859, forcing Shamil's surrender.

In captivity, Shamil was treated with respect and allocated a house in Kaluga and later in Kiev. In 1869, he was allowed to leave for hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca. He settled in Medina and died in 1871 on his way to another visit to Mecca. His eldest surviving son, Ghazi Muhammad, became a general in the Ottoman army and led a Caucasian division in the Russo-Ottoman War (1877–78). His other son, Shafi' Muhammad, was a general in the Russian army. His grandson Sait (Sa'id) Shamil joined the 1920 rebellion against the Bolsheviks in Daghestan and was one of the only two survivors who returned to Turkey.

During his long reign, Shamil completed the structure of the imamate, the foundations of which had been laid by his predecessors, Ghazi Muhammad (1829–32) and Hamza Bek (1832–34). The imam stood at the head of both the lay and the religious hierarchies and claimed full sovereignty, assuming the title amīr al-mu'minīn (Commander of the Faithful). He was assisted in running the state by a dīwān (privy council), which included Jamal al-Din. The lay hierarchy below the imam included in descending order mudirs and nā'ibs, who were simultaneously governors, military commanders, and tax collectors for bayt al-māl (the treasury). The religious hierarchy included muftis (jurists) and qadis (judges), who were independent of the nā'ibs and accountable only to the imam. The backbone of the army were the murtaziqa (supported, provided for)—a standing army of one soldier per ten households who provided for all his family's needs—but in the late 1840s an artillery corps and an Ottoman-style regular infantry, the nizām, were also set up.

Contrary to the established view, the main aim of Shamil's movement was not jihad (holy war) but tanfīdh (implementation) of the shari'a. Jihad was merely a tool for tanfīdh, in addition to a means for self-defense against occupation by unbelievers. Correspondingly, the imamate was based on Islamic law—according to his (and his followers') interpretation. Shamil thus made a major effort that the taxes and the expenses of bayt al-māl approximate as far as possible the stipulations of the shari'a, and an important part of the stipulations of the nizām—Shamil's "secular" legislation (by-laws, not to be confused with the infantry unit of a similar name)—dealt with (re)interpretations of the provisos of the shari'a. As both an 'ālim (scholar) and a Naqshbandi disciple, Shamil personally made an effort to live according to the shari'a and to demonstrate that all his actions as leader matched the dictates of the sacred law.

From an early stage in the struggle, the Russians used Daghestani and Middle Volga Region 'ulama' in their service in order to discredit Shamil and his movement on Islamic grounds. The most important of these 'ulama' were Harakani, Mirza 'Ali al-Akhdi (d. 1858), and Yusuf al-Yakhsawi (d. 1871). But Shamil and his followers easily dismissed them as traitors to Islam. Of more consequence was Sulayman Efendi, a nā'ib in Shamil's imamate who defected to the Russians and produced in 1846 a list of Shamil's transgressions and deviations from the shari'a. This prompted Shamil to put on record both his history and the legal justifications for his actions. Both of these projects were carried out by well-known 'ulama'.

Muhammad Tahir al-Qarakhi, who served for a while as Shamil's secretary, wrote the chronicle titled Bariqat al-Suyuf al-Daghistaniyya fi ba'd al-Ghaziwat al-Shamiliyya (The glitter of Daghestani swords in some of Shamil's raids), which recorded Shamil's version of the events. Murtada 'Ali al-Uradi (d. 1865), who also served for a short time as Shamil's secretary, wrote al-Murghim (The compulsory) and Risala fi al-Hijra (Treatise on emigration), which summarized the legal point of view of the imam and his supporters.

According to this point of view, an imam is a farḍ kifāya (collective duty), which means that the Muslims must always have at least one leader. Territories too far removed from one another or from the center to effectively assist each other should have their own imam. All Muslims in the imam's domain have to accept his authority. Those who disobey him are bughāt (rebels), and those who reject the rule of the shari'a are murtaddūn (apostates). Hijra—that is, emigration from dār al-ḥarb (abode of war) to dār al-islām (abode of Islam)—is compulsory if called upon by the imam. Those who remain in dār al-ḥarb are bughāt, while collaborators with the infidels are murtaddūn. The killing of ahl al-ridda (apostates) takes priority over the killing of ahl al-ḥarb (infidels not recognizing the sovereignty of the Islamic state). If those ahl al-ridda are beyond the reach of the imam, their property may be seized or destroyed, and their marriages, commercial contracts, and inheritance rights are null and void. It is permitted to raid the houses of the bughāt, to pillage and destroy them, and to evict their inhabitants by force into dār al-islām. If dictated by maṣlaḥa (the benefit of the Muslim community), bughāt may be killed too.

The principle of maṣlaḥa grants unrestricted authority to the imam. He has the right of ijtihād (independent reasoning on the basis of the Qur'an and sunna) with regard to legislation and to ta'zīr (punishments for criminal offenses), including inflicting the death penalty and punishing upon suspicion, without the sufficient proof required by Islamic law. Indeed, Shamil used this authority in both his "secular" legislation—the niẓām—and in substituting the ḥudūd (punishments fixed by the shari'a) with other punishments.

The physical and spiritual backbone of the movement and the imamate were the Khalidis. It is, therefore, natural that the real challenge to the imamate came from another ṭarīqa that started to spread in Chechnya and Daghestan in the late 1850s: the Qadiris. Shaykh Kunta Hajji al-Michiki al-Iliskhani (ca. 1830–67), who introduced it to the Caucasus, offered people exhausted by 30 years of war and deprivation a third alternative to the two presented by Shamil—either to be true believers and resist or to surrender and become apostates. Kunta Hajji said that being a good Muslim depended on one's personal behavior, not on resistance. Furthermore, he stated that resistance to the Russians was a sin and predicted the fall of the imamate and the captivity of Shamil. Unable to counter these arguments, the imam sent Kunta Hajji on another hajj, but the message had fallen on fertile ground and contributed to the downfall of the imamate.

Almost completely forgotten in the wider Muslim world and in the West, Shamil became a hero to many in the former Soviet Union, and his figure generated controversy in Soviet historiography. His heritage is claimed by various, often opposing, political, ethnic, and ideological groups and movements in the Caucasus.

See also brotherhoods; Central Asia; Ottomans (1299–1924); Sufism

Further Reading

Moshe Gammer, Muslim Resistance to the Tsar: Shamil and the Conquest of Chechnia and Daghestan, 1994; Idem, "Shamil in Soviet Historiography," Middle Eastern Studies 28, no. 4 (1992); Michael Kemper, "Khalidiyya Networks in Daghestan and the Question of Jihad," Die Welt des Islams 42, no. 1 (2002); Idem, "The North Caucasian Khalidiyya and 'Muridism': Historiographical Problems," Journal of the History of Sufism 5 (2006); Alexander Knysh, "Sufism as an Explanatory Paradigm: The Issue of the Motivations of Sufi Movements in Russian and Western Historiography," Die Welt des Islams 42, no. 2 (2002); Anna Zelkina, In Quest of God and Freedom: The Sufi Response to the Russian Advances in the North Caucasus, 2000.

MOSHE GAMMER

shari'a

The shari'a (shart'a) is the revealed, sacred law of Islam, though the primary term for law in the Qur'an is arguably dīn, ordinarily translated as "religion." Law is an essential feature of revealed religion in both the Qur'an and Islamic thought in general, and the term shari'a is used with reference not only to Islam but also to Judaism and Christianity, because all three are conceived as having a divinely given law. According to later jurists, 500 verses of the Qur'an, termed āyāt al-aḥkām (verses of rulings), treat legal subjects, including matters relating to prayer, fasting, alms, pilgrimage, permitted food, marriage, divorce, inheritance, slavery, and trade. This represents roughly one-thirteenth of the sacred text.

Fiqh (literally, "understanding") is the term for the human effort to work out God's law on particular issues. Like shari'a, with which it is often contrasted, it is translatable as law, but whereas shari'a refers primarily to God's regulation of human behavior, and thus the ideal, fiqh always stands for the human approximation of this ideal, the law as actually found in the books. Because it etymologically means "comprehension," fiqh is often translated as "jurisprudence" in English, but usually it corresponds to law, referring to the actual rules in the books. Jurisprudence, the science or methods of interpretation through which one determines the law, corresponds more closely to uṣūl al-fiqh (literally, "the roots of the law"), the science devoted to the hermeneutics of Islamic law.

For the vast majority of Muslims, law has determined—and still determines today—what Islam is. This distinguishes Islam from Christianity, which does not actually have a revealed law and in which theology is the queen of religious sciences; Judaism likewise stresses the importance and centrality of the law. The "clergy" of Islam, like the rabbis of Judaism, are jurists rather than theologians, and it is their study of the law and competence in addressing legal questions that gives them authority. Many other claimants to authority have coexisted with them in the course of history, but, for more than a millennium, jurists have been among the groups most successful in gaining acceptance for their claims.

The Law in the Books

Islamic law is not embodied in a single authoritative code but rather held to reside in the vast array of legal texts, based ultimately on legal responsa issued by recognized jurists over the course of history. A responsum (fatwa) is an opinion solicited from a legal authority on a specific legal question. In the early sources, opinions are often solicited by one jurist of another ("I asked so-and-so about the case of . . .") or by a student or a layperson; in later times, fatwas were typically issued in response to questions by laypersons. Not all opinions were considered equal: the most authoritative opinions were those issued by mujtahids, jurists endowed with the ability acquired through intense legal study to derive independent legal rulings directly from the sources (ijtihād). Of the books recording these opinions, some were (and are) considered more important than others, but no one book gained the overriding authority of a work such as the Shulchan Aruch (The set table) of Joseph ben Ephraim Karo (d. 1575), which has served as the nearly exclusive basis for the elaboration of Jewish law over the past four centuries.

The law books divide their subject matter into set topical chapters that, already in the ninth century, followed a standard order, with some variations, that facilitated the location of particular legal topics in relatively large works without fixed pagination and often without indexes or tables of contents. The chapters fall into three large categories: 'ibādāt (acts of worship); mu'āmalāt (transactions or contracts); and qadāyā (court cases). The 'ibādāt sections start with ritual purity (ṭahārah), a prerequisite for ritual prayer and other acts of devotion, and proceed to discuss prayer itself, the first act of devotion since it is performed daily; this is followed by fasting, performed during at least one month of the year, the alms tax (zakat), which must be given once a year, and the pilgrimage, which must be performed once in a lifetime by those who are able to undertake it. The chapter order in the mu'āmalāt section is not as rigidly fixed, but it always appears after the 'ibādāt section. Major topics include sales, marriage, divorce, inheritance, renting, pawning, sharecropping, partnerships, agents, slavery, deposits, found property, foundlings, endowments, and so on. The third section includes chapters on crimes, judicial procedure, and court cases. The crimes known as ḥudūd are those for which fixed punishments are sanctioned by the Qur'an, and they are generally held to be seven in number: apostasy, adultery, false accusation of adultery, burglary, highway robbery, sedition, and drinking alcohol.

The law books regulate many matters of ritual that one could scarcely hope to enforce. Muslims are not tried in court for failing to perform ablutions properly, even though the discussion of ritual purity is usually one of the longest sections in any given law book. Most actual court cases have to do with matters governed by contracts and agreements between individuals, such as business transactions of all types. In addition, the law does not simply regulate what is forbidden, obligatory, or permissible but rather seeks to rank all human acts in moral terms on a five-tiered scale: ḥarām (forbidden), makrūh (reprehensible, discouraged), mubāh (allowed), mustaḥabb (recommended), and wājib (obligatory).

The Sources of the Law

On what did the scholars base their responsa? The substance of their rules was often indebted to existing systems, both Arabian and Near Eastern (a conglomeration of systems of diverse origin, including Jewish, Byzantine, and Sassanian law), but this does not tell us on what basis the rules were counted as Islamic. Some will have been formulated by the caliphs, whose decisions seem initially to have been accepted as authoritative. In later times this was true only of those caliphs who were also Companions of the Prophet, notably 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), who is held to have made important contributions to the law. The laws relating to *dhimmī*s (non-Muslim communities under Muslim rule) must also have derived from caliphal decrees, even though the documents attributed to them are not always genuine. By most accounts, however, Islamic law was elaborated by thinkers who stood outside the government and were opposed to or at least stood aloof from it and who did not accept the decrees of the caliphs as a source of law. In the earliest material, their rules often rest on nothing but their considered opinion (ra'y); their decision is recorded, but their reasoning is not explained. Stringent principles for the derivation of law soon made their appearance, however.

The science of the uṣūl al-fiqh proposed that the law must be derived from an ordered series of sources, of which most Sunni jurists eventually accepted four: (1) the Qur'an; (2) the sunna (the customary way of the Prophet Muhammad), which was understood to be preserved in the hadith (recorded reports about the Prophet's words and deeds); (3) consensus (ijmā'); and (4) legal analogy (qiyās) or the exhaustive independent consideration of a legal question (ijtihād). The idea of an ordered list of sources originated in the eighth century and is seen in checklists presented in instructions for judges. The first extant work of uṣūl al-fiqh, the Risala of Shafi'i (d. 820), presents a sophisticated system of legal hermeneutics, but his system is based on the idea that there is only one source of the law: revelation. Revelation includes both the Qur'an and the corpus of prophetic hadith, but to Shafi'i they combined to form a coherent whole. This is quite a bit different from the later four-source theory. Jurists writing after Shafi'i interpreted his work anachronistically, in some cases even rearranging the text in order to bring it in line with the later conventions of the uṣūl al-fiqh genre. As the four-source theory gained ground, "considered opinion" as a basis of the law was eclipsed and suppressed in favor of a stricter reliance on texts; "opinion" came to be associated with whim or wild speculation. It survived in a disciplined form as qiyās, analogical reasoning from a known, determined case to a similar, undetermined case, but some jurists continued to oppose that too.

Consensus is usually negative and retroactive: the lack of dissenting opinions over the past generation is a sign that consensus exists. The body of acceptable opinion is thus made up of two parts, consensus and disputed points (khilāf), both within a particular legal school and between them, for variant opinions are allowed on those points of law for which a consensus does not exist. Lists of the requirements of a master jurist often stress that he must be aware of areas of consensus in the law—this is similar to a call for the necessity of examining relevant precedent before deciding a case.

Madhhabs and Madrasas

Two institutions that contributed to making the law central to Islamic societies and creating continuity over space and time are the madhhab, or the legal school (in the sense of a tradition of legal study based on a stable body of doctrine), and the madrasa, or college of law. The circles behind the legal schools organized and regularized the transmission of legal knowledge and interpretive authority, which have survived until the present day, and their activities represent a significant step in the professionalization of the jurists as a class. They solidified in the course of the ninth and tenth centuries, and four Sunni schools survive to this day: the Hanafi, named after Abu Hanifa (d. 767); the Maliki, named after Malik b. Anas (d. 795); the Shafi'i, named after Shafi'i (d. 820); and the Hanbali, named after Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855). But there were others as well, including the Dawudi madhhab, named after its founder Dawud b. 'Ali b. Khalaf al-Isfahani (d. 884), which was also called the Zahiri madhhab on account of the principle of reliance on the prima facie reading (zâhir) of revealed proof texts, and the Jariri, named after Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923). In addition to these six, several non-Sunni legal schools arose. These included the Twelver Shi'i school, called the Imami madhhab, after their adherence to the teachings of their 12 imams, or Ja'fari, in reference to the sixth imam, Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765); the Zaydi Shi'i madhhab, named after the martyred rebel imam Zayd (d. 740); and the Ibadi Khariji school, named after 'Abdallah b. Ibad (d. 708), all of which were established by the 11th century, making nine in total. The Zahiri and Jariri schools had died out by the 12th century and were absorbed into the Shafi'i school, leaving the Imami, Zaydi, Ibadi, and the four well-known Sunni schools: Hanafi, Maliki, Shafi'i, and Hanbali. Isma'ili Shi'is developed their own legal tradition under the Fatimid caliphate (909–1171), chiefly in the work of the outstanding jurist Qadi al-Nu'man (d. 974), but their legal madhhab differs from the others in institutional terms because of continued access to and dependence on the teachings of an inspired imam. While the Shi'i and Khariji legal traditions preserved early doctrines that differed from those of the Sunni schools, such as the Twelver Shi'is' acceptance of mut'a or temporary marriage, the professionalization of the jurists as a class and the institution of the madhhab had the effect of making their systems of legal education and interpretation resemble those of the Sunnis more and more over time.

The main centers of formation of the schools were Fustat in Egypt and Baghdad in Iraq. The Hanafi school was supported by the Abbasid caliphs and associated with their rule until the late 12th century (when several caliphs adopted the Shafi'i school); later, it became the preferred school of all major Turkish dynasties, spreading in Central Asia, Anatolia, and India and in Syria and Egypt under the Ottomans. The Shafi'i school was strong in Iraq, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, and, later, Indonesia; that of the Malikis was strong in Egypt and dominant in North Africa, sub-Saharan Africa, and Andalus, where the Umayyad rulers supported it. The Hanbali school, more limited in scope, boasted adherents in some towns of Palestine, Syria, and Iraq. In modern times, it was chosen by adherents of the Wahhabi movement that grew in tandem with the Saudi state and through them became influential throughout the Islamic world. Iran was split between Hanafis and Shafi'is until the Safavids succeeded in converting most of the populace to Shi'i Islam. The remaining Sunnis—for the most part Kurds—are Shafi'is. The Twelver, Zaydi, and Khariji madhhabs developed primarily in Iraq and Baghdad in particular, gained ground during the Buyid period (945–1055), and spread to Iran and other areas from there. Madhhab allegiance has remained to this day a matter of region and has been influenced in many cases by political rule, illustrating the dictum that "people adopt the religion of their rulers."

The madrasa represents another milestone in the professionalization of the jurists. The madrasa originated in Khurasan—eastern Iran—in the tenth century and traveled west into Iraq, Syria, Egypt, North Africa and east into Central Asia, India, and beyond. It was an organization embodied in a physical building dedicated to legal education through the establishment of an endowment. Agricultural land or rental properties that produced an annual income were placed in a charitable endowment in perpetuity, and the funds were used to pay for the maintenance and upkeep of the building, for the salary of a law professor (mudarris), and for monthly stipends for law students. Like the European universities, such as that of Bologna, it grew out of the needs of out-of-town law students. Previously, many prominent jurists had taught their lessons in a mosque, and an adjacent inn provided convenient lodging for students who were not local. This often continued to be the case, but the madrasa combined these two functions: a typical madrasa was a two-story building with an open courtyard. Lessons would be held on the ground floor in alcoves designed for teaching purposes, and the upper floor served as a dormitory for the stipendiary students and sometimes the mudarris. By the late 11th century, a number of madrasas had been founded in Baghdad; the most impressive of them was the Nizamiyya, one of a series of such institutions founded by the famous Seljuq vizier Nizam al-Mulk. The Zengids and Ayyubids made the madrasa a prominent feature of the major cities of Syria and Egypt, where they spread its influence in the 12th century. It continued moving west, and the Marinids established numerous madrasas in Morocco in the 14th century. At the same time, madrasas also spread into Anatolia, Central Asia, India, and beyond.

The spread of the madrasa did not initially change the nature of legal study, for the curriculum, stages of study, and methods of teaching apparently remained the same. They did, however, serve visibly to increase the power and prestige of jurists by raising the status of the mudarris, and they increased societal support for legal education as a whole, especially on account of the stipends accorded to law students. In addition, they bolstered the institution of the legal school, since each madrasa was devoted to the teaching of the law according to a single school, with one law professor teaching stipendiary students belonging to the same school. Over time, the madrasa came to dominate legal education, and access to the judiciary came to be controlled primarily by the law professors, who would recommend their students to the chief judge of the district for patents of probity—essentially, a document from the local judge attesting that a student was of good character and had a clean moral record and was thus not barred from holding positions of legal responsibility—and then, probably, for the certificate of permission to teach law and grant legal opinions.

Legal Education and Careers

The study of the law in the 10th to 14th centuries was divided into three stages: preparatory studies, including Arabic grammar, rhetoric, and logic; the legal doctrine of the particular school to which one belonged, studied in epitomes; and the disputed points of the law, legal hermeneutics, and dialectic—the rules of legal debate. Advanced students often became the disciples of a master jurist, studying with him for many years and eventually composing a commentary called a ta'liqa, based on the lectures of the professor. In recognition that a student had completed his legal education, the master jurist conferred on him a diploma termed ijāzat al-tadrīs wa-l-ifta' (certificate to teach law and grant legal opinions). This diploma established the student's qualifications as a jurist or faqīh able to analyze legal questions, as a mufti or jurisconsult entitled to answer legal questions from the lay public, and as a scholar of law able to teach law students of his own.

One of the functions of the system of legal education was to provide legal experts to serve in the judiciary. At a low level, a scholar who had a good basic knowledge of the law and a patent of probity could obtain work as a private notary who drew up documents such as marriage, divorce, sales, and other contracts or as an official witness, notary, or clerk attached to a judge's court. A more experienced jurist could serve as a deputy judge and eventually as a judge in his own right. After the 11th century, more and more salaried positions as law professors (mudarris) or repetitors (mu'id, essentially an assistant professor) became available. Jurists who had a good knowledge of mathematics could also make a living as inheritance law experts (faraḍī), who, like notaries for marriage and divorce contracts, were often in high demand.

The relative ranking of the jurists within a given legal school in a city was generally known, though it was not official. A pecking order was established not only by debate, authorship, teaching, and serving as judges but also by the public activity of granting fatwas and endorsing, revising, correcting, or denouncing the fatwas of other jurists. The top living jurist within a given madhhab was termed ra'īs (chief) or foremost jurist. The hierarchy was theoretically independent of specific offices such as that of chief judge, but rank and office often tended to go together. The endowment deeds of a number of madrasas specified that the law professor at the madrasa should be the top Shafi'i legal scholar of the time. Related to this juristic hierarchy was the controversy over ijtihād. Theorists such as Yahya b. Sharaf Nawawi (d. 1277) wrote that the jurists were to be ranked according to various levels of ijtihād, often with one or more of the top ranks empty. While the texts of jurisprudence present this as a theoretical exercise about past jurists, it also reflects an understanding that contemporary jurists form a hierarchy of authority.

Rival Authorities

The legal schools served not only to establish regular methods of textual transmission and legal education but also to exclude other groups from participation in the elaboration of law. In the ninth and tenth centuries, the main contenders for religious authority among the scholars were the theologians (mutakallims). The jurists took the view that every believer should know a basic catechism: there is one God, the Prophet Muhammad is the messenger of God, the Qur'an is God's word, and so on. Beyond that, theology was necessary only to defend Islam from heretics, and an advanced knowledge of theology was not required for the populace at large or important for their daily lives and worship. The theologians, by contrast, held that the law merely treated details whereas theology dealt with the large, important questions. Mu'tazili theologians explicitly stated that the study of hadith and law were subordinate to the study of theology.

The conflict between the two groups, jurists and theologians, is nowhere more evident than in the miḥna (literally, trial, tribulation, often called "inquisition") of the mid-ninth century, in which the theologians in cooperation with the caliph Ma'mun and his successors sought to impose the doctrine that the Qur'an was created by God at a particular point in historical time (rather than being eternal) on the officials and prominent scholars of the empire. The theologians lost this battle, but they regained ground through the patronage of later rulers. By the tenth century, however, the legal schools had grown so powerful that the theologians had to declare allegiance to one of them in order to legitimate their scholarship. In general, the Mu'tazilis chose the Hanafi school, while the Ash'aris chose that of Shafi'i. A tenth-century Mu'tazili is said to have encouraged his students to join different schools in order to populate them all with proponents of Mu'tazilism. The Mu'tazili school of theology waned in the 11th and 12th centuries, and with it, the authority of theologians in general. It lived on in part in the Twelver and Zaydī Shi'i traditions, whose leading scholars were profoundly influenced by Mu'tazili theology between the 9th and 11th centuries, but in those traditions as well, religious authority came to be based on the study of law rather than theology. While theology continued to be an important Islamic science, it was relegated to a subordinate and ancillary position.

There was also some conflict between jurists and hadith experts. The ahl al-ḥadīth were scholars of reports concerning the words and deeds of the Prophet Muhammad, which they examined in order to determine his exemplary or normative behavior, or sunna. They believed that these rules determined the law for contemporary Muslims. They rejected the use of rational inquiry independent of such texts for the elaboration of the law, and they were able to maintain a distinct authority in the ninth and tenth centuries, compiling many legal works termed Sunan, which arranged hadith reports by legal chapter. Jurists who were more inclined to rational inquiry decried the ahl al-hadīth as uncritical, simple-minded collectors who were incapable of understanding the implications of the texts they transmitted. By the end of the 11th century, the hadith scholars had lost much of their former authority and came to be subsumed under the legal scholars. Signs of this development include statements that the fully qualified jurist need not have memorized hadith reports but should know where to look them up in standard reference works.

Other rivals of the jurists were the philosophers and Sufi masters (who were rivals themselves). Both groups tended to see themselves as elites, holding that their understanding of the world was only accessible to a few; those who were not adept at rational analysis (according to the philosophers) or not sensitive to the spiritual world of the unseen (according to the Sufis) could make do with following the dictates of the jurists and simply performing their religious obligations in the ordinary fashion. This identified the jurists as low-level leaders, somewhat like school teachers in relation to professors. The jurists responded by often denouncing the philosophers as unbelievers, but the Sufis were a more prevalent and persistent threat. Their claim to access to divine knowledge through paths other than study of the law threatened to undermine the jurists' authority, leading one 16th-century scholar to remark to a Sufi friend that the jurists and the Sufis were mentioned right next to each other in the Qur'an, in the verse that reads, "Are the two equal: those who know and those who do not know?" (Q. 39:9); he obviously took "those who know" to mean the legal scholars. The jurists did come to terms with Sufis who adhered to the law, and they often joined them, too, but they vigorously condemned those who claimed that the ordinary rules concerning religious obligations did not apply to them because they were in direct communion with the divine, often charging them with antinomianism—categorical disregard for the law—and belief in reincarnation and divine immanence. They also accused Sufis of vices such as laziness, excessive dependence on others, dancing and singing, and pederasty and tended to react adversely to their apparently blasphemous ecstatic statements. Fierce debates raged over the mystical poetry of Ibn al-Farid (d. 1235), which many jurists declared heretical. Defenders of the poetry, who also included jurists, insisted that one could not interpret the ecstatic and inspired statements of the Sufis literally, for the true meaning was incomprehensible to the uninitiated. Sufism has continued to be extremely influential in many areas in the Muslim world, and Sufi groups continue to risk conflicts with representatives of juristic authority, such as in Pakistan, where their shrines have been bombed by Salafi zealots, or in Iran, where the Islamic Republican government has disbanded several Sufi orders in the last decade.

Caliphs

The jurists' most important rivals in the first centuries were the caliphs, who claimed religious authority in legal and theological matters alike. The rivalry between them came to a head in the "inquisition" of the mid-ninth century, a battle that the caliphs lost along with the theologians. Nonetheless, they never lost their religious authority completely. They retained some room for maneuver through their control of the judiciary, the main institution that applied the law; the chief judges (qādī al-quḍāt) they appointed were prominent ideologues with authority throughout the empire and had tremendous influence on legal doctrine and practice. In the late 10th and early 11th centuries, the caliph Qadir (991–1031) made a number of attempts to enhance his religious authority and was particularly active in denouncing the public presence of Mu'tazili theology and Twelver and Isma'ili Shi'ism. In league with Hanbali and other conservative Sunni theologians, he repeatedly and publicly promulgated, in 1018 and subsequent years, the Qadiri Creed, a document that declared Mu'tazili and Shi'i theology heretical and prohibited debate with their scholars. His policy was continued by Qa'im, his son and successor. Even until the late Abbasid period, dynasts throughout the central Islamic lands regularly sought the caliph's recognition of their position and even his sanction for their military campaigns against the Byzantines and others. The idiosyncratic caliph Nasir (r. 1180–1225), who endeavored to revive the glory of the early Abbasid caliphate by placing himself at the pinnacle of all societal structures of authority, wrote four ijāzahs or certificates authorizing the activities of the four Sunni schools, granting one to the leading jurist of each one of them. Much later, in the Treaty of Kuchuk-Kainardja, signed in July 1774 between the Ottoman sultan Abdülhamid I (1774–89) and the Russian empress Catherine the Great (1762–96), the Ottomans recognized the independence of Crimea but insisted that the sultan remained the spiritual leader of the Tartars on the grounds that he was the caliph of the Muslims. This may be seen as a move to counter Russian and French claims to represent the cause of Christian minorities within the Ottoman Empire, similarly claiming jurisdiction over Muslims outside the official boundaries of Islamdom. Whatever the reasoning behind it, the condition nevertheless indicates a strong claim to religious authority on the part of the caliph many centuries after the heyday of the Abbasids.

As far as the caliph's relations with the jurists are concerned, it could be said that a compromise was reached whereby the jurists claimed direct jurisdiction over private law while recognizing the caliphs' (and eventually other rulers') control over public law; the jurists publicly supported the legitimacy of the government, while the rulers supported the jurists as a class. This was possible because the shari'a leaves large parts of the law relatively undeveloped, particularly public law (except for taxation, a constant bone of contention). Rulers thus had some freedom to act, and they imposed a wide variety of systems of civil, criminal, and even tax law throughout Islamic history. The most famous is the Qanun of the Ottoman sultans. Collected by Mehmed the Conqueror in the mid-15th century, this code was revised in 1501 and again in the mid-16th century by Sultan Süleiman; it dealt primarily with the organization of government and the military, taxation, and treatment of the peasantry.

Jurists periodically attempted to assert broader control, arguing that the ruler, even when acting on his own, was required to adhere closely to the dictates of the shari'a. They made such arguments in works under the generic rubric of siyāsa shar'iyya (public policy that conforms to the shari'a), including such works as al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (The book of governance according to the shari'a) by Ibn Taymiyya and al-Turuq al-Hukmiyya (Methods of rule) by Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya. Such works stressed the authority of the jurists as a professional class and the obligation of the caliph or ruler to heed their advice and carry out their dictates. They occasionally admitted that the caliph could decide legal questions on his own, but only if he were himself a qualified jurist.

Similarly, many premodern reform movements emphasized the importance of adherence to the law on the part of the ruler and/or the populace in general, or the necessity of ridding society of beliefs and practices that were inauthentic accretions contradicting the law in its pure form. Such movements included the Almohad movement that held sway in North Africa in the 12th and 13th centuries, the Wahhabi movement founded in central Arabia by Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab (d. 1792), the Sanusi movement in 19th-century Libya, the thought of Indian Muslim reformers such as Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi (d. 1624) and Shah Waliullah (d. 1762), and so on. The same logic led to public expressions of repentance and atonement on the part of rulers who promised to turn over a new leaf, giving up wine drinking, dancing girls, illegal taxes, and other un-Islamic practices. One dramatic example of this was the Edict of Sincere Repentance promulgated by the Safavid monarch Shah Tahmasp in 1556, in which he forswore not only alcohol and other vices but also the patronage of painting and other secular arts.

Judges and Muftis

Judges (qadis) theoretically arrived at their verdicts independently of outside interference, but they were appointed directly by the ruler, and thus in a sense they were his representatives and beholden to him. The position of judge was considered morally dangerous by many, not least of whom were the jurists themselves. A judge was often under considerable pressure to violate the law in order to enforce the ruler's will or justify his actions or those actions of influential and powerful viziers or army commanders, and stories abound of prominent scholars refusing the office in order to avoid such a predicament. Many jurists were also reluctant to accept a salary that could have been acquired through illegal taxes or through seizure or extortion. In addition, the office presented many opportunities for increasing one's income in less than honest ways. The judge and other court officials often lined their pockets by charging various fees for hearing cases and processing documents, not to mention by accepting gifts and bribes to influence the outcome of cases. A judge was often in charge of the property of orphans and other individuals who were wards of the court, lost property, unclaimed estates, and so forth and could divert funds for his own benefit or that of his accomplices. He often became the trustee of endowments, a position that usually paid 10 percent of the annual endowment income, or he could appoint relatives or friends as trustees or sell these positions for bribes or kickbacks. The same was true of various salaried positions funded by endowment income, such as professorships at madrasas and positions as Qur'an readers and imams at mosques. Many judges accumulated a large number of such endowed positions in the course of their career and had deputies carry out the duties associated with them. Perhaps the largest income, though, came from selling deputy judgeships for the various subdistricts within his territory. Aspiring judges were often ready to pay large sums for such deputyships because they knew they would be able to recoup their investment in a short time. In short, if they could stay in office for a considerable period, chief judges could accumulate vast fortunes, and it is likely that many appointees paid a huge fee or bribe to the ruler for the office. Indeed, the sums involved were so significant that the later Fatimid caliphs' urgent need for funds was provided, to a large extent by the payments involved in a rapid succession of appointments to the position of chief judge. A judge who remained unsullied by venality was deserving of comment.

Judges adjudicated cases that appeared before them but did not investigate and bring cases to trial unless a private citizen filed a suit. Another legal arm of the government was the muhtasib or "market inspector," who was in charge of inspecting weights and measures, preventing fraud in economic transactions, setting prices, and preventing hoarding and price gouging for basic commodities. He was also in charge of public morality and was responsible for closing down wine taverns and houses of ill repute. Also important were the shurta or police, who actively sought to prevent crime, investigate incidents of crime, and bring criminals to justice. Grievance courts were a standard feature of Islamic governments and were intended to be an avenue for the redress of wrongs committed by government officials and the like. This court was ideally presided over by the ruler himself, but a specific judge was often appointed to represent him. While the official appointed as judge of the grievance court was often a qualified jurist, he was not required to apply Islamic legal rules in a strict fashion and often had wide discretion to resolve disputes as he saw fit.

Jurisconsults (muftis) remained relatively freer of government control than judges, but eventually they too became government-appointed officials. Muftis were (and are) supposed to grant fatwas to lay Muslims on legal questions having to do with personal devotion, ritual practice, marital issues, commercial disputes, or other issues. Since such consultation should ideally be free of charge and accessible to all, Mirrors for Princes regularly suggest that the ruler should pay stipends to muftis so that they could carry out their service without asking for payment; from the 12th century onward, the Zengid, Ayyubid, and Mamluk rulers of Syria and Egypt provided state-appointed muftis to answer the legal questions of the public at large.

In tenth-century Khurasan, prominent jurists began to be recognized as the leading muftis of their cities, each one of them under the title of shaykh al-Islam (master of Islam). At first an informal position, it became an official government appointment in later centuries and spread throughout Iran, Central Asia, India, Anatolia, and then to Syria and Egypt. The shaykh al-Islam of the capital city came to wield enormous power and was viewed as the highest legal authority in the realm under such dynasties as the Ottomans, Safavids, Uzbeks, and Mughals. He not only answered thousands of petitions from the laity but also oversaw all the shaykhs al-Islam in the cities of the empire and sanctioned the policies and actions of the ruler. In the 16th century, the position of the Ottoman shaykh al-Islam was integrated fully into the government bureaucracy, and along with him the entire network of shaykhs al-Islam in provincial cities. Many Muslim states such as Egypt and Pakistan continue to appoint grand muftis who are responsible for answering questions of public import.

In the Twelver Shi'i system, the jurists successfully maintained more independence from the government, in part because they were less dependent on the income of endowments, which could more easily by confiscated or controlled by the government. Instead, the Shi'i scholarly establishment was supported by the payment of the khums (literally, "fifth"), an income tax paid by lay believers directly to the leading Shi'i scholars, which often crossed borders and remained inaccessible to rulers. Even though religious authority is understood to reside in the imam, the authority of Twelver jurists has grown steadily since the tenth century, when the Twelfth Imam was said to have gone into occultation. In 874 the 11th imam died in Samarra, Iraq. A series of four representatives maintained contact with his son, the Twelfth Imam, who remained in hiding, during a period known as the Lesser Occultation. In 941 the last of the four representatives died without designating a successor, and it was held that the Twelfth Imam was now in Greater Occultation: ordinary communication with the Twelfth Imam was cut off, as he circulated incognito among the believers. Since then, Twelver jurists gradually arrogated to themselves many of the prerogatives of the Twelfth Imam, making ever-stronger claims concerning their own religious authority. In the 13th century, they accepted the concept of ijtihād, claiming the exclusive right to determine the correct rulings on legal questions through legal study and investigation. In the 16th century, the theory developed that the leading jurists' authority derived from the fact that they had been designated the general representatives of the Hidden Imam. A hierarchy was established among the jurists in which the top rank is occupied by a marja' al-taqlid (reference for adoption of opinions), who serves as an authority for lay believers and is now termed āyat allāh 'uzmā (a greater sign of God). This process culminates in Ayatollah Khomeini's theory of the comprehensive authority of the jurist (wilāyat al-faqth), according to which the leading jurist is actually responsible for political rule, which goes against the theories of many earlier Shi'i legal thinkers, who argue that certain prerogatives of the Hidden Imam, such as direct political rule, the conduct of jihad, taxation, and the establishment of Friday prayer, are in abeyance until he reveals himself.

The Law and the Family

Unsurprisingly, the shari'a assumes a patriarchal system in which the head of the family is male. Paternity determines what family one belongs to, and in Sunni law a person's male agnatic relatives form part of the extended family. The law of inheritance grants them the remnant of the estate when it is not exhausted by the fixed shares (a rule rejected in Shi'i law), and they are also responsible for paying blood money for injury or death (except in Hanafi law). Laws regarding child custody are based on the premise that the natural allegiance of a child is to the father's side of his or her family, and custody always reverts to the father even though very young children may remain with their mothers temporarily.

Men are generally dominant over women. While men and women are held to believe in the same way and to have roughly equal religious obligations, one may argue that in a blunt, practical sense, a woman's value is half that of a man of similar status. According to the traditional system of blood money payments, which likely goes back to pre-Islamic customs in pagan Arabia, a free Muslim woman is worth 50 camels, exactly one-half the price of a free Muslim man and equal in value to a Jewish or Christian male or a male slave. Similarly, a daughter's share of inheritance from her parents is half that of a son, and the testimony of a woman in court is worth one-half of the testimony of a man. Nevertheless, women have many rights under Islamic law, including the right to own and dispose of property without the interference of their husbands, something that women in Western societies did not have until quite recently. Husbands are required to pay for the food, shelter, clothing, and upkeep of their wives and children, while wives are not required to use any of their own property or income, even if it is vast, to support the family.

Slavery is accepted as a legitimate institution, though there are rules for the humane treatment of slaves, and slaves are not merely property but also individual agents. They can be Muslims and have the same religious obligations as other Muslims, such as fasting and regular prayer. They may marry and they may own property, though, technically, until they gain their freedom, their property belongs to their master. Many apologists claim that Islam set out to abolish slavery gradually, basing this idea on the Qur'anic verses that urge emancipation of slaves as a means to atone for infractions of religious obligations.

All free men are generally awarded the same rights and duties, but there are a few exceptions. The law of marriage equality (kafā'a, literally, "suitability") stated that a man had to be of appropriate status to marry a woman of high status and could be used to annul the marriage of an heiress who ran off with a servant or the local butcher. Some held that a non-Arab was not a suitable partner for an Arab woman, nor an ordinary man for a woman descended from the Prophet. The descendants of the Prophet (termed sayyids or sharifs) are also distinguished from other Muslims in some other respects, but the vast respect they enjoyed in medieval Muslim society had little to do with the law.

Modernity

During the 19th and 20th centuries, most of the Islamic world came under the direct rule of colonial powers, especially France and Britain but also Holland, Italy, Portugal, and Russia (later the Soviet Union). Colonial rule and the modern nation-states that followed in the mid-20th century had far-reaching effects on the law enforced in those areas. From 1850 onward the traditional legal system was increasingly replaced by codes based on European models, and traditional Islamic law was largely restricted to ritual, family, and inheritance law. With the new codes came a system of law depending on constitutions, codes, and statutes, together with a new system of secular legal education and a new class of legal professionals; Saudi Arabia was the only country to have a shari'a court system in 2011. The jurists in the traditional system lost their monopoly on organized education and saw their social power and status plummet. In nearly every nation in the Muslim world, the endowment properties that had funded most of the institutions of Islamic legal education were confiscated by the colonial powers and then the modern nation-state. Most members of the class of jurists, including the top religious authorities, became government employees.

In colonial India, the British sought to apply the law of the various religious communities to their members and thereby prevent the unfair imposition of Hindu law on Muslims, so that they created "Anglo-Muhammadan law" for the Muslims. In so doing, they inadvertently turned Islamic law into code law, for they chose the Hanafi work al-Hidaya by Burhan al-Din al-Marghinani (d. 1197) for the administration of Hanafi Muslims in India, translated it into English, and used it as the nearly exclusive reference for Islamic law. Similar developments occurred in Dutch Indonesia and elsewhere.

The modern period witnessed many attempts to change Islamic law and debates about how it could be done. Muslim reformers such as Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) and Rashid Rida (d. 1935) argued for modern jurists' freedom to adapt rules from other legal schools to those of their own, a process called talfiq (piecing together). A prominent example of talfiq put into practice was the use of principles borrowed from Maliki law to reform the Hanafi law of divorce in the Anglo-Muhammadan legal system. Another method was takhayyur, granting jurists the freedom to choose from all the opinions found in the traditional corpus, including those of other schools and minority views within one's own. This generated the new field of fiqh muqāran (comparative law), the study of similar issues across the different schools.

Others argued for a rethinking of the hermeneutics of Islamic law, generally presented as a form of ijtihād, which takes on here a new sense allowing traditional rules to be set aside and permitting those with secular education to participate. Muhammad 'Abduh argued that laws should change with the times and the conditions of the societies to which they apply; since reason and revelation are intended to be in harmony, independent rational inquiry should be used to revise and reform the law as needed. Many liberal proposals have involved the rejection or limitation of one or more of the "sources" on which law was based. 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq (d. 1966) and others argued for the rejection or limitation of consensus; some, such as the Shi'i thinker Murtada Mutahhari (d. 1979), denounced qiyās; Ahmed Mansour, leader of the contemporary Ahl al-Qur'an movement in Egypt, has argued for the rejection of hadith, seeking the law in the Qur'an alone; and some would even limit the sources to the suras, or chapters of the Qur'an, revealed at Mecca (which would yield almost complete freedom, since they contain practically no legislation). Radical proposals of this sort have met with limited success and have often been vehemently rejected.

Strategies for reform that do not throw out any of the traditional bases of the law but rather urge an emphasis on lesser-known aspects of medieval Islamic legal hermeneutics have met with better acceptance from traditional legal authorities. Proponents of these strategies have championed a more expansive and aggressive use of the concepts of public interest (maṣlaha) or "the objectives of the law" (maqāṣid al-sharī'a). Frequent recourse is also had to the traditional principle of al-barā'a al-aṣlīyya (original permissibility), according to which something is considered permissible unless a text states that it is not.

Political Islam

The late 20th century has called for the application rather than change of the shari'a that multiplied throughout the Muslim world, becoming the basis for myriad political campaigns, resistance movements, and even revolutions. This is usually seen as a response to the failure of secular nation-states to keep up with the economic aspirations of Muslim populations, and it was also seen as an attempt to return to culturally authentic forms of government, social organization, and regulation of public behavior in the face of a perceived cultural invasion from the West. Drawing on leftist anticolonialist thinkers from Europe, the new leaders couched their push for the application of the shari'a in terms of a resistance struggle, believing that the shari'a would guarantee social and economic justice by replacing despotic, self-interested rulers with pious officials reined in by the revealed law. Khomeini and many other activists stressed the corruption and predatory nature of the secular rulers in the Islamic world, who were enriching themselves at the expense of the Muslim populace and not using oil wealth and other resources to improve the lot of the common people, something they claimed a return to Islamic law would change. Modern reformers and activists claim that Islamic law provides an answer to all possible questions, an idea captured in the common slogan al-Islām huwa al-ḥall (Islam is the solution).

In a number of ways, these calls for the implementation of shari'a are quite different from the periodic insistence of premodern reform movements that the ruler should adhere strictly to the sacred law; they cannot be interpreted as pure traditionalism, for the Muslim world has irrevocably changed. The modern, bureaucratic nation-state exerts a level of invasive control over the populace that its premodern precursors never had; modern education and administration have depersonalized the context in which the law used to be studied and applied. Just as the veils required for women in Iran do not resemble those worn by their precolonial counterparts, so the Islamic regime imposed on them differs starkly from a traditional Islamic state. Similarly, when Zia-ul-Haq (d. 1988) undertook a series of Islamizing reforms to appease Islamists in Pakistan, including a new law that required banks to deduct zakat automatically, this was something unprecedented in Islamic history. In addition,

Western concept categories and modes of thought have indelibly affected those of Muslims, who are reacting to this "colonization of their minds" by seeking their identity in Islam. Jihad, traditionally a duty to expand and defend the borders of the Islamic world, is now understood as part of a broader defense of Muslims against cultural imperialism.

The urge to find culturally authentic forms is prominent in the continuing attempts to apply Islamic law to modern economic institutions, including corporations, bank accounts, mortgages, stock exchanges, and insurance of all kinds, throughout the Islamic world. These present a challenge for several reasons. The corporation, an economic entity that can act as a fictional person, does not exist in Islamic law, which assumes that all economic actors are individuals, partnerships, or agents for individuals or partners. Islamic law traditionally forbids both the taking and payment of interest, termed ribā. It forbids the unequal assumption of risk, such as the buying or selling of something the value of which is unknown because of contingency for a fixed price, as this is akin to gambling. It is understood in medieval legal texts that one lends money as a favor or act of piety in order to help a fellow believer and should expect no profit in return. This created, and continues to create, an economic problem, as the use of loans is a necessary part of any economic system. One avenue of reinterpretation of the traditional laws is to argue that ribā in the Qur'an and hadith did not refer to all interest but rather to exorbitant interest or usury, so that reasonable interest is excluded from the prohibition. For bank accounts, theorists have often resorted to the concept of muḍāraba, a type of sleeping or limited partnership, whereby the account holder essentially shares in the profit of the bank's investments. Of course, this arrangement is often understood to require, though, that the interest rate not be fixed and that the account holder lose money if the bank's investments are not profitable. Similar shari'a-compliant banking and financial instruments have become a major area of investigation and legal innovation and interpretation, and economic globalization is having an enormous effect on traditional business structures, from halal pizza chains to banking conglomerates and multinational corporations.

The calls for the application of shari'a have had major political effects starting in the 1970s, when the Egyptian and Syrian Constitutions were amended to name Islamic law as their basis. The Iranian Revolution of 1979 and the subsequent establishment of the Islamic Republic was a watershed, for they proved that it was possible to topple a secular regime and replace it with a theocratic Islamic one. It was also in 1979 that Zia-ul-Haq began his Islamicizing reforms, establishing benches charged with delivering verdicts in accordance with Islamic law, reviving the amputation of the hand for theft; the stoning of married adulterers; the flogging of unmarried fornicators; and a fine of 5,000 rupees or imprisonment, or both, for Muslims who sold or drank alcohol. He also instituted a blasphemy law prohibiting disparagement of the Prophet, his family, his Companions, and other prominent symbols of Islam; forbade the Ahmadis to call themselves Muslims or use Islamic rituals; and prosecuted Shi'is and Pakistani Christians under the blasphemy law. These laws remain on the books.

Forms of the shari'a have likewise been instituted in Saudi Arabia, Iran, Sudan, Northern Nigeria, and Afghanistan, where Mulla Muhammad 'Umar, the leader of the Taliban movement, became de facto head of state during Taliban rule (1996–2001), styling himself Commander of the Faithful. All these cases of Islamization of the law are primarily symbolic, focusing on visible issues associated with Muslim identity and morality such as women's clothing in public and the enforcement of ḥudūd punishments. Entire new codes of law have not been introduced. Even in Iran, where an ideologically based theocratic regime is in place and new legislation is checked for violation of the shari'a by the Council of Experts, the laws already on the books remain unchanged until they are challenged for some other reason.

Calls to implement the shari'a meet with resistance from various quarters, including women's organizations and advocates of human rights and religious freedom. Muslim minorities such as Shi'is in Afghanistan and Pakistan or Baluchi and Kurdish Sunnis in Iran have in fact been subject to regular abuse by regimes intent on applying shari'a law, and Coptic Christians look upon the application of shari'a in Egypt with some trepidation, since it threatens to strip them of gains they made under colonial regimes and later nation-states in favor of the restrictions associated with dhimmī status. Indeed, their perception is that their Muslim compatriots are already treating them according to many of the medieval rules associated with dhimmī status, even though this contradicts the Egyptian Constitution and other laws.

Discussions of the merits or flaws of Islamic law often suffer from a failure to distinguish between several levels of what may be held to represent "Islam" or Islamic legal rules, conflating (1) what is stated in the Qur'an, (2) what is stated in the legal works of one or more legal schools, (3) the idealized or exemplary behavior of Muslims, (4) the actual or nonexemplary behavior of Muslims, and (5) local customs in a particular area inhabited by Muslims, which often diverge from Islamic law. In some cases, the problems do not arise from the law itself but rather from the way it functions. For example, Islamic law provides a wife with a right to her entire dower (mahr), including any deferred amount, in case of a divorce initiated by the husband. Requiring a large deferred dower in the contract is a way for a bride's family to provide a sort of divorce insurance for her or to provide for her significant wealth to support herself in case divorce actually occurs. In practice, though, a husband who decides to divorce his wife but does not wish to pay an enormous deferred mahr to her may simply mistreat her until she promises to relinquish her claim to the mahr in exchange for being released from the marriage. Ensuring that the law function as it should is a problem whatever the legal system may be.

Throughout Islamic history, the shari'a has played a crucial role in defining Islam, determining the boundaries of Islamic orthodoxy and shaping societal institutions, including political rule. Its hegemony has not been total, however, and it has had to contend with and adapt to other systems of thought and social and political organization. The impact of colonialism and the rise of the secular nation-state in the Islamic world did much to limit the purview of the shari'a, and some observers in the 20th century imagined that its influence, along with that of religion in general, would steadily decline. However, the failure of secular nationalisms to support steady material progress and to keep up with the expectations of the populace led to a turn toward religion, and adherence to the shari'a became a key component of identity politics in the modern Muslim world. It is bound to remain an important feature of political movements in Muslim nations that stress cultural authenticity and independence in the face of Western political, economic, and cultural dominance. The shari'a, though, is not a monolithic and static category: governments are defining and applying it in diverse ways, and modern thinkers are revising and formulating its concrete rules and its hermeneutic methods, drawing both on the rich historical legacy of Islamic legal thought and on Western theories and legal models.

See also authority; caliph, caliphate; family; judge; jurisprudence; madrasa; punishment

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Speaking in God's Name: Islamic Law, Authority and Women, 2001; Norman Calder, "Al-Nawawi's Typology of Muftis and Its Significance for a General Theory of Islamic Law," Islamic Law and Society 3, no. 2 (1996): 137–64; Wael B. Hallaq, A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunni Uṣūl al-Fiqh, 1997; Idem, An Introduction to Islamic Law, 2009; Idem, The Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Idem, Shari'a: Theory, Practice, Transformations, 2009; Colin Imber, Ebu's-Su'ud: The Islamic Legal Tradition, 1997; George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges, 1981; Muhammad Khalid Masud, Brinkley Messick, and David S. Powers, eds., Islamic Legal Interpretation: Muftis and their Fatwas, 2005; Christopher Melchert, The Formation of the Sunni Schools of Law, 9th–10th Centuries, 1999; Joseph Schacht, An Introduction to Islamic Law, 1964; Idem, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, 1950; Devin J. Stewart, Islamic Legal Orthodoxy: Twelver Shiite Responses to the Sunni Legal System, 1998; Knut S. Vikør, Between God and Sultan: A History of Islamic Law, 2005; Bernard Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998; Roland Knyvet Wilson, A Digest of Anglo-Muhammadan Law, 1895.

DEVIN J. STEWART

Shari'ati, 'Ali (1933–77)

Known as one of the major ideologues of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 'Ali Shari'ati was influential in channeling much of the revolutionary fervor of a large segment of the Iranian youth at the intersection of Islam and mostly leftist Western ideologies.

Shari'ati was born in the northeastern town of Mazinan, close to Mashhad (Iran) on November 24, 1933. His father, Muhammad-Taqi Mazinani Shari'ati, was strongly influenced by the intellectual and political currents of his time and attempted to merge his traditional understanding of Islam with new ideas such as those espoused by the secular critic of religion, Ahmad Kasravi, or the concepts of social justice and equality promoted by the Tudeh party. The result was a highly unorthodox vision of Islam that drove Shari'ati's father toward secular teaching instead of membership in the clergy. He was instrumental in founding the Center for the Propagation of Islamic Truths (Qanun-i Nashr-i Haqa'iq-i Islami), where he held his first lectures while still a high school student in Mashhad.

Shari'ati's formative years coincided with a period of political unrest in Iran. While he was strongly influenced by the nationalist movement of Prime Minister Mohammad Mossadeq, he remained rooted in the religious culture of his youth. This ambivalence was to remain with Shari'ati and become one of his trademarks. During those years, Shari'ati also came into contact with the Movement of God-Worshipping Socialists (Nahdat-i Khoda Parastan-i Socialist), an organization founded in 1945 among university students. According to this movement, socialism, strong religious sentiments, and nationalism need not be mutually exclusive. Islam is seen by this movement as an internationalist idea that provides the philosophical underpinnings of socialism as an economic system and a frame of reference for social action, picturing an authentic, progressive, and liberating Shi'ism. Shari'ati's later writings are strongly influenced by this revolutionary sociopolitical program that was deeply anchored in Islamic culture, while simultaneously discarding Islamic ritual and quietism associated with the traditional religious establishment.

Shari'ati enrolled at the Teacher's Training College of Mashhad in 1950 and subsequently worked as a teacher for several years. In 1955, he began to study literature at Mashhad University. Even before entering the university, Shari'ati had joined a student cell of Mahmud Taleqani's National Resistance Movement (Nahdat-i Muqawamat-i Milli), which had evolved by 1954 into the Iranian People's Party (Hizb-i Mardim-i Iran). At the university, he became involved in clandestine propaganda activities and was known as a political agitator. But he also expanded his writing activities and published a translation of Abu Dharr al-Ghifari's (d. 652) philosophies by a contemporary Egyptian writer, 'Abdul-Hamid Jawdat al-Sahhar, which laid the cornerstone of Shari'ati's own line of thinking. By his own admission, he was so intrigued by Abu Dharr, who was an early convert to Islam remembered for his strict piety, that he interspersed the translation with his own comments and reflections and finally published the text in 1955 under the title Abu Dharr al-Ghifari, the God-worshipping Socialist, a clear reference to the movement he had joined some years back. He molded the historical person Abu Dharr to suit his own time, making him the first "Islamic socialist" who aided the downtrodden, stood up for the authentic meaning of Islam, and became the first martyr to his convictions. Shari'ati's take on Abu Dharr is symptomatic of his subsequent method of work: ahistorical, nonmethodological, and using conceptual transformations to suit his own needs. In addition to translations of Arabic and Western books—among them a Farsi rendition of Frantz Fanon's The Wretched of the Earth—Shari'ati started his prolific publishing of political treatises as well as mystical, autobiographical writings. Among the political treatises he wrote and published was a series called The Median School of Islam (Maktab-i Wasita-i Islam), in which he praised Islam as a third option between communism and capitalism.

From 1959 to 1964, Shari'ati pursued his studies at the Sorbonne on a state scholarship, attaining a doctorate in 1964 in Persian literature (not in sociology, as is often mistakenly assumed). His stay in France was intellectually formative in that he became acquainted with the Western political, sociological, and philosophical currents of the day. In addition, he joined the Union of Iranian Students in France and the Confederation of Iranian Students in Europe and the United States and thus became involved in the budding Iranian exile politics against the Pahlavi regime.

Upon his return to Iran, Shari'ati was detained for a short period of time. After he was released, he worked as a teacher and finally lectured at the Department of History at Mashhad University in the spring of 1966, thanks to the intervention of some influential academic personalities. Soon he established a reputation as a charismatic orator and innovative teacher, and his students were intrigued by his blend of scientific Western methods and Islamic principles. He presented ideal Islam as an egalitarian, democratic, and revolutionary ideology. Transcripts of his course notes were distributed and eventually collected in 1969 under the title Islamshinasi. This collection found its way to intellectual circles in Tehran, where it was hotly debated. His popularity aroused the suspicion of the regime, and in 1968 he was dismissed from the university. He started to lecture both openly and clandestinely until he found his forum at the newly built religious institute Husseiniye-ye Ershad in Tehran, where he drew increasing numbers of listeners from the educated, urban middle class. In November 1972, Husseiniye-ye Ershad was closed on the grounds of subversive activities against the interests of the state, and Shari'ati went into hiding. Following periods of detainment and house arrest, he finally managed to leave Iran and died under suspicious circumstances in Southampton, England, shortly afterward on June 18, 1977.

Most of Shari'ati's immense written output was originally delivered in the form of speeches and often lacks coherence and defies classification. Yet these writings provide an easily understandable blueprint for action clothed in known Shi'i terminology and affirm cultural self-assertion. Those concepts that were instrumental in mobilizing large and diverse segments for revolutionary change refer to the role of martyrdom (jihād wa-shahādat); the revolutionary participation of women (Fatima Fatima ast); the distinction between a quietist, ritualistic Shi'ism and one that is the vehicle for revolution (tashayyu'-i safawī wa-tashayyu'-i 'alavī); and the all-important issue of personal choice and individual responsibility that accords more importance to the intellectual and makes the intervention of the clergy obsolete. Thus, while Shari'ati eased the way for the advent of the Islamic Revolution, his ideas differ markedly from Ruhollah Khomeini's concept of the "guardianship of the jurist" (wilāyat al-faqīh) in which the clergy play the dominant role in fulfilling the vision of a theocratic Islamic Republic. Shari'ati remains a controversial personality. His critics on the Left dismiss his ideology for its lack of scientific reasoning and reliance on "metaphysics"—a synonym for religious thinking in leftist circles. The religious establishment, on the other hand, voices its objections to Shari'ati's unorthodox Islamic interpretations and the negative role he assigned to the clergy.

See also Iran; revival and reform; revolutions; Shi'ism; socialism

Further Reading

S. Akhavi, Religion and Politics in Contemporary Iran: Clergy-State Relations in the Pahlavi Period, 1980; H. E. Chehabi, Iranian Politics and Religious Modernism: The Liberation Movement of Iran under the Shah and Khomeini, 1990; H. Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundations of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 2006; A. Rahnema, An Islamic Utopian, 2000; A. Shari'ati, Collected Works in 35 Volumes, 1984–90.

SCHIRIN H. FATHI

al-Shawkani, Muhammad b. ʿAli (1760–1834)

A scholar, judge, and reformer who played a central role in the Sunnification of the Zaydi imamate and the religious landscape in Yemen, Shawkani is also important for his influence on modern Salafis, who praise him for abandoning Zaydi Shi'ism, for rejecting the authority of the established schools of law (madhhab), and for his originalist interpretation of the Qur'an and the hadith, the sources of revelation. Shawkani is the last great figure in the Sunni- and hadith-oriented lineage of scholars that emerged in Yemen with Muhammad b. Ibrahim al-Wazir (d. 1436) and is a prominent authority for the Salafi version of Islam that is promoted by the modern state in Yemen. His oeuvre, which includes over two hundred titles in numerous Islamic fields, relies heavily on the teachings of Sunni traditionists (ahl al-hadīth), including Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn al-Qayyim but also Ibn Hajar al-'Asqalani. He advocated a revamping of Islamic law; in particular he condemned taqlīd, or the strict adherence to the established opinions of the schools of law. Shawkani strongly believed that Muslims should systematically practice independent judgment (ijtihād) for obtaining rulings and opinions, and his methodology stresses the explicit meaning of the texts of revelation (i.e., Qur'an and sunna). He saw in ijtihād a panacea for the ills that afflicted the Muslim community, which he argued were due to having distanced itself from the principal sources of law. In his interpretive method, Shawkani can be considered a radical in that he rejected the principle of juristic consensus (ijmā') and most forms of analogical reasoning (qiyās) while claiming that his methodology obtained greater certainty of God's will and therefore had greater authoritativeness. He dismissed speculative theology (kalām) and reason-based arguments as idle talk and was a staunch Salafi in matters of creed.

Shawkani's most widely referenced book is his hadith-based legal manual titled Nayl al-Awtar fi Sharh Muntaqa al-Akhbar (Attaining the aims in commenting on the choicest traditions). Modern Salafis favor it because it provides proof texts from the hadith corpus for its legal opinions. He also wrote an influential work on legal theory titled Irshad al-Fuhul (Guidance to the luminaries), a biographical dictionary titled al-Badr al-Tali (The rising moon), and a commentary on the Qur'an titled al-Fath al-Qadir (Victory of the Almighty), as well as numerous shorter treatises on a panoply of topics. In Yemen his most controversial work is a detailed legal critique of Zaydi law titled al-Sayl al-Jarrar (The raging torrent), in which Shawkani undermines the canonical legal manual of the school, Kitab al-Azhar (The book of flowers). His books, especially those on the Qur'an and on hadith-based law, continue to be taught widely throughout the Muslim world.

For modern Muslim reformers, Shawkani is a towering figure not only because of his powerful criticism of the failings of the scholastic tradition and synthetic style but also because of his successful reformist project in Yemen. The dominant tradition in 18th-century highland Yemen was Zaydism, one of the branches of Shi'ism. Shawkani made the case that many Zaydi theological and legal teachings had no basis in revelation but rather consisted of the unsubstantiated opinions of the imams and therefore had to be rejected. By the mid-18th century, Yemen was ruled by a dynasty of imams called the Qasimis, who supported scholars like Shawkani because he legitimized their dynastic form of rule while at the same time he managed the state's judicial apparatus as chief judge. In contrast with the Zaydi insistence that the state be ruled by a qualified imam and that unjust rulers be removed forcibly if necessary, Shawkani favored a quietist political posture that favored obedience even to one who lacked the qualifications enumerated in Zaydi law. As chief judge from 1795 until 1834, Shawkani instituted his reformist project and placed many of his students in positions of influence, who then carried on his intellectual legacy into the early 21st century. With the state favoring scholars with this Sunni orientation, the Zaydis were unable to stop the influence of Shawkani and his hadith-centered students and followers. The Zaydis continue to insist that their imams, as members of the Prophet's family, are more authoritative sources for religious teachings than the Sunni canonical hadith collections on which Shawkani's interpretive methodology is so heavily focused.

Zaydis saw Shawkani as seeking to destroy Zaydism in order to create a legal school and sect in the tradition of the Salafis or the ahl al-hadith. The modern Yemeni state has indeed pursued an anti-Zaydi policy and justifies this under the broad label of Islamic reform and by invoking Shawkani's teachings. Shawkani also had a profound influence on the ahl al-hadith on the Indian subcontinent in the 19th century, especially on scholars such as Siddiq Hasan Khan of Bhopal, and Shawkani's views and works remain influential in Saudi Arabia and wherever else Salafis are to be found.

See also revival and reform; Salafis; Yemen

Further Reading

Husayn 'Abdullah Al-'Amri, The Yemen in the 18th & 19th Centuries, 1985; Ahmad Dallal, "Appropriating the Past: Twentieth Century Reconstruction of Pre-Modern Islamic Thought," Islamic Law and Society 7, no. 3 (2000); Bernard Haykel, Revival and Reform in Islam: The Legacy of Muhammad al-Shawkani, 2003.

BERNARD HAYKEL

al-Shaybani, Muhammad b. al-Hasan (749–805)

Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Shaybani was an early Muslim jurist who was the most important progenitor of the Hanafi school of law. His father is said to have been a non-Arab mawlā or client of the Arab tribe of Shayban from Upper Mesopotamia who moved to Damascus, enlisted there in the Umayyad army, and was stationed at Wasit in Iraq, where Shaybani was born. Shaybani himself chose a different career as a student of Muslim religious knowledge. At an early age, he immigrated to the Muslim metropolis of Kufa and later to its great successor and the capital of the Abbasid caliphate, Baghdad. As one of the main early jurists of the Iraqi school of law, Shaybani is said to have been the student of its eponymous founder, Abu Hanifa (699–767), but this is barely possible, as Abu Hanifa was unavailable—in prison—from 763, when Shaybani was only about 14 years old. Rather, Shaybani was the student of Abu Yusuf (732–98), Sufyan al-Thawri (716–78), and Awza'i (706–74). Shaybani also studied for three years with Malik b. Anas (712–95), the great exponent of the Madinan school of law, taking from him his legal compendium al-Muwatta' (The trodden path), of which Shaybani produced his own version. Shaybani also produced a highly polemical work, Kitab al-Hujja 'ala ahl al-Madina, in which he defined his own Iraqi school's legal positions against those of the Medinan school.

Politically, Shaybani is almost always portrayed together with the caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809). In 792, Rashid asked him for a religious approval that would permit the caliph to execute an 'Alid rebel who had been given a promise of safety in exchange for surrendering, but Shaybani refused, and his opinion was hence ignored by the caliph. Nonetheless, when the caliph left for the Syrian town of Raqqa in 796, he summoned Shaybani to accompany him and to serve as judge, which Shaybani did until Rashid dismissed him in 803. It is probably this service with the caliph that led to Shaybani being described as chief judge (qādī al-qudāt), a position that had not yet been clearly defined. Shaybani then returned to Baghdad, but in 805 he was again summoned by the caliph to accompany him to Khurasan. Shaybani, however, died on the way, in the city of Rayy, which is modern Tehran. It is clear that Rashid respected Shaybani and that Shaybani found serving the caliph acceptable. However, that did not stop Shaybani from sometimes opposing the caliph.

The writings attributed to Shaybani are extensive and indeed probably more voluminous than all other Muslim writings produced until his time combined. One of his most important works is his Kitab al-Siyar (The great book on the rules of war), the earliest Muslim treatise on foreign relations, including laws of war and peace. Despite his obvious interest in the state, Shaybani's works are still surprising for assigning a limited role to the state and especially the ruler, who nevertheless makes the decisions about war and peace. Still, it is clear that the idea of the independence of the religious scholar from the ruler was cultivated by Shaybani, despite his close ties to Rashid.

Shaybani also played a significant role as teacher and informant to Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi'i, the founder of the Shafi'i school of law. In particular, his writings emphasize that traditions traceable to the Prophet Muhammad are the strongest legal proofs after the Qur'an, a feature incorporated by Shafi'i into his famous legal principles (uṣūl).

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Abu Hanifa (699–767); Abu Yusuf (ca. 731–98); jurisprudence; al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820)

Further Reading

Muhammad b. al-Hasan Shaybani, The Islamic Law of Nations: Shaybānī's Siyar, translated by Majid Khadduri, 1966; Idem, The Kitāb al-Āthār of Imam Abū Hanīfah, translated by Abdassamad Clarke, 2006; Idem, The Muwaṭṭa' of Imam Muhammad, translated by Mohammed Abdurrahman and Abdus Samad Clarke, 2004; Idem, The Shorter Book on Muslim International Law, translated by Mahmood Ahmad Ghazi, 1998.

KHALID YAHYA BLANKINSHIP

shaykh, pīr

The Arabic term "shaykh" and the Persian term pīr both have the principal meaning of a person of advanced age, generally older than 50 years. This primary meaning has been extended to a secondary meaning of "master," and especially "spiritual master," by virtue of the fact that one may become a master only after a lifetime of work. It is also an honorific title given to one's teacher or mentor. The most common social context of both shaykh and pīr is in the hierarchy of Sufism. In this case, the shaykh/pīr is one who has traveled the mystical path (ṭarīqa) and mastered its various states (aḥwāl) and stations (maqāmāt). Once an individual has mastered the path and is qualified to teach the doctrines of Sufism to novices and train them, he or she takes on the title shaykh/pīr (shaykha in the case of women).

The training of novices may take many forms. The shaykh/pīr might assign the novice spiritual exercises, litanies, prayers, or chants to be performed under the shaykh's guidance. In other instances, the shaykh/pīr may assign the novice seemingly degrading tasks in order to inculcate humility in the novice and conquer the ego-self. In all cases the novice is meant to follow the directives of his or her shaykh/pīr without question and bind himself or herself to the master. This is exemplified in the well-known Sufi aphorism, "The novice should be in the hands of the shaykh as a corpse in the hands of the mortician." This master–disciple relationship became one of the more distinctive elements of Sufism, the importance of which can be gleaned from another aphorism, "One who does not have a shaykh takes Satan for his shaykh." As Sufi practices became increasingly institutionalized after the 11th century, Sufis began to differentiate between shaykh al-ta'līm and shaykh al-tarbiya. The former refers to "the teaching shaykh," or a master who conveys general knowledge of the Sufi path to many individuals, while the latter refers to "the training shaykh," a master who takes on disciples and personally trains them in the Sufi way.

The institutionalization and organization of Sufism after the 11th century would have significant consequences for the Sufi shaykh/pīr. With the emergence of formal, organized brotherhoods, the shaykh/pīr became the spiritual leader of large groups of people, which attracted the attention of political rulers. While most shaykhs and pīrs were not directly involved in politics, a number of examples highlight the political potential of the shaykh/pīr.

By the 11th century, Seljuq authorities were patronizing and supporting influential Sufi shaykhs by building and endowing hospices (khawānīq, sing. khānaqāh) for them and their students. The Ayyubid and Mamluk sultans after them continued this practice in Egypt and greater Syria, creating the office of shaykh al-shuyūkh, or the "master of masters." The shaykh al-shuyūkh was appointed, usually for life, to oversee all the Sufi activities under the ruling authorities' jurisdiction. This patronage has continued up to the present day, and a number of governments have full-time positions for Sufi shaykhs, including Egypt, Syria, and Sudan, among others.

Sufi shaykhs and pīrs may also serve important roles as advisors to political figures. It is often related that the Seljuq vizier Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092) sought counsel with a number of Sufi shaykhs, including Abu Sa'id b. Abi al-Khayr (d. 1049). While the Chishtis in South Asia were generally politically quietist, Suhrawardi shaykhs were prominent political advisors at the court of the Delhi Sultanate. Likewise, the Ottoman Janissaries were often affiliated with the Bektashi order, and their shaykhs were prominent members of the Ottoman court in Istanbul.

In addition to their roles as political counselors, a number of shaykhs/pīrs have been influential in bringing Islam to new regions. The wali songo, or nine Sufi saints, were supposed to have brought Islam to Indonesia from South Asia and converted the population of Java in the 15th century, although much of this is legend. In the 19th century, Sanusi shaykhs in Cyrenaica and Sahili shaykhs in Somalia were instrumental in bringing Islam to those regions. Various subbranches of the Qadiris in sub-Saharan Africa during the 19th century were the vehicles for a number of charismatic shaykhs to proselytize and propagate Islam in Nigeria, Mali, and Senegal. In South Asia pīrs of the Chishti, Suhrawardi, and Naqshbandi orders trained their disciples to act as missionaries to the local non-Muslim population and are widely credited with bringing Islam to much of the Indian subcontinent. In Central Asia and the Caucasus, Sufi shaykhs, particularly of the Qadiris and Naqshbandis, traveled into mountainous and isolated regions to spread Islam and teach Sufism.

In some cases the shaykh/pīr becomes a political leader in his own right. As the hereditary pīrs of a Sufi order, the Safavid shahs, such as Isma'il I (1501–24), were simultaneously rulers and spiritual masters. This was a potent combination, as the Safavid troops, a federation of Turkic tribes termed collectively the Qizilbash (Redheads) because of the distinctive red headgear they wore, were bound to obey their shah/pīr, to whom they had sworn multiple allegiances. This was a significant factor in the success of the Safavid armies in conquering much of present-day Iran. Between 1824 and 1859, Imam 'Ali Shamil (d. 1871), a Daghestani Naqshbandi, commanded an Islamic state in the area that was the center of the anti-Russian struggle. While Shamil was not the primary Naqshbandi shaykh, his followers saw him as their temporal guide and would chant the dhikr (invocation of God's name) in their marches into battle. The Sammani order played an important role in the founding of the Mahdist state in Sudan, led by the shaykh Muhammad Ahmad b. 'Abdallah (d. 1885). 'Abdallah was granted authority to initiate others into the Sammani brotherhood in 1861. In 1881 once he had gathered a sufficiently large number of disciples, he declared himself the Mahdi (savior) and, with an army of loyal disciples, launched a successful offensive against the Egyptian-British occupation of Sudan.

See also brotherhoods; Sufism

Further Reading

Arthur Buehler, "Overlapping Currents in Early Islam: The Sufi Shaykh and the Shi'i Imam," Journal of the History of Sufism 3 (2001–2): 279–97, 355; S. Digby, "The Sufi Shaykh and the Sultan: A Conflict of Claims to Authority in Medieval India," Iran 28 (1990): 71–81; Marshall Hodgson, The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civilization, vol. 2, 1974; Ahmet Karamustafa, Sufism: The Formative Period, 2007; Margaret Malamud, "Gender and Spiritual Self-Fashioning: The Master-Disciple Relationship in Classical Sufism," Journal of the American Academy of Religion 64 (1996): 89–117.

NATHAN HOFER

shaykh al-Islam

The term "shaykh al-Islam," literally "master of Islam," originated as an honorific title for outstanding scholars of the Islamic sciences but also has been used to designate the chief jurisconsult of a city or realm. The term suggests that the official thus designated was so learned in the religious sciences, especially Islamic law, that he was in effect the teacher of the entire Muslim community and that the authority of his opinions was unassailable or unmatched among his contemporaries. The term has been applied in this sense to such historic figures as Malik b. Anas, Ahmad b. Hanbal, Ibn Taymiyya, and Hajar al-'Asqalani, among others. The Egyptian historian and hadith expert Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sakhawi complained in the 15th century that it had been overused and applied to many who did not actually deserve it.

The history and the exact nature of the office are somewhat obscure before the 16th century, but it apparently originated in Khurasan in the tenth century, where the major cities each had a scholar, called a shaykh al-Islam, who was not a government appointee but was recognized by his peers as an authority. One of the early holders of this title was Abu Sa'd al-Khargushi (d. 1016), a wealthy Ash'ari preacher and Shafi'i jurist of Nishapur, known for his piety and asceticism. After the 11th century, the position became a regular government appointment throughout the Persianate sphere, including the central lands of the Islamic world. The office was developed in an effort to create for the mufti (jurisconsult) an office that paralleled and supplemented that of the qadi (judge), a policy somewhat at variance with classical Islamic legal theory, which envisaged the independence of the mufti from government control. The shaykh al-Islam of the capital city, like the chief judge (qādī al-qudāt), was responsible for those appointed to the same position in the other cities of the realm. Historical sources mention a shaykh al-Islam under the sultan of Delhi Iltumish (1211–36). The Abbasid caliph Nasir (1180–1225) designated Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi (d. 1234), his confidant and a renowned Sufi master, shaykh al-Islam in 1200. Similarly, the Ilkhanid sultan Ahmad Teguder appointed 'Abd al-Rahman, his spiritual advisor, shaykh al-Islam. Timur (r. 1370–1405) appointed the title shaykh al-Islam of Samarqand to the Hanafi jurist 'Abd al-Malik al-Marghinani, a descendant of Burhan al-Din al-Marghinani, author of al-Hidayah (The book of guidance), the famous text of Hanafi law.

The title appears not to have been used in this fashion by the Zengids, Ayyubids, or the Mamluks, who founded a new institution called the House of Justice (Dar al-'Adl) in an attempt to bolster the prestige of the grievance court and at the same time sponsor the public granting of fatwas, legal responsa or answers to legal questions of the lay populace, the first in Damascus circa 1163 and the last in Cairo in 1315. Terminology differed in North Africa as well, where the chief mufti of a realm was simply termed the mufti of the capital city, such as the mufti of Fez or of Marrakesh.

The institutionalization of the office reached a peak under the Ottomans, but it was also a prominent office under the Safavids, Uzbeks, and Mughals. In the 15th century the shaykh al-Islam was a highly respected jurist whose position remained outside the learned hierarchy, untainted by the secular associations of judgeships and similar positions, who served in some sense as a check on the authority of the sultan. In the course of the 16th century, the office was consolidated and incorporated into the learned hierarchy, especially under the shaykh al-Islam Abu al-Su'ud (d. 1574), who spent 29 years in office under sultans Süleiman I (r. 1520–66) and Selim II (r. 1566–74). The shaykh al-Islam generally acceded to this office after a long cursus honorum of teaching and judicial appointments in the empire's major cities. Standing at the pinnacle of the learned hierarchy, he was charged with broad oversight not only of the muftis but also of the professors and judges of the realm, a responsibility held in earlier times by the qādī-'askars, originally judges over the governing military class. Ironically, the incorporation of the office into the state apparatus seems to have diminished the power of the incumbents and their ability to critique the government. Incumbents after Abu al-Su'ud had short tenures.

One of the main duties of the Ottoman shaykh al-Islam was to answer a monumental number of legal questions submitted by the public, and a bureaucracy termed the fetvahane was established to accomplish this quickly. Before being viewed by the shaykh al-Islam himself, questions were drafted, after the 16th century, by a permanent staff of clerks headed by the superintendent of fatwas (fetva amini), who removed extraneous information, replaced actual names with pseudonyms, and brought the point of law at issue into relief. The shaykh al-Islam was able to answer a very large number of fatwas in this manner, sometimes as many as 1,400 in one day. The shaykh al-Islam's office received all manner of questions: requests for clarification on matters of correct religious observance; commercial and property disputes; issues of general social concern such as the legality of coffee or tobacco; and important matters of state, such as queries from the sultan seeking justification for war. Holders of the office played an important role in anti-Safavid propaganda, justifying Ottoman wars against the Safavids in the 16th and 17th centuries on the grounds that the Qizilbash, the Turkmen tribal warriors who formed the core of the Safavid armies, were actually unbelievers on account of their heterodox beliefs and therefore legitimate targets of jihad. They also sanctioned the introduction of new technologies such as the printing press, the telegraph, railroads, and Western arms of various types. The last Ottoman shaykh al-Islam, Mustafa Sabri Efendi, held the office until 1922, when he was exiled to Egypt.

In the Safavid Empire, the shaykh al-Islam of the capital city—Tabriz, then Qazvin, then Isfahan—fulfilled a role similar to that of the Ottoman shaykh al-Islam, though the cadre of religious scholars had a less hierarchical structure and often held the office for life. One of the main roles fulfilled by the Safavid incumbents of the office was responding to ideological attacks from their Ottoman counterparts and other Sunni polemicists. Their fatwas were likewise important in justifying war against the Ottomans in the West and the Uzbeks of Transoxania in the East. In the late 17th century, the Safavid government made a structural change similar to the change in the Ottoman office more than a century earlier: the shaykh al-Islam of Isfahan was recognized as the titular head of the entire cadre of religious scholars in the realm, thus acquiring some of the prerogatives of the sadr, an official who corresponded roughly to the Ottoman qādī-'askar. In recognition of the change, he acquired the new title mullā-bāshī, "chief of religious scholars," an office established in 1712–13 by Shah Sultan Husayn (r. 1694–1722) for the jurist Muhammad Baqir Khatunabadi. The mullā-bāshī's office continued to exist under Nadir Shah (r. 1736–47) and the Qajar dynasty (1794–1925), but in the late Qajar period it became a more ceremonial sinecure in which the incumbent served as a tutor for royal princes.

In the modern period, various governments of Islamic nations have appointed grand muftis who fulfill the functions of the shaykh al-Islam. Institutions also have been founded to regulate fatwas and to ensure that only trained scholars with government-approved qualifications have the authority to issue them. Among these institutions are the Dar al-Ifta' al-Misriyya (The Egyptian Organization for Granting Legal Opinions), founded by the Egyptian government in 1895 and headed by the grand mufti of Egypt, and the Jedda-based Islamic Fiqh Academy (Majma' al-Fiqh al-Islami al-Dawli), founded in 1988 by the 57-nation Organization of the Islamic Conference in reaction to what was seen as a proliferation of irresponsible and incompetent fatwas.

See also mufti/grand mufti; shari'a

Further Reading

Richard Bulliet, "The Shaikh al-Islam and the Evolution of Islamic Society," Studia Islamica 35, no. 1 (1972); Colin Imber, Ebu's-su'ud: The Islamic Legal Tradition, 1997; R. C. Repp, The Müfti of Istanbul: A Study in the Development of the Ottoman Learned Hierarchy, 1986; Devin J. Stewart, "The First Shaykh al-Islām of the Safavid Capital Qazvin," Journal of the American Oriental Society 116, no. 3 (1996).

DEVIN J. STEWART

Shi'ism

"Shi'ism" is the English term given to the sectarian movement referred to in early Arabic sources as Shi'at 'Ali (the party of 'Ali), or simply the "Shi'a." The Shi'a identified themselves as supporters of the leadership claims of 'Ali b. Abi Talib, the son-in-law and cousin of the Prophet Muhammad, whom they saw as the rightful successor to Muhammad as leader of the Muslim community. Whether 'Ali viewed himself in the same terms is difficult to assess, since he did not embark on an open rebellion against the first caliphs of the Muslim empire following Muhammad's death in 632. The claim that 'Ali was the rightful leader (or imam) after Muhammad was based on reports in which the Prophet expresses his high regard and (arguably) his preference for 'Ali over his other Companions. The reliability and interpretation of these reports has become a topic of extensive sectarian dispute between the Shi'a and their opponents (primarily the later Sunnis). 'Ali did eventually become caliph in 656, though he had to face extensive opposition during his reign, and he was eventually murdered in 661. In the century and a half following 'Ali's death, there were a series of rebellions in the name of 'Ali and his descendants. All of these movements, in one way or another, were appealing to the central Shi'i political idea that the members of the family of the Prophet had somehow been blessed with particular leadership skills—for some groups, these qualities were sufficiently unique to make the imams a breed apart from the ordinary folk. Members of the Prophet's family have, by some process of divine designation, acquired particular qualities and rights, among which is the right to govern. This, at least, indicates the basics of Shi'i political theory developed in this early period, and it contrasts with the emerging Sunni (and Khariji) notions of good leadership and political legitimacy. Some subsequent Shi'i groups proclaimed the imams to be a manifestation of God or to have a divine nature in an incarnational sense. These beliefs were unacceptable to other Shi'a and also viewed as dangerously heretical by the mainstream Sunnis. In the heresiographical literature, the groups associated with these incarnational beliefs were labeled ghulāt (extremists).

Central to all the Shi'i political ideas at this time was the notion of an imam as a political leader designated by God (through an inheritance of the Prophet's designation to 'Ali) but lacking political power. It seems that for all the Shi'a the imam must be a relative of the Prophet Muhammad. How far this description might extend was disputed. Was the son of 'Ali by a slave girl a candidate for legitimate leadership (as was claimed in Mukhtar's rebellion in support of Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya in 686)? Was a descendent of 'Abbas, the Prophet's uncle, acceptable (as was claimed by the Abbasid movement, which came to power in 750)? The rebellion against the Abbasids by a grandson of Hasan (the eldest son of Imam 'Ali), Muhammad b. 'Abdallah al-Nafs al-Zakiyya (d. 762), and the continued opposition to the Abbasids by other Shi'i groups show that most did not consider this extension of the "Prophet's descendants" (ahl al-bayt) acceptable. Other debates among the Shi'a at the time included whether an imam (or his representative) must rebel against the usurping caliphate of the Umayyads (and later the Abbasids). The Shi'a had examples of imams who had been quietist (such as Hasan) and examples of those who had taken up arms (the most famous being Husayn, 'Ali's second son and the third imam, at Karbala in 680). Additional accretions to these fundamental Shi'i ideas in the early period included the idea of an imam who had disappeared and would return at some time to establish legitimate government and abolish the corrupt system of the Umayyads (and later Abbasids). For example, Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya is said to have disappeared (and not died), and the appeals of other Shi'i leaders in this early period were tinged with messianic expectation.

As well as all the rebellious movements challenging the Umayyads and the Abbasids, there was a more quietist Shi'i position associated with a group given the title "Imamis" in the heresiographical literature. According to these writers, the Imamis traced a line of imams beginning with imams 'Ali, Hasan, and Husayn and then followed by generational descendents of Husayn. The line continues with Husayn's son 'Ali Zayn al-Abidin, 'Ali's son Muhammad al-Baqir, and Muhammad's son Ja'far al-Sadiq. For the Imamis, while the current political power was illegitimate, the imams did not wish to endanger themselves or the true community of followers by openly rebelling. Proper government would be established at some future point, and rebellious activity was fruitless (and for some even forbidden). After the death of Imam Sadiq, the Imamis followed Musa al-Kazim, Sadiq's son by a slave woman. The decision was controversial, and some of the Shi'a considered a separate line of descendents (through Ja'far's deceased son Isma'il) acceptable, giving birth to the Isma'ili Shi'a. The Imamis recognized five more imams after Musa in a father-son sequence. The last of these, the Twelfth Imam after the Prophet, was Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Mahdi, who, according to Imami accounts, disappeared in 874. The Imamis then became known as the Twelvers (ithnā 'asharīyya), since their 12th and last imam disappeared and, according to Imami theology, will reappear at some point in the future. The Twelvers went on to become the most numerous Shi'i sect with a distinctive political theory. Twelver legal literature (fiqh) explored the operation of proper Islamic rule through an elucidation of rules supposedly derived from sources (in particular the Qur'an and the sources describing the sunna, or example of the Prophet). In effect, the limitation of these sources left much to the individual jurist's creativity. In the Imami tradition, the ideal government was one led by the imam himself. However, this rarely happened when the imams were present (only 'Ali actually held political power, and even then his authority was hardly absolute). When there were no longer imams because they were in hiding (ghayba), the operation of particular elements of the law became problematic in the jurists' views. For example, a legitimate collection or distribution entity was required for valid taxation: not only for religious taxes such as zakat (the alms tax) and khums (the special Shi'i "one fifth" tax) but also for other valid taxes such as kharāj (the land tax). In the absence of the imam, no such entity exists. The first jurists, such as Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Tusi (d. 1067), offered various solutions, including burying the wealth in a secret place to await the return of the imam or distributing the wealth oneself to the deserving recipients. Over time, one solution became dominant in fiqh literature: the individual believer could (and for some jurists, must) give his religious taxes to a suitably qualified jurist (i.e., a mujtahid) to distribute. Imami jurists proposed a theory of niyāba, or delegation, whereby certain sayings of the imams were reinterpreted to demonstrate that the imams themselves had delegated to the jurists the right to collect and distribute taxes, convene Friday prayer, and perform other duties for which a legitimate imam was required. During the Safavid period in Iran, a number of jurists gave the state a sort of limited legitimacy by sanctioning its activities as "legal" (shar'i), though they still argued that the ideal state is one led by the imam himself. This was a controversial move, and many Imami Shi'i jurists continued to argue that the state was de jure illegitimate and that a truly pious believer would avoid all contact with it. The debate continues into the early 21st century, but it has been given an added twist by the introduction of the revolutionary theory of wilāyat al-faqīh (the guardianship of the jurist). Imami jurists had always avoided making an outright claim to political power, even if some of them at times came close to sanctioning actual political rule by a temporal power. In the mid-20th century, Ayatallah Khomeini began to develop a theory whereby the role of the jurists within Shi'i society might be expanded to include direct political rule. He put forward this theory in the context of the rule of Muhammad Reza Shah Pahlavi in Iran, who had embarked on a series of policies that were undermining the traditional authority of the scholarly class in the name of modernization. Khomeini took an established jurisprudential concept, such as the notion that the jurist (faqīh) has control of the assets of an orphaned minor, and expanded it to legitimize the seizure of power by the scholarly class. In the same way that the jurist has legitimate power over the orphan's property (in order to protect it from being seized by the unscrupulous and unworthy), the faqīh also has rights to take political control in order to prevent the assets of the nation from being wasted by the corrupt. This idea of direct clerical rule was quite novel within Imami Shi'i law and underpinned much of the political structures of postrevolutionary Iran, where wilāyat al-faqīh is the theoretical basis for the political system. The debate over the legitimacy of Khomeini's theory has dominated modern Shi'i political thought, with a sizable body of juristic opinion (particularly from those based outside of Iran) arguing that the statement is invalid and unscriptural.

The two other major Shi'i groups that survived from the early period, the Zaydis and the Isma'ilis, also devised distinctive political theories, and both of these groups experienced internal fissures. The Zaydis were named after a grandson of Imam Husayn, Zayd b. Ali, who led an ill-fated revolt against the Umayyads in 740. His rebellion may have failed, but his movement gave rise to a number of subsequent groups of scholars and activists. The Zaydis generally did not recognize the Imami doctrine of the designation (nass) of one imam by the previous one. For some Zaydis, there had never even been a designation of 'Ali by the Prophet; rather, 'Ali and his descendents had the right to rule because they were intrinsically the most meritorious (al-afdal). For others, only 'Ali and his two sons had been designated. After Husayn, all the descendents of 'Ali and his wife, Fatima, were eligible for the imamate, and this explains why there was no need for a designation of Zayd himself. The imam was the person who combined the qualities of lineage (from 'Ali and Fatima), learning, and worthiness, and, most crucially, who had rebelled against the unjust government of the day. Zaydi statelets appeared in northern Iran and in Yemen. In Yemen, the Zaydis established dynastic rule in north Yemen that survived until 1962, when an Arab nationalist revolution overthrew the last Zaydi imam. The militant activism of the Zaydi tradition continued in the 21st century through the movement associated with the Yemeni rebel Husayn Badr al-Din al-Huthi (d. 2004), though it is not clear whether his political ideas included the reestablishment of the Zaydi imamate.

The Isma'ilis emerged only a century or so after Muhammad b. Isma'il's death (or disappearance in the early ninth century), and in its early phase it seems to have been primarily a spiritual rather than political movement. There were inevitable political manifestations, however. First, there was the emergence of the revolutionary Qarmatians, and then later the Fatimids and their successors. The Qarmatians established a rebel state in eastern Arabia, which broke free of the Abbasid Empire and (most infamously) raided Mecca and removed the Black Stone of the Ka'ba in 930. Their origins certainly lay in a form of Isma'ilism that had broken away and developed its own messianic and millenarian tendencies. The Fatimids, on the other hand, appeared in North Africa in the early tenth century as a military force under the leadership of 'Abdallah al-Mahdi, who claimed 'Alid descent. For the Fatimids, the caliph of their empire (which spread out across North Africa with its capital in Cairo) was the imam—theoretically a sinless, divinely designated leader descended from the Prophet through Fatima. Even before the Ayyubid capture of Egypt in 1169, the Fatimid Isma'ilis had experienced offshoots that established separate communities claiming the lineage of different descendents of the Fatimids. While some of these communities were subsequently politically active (most famously the Nizari Isma'ilis in Iran, renowned for assassinating leading political figures), the post-Fatimid Isma'ili intellectual tradition was less concerned with politics, returning instead to spiritual and philosophical questions. The different Isma'ili groups have survived into the modern period, the largest being the Nizaris under the spiritual direction after 1957 of their 49th imam, Karim Husayni, who has the honorific title of Agha Khan.

The Shi'i movement did not have a detailed political theory worked out from its inception. Much of its theory developed out of Shi'i historical experiences, and the need to justify history, rather than any abstract contemplation by theorists. Its basic premises, however, such as the legitimacy of 'Ali's claim to be the Prophet's successor and the importance of Muslim leadership being drawn from the Prophet's family and their descendents, provided subsequent thinkers with an ideological base from which to develop a variety of conflicting and competing political theories. Furthermore, the various Shi'i groups defined their political stance in relation not only to each other but also to the wider Muslim (particularly Sunni) intellectual landscape. This variety has survived into the modern period and demonstrates the continued potency and popularity of the basic tenets of Shi'ism.

See also Isma'ilis; Qarmatians; Sunnism; Zaydis

Further Reading

Juan Cole, Sacred Space and Holy War: The Politics, History and Culture of Shi'ite Islam, 2005; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Robert Gleave, "Recent Research into the Early History of Shi'isn," History Compass 7, no. 6 (2009); Wilferd Madelung, Religious Trends in Early Islamic Iran, 1988.

ROBERT GLEAVE

Shu'ubis

The term Shu'ūbiyya is most often used to refer to a movement, social and cultural in tenor, that originated in the eighth century and that stood for the equality of Arabs and non-Arabs in Muslim society, or even the non-Arabs' superiority. The movement had its roots among the non-Arab court secretaries that served the Abbasid caliphs. Its proponents, known as Shu'ubis, were skilled orators and talented poets, overwhelmingly of Iranian origins, and centered in Baghdad. At times they employed incendiary rhetoric. Although not widespread, the Shu'ubis and the opposition they generated reflected broader tensions in Muslim society between Arabs and non-Arabs. The Shu'ubis aimed neither to overthrow the Abbasid government nor to advance a political program.

A central tactic of Shu'ubis was apparently to assert the irrelevance of Arab descent as a criterion for precedence in Muslim society. An anonymous statement suggests the style of rhetoric employed by Shu'ubis. It quotes Qur'an 23:12 to argue that all people are the offspring of one man (Adam), as well as Qur'an 49:13, which states, "The most noble among you before God is the most pious." It is from the latter verse, which mentions shu'ūb (peoples), that the Shu'ubis' name derived. This statement also mentions that the Prophet, during his Farewell Pilgrimage to Mecca, reiterated the common descent of humanity and the equality of Arabs and non-Arabs. At the same time, the statement undermines traditional bases for Arab pride. For example, it alleges the corruption of Arab genealogies by citing the Arabs' own pre-Islamic poetry as evidence for raids in which women passed back and forth between tribes.

The movement is commonly mentioned in scholarship on early Islam. The most important early study was completed by Ignaz Goldziher, who placed the Shu'ubis in the context of the growth of "foreign elements in Islam" and the growing displacement of Arabs from powerful positions. With the emergence of independent dynasties within the caliphate beginning in the ninth century, these foreign elements ultimately achieved foreign rule, breaking not only the caliphate's power but "also that of the nation from which this institution stemmed." For H.A.R. Gibb, the Shu'ubis represented a movement among court secretaries with loyalties to pre-Islamic values. These secretaries sought to "remold" the political and social institutions of the Islamic empire and the "inner spirit of Islamic culture." If successful, the secretaries would have achieved the subordination of Arabic and Islamic elements to "the old Perso-Aramaean culture." The Shu'ubis' concern with social status has also been much remarked on by scholars (including Roy Mottahedeh, Susanne Enderwitz, and Louise Marlow). Most recently, Patricia Crone characterized Shu'ubism as a form of "post-colonialism," with the argument that the Shu'ubi movement "was a literary attack on the Arabs and their heritage by assimilated natives who were heard with increasing frequency" after the Abbasid revolution in 750. What was at stake was "self-respect and, above all, the character of the culture that converts were now sharing with the conquerors." The Shu'ubi movement has also received significant attention from scholars working in Arabic and Persian. A Shu'ubi phenomenon also apparently emerged in Andalus, and the term has had a currency in certain modern contexts as a pejorative label applied, for example, to opponents of Pan-Arab nationalism.

Few sources contemporary with the Shu'ubis survive. In analyzing the Shu'ubis, scholars, by necessity, have relied heavily on works written by the Shu'ubis' opponents. These works include a book-length refutation by Ibn Qutayba (d. ca. 889). Although of Iranian ancestry, as were many of their opponents, Ibn Qutayba was bothered by the way that Shu'ubis ridiculed Arabs as less civilized than Persians and explained why, for example, Arabs have eaten camel fur and lizards. He praised Arabs for their cultural traits and practices and cited several statements by the Prophet himself to support the superior status of Arabs in Muslim society. For Ibn Qutayba, humans are all the same before God, but in the present world, differences exist, and so, too, there are superior and inferior individuals and peoples (umam).

Classical Arabic authors generally are unsympathetic to the Shu'ubis. When biographers identify individuals as Shu'ubis, for example, they allege bias against Arabs and give no indication that Shu'ubis held egalitarian views, as the Shu'ubi statement cited earlier might suggest. As one biographer of Sahl b. Harun (d. ca. 830), an Abbasid courtier who was likely a Shu'ubi, stated, Sahl "felt great bias for the 'Ajam [Persians] against the Arabs; he was extreme in that."

Some scholars have raised doubts about the importance of the Shu'ubi movement as a historical phenomenon, instead viewing it as a term to describe anti-Arab bias and particular ways of expressing it.

See also kinship

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, "Post-Colonialism in Tenth-Century Islam," Der Islam 83, no. 1 (2006); H.A.R. Gibb, "The Social Significance of the Shuubiya," in Studies on the Civilization of Islam, edited by Stanford J. Shaw and William R. Polk, 1962; Ignaz Goldziher, Muslim Studies, vol. 1, edited by S. M. Stern, translated by C. R. Barber and S. M. Stern, 1967; Sami A. Hanna and George H. Gardner, "'Al-Shu'ūbiyyah' Up-Dated: A Study of the 20th Century Revival of an Eighth Century Concept," Middle East Journal 20, no. 3 (Summer 1966); Göran Larsson, Ibn García's Shu'ūbiyya Letter: Ethnic and Theological Tensions in Medieval al-Andalus, 2003; James T. Monroe, The Shu'ūbiyya in al-Andalus: The Risāla of Ibn García and Five Refutations, 1970; Roy P. Mottahedeh, "The Shu'ūbiyah Controversy and the Social History of Early Islamic Iran," International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 7, no. 2 (April 1976).

SARAH BOWEN SAVANT

al-siyāsa al-shar'iyya. See governance slavery

Chattel slavery was a well-established reality of political, legal, and social life in the pre-Islamic world. The advent of Islam did not change this; the revelations of the Qur'an and the Prophet Muhammad's sunna accepted slavery as an ordinary aspect of human existence. Yet the Qur'an and the Prophet explicitly recognized the humanity of the enslaved, seeking to ameliorate suffering and injustice and encouraging emancipation. Many modern jurists have therefore argued that one of the purposes of the Qur'anic revelation was to bring about the gradual disappearance of slavery and the advent of a society free of slavery. While a fair reading of the texts might support this view, the actual history of slavery and slave trading in the Muslim world belies this perspective. The slave trade and the suzerainty of slave-holding regimes in the Islamic heartlands flourished for more than 1,300 years after the death of the Prophet; in many places slavery and slave trading were robust, a source of great wealth, a sinew and building block for the construction of empire, and a central feature of Muslim political, legal, military, economic, and social life. Significantly, vestiges of slavery and slave trading, taking the form of human trafficking practices using transportation routes established in the 18th and 19th centuries, as well as forced labor regimes and extremely brutal forms of domestic servitude, still remain in some parts of the contemporary Muslim world, particularly in the Persian Gulf and the Arabian Peninsula, and on the Indian subcontinent.

Slavery and slave trading flourished in the early modern and modern eras because of a curious paradox created by the Islamic law. The classical law, developed by Muslim jurists over a 300-year period following the death of the Prophet, considerably reformed pre-Islamic slave systems. Under these pre-Islamic systems, one could enter the state of enslavement in a number of ways, including capture in war, birth, self-sale and sale by parent or guardian, as punishment for crime, as satisfaction for debt, as expiation for sin, and as a foundling or other disenfranchised person without means of support. The classical shari'a reduced the means by which one could be lawfully enslaved to just two: birth from two lawfully enslaved parents or capture as a prisoner in a lawful jihad. All other forms of enslavement were abolished. Furthermore, no Muslim could be lawfully enslaved (although conversion to Islam after enslavement did not automatically result in emancipation). The Qur'an expressly permitted marriage between enslaved and free, observing that marriage to a Muslim slave is preferable to marriage to an unbelieving free person. The Qur'an also declared the emancipation of slaves to be an act of great piety, entitling the believer to reward in the afterlife. Interpreting these provisions and others like them, the jurists concluded that there should be a presumption of human freedom in all social and political affairs (al-aṣl huwa al-ḥurriyya), and any reasonable doubt with respect to one's servile status should be resolved in favor of emancipation. The jurists also declared that the children of unions between slave and free were also free and that the mother of such children (umm al-walad) was entitled to freedom at the death of her owner. This was an important rule in elite households, where a man might own large numbers of concubines. Heads of state in the Muslim world often traced their heritage to a slave mother. It is said that 34 of the 37 Abbasid caliphs were born of such relationships.

Islam's ameliorative approach to slavery thus resulted in frequent emancipation and great fluidity in social movement of persons who had once been enslaved, paradoxically creating a constant demand for more slaves. This demand was satisfied by entrepreneurs, slave traders, and unscrupulous marauders and plunderers who illegally captured and transported fresh slaves to the Muslim cosmopolitan centers from many distant places, including West and East Africa, the Balkans, the Caucasus, the Asian Steppes, India, and the islands of Southeast Asia. The classical law was essentially ignored, and many individuals, particularly women and children, were violently uprooted and relocated to the central lands of the Muslim world. Africans were particularly vulnerable to slave raiding, but by no means were they the only victims. The great majority of slaves in the Muslim world performed domestic household duties, but many worked as soldiers and sailors, concubines, agricultural and mining laborers, or as servants of governments.

The presence of significant numbers of enslaved persons in the Islamic heartlands, particularly military slaves, had a profound effect on Islamic political thought. In 1250, military slaves (mamluks) of the Ayyubid dynasty based in Cairo overthrew the sultan and established their own dynasty, which lasted for almost 300 years (1250–1517), deriving its success from the continuation of the codes of behavior established under the traditions of slave soldiery. Another dynasty of slaves and former slaves was established in Delhi, lasting for almost 100 years (1206–90). Similar events occurred in other places, and it is fair to say that military slaves were influential in a number of Islamic centers of power for nearly a millennium, from the rise of the Abbasid caliphate beginning in the eighth century until the decline of the Ottoman Empire at the end of the 19th century.

Military slavery and concubinage were not the only aspects of the Muslim slave systems that influenced political thought. Medieval and premodern jurists developed elaborate rules governing the commercial buying and selling of slaves, the resolution of disputes over slaves arising out of insolvency, the liability of slaves for crimes, the disposition of prisoners of war, and myriad other circumstances, making slavery an important aspect of the Islamic legal and political culture. This feature of the culture remained part of the political milieu in the major centers of Islamic thought until well into the 20th century. In fact, the conventional historical wisdom tells us that there was never any significant indigenous impetus for the abolition of slavery in the Muslim world and that slavery and slave trading came to an end in the Muslim world only because of the abolitionist edicts of colonialist Western governments and the persistent efforts of antislavery activists, particularly the British. While there is considerable truth in this assertion, it cannot be said that Muslim thinkers played no role in abolition. It was difficult to eradicate the old thinking among religious conservatives, but a number of 19th- and early 20th-century liberal Muslim scholars and political leaders, notably Ahmed Bey (1784–1850) in Tunisia, Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98) and Sayyid Ameer ʿAli (1849–1928) in India, and Muhammad ʿAbduh (1849–1905) and Rashid Rida (1865–1935) in Egypt, were critical of slaving and slave trading by Muslims and sometimes vigorously sought to influence public opinion to end it. This struggle to make Muslims aware of the history of slavery and abolition in the Islamic world and to eliminate the vestiges of slavery and slave trading, referred to earlier, continues to this day.

See also Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526); equality; jihad; Mamluks (1250–1517); military; Ottomans (1299–1924); racism; rights; women

Further Reading

David Ayalon, Islam and the Abode of War: Military Slaves and Islamic Adversaries, 1994; William Gervase Clarence-Smith, Islam and the Abolition of Slavery, 2006; Patricia Crone, Slaves on Horses: The Evolution of the Islamic Polity, 1980; Bernard Freamon, "Slavery, Freedom and the Doctrine of Consensus in Islamic Jurisprudence," Harvard Human Rights Journal 111 (1998); Murray Gordon, Slavery in the Arab World, 1989; Bernard Lewis, Race and Slavery in the Middle East: An Historical Enquiry, 1990; Ronald Segal, Islam's Black Slaves: The Other Black Diaspora, 2001; Ehud R. Toledano, Slavery and Abolition in the Ottoman Middle East, 1998.

BERNARD K. FREAMON

socialism

The modern concept of socialism (ishtirākiyya), which involves state regulation, if not ownership, of the means of production and distribution, was introduced to the Muslim world in the 19th century, probably in the Ottoman Empire during the reform period known as the Tanzimat (1839–77). The word ishtirākiyya comes from the root sh-r-k, which denotes sharing. The Young Ottomans, as the reform-minded intellectuals were known, diffused the concept and doctrines of socialism among themselves, and through the media their ideas spread into Egypt and the Fertile Crescent. Socialist political groups emerged in Turkey after the collapse of the Ottoman Empire after World War I, but the regime of Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, Turkey's president, exerted constant pressure on these entities in the early to mid-1920s. Socialism and communism were understood to be bedfellows, so the repression of the Turkish Communist Party tended to reverberate and extend to the socialists as well. It was only after the Turkish military coup in 1960 that Turkish socialists acquired a new lease on life.

Meanwhile, in the Arab lands of the Middle East, Egyptian, Syrian, and Lebanese writers such as Salama Musa (d. 1958) and Shibli Shumayyil (d. 1917) published their interpretations of European socialist thought and practice in newspaper essays and articles. By the late 1940s and the 1950s, socialism came to be examined in the context of Arab society and politics, and some of its principal exponents were the Syrian Michel ʿAflaq (d. 1989) and the Jordanian Munif al-Razzaz (d. 1984), Arab nationalist writers of the Baʿth Party. Meanwhile, professional men of religion or pious laypersons such as the Syrian Mustafa al-Sibaʿi (d. 1964), the leader of the Syrian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, and the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), the main ideologue of the Egyptian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, began writing about socialism in the context of the principles of Islam. In Iran, the cleric Mahmud Taliqani argued that the best attributes of socialism were already to be found in Islam, a line of argument similar to that of Sibaʿi and legions of others writing on this topic, both Sunni and Shiʿi. In contrast, Qutb and the Pakistani thinker Abul al-Aʿla Mawdudi (d. 1979) argued that all secular ideas were inherently inimical to Islamic thought and practice. Even so, in their view, "Islam" introduced these same principles centuries ago, and the rest of the world was merely belatedly catching up.

Many Muslims have attested that the Islamic scriptures are redolent with themes of egalitarianism, a bedrock concept in socialism. They also alleged that "social justice" (al-ʿadāla al-ijtimāʿiyya) is endemic to Islamic belief and used the expression "joint mutual responsibility" (al-takāful al-ijtimāʿī) to capture the spirit of this principle. But the phrase al-ʿadāla al-ijtimāʿiyya is a neologism generated by pious Muslims in the face of writings in non-Islamic social theory, and it was absent from Islamic discourse—whether juristic or theological—until the late modern period. As David Miller, author of Principles of Social Justice, has shown, the concept of social justice emerged in Western political discourse itself only in the late 19th century, even though its genesis might be found in 18th-century writings.

Those responsible for crafting a theory of social justice assumed first of all that every individual is entitled to a claim of fairness. Second, they held that a clearly articulated society with identifiable members must exist in order to assess whether individual members were obtaining their fair share of goods, services, and opportunities. Third, they agreed that sophisticated measures were necessary to make that determination accurately. Fourth, they maintained that an institution (typically, the state) must be able to operate in a manner that would ensure as close an approximation to social justice as possible. Finally, they believed that rational, nonreligious justifications should be provided for each individual's claim to entitlements, presumably on the argument that religiously based justifications risked omitting entitlements for those who did not profess the mainstream religion of the group.

In the juristic theories of the classical Muslim legists, these conditions and considerations were absent. Indeed, the main concern of these jurists was to identify the caliphate as divinely ordained and its task to ensure the ability of the believer to worship God according to the strictures of the holy law, as opposed to an organizational framework for enforcing the right of individuals to pursue their interests.

Nonetheless, socialism was the preferred model for Muslim writers in the contemporary period. During the Soviet era, Muslim political theorists maintained that "Islam," which they tended to reify, avoided the excesses of communism and capitalism. They cited scripture, such as Qur'an 11:143: "We have made you a middle-most nation so that you may act as witness over man." These Muslim writers saw a community of the middle way, as it were, as God's deliberate creation, which alone could ensure justice, equity, balance, and moderation. In other words, in their view "Islam" avoided extremism. The extremism of communism was its putative brutality against individuals, and the extremism of capitalism was its alleged valorization of greed.

Such interpretations have routinely been made by political leaders and professional men of religion. Among the former are Libyan ruler Mu'ammar Qaddafi (d. 2011), whose famous Green Book referred to Islam as "the third international theory," and Iranian leader Ayatollah Khomeini (d. 1989), who demonized communism and capitalism as the work of Satan. Popular Muslim preachers, such as Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), Muhammad al-Ghazali (d. 1996), and Shaykh Muhammad Mutawalli Sha'rawi (d. 1998)—all Egyptians—have echoed such ideas.

Although socialism in the writings of authors in the Muslim world was undercut to some degree by the collapse of the communist systems in Europe and the Soviet Union in the late 1980s and early 1990s, its appeal did not vanish. Indeed, to the degree that capitalism was perceived as a threat, a number of Muslim writers upheld the advantages they saw in socialism. But socialism held little appeal for many other Muslims, given its association with secular thought and the suppression of organized Islamic activities by some political leaders in the Muslim world who professed Arab socialism, such as President Gamal Abdel Nasser (d. 1970) in Egypt or the Ba'thist leaders in Syria and Iraq from the 1960s into the 21st century.

See also Ba'th Party; capitalism; communism; economic theory; individualism

Further Reading

Shahrough Akhavi, "The Dialectics of Contemporary Egyptian Social Thought: The Traditionalist and Modernist Discourses of Sayyid Qutb and Hasan Hanafi," The International Journal of Middle East Studies 29, no. 3 (1997); Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939, 1962; David Miller, Principles of Social Justice, 1999.

SHAHROUGH AKHAVI

solidarity

The Qur'an explicitly mentions ta'āwun, which means solidarity or cooperation: "And be in solidarity with each other in righteous works and Godwariness, and do not support one another in sin and transgression" (Q. 5:2). The text is also replete with references to related notions of unity and community. In Qur'an 3:110, for instance, God calls the believers the best community brought forth for the benefit of humankind. Indeed, the rise of Islam in seventh-century Arabia ushered in a radical paradigm shift in existing notions of solidarity: from one based on strict adherence to centuries-old tribal loyalties to one based on faith wedded to righteous conduct. Throughout the history of Islam, solidarity has been expressed in varied, interwoven ways: politically, socially, economically, and religiously.

Pan-Islamic identity is one of the most enduring manifestations of Muslim solidarity in the contemporary world. The Islamic reformist and anti-imperialist activist Afghani (d. 1897) played a pioneering role in fostering Pan-Islamic sentiment. Drawing on the Qur'anic notion of the umma—that the faithful constitute a community, irrespective of language or race—Afghani urged Muslims to stand united against European rule. The Ottoman sultan Abdülhamid II (d. 1918) also picked up the banner of Pan-Islam, calling on Muslims from India to North Africa to rebel against their occupiers. Muslims in the 20th century kept the call of Pan-Islamic resistance alive, such as the Lebanese activist Shakib Arslan (d. 1946), who became a fiery voice of anti-imperial Muslim unity in the 1920s and 1930s. Though most Muslim countries achieved political independence by the mid-20th century, the global balance of power shifted from Europe to the United States. The ensuing dominance of America in the Middle East in general, and U.S. support for Israel in particular, has played a vital role in sustaining a keen sense of solidarity among Muslims.

While most forms of Islamic solidarity have been based on the appeal to Muslims to support other Muslims, the concept of solidarity increasingly has been invoked for such causes as gender justice, gay rights, religious pluralism, the struggle against apartheid, and the destigmatization of people living with HIV and AIDS. Sisters in Islam (SIS) is a case in point. Formed in 1988 in Malaysia, the organization undertook gendered readings of the Qur'an to argue for the full inclusion of women in social, economic, religious, and political life. Under the leadership of Zainah Anwar, SIS became a formidable force within Malaysian society and for Muslim women in other parts of the world. Positive Muslims (PM) is another example. Established in South Africa in 2000, the faith-based organization increased awareness about HIV and AIDS within the Muslim community, emphasizing compassion and love for those afflicted. In addition to combating the stigma associated with the disease, particularly within Muslim circles, PM provided counseling and safe spaces for people living with HIV and AIDS. Solidarity has also been approached through the framework of religious pluralism, most notably by the South African liberation theologian Farid Esack (b. 1956). Reflecting upon his own experiences in the antiapartheid struggle, which had a markedly interreligious character, Esack put to paper a Qur'anic theology of liberation that embraced the religious Other, calling for interfaith solidarity against oppression.

See also Abdülhamid II (1842–1918); apartheid; colonialism; equality; justice; Pan-Islamism; tyranny

Further Reading

Selim Deringil, The Well-Protected Domains: Ideology and the Legitimation of Power in the Ottoman Empire, 1876–1909, 1998; Farid Esack, Qur'an, Liberation and Pluralism: An Islamic Perspective of Interreligious Solidarity against Oppression, 1997; Toshihiko Izutsu, Ethico-Religious Concepts in the Qur'an, 2002; Nikki R. Keddie, An Islamic Response to Imperialism: Political and Religious Writings of Sayyid Jamal al-Din al-Afghani, 1983.

SHADAAB RAHEMTULLA

source of emulation

For more than a century, the term marja' al-taqlīd, or "source of emulation," has been used to designate the highest position of clerical authority in Twelver Shi'i Islam, indicating that the jurist-scholar (faqīh) acts as the primary source (marja') of religious instruction and imitation (taqlīd) for lay followers (muqallids). In addition to providing instruction in following the dictates of Islamic law, the marja' is also responsible for the collection of religious taxes (zakat and khums) and their redistribution to the networks of charitable institutions, seminaries, and students over which he presides. Despite this clear hierarchical structure, the marja' achieves his position not through a formal institution but instead through what sociologist Said Arjomand calls a "hierarchy of deference" wherein the community of mujtahids, jurists capable of issuing religious opinions (fatwas), acknowledges the superior learning (a'lamiyya) of a particular jurist and chooses him as their own religious reference. (Although given his own capability, a mujtahid does not need to follow a marja' but does so out of respect.) This process can lead to the presence of single or multiple sources of emulation in any given period. Of course, in addition to excelling in all areas of Islamic scholarship and especially in jurisprudence, a marja' must be sālih (pious) and 'ādil (of just character).

The institutionalization of the marja' al-taqlīd, like other major developments in contemporary Shi'ism, coincided with the rapid decentralization of Iranian social and political structures under the Qajar dynasty (1789–1925). It was also the outgrowth of the fracturing of the Twelver Shi'i community as seen in the rise of Shaykhism and Babism, the religious movements originating with Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa'i and Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad Shirazi, respectively, that ultimately led to the development of the Baha'i religion. However, the doctrinal underpinnings of the institution and the clerical authority that supports it are rooted in the classic jurisprudential struggle to define a legitimate hermeneutical method of discerning Islamic legal ordinances during the Occultation of the Twelfth Imam. Identifying the basis of the authority of Twelver Shi'i jurists—who act as the curators of the divine law—as the general representatives (al-nā'ib al-'āmm) of the Imam therefore becomes a necessary attendant question. These classic jurisprudential debates were reinvigorated during and after the Safavid period (1501–1722) in what has come to be known as the Akhbari-Usuli conflict.

Deriving its name from the term for texts or reports (akhbār) of the imams' words or deeds, the Akhbari school restricted the basis of the law to scriptural proof texts, quotes from sacred literature, arguing that legal injunctions and ordinances could not surpass or limit what was explicitly recorded in the Qur'an or in the reports of the Prophet and his legitimate successors, the Twelver imams. The Akhbari school thus rejected ijtihād, even when performed by a highly qualified jurist, as a source of law. In contrast, the Usuli school, a label that derives from uṣūl al-fiqh or "the roots of the law," argued that a process of legal interpretation that included rational operations was the best method to understand God's law in shifting contexts and thus ensure the application and survival of the Divine Law throughout time. This logic also underlies the mandate that only a living marja' can offer a religious opinion and that it is forbidden for the lay Shi'i to follow the opinions of a past authority. Building upon the efforts of Agha Muhammad Baqir al-Bihbihani (d. 1793), who managed to cast Akhbaris as heretics, the Usuli jurist Shaykh Muhammad Hasan al-Najafi (d. 1849) is credited with heralding the demise of the most recent Akhbari intellectual movement. After his time, Akhbarism survived only in marginal settings in the Shi'i world, particularly in Bahrain.

These theological debates were concomitant with structural changes in the world of 19th-century Shi'i jurists. For example, in addition to providing intellectual grounds for the defeat of Akhbaris, Najafi was also the first mujtahid to delegate his clerical authority to lower-ranking scholars in other urban centers. Having a network of representatives, he thus created a centralized system of khums collection and legal administration that provided a source of income and political power that surpassed formal political boundaries and ensured clerical independence from state authorities. He also was the first to appoint a successor, Ayatollah Murtada al-Ansari (d. 1864)—generally recognized as the first to bear the title marja' al-taqlīd—as the chief mujtahid of the Twelver community. Between Najafi and Ansari's jurisprudential and administrative contributions lie the clearest precedents for the contemporary Shi'i hierocracy. It is no surprise, then, that Ansari's student and successor, Ayatollah Hasan al-Shirazi (d. 1895), used the power vested in him by such a system in his famous fatwa against the tobacco concession granted to the British by the shah of Iran in 1891.

With the consolidation of the clerical establishment, doctrinal justification of religious authority naturally became a topic of Usuli jurisprudence. Among the first to provide coherence to the otherwise ambiguous arrangement of general clerical authority (al-wilāya al-'āmma) was Mulla Ahmad al-Naraqi (d. 1829) in a wide-ranging treatise on Shi'i jurisprudence titled 'Awa'id al-Ayyam (Expectations of the millennium). True to his Usuli schooling, Naraqi justified the authority of Twelver Shi'i jurists on more rational grounds (dalīl 'aqlī) than on explicit textual authority. He wrote, for example, "It is obvious and understood by every common or learned man, that when the messenger of God was on a trip, someone behind him is assigned as his substitute, successor, trustee, [or] proof. . . . This person would be accorded all the powers that the Prophet enjoyed over his community." Naraqi's vision was foundational to Ayatollah Khomeini's infamous treatment of the issue in his exposition of the doctrine of "the guardianship of the jurist" (wilāyat al-faqīh), according to which the constitution of a legitimate state depends on its being headed by a just jurist. Like Naraqi and other Usuli scholars, Khomeini justified his position on the issue through a combination of rational arguments and scriptural proof texts. His elaborations on Naraqi's points should not be seen, then, as a spontaneous innovation. Rather, in the 150 years between Naraqi and Khomeini, the question of wilāyat al-faqīh had become an important question in Usuli jurisprudence that leading scholars addressed in different ways.

Khomeini's joint occupation of the positions of both the singular temporal leader (rahbar) and marja' al-taqlīd was a unique development in Twelver Shi'i Islam. Both before and after Khomeini's occupation of the position of head of state, other sources of emulation in and outside of Iran were divided in their support of wilāyat al-faqīh, and the doctrine never received the unanimous sanction that its supporters sought. The requirement that the rahbar be the leading marja' was dropped from the Iranian Constitution shortly before Khomeini's death in 1989, and though 'Ali Khamene'i, Khomeini's successor as head of state, eventually became recognized by his devotees as a marja', his status as such remains a heated point of contention among many clergy and lay followers. Ironically, the fusion of state and religious institutions in the Iranian experiment has had the counterintuitive effect of further decentralizing the Shi'i religious establishment. Whereas the marja' al-taqlīd in much of the 19th and 20th centuries was an office held exclusively by one figure, in the early 21st century there were multiple sources of emulation throughout the Shi'i world, divided once again on the question of the relationship between political and religious authority.

See also authority; guardianship of the jurist; imamate; Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89); Shi'ism

Further Reading

Said Amir Arjomand, ed., Authority and Political Culture in Shi'ism, 1988; Mehdi Khaliji, The Last Marja: Sistani and the End of the Traditional Religious Authority in Shiism, 2006; Ruhollah Khomeini, Islam and Revolution: The Writings and Declarations of Imam Khomeini, trans. Hamid Algar, 1981; Ahmad Kazemi Moussavi, "The Establishment of the Position of Marja'iyyat-i Taqlid in the Twelver-Shi'i Community," Iranian Studies 18, no. 1 (1985); Linda Walbridge, The Most Learned of the Shi'a: The Institution of the Marja' Taqlid, 2001.

ABBAS BARZEGAR

South Africa

The first group of Muslims came to the Cape in successive waves from 1658 to the end of the 18th century. Most of them came from the Malay Archipelago and the coastal regions of India as servants, slaves, and political exiles. The most prominent religious figures among them were Shaykh Yusuf (d. 1699), a Sufi thinker who died several years after his exile to the Cape, and Imam 'Abdallah b. Qadi 'Abd al-Salam, better known as "Tuan Guru" (d. 1807), an Islamic philosopher, Sunni theologian, and mystic who was banished to Robben Island in 1780. Upon his release in 1791, he established the first mosque (Awwal Mosque) and school (madrasa) in the Bokaap. The early Muslims generally were not militant, but they were not slow to confront the colonial state if they felt that their Islamic faith and practices were threatened.

With the emergence of the secular Turkish Republic in 1924, the classical concept of the caliphate and sultanate came to an end. With the Salafi scholars, however, especially Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida, Islam as an ideology was revived in response to the needs of a modern Muslim nation-state. Hasan al-Banna, Sayyid Qutb, and Mawdudi were representatives of this Islamic revival. These scholars, among others, had a profound impact on Muslim political thought in South Africa.

Political Thought during Apartheid

The first notable South African leader to be inspired by the teachings of Banna and Qutb was Imam 'Abdallah Haron (d. 1969), whose sermons at the Stegman Road mosque emphasized the social message of Islam. The imam was critical mainly of the racial inequality and social injustice of the apartheid regime. Consequently, he was arrested and killed by the state security police on September 27, 1969. Attendance at his funeral was overwhelming, and soon he became a symbol of the revolutionary message of Islam, especially for the Muslim Youth Movement (MYM), established in 1970; the Muslim Students Association (MSA), established in 1974; and the Qibla movement, founded in 1980. After the Iranian Revolution of 1979, these movements developed a culture of commemoration of the imam's martyrdom, which became a catalyst for social programs that sought to bring about transformation from complacency to activism against apartheid.

After the Iranian Revolution of 1979, the MYM was interested not only in the writings of Mawdudi and Qutb but also in those of 'Ali Shari'ati (d. 1977) and Ayatöllah Khomeini (d. 1989). It did not see the Iranian model of establishing an Islamic state as something to be emulated in South Africa, however, and preferred to focus on Islamic education and training. By 1982 the MYM's members expressed reservations about the Shi'i vilification of the first three caliphs in Islam. Thus the MYM accommodated the teachings of Shari'ati but not Shi'i theology. A graduate of the Sorbonne, Shari'ati was inspired by existentialism and Marxism. He denounced not only Western capitalism and imperialism but also the Shi'i teaching of the Hidden Imam who will return to the world to rectify the injustices. In his view, the clerics used that idea to justify a passive Islam rather than the evolutionary Islam exemplified by the martyrdom of Imam Husayn. He believed instead that Islam's mission was the liberation of the "oppressed" (mustad'afin), who included the poor and the exploited in Iran and elsewhere in the Third World.

Other Islamic resurgent organizations emerged in the South African Muslim community that challenged the MYM ideology. Achmat Cassiem, a leading antiapartheid activist who also had been imprisoned on Robben Island, was inspired by the Iranian Revolution and the ideological thought of Shari'ati. He launched the Qibla Mass Movement, which married the revolutionary message of the Iranian Revolution with local, antiapartheid politics. Qibla worked closely with the Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC), a group that had broken away from the African National Congress (ANC) in 1959 to espouse an Africanist program as opposed to a nonracial one based on the Freedom Charter of 1955.

Another example of a resurgent organization that resisted the political direction of the MYM was the Call of Islam, founded by Mawlana Farid Esack. This organization, committed to the struggle against the injustice of apartheid, aligned itself with the United Democratic Front (UDF) in 1983. The UDF represented a cross section of the South African cultural and religious organizations opposed to the apartheid state. Like Qibla, it espoused a clear, unequivocal political program and addressed the broader liberation struggle. While Qibla worked with the PAC, the Call of Islam remained aligned with UDF and, by extension, the ANC. By contrast, the MYM merely identified itself as the local manifestation of the global Islamic movement but did not make antiapartheid activity central to its program.

Furthermore, the Call of Islam drew its inspiration from the South African experience and not from international Islamic movements. It was committed to the creation of a nonracial, nonsexist, democratic, and just South Africa. It searched for a South African Islam, not one inspired by "outside" models as in the case of Qibla and the MYM. The Call of Islam presented Islam as social conscience linked to mass democratic movements. Imam Hasan Solomons, a member of the Muslim Judicial Council (MJC, established in 1945), also became attracted to the contextual approach to Islam and therefore joined the Call of Islam. Subsequently, the MYM sought to express Islam in the local context of the struggle for social justice against apartheid.

Political Thought during Democracy

The turning point in the history of Islamic political thought and practice in South Africa came in 1994, which marked the end of apartheid and the inception of democracy. The new democracy protected human rights, including gay and abortion rights. Although the legalization of abortion and the granting of equal rights to gay people were perceived as contrary to Islamic morality, Islamic political parties that campaigned against these measures in 1994 did not gain much support from Muslims. Taking into account that Muslims constituted only 1.46 percent of the total population, their support for these Islamic political parties was still well below the national average. Like the MYM and Qibla, who projected the utopian vision of an Islamic state, the Islamic political parties projected the vision of a utopia with an emphasis on Islamic morality; however, they showed little sign of attempting to respond to the real ethical challenges of a democracy that wants to protect the rights of all citizens.

Ebrahim Rasool, a former MYM and UDF member, was elected as the premier of the Western Cape in August 2004. Rasool was committed to religious pluralism, not to the "fundamentalist" Islamic discourse that avoided the real challenges of society. For him, just as the religious leaders developed a theology of liberation during the struggle against apartheid, so developing a theology of complementing religion with politics was now crucial for guiding religiously diverse communities. Thus he saw no contradiction between being a politician and having a religious identity. A politician with a religious identity could be more sensitive to the concerns not only of his own religious community but also of others.

The MJC supported the 2009 elections on the grounds that, for a Muslim minority, an Islamic state in a non-Muslim country was unrealistic. Thus they argued that Muslims should support the political party that served Muslim objectives, which included the establishment of a just and moral order for all South Africans. Furthermore, they argued that Muslims should become an integral part of the political structures of the country and participate in shared values but without sacrificing their Islamic principles.

From the preceding information, we can conclude that the Islamic political thought of persons and organizations in South Africa changed in accordance with the changes in the sociopolitical conditions of the country. During the apartheid era, Muslims made a significant contribution to the struggle for justice in South Africa for all South Africans. After the establishment of a democratic state, Muslims came to terms with the new challenges of a secular constitution that protected the rights of all its citizens. Muslim religious leaders encouraged the support of political parties that could also serve Muslim objectives but cautioned against sacrificing Islamic principles and values as a result of that support.

See also apartheid; al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89); Mawdudi, Abul al-A'la (1903–79); Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); Shari'ati, 'Ali (1933–77)

Further Reading

Farid Esack, "Three Islamic Strands in the South African Struggle for Justice," Third World Quarterly 10, no. 2 (1988); Muhammad Haron, The Dynamics of Christian-Muslim Relations in South Africa (ca 1960–2000): From Exclusivism to Pluralism, 2006; Lubna Nadvi, "South African Muslims and Political Engagement in a Globalising Context," South African Historical Journal 60, no. 4 (2008); Abdulkader Tayob, "Islamic Politics in South Africa between Identity and Utopia," South African Historical Journal 60, no. 4 (2008).

YASIEN MOHAMED

Southeast Asia

Islam is represented in almost all of the modern nation-states that make up Southeast Asia, whether as the hegemonic faith in Indonesia, Malaysia, or Brunei, or as that of a noticeable, often marginalized minority in such entities as Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, and the Philippines.

Though Islam perhaps was known to some of the peoples traversing the waters between China and India in the first centuries after the death of Muhammad, there is no firm evidence of it being taken up as the religion of state in Southeast Asia until the 13th century, when North Sumatran ports such as Perlak and Pasai, in the present-day Indonesian province of Aceh, adopted Islam, followed by numerous polities along both sides of the Strait of Malacca. Of these, Malacca, a Ming vassal that seems to have formally adopted Islam at the opening of the 15th century and emerged as the primary entrepôt in the straits, played a pronounced role in the further dissemination of Islam in the western reaches of the archipelago. The north coast ports of Java, Islamized around the same time, ensured that Islam penetrated the still-Indianized hinterland of that island and the spice-rich eastern part of the Indonesian archipelago.

Wherever Islam spread, the Arabic script was adopted, and Malay (often known as Jawi) emerged as the primary vehicle of regional scholarship. Scholars would travel as far afield as Mecca, supported by rulers eager to connect their lineages to that of the Prophet. By the beginning of the 17th century, these same rulers sought official titles from the Sharifs of Mecca, and in keeping with international trends, they also invested in connections with specific Sufi orders. Thus the Shattari order, often associated in Southeast Asia with the teachings of the Gujarati Muhammad b. Fadl Allah al-Burhanpuri (d. 1620), attained official favor in many parts of Sumatra and Java, particularly after the return to Aceh from Arabia of the Acehnese 'Abd al-Ra'uf al-Sinkili (1615–93) in the latter part of the 17th century.

Esoteric Sufi teachings were not necessarily encouraged for the broader population, however. Legal codes such as the Undang-undang Melaka (The laws of Malacca) often urged commoners to abstain from deliberate emulation of their rulers' dress and rituals and sometimes royally endorsed campaigns attempted to limit Sufi practices, especially those deemed to stray from Islamic norms. Allegedly antinomian preachers were repeatedly condemned for revealing the secrets of Sufism to the masses, as was the case with a campaign led by Nur al-Din al-Raniri (d. 1658) in Aceh in the 1630s.

As such campaigns were supported by an increasing number of local rulers, such as those of Gowa, South Sulawesi (Islamized ca. 1605), ever more Southeast Asians took to the study of fiqh (almost uniformly that of the Shafi'i madhhab [school of law]), which encouraged the ongoing dialogue with visiting scholars from the holy cities, Gujarat, the Hadhramaut, and Ottoman Cairo. Southeast Asia is remarkable for following a single madhhab and, until the Iranian Revolution, for having practically no Shi'i communities. This uniformity notwithstanding, the increasing penetration of the Europeans in the region from the early 16th century was not met by unified political action. After their conquest of the Muslim port of Manila in 1570, the Spanish effectively pushed back the frontiers of politically autonomous Islam to the southern reaches of the Philippines, while their Portuguese and later also Dutch competitors engaged in a long series of conquests and conversion, leaving the Southern Moluccas a patchwork of Muslim and Christian settlements.

Meanwhile, in the Malay lands and Java, sultans such as Iskandar Muda of Aceh (r. 1607–36) and his contemporary Agung of Mataram, Java (r. 1613–45), expanded their territories at the expense of Muslim rivals rather than the Western interlopers. In subsequent centuries their own domains and authority would be eaten away by the Dutch East India Company in the 18th century or Great Britain and the Netherlands in the 19th century. By the 1770s, however, the independent entrepôt of Palembang in South Sumatra had become a center of the Sammani Sufi order, said to have been at the heart of the resistance to both English and Dutch attacks in the distant wake of the Napoleonic Wars.

The rise of the Sammanis at Palembang had been inspired in part by one of that port's most famous sons, 'Abd al-Samad al-Falimbani (1719–89), who was composing Malay glosses of Ghazali's works in Mecca in the 1770s and also sending letters to Javanese rulers urging active jihad against the Dutch. While the latter intercepted these letters and grew more wary of Islam's political force, they were nonetheless taken aback by the religious rhetoric and effective resistance launched during the Java War of 1825–30 and by the Padri War that ravaged West Sumatra in the early 1800s before turning into an anticolonial conflict in the 1830s. In the case of Java in particular, it was apparent that the forces of the leading rebel Prince Dipanagara (1785–1855) included many people connected to the large, and relatively recent, network of Islamic schools (pesantren).

Such schools were furthermore spreading throughout the region at large. Although they were divided somewhat between those of Malay lands and those of Java and satellite isles such as Madura, they all sent ever more aspiring scholars and pilgrims on the hajj and into the arms of Sufi teachers, particularly the Naqshbandis, who were reasserting their place in Ottoman society after the Wahhabi occupation of the holy cities in the first quarter of the century. Travels, whether between schools or to Mecca, also engendered networks of kinship that could foster connections between politically aware subjects of British, Dutch, Spanish, and even Thai regimes in the region at large. (The Thais were conquering territories down the Malay Peninsula at the time.) With the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 and the increasing propagation of printed materials via Singapore, Mecca was rendered an ever more accessible refuge and fount of religious authority for Southeast Asian subjects. During the drawn-out Dutch attempt to annex the remains of Aceh in 1873, the local fighters, many bearing Sufi amulets, were the talk of the day in the holy city.

With the almost wholesale annexation of Southeast Asian territories and strong-armed incorporation of the last independent rulers of the Archipelago as clients, some Muslim activists linked themselves to Cairo and the rhetoric of religious reformism to seek political redress. Then, with the belated birth of Islamic periodicals at the opening of the 20th century, well-connected Muslims in the Dutch sphere began to establish welfare societies, schools, and associations. On Java this culminated in the establishment of the trade-oriented Sarekat Islam and the Cairo-oriented reformist movement Muhammadiyah in 1912, but there were like-minded activists elsewhere, too. They were countered by more conservative associations, such as the Nahdatul Ulama, founded in 1926 around a core of East Javanese 'ulama' with little liking for either the modernist pretensions to religious leadership or the disdain for Sufi orders that was gaining support in once-more Wahhabi Mecca.

Matters were somewhat different, however, in the British sphere, where local rulers were effectively made the final arbiters of Islamic law for their subjects after the Pangkor Treaty of 1874. Some encouraged the links to Cairo and the ongoing codification of Islamic law in their names, thereby winning a respect they retained under the Japanese occupation and the independence that followed in the decades after World War II.

By contrast, the Japanese occupation of 1942–45, which had radically reorganized Indonesian society and elevated such nationalists as Sukarno (1901–70) before the attempted return of the Dutch, left little formal political space for Islam. The assembly hurriedly convened in 1945 to debate the future of the state and ultimately decided not to declare it Islamic (causing this to be taken up as the aim of the Darul Islam insurgencies that broke out in West Java, Aceh, and Sulawesi in the 1950s). The Islamic parties, forcibly merged under the Japanese in the all-encompassing body known as Masyumi (an acronym for the Majelis Syuro Muslimin Indonesia, or "Consultative Council of Indonesian Muslims"), were divided on questions of strategy, with the Nahdatul Ulama withdrawing to contest the elections of 1955.

The final crushing of the Darul Islam by the early 1960s and the silencing of Masyumi's leaders by President Sukarno seemingly heralded the last gasps of Islamist activism in Indonesia. Even with the active collaboration of Muslim youth organizations in the countercoup that toppled Sukarno in 1965–66, political Islam received little encouragement during the long reign of President Suharto (1921–2008), though he did encourage the de facto Islamization of the regime in the 1990s. Islamic political parties only reemerged in the wake of his downfall in 1998. Once again the spectrum of Islamic political offerings was widespread, ranging from accommodating parties allied to the older Muhammadiyah and Nahdatul Ulama to the more strident, globally oriented Hizb ut Tahrir and the Partai Keadilan Sejahtera (PKS), formed under the Suharto administration in emulation of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. The latter group in particular seemed poised to make major gains after a series of corruption scandals in 2000 brought down Abdurrahman Wahid (1940–2009), formerly the head of Nahdatul Ulama and all too briefly the first Muslim intellectual president of the republic.

In the meantime, growing interreligious conflict in the Moluccas saw other nonstate Islamic actors enter the fray to act in the name of Indonesian Islam, from the Salafi-inspired Laskar Jihad (disbanded in the wake of the Bali bombing of 2004) to the more opaque Jemaah Islamiyah, led by old hands from the Darul Islam and recruited from among their descendants. The actions of the latter grouping, which courted funding and support from international Islamists while prosecuting a series of deadly bombings (most spectacularly in Bali in 2004 and Jakarta in 2003 and 2009), seemed calculated to engage a constituency that went far beyond any national boundaries, linking members in Malaysia, Indonesia, and the Southern Philippines.

With the effective neutralization of the main actors of the Jemaah Islamiyah network by the police and of a significant number of minority seats taken in parliament by such parties as PKS in recent years, it would be tempting to say that the problem of Muslim politics seems to have been resolved (for the moment) in Indonesia, with its open public sphere. In Malaysia, where an ascendant Malay majority is increasingly flexing its muscles either in support of the current paternalistic state ruled by the United Malays National Organization or as its most vocal opposition in the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS, Parti Islam Se-Malaysia), Islam and politics also remain inextricably but peacefully linked. By contrast the situation remains fraught for the populations of Southern Thailand and, to a lesser degree, the Southern Philippines, which have both witnessed insurgencies and repressions over the last decades. Indeed, the long-running violence in Southern Thailand in particular shows little sign of abating, though it may be seen less as a manifestation of global jihad than as a function of older Malay claims to sovereignty founded on Islam.

See also Indonesia; Malaysia

Further Reading

Azyumardi Azra, The Origins of Islamic Reformism in Southeast Asia Networks of Malay-Indonesian and Middle Eastern 'Ulama' in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, 2004; R. Michael Feener, Muslim Legal Thought in Modern Indonesia, 2007; Michael Laffan, The Makings of Indonesian Islam: Orientalism and the Narration of a Sufi Past, 2011; Duncan McCargo, Tearing Apart the Land: Islam and Legitimacy in Southern Thailand, 2008; Farish A. Noor, Islam Embedded: The Historical Development of the Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party PAS: 1951–2003, 2 vols., 2004; M. C. Ricklefs, A History of Modern Indonesia since c. 1200, 4th ed., 2008; William R. Roff, The Origins of Malay Nationalism, 2nd ed., 1995; Martin van Bruinessen, "Genealogies of Islamic Radicalism in Post-Suharto Indonesia," South East Asia Research 10, no. 2 (2002).

MICHAEL LAFFAN

sovereignty

The theme of sovereignty (ḥākimiyya) featured prominently in modern Islamic political thought during the mid-to-late 20th century in the context of emerging debates on the moral basis of legitimate political authority in the postcolonial era. Theoreticians of political Islam, seeking to construct an authentic Muslim identity in the face of growing Westernization and secularization policies, seized upon the theme of sovereignty to anchor their concept of an "Islamic state" and to contrast it philosophically with Western capitalist and Eastern socialist political systems. In the view of these Muslim thinkers, the critical difference with other political systems was that sovereignty in a Muslim polity belonged exclusively to God and not to the people. The objective of political life was not to fulfill the whims of human beings, they argued, but to discover God's will as guided by the Qur'an, the traditions (sunna) of the Prophet Muhammad, and the provisions of Islamic law.

The internal logic of this God-as-sovereign approach to politics was rooted in a traditional understanding of Islam. According to the Qur'an, "Governance belongs to God" (Q. 12:40), and those "who do not rule in accordance with what God has revealed are unbelievers" (Q. 5:47). The Qur'an uses the following adjectives to describe God: "the arbitrator" (al-ḥakam), "the eternal possessor of sovereignty" (mālik al-mulk), and "the bringer of judgment" (al-ḥasīb). Moreover, as a monotheistic religion, Islam holds the doctrine of the oneness of God (tawḥīd) as foremost in the profession of faith, integrating all domains of human existence, including the religious and the political. This approach to politics has posed a huge challenge for modernist Muslims seeking to reconcile Islam and democracy where popular sovereignty, according to international norms, is supreme.

The first major debate of the 20th century on sovereignty occurred during the Iranian Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11. The idea of a constitutional monarchy raised two pressing questions: (1) do democracy and a secular constitution have any legitimacy in a Muslim society, and (2) where does political sovereignty lie? A major public debate ensued wherein some senior clerics supported the revolution, arguing that a democratic constitution was compatible with Islamic norms because of the limits it placed on political tyranny. Others argued the opposite view, focusing on the supremacy of shari'a over constitutional law.

Ayatullah Khomeini's theory of the rule of Islamic jurist (wilāyat al-faqīh) draws upon this idea of the supremacy of the sovereignty of God. The constitution of the Islamic Republic of Iran that emerged after the 1979 Iranian Revolution tried to reconcile clerical sovereignty with popular sovereignty, but it clearly gave supremacy and veto power to the former in case of a clash between the two.

While Sunni Islamists reject a special role for the clergy in their vision of an Islamic state, they fully agree with the elevation of the sovereignty of God over popular sovereignty. The two most influential Sunni theoreticians of this concept are Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) and Mawdudi (1903–79). In his influential treatise Milestones, Qutb maintained that only a group of enlightened and committed thinkers and activists could lead the Muslim world out of the state of pagan materialism (jāhiliyya) toward a just society under the sovereignty of God.

Mawdudi developed a more detailed political theory than Qutb. He sought to reconcile the supremacy of divine sovereignty with the modern reality of popular sovereignty. He observed that Islam is the very antithesis of secular Western democracy and coined the term "theo-democracy," which he described as "divine democratic government, because under it the Muslims have been given a limited popular sovereignty under the suzerainty of God." In this theoretical model, which became widely popular among Sunni Islamists during the late 20th century, the entire Muslim population is involved in politics, but within the framework of the Qur'an and the sunna, while the executive is constituted by the general will of the Muslims, who have the right to depose it within the framework of Islamic law.

As the foregoing suggests, both mainstream Sunni and Shi'i Islamists share a particular skepticism toward full popular sovereignty. In the various political models proposed by both groups, there has been a call for the creation of a council of religious experts to ensure that the legislation that emerges from democratically elected parliaments does not violate Islamic norms. The most explicit and robust manifestation of this is in the Iranian Council of Guardians (Shura-i Nigahban), an appointed oversight body dominated by clerics that has veto power over parliamentary deliberations. Similarly, the 2007 draft platform of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, while less intrusive, called for an elected body of senior religious scholars to advise the president and parliament. This provision led to considerable controversy within Egypt, and it was dropped in the 2011 updated version of this document.

The development of Islamic political thought in the late 20th and early 21st centuries on the question of democracy has led to greater theorizing on the tension between popular and divine sovereignty. In the context of reformist Shi'i Islam, Iranian philosopher Abdolkarim Soroush sought to reconcile the two by affirming that, in essence, "the voice of the people is the voice of God."

Developing this theme further, Abdelwahab El-Affendi criticized the Islamist obsession with the sovereignty of God, noting that it has created a false obsession among Muslims while ignoring that which is central in political life: the question of human agency, the horizontal relationships between people, and the question of who should exercise authority here and now. Responding to the Islamist fear that full popular sovereignty could lead to the erosion of Islamic values, and hence the need for a religious oversight council, El-Affendi noted that in a Muslim society, most people will want to rule themselves according to values that reflect their indigenous traditions. It is up to the community to determine what these values should be and not merely one segment of the community.

See also authority; democracy

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Islam and the Challenge of Democracy, edited by Joshua Cohen and Deborah Chasman, 2004; Abdelwahab El-Affendi, "Democracy and Its (Muslim) Critics: An Islamic Alternative to Democracy?" in Islamic Democratic Discourse: Theory, Debates, and Philosophical Perspectives, edited by M. A. Muqtedar Khan, 2006; Sharough Akhavi, The Middle East: The Politics of the Sacred and the Secular, 2009; Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 1982; Roxanne Euben and Muhammad Qasim Zaman, eds., Princeton Readings in Islamist Thought: Texts and Contexts from al-Banna to Bin Laden, 2009; Nader Hashemi, "Religious Disputation and Democratic Constitutionalism: The Enduring Legacy of the Constitutional Revolution on the Struggle for Democracy in Iran," Constellations 17, no. 1 (2010).

NADER HASHEMI

Spain and Portugal (Andalus)

Andalus (Spain and Portugal) was initially a province of the Umayyad caliphate, based in Syria. The arrival of the Umayyad 'Abd al-Rahman I in Córdoba in 756, after escaping from the Abbasids, led to independent rule—a trend toward autonomy that had already begun under the previous Arab governors. It took more than 150 years for one of the descendants of the first Córdoban Umayyad amir to proclaim himself caliph. 'Abd al-Rahman III did so in 929, mainly as a reaction against the proclamation of the Fatimid caliphate in Ifriqiya in 909, which obliged him to develop a rival political and religious ideology. The rise to effective power of the Yemeni Arab Ibn Abi 'Amir—acting as chamberlain and helped by the fact that the third caliph, Hisham II, was a minor—and his descendants posed the problem of their legitimization, achieved mostly through jihad. Military reforms aiming at weakening the old conquest elites involved increased importation of Berber troops from North Africa. Dissatisfaction with these developments eventually led to civil wars—which sources tend to present as the result of enmity between Berbers and Andalusis—and to the "abolition" (ibṭāl) of the caliphate in Córdoba in the year 1031. Political fragmentation gave rise to a varying number of party kingdoms, whose rulers had different backgrounds and found different ways of legitimizing their power without ever claiming the caliphate. Only the Maghribi Hammudids—who claimed 'Alid (Idrisid) descent—obtained recognition as caliphs in a reduced area and for a short period. Coins struck at the time mention "the imam 'abd Allāh [servant of God], Commander of the Faithful," a useful formula that did not refer to any specific caliph but merely implied acknowledgment of the Sunni doctrine regarding the need for an imam as supreme leader of the community of believers. When after 1087 the Berber Almoravids started incorporating Andalus into their empire, they kept the same formula, while their leader limited himself to adopting the title Commander of the Muslims. The recognition of Almoravid rule by the Abbasid caliphs led eventually to the new formula "the imam 'abd Allāh [servant of God] the Abbasid," attested in a coin minted in 1140. The Almoravids were by then fighting a new Berber movement, that of the Almohads, founded by a messianic figure (Ibn Tumart), whose successor 'Abd al-Mu'min officially proclaimed himself caliph in 1147. 'Abd al-Mu'min developed a revolutionary policy that involved the creation of new political and religious elites and the assimilation of Almohad rule to God's command (amr Allāh). His successors reigned in Andalus until the Christian advance greatly reduced the territory under Muslim rule, with Córdoba and Valencia conquered in 1236 and Sevilla in 1248. The resulting power vacuum was filled by various local notables, such as Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. Yusuf b. Hud, known as Ibn Hud, who followed the Almoravid model by proclaiming himself Commander of the Muslims in Murcia in 1228, and Muhammad b. Nasr (Muhammad I, also known as Ibn al-Ahmar), who entered Granada in 1238 and made it his capital from which he extended his rule to Almería and Malaga, thus establishing the Nasrid kingdom. Almost three centuries later, in 1492, it was conquered by the Catholic kings, thus ending Muslim rule in the Iberian Peninsula. The existence of a Muslim population living under non-Muslim rule (the so-called Mudejares) gave rise to different legal opinions about whether this was in accordance with Islamic law. The Mudejar population was eventually forced to convert and finally was expelled from the Iberian Peninsula between 1609 and 1616.

Andalusi scholars sometimes produced works reacting to the political developments of their time. The Zahiri scholar Ibn Hazm (d. 1064)—from positions usually understood as pro-Umayyad—devoted a lengthy section of his book on religions and sects to the issue of who is entitled to the imamate (leadership) of the community, while in other works he argued for the illegitimacy and illegality of Taifa politics. Coinciding with Almoravid rule, two Andalusi scholars—Muradi (d. 1095) and Turtushi (d. 1126)—wrote Mirrors for Princes, Ibn ʿAbdun reflected in his ḥisba (commanding right and forbidding wrong) work the tendency of qadis (judges) to assume power in their towns in moments of a power vacuum, and Abu Bakr b. al-ʿArabi (d. 1148) elaborated his political thought within Ashʿarism. Almohad rule favored philosophical political thought, as shown by both Ibn Tufayl (d. 1185) and Ibn Rushd (d. 1198), within a tradition going back to Ibn Bajja (Avempace; d. 1138). Sufi involvement in politics—with Ibn Qasi (d. 1151) becoming a political leader thanks to his army of murīdān during the disintegration of Almoravid rule—or just the fear of such possibility led to the persecution of Ibn Barrajan (d. 1141) and Ibn al-ʿArif (d. 1141), and to the emigration under the Almohads of many Andalusi Sufis such as Abu Madyan (d. 1197), Ibn al-ʿArabi (d. 1240), and Ibn Sabʿin (d. 1270). Under the Nasrids, Ibn al-Khatib (d. 1375) reflected in his political writings his own experience as a member of the ruling circles, and Ibn al-Azraq (d. 1491) heavily relied on Ibn Khaldun's Muqaddima in his Badaʾiʿ al-Silk. Andalusi political thought still awaits a monographic study, analyzing both works such as those mentioned and the reception and assimilation of non-Andalusi thinkers and writers.

See also Berbers; caliph, caliphate; imamate; North Africa; Sufism; theology

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Maribel Fierro, Abd al-Rahman III, The First Cordoban Caliph, 2005; Endem, "The Qadi as Ruler," in Saber religioso y poder político actas del Simposio Internacional (Granada, 15–18 octubre 1991), 1994; Mercedes García-Arenal, Messianism and Puritanical Reform: Mahdis of the Muslim West, 2006; M. Cruz Hernández, Historia del pensamiento de al-Andalus, 2 vols., 1985; P. S. van Koningsveld and G. A. Wiegers, "The Islamic Statute of the Mudejars in the Light of a New Source," Al-Qantara 37 (1996); Miguel Asín Palacios, Abenházam de Córdoba y su historia crítica de las ideas religiosas, 5 vols., 1927–32; Janina Safran, The Second Umayyad Caliphate: The Articulation of Caliphal Legitimacy in al-Andalus, 2000; Peter C. Scales, The Fall of the Caliphate of Córdoba: Berbers and Andalusis in Conflict, 1994; D. Urvoy, Penseurs d'al-Andalus. La vie intellectuelle à Cordoue et Séville au temps des Empires Berberes (fin XIe siècle—début XIIIe siècle), 1990; D. Wasserstein, The Caliphate in the West: An Islamic Political Institution in the Iberian Peninsula, 1993.

MARIBEL FIERRO

succession

The fact that the Prophet Muhammad died in 632 without a surviving male heir ensured that succession in the nascent Islamic state, that of the Rightly Guided Caliphs, would not be based on simple heredity. A survey of later Islamic dynasties shows a number of distinct modes of succession, varying with region, period, and other factors; by and large, succession by primogeniture, which became the dynastic norm in premodern Europe, was followed relatively infrequently.

The legitimate leadership of the Islamic polity—the caliphate or imamate—after the Prophet Muhammad died became the subject of violent dispute in the early decades of the Islamic state and defined the major Muslim sectarian divisions, which produced two distinct narratives regarding the rightful rulers over the early Islamic polity. Sunni orthodoxy upheld the principle of acclamation, whereas Shiʿi orthodoxy favored designation or appointment. While succession to the universal caliphate is no longer a central issue in Islamic politics, views of the early disputes over succession became matters of theological doctrine and remain the subject of polemics.

Historical reports supporting the Sunni construction of Islamic salvation history agree that Muhammad did not designate a successor, leave an heir, or transfer political authority by covenant; at the same time, he did not repudiate political leadership. Nonselection of a successor apparently allowed for a flexible form of government, distinguishing the Islamic political system from contemporary forms of hereditary rule. Almost immediately following the Prophet's death, a political successor and leader of the Muslim community (umma) was installed without the use of force. While the Prophet's body was being prepared for burial, factions from the dominant Arab tribes of Medina, the anṣār, and their Meccan immigrant counterparts, the muhājirūn, gathered at a garden called Saqifat Bani Saʿidah in Medina to deliberate on the leadership issue. By most accounts, this brief public meeting was heated, tense, and nearly raucous. Without an explicit prophetic political directive or legal proof text to guide the assembly, the anṣār and muhājirūn each argued that the successor should come from their respective ranks because of their prominent services to Islam. A general agreement prevailed on Arab heritage, Islam, male gender, and nonslave status, but the particular choice of leader was contested. The anṣār proposed a two-ruler solution—"a leader (amīr) from us and a leader from you"—but it was rejected outright by the muhājirūn in favor of one ruler from the muhājirūn. Meanwhile, outside the Saqifa, Muhammad's uncle, ʿAbbas b. ʿAbd al-Muttalib, reportedly attempted to give the oath of allegiance (bayʿa) to ʿAli b. Abi Talib, thereby recognizing the Prophet's household (ahl al-bayt) as rightful successors, but garnered no support. Finally, Abu Bakr was elected as "the successor (khalīfa) of the Messenger of God," allegedly on the grounds of two widely acknowledged moral and social characteristics: his standing as Muhammad's closest and most trusted Companion and a shared Quraysh Arab heritage.

Toward the end of Abu Bakr's brief tenure (632–34), he reportedly chose ʿUmar b. al-Khattab as his successor after consulting prominent members of the community. ʿUmar's longer reign (634–44) ended with his assassination, but before he died, he had appointed a council comprised of six muhājirūn elders to elect his successor. This ad hoc electoral body chose 'Uthman b. 'Affan (644–56). After a 12-year tenure as caliph, 'Uthman was also assassinated and died before making any provisions for his successor. 'Ali b. Abi Talib was acclaimed as caliph, but conflict soon broke out because of 'Ali's failure to bring 'Uthman's assassins to justice, implicating him in the plot in the view of some of his opponents. 'Ali's rule witnessed a civil war and the first political schism in Islam, creating three distinct groups: the Shi'is, who were his supporters; the Kharijis, 'Ali's supporters who later turned against him because he negotiated with the enemy; and the 'Uthmanids or Umayyads, who denounced 'Ali's caliphate. The reign of the first four caliphs altogether did not exceed 30 years and ended with 'Ali's assassination, after which Mu'awiya founded the Umayyad dynasty (661–750) with its capital at Damascus. Sunni Islam arose as a compromise between the views of Shi'is and the Umayyads on the issue of succession in particular. Later Sunni views stressed that the succession was based on acclamation and the moral excellence of the caliphs, but also to some extent on tribal affiliation—the caliph had to be from the Quraysh tribe. It became a standard Sunni creed that these first four caliphs were all "Rightly Guided" and that the chronological sequence of their accession to the office matched their moral superiority among the Companions of the Prophet: Abu Bakr was first in terms of moral merit, then 'Umar, then 'Uthman, then 'Ali. It is often overlooked that the first four caliphs were all related to the Prophet by marriage.

According to the heresiographer Abu al-Fath Al-Shahrastani (d. 1153), Shi'is are "those who follow 'Ali in particular and assert his imamate and caliphate by appointment (waṣiyya) and delegation (naṣṣ) made either openly or secretly, and who believe that the imamate does not depart from his descendants." Shi'is agree that the caliphate rightly belonged to the Prophet's descendants through 'Ali and Fatima, "the People of the House" (ahl al-bayt), but are divided, as a result of succession disputes, into numerous splinter groups or sects. The most historically important of these Shi'i groups are the Zaydis, Isma'ilis, and Imamis. All of them adhere to 'Ali, but they differ on the number of legitimate imams and the manner and line of succession. The Zaydis maintain that any descendant of the Prophet can assume the imamate, provided that his claim is public and backed by force. In other words, the imam must rise up and establish a state. Their appellation derives from the name of Zayd (grandson of 'Ali b. al-Husayn who was the grandson of 'Ali), who led an unsuccessful revolt against the Umayyad regime and was killed in 740. The Imamis, or Twelvers, hold that the rightful leader of the Muslim community had to be a descendant of 'Ali's son Husayn and, as their doctrine developed, had to be designated explicitly by the previous imam. In accordance with this doctrine, they stress that the Prophet had explicitly designated 'Ali his successor at Ghadir Khumm while returning to Medina from the Farewell Pilgrimage (i.e., his last and only pilgrimage to Mecca), shortly before he died. A crisis occurred around 874 when their 11th imam, Hasan al-'Askari, died, apparently without issue. The doctrine came to be that his son, the Twelfth Imam, had gone into hiding and could be contacted only through a representative; this was termed the Lesser Occultation. After the fourth representative died in 941 without designating a successor, it was held that the Greater Occultation had begun: the believers could no longer contact the imam, even through a representative. Circulating incognito in the Muslim world because of the danger to himself and his adherents posed by the Sunni majority, and with his life miraculously prolonged by God, he would reveal himself as the mahdī ("Guided One") toward the end of time, filling the Earth with justice. The Isma'ili Shi'is emerged in the late ninth century, posing a revolutionary threat to Muslim leaders. Their view of succession resembled that of the Twelvers but they held that the sixth imam, Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765), had been succeeded by his son Muhammad b. Isma'il, who remained in occultation. Their doctrine stresses the possibility that the identity of the current imam could be hidden, even for several generations, before being revealed. The dominant Khariji view came to be that any Muslim who did not commit major sins could accede to the caliphate and revolt against any leader of the community who sinned.

The issue of political succession became an issue of theological difference not only among the various Shi'i groups but also among the Sunnis, Shi'is, and Kharijis. The Twelver and Isma'ili Shi'is regard the first three caliphs—Abu Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Uthman—as usurpers. The Zaydis, at least in the early period, accepted the legitimacy of Abu Bakr and 'Umar but rejected 'Uthman. The Kharijis accepted the legitimacy of Abu Bakr and 'Umar but rejected both 'Uthman and 'Ali. Sunni theologians have denounced as heretics anyone who denies the legitimacy of any of the Rightly Guided Caliphs and even one who denies that their order of superiority follows the chronological order of their succession.

Hereditary rule was introduced to the Islamic polity with the establishment of the Umayyad dynasty. Mu'awiya, the former governor of Damascus, who became universal caliph by default when 'Ali was assassinated in Kufa, Iraq, had his followers swear a bay'a to his son Yazid, thereby recognizing him as heir apparent. (Although it should be noted there that, upon the death of his father 'Ali, Hasan became caliph by acclamation, but after a few months, he abdicated to Mu'awiya in order to avoid civil war in the year known as the "Gathering" ['ām al-jamā'a] circa 661, since it unified Muslim rule.) This move worked, and Yazid indeed succeeded his father. When Yazid's son Mu'awiya abdicated, the rule passed to an uncle, Marwan b. al-Hakam. Rule remained among the descendants of Marwan for the remainder of the dynasty, but the nature of succession changed somewhat. The caliphs appointed two heirs apparent, ostensibly in order to keep rule within the family in case one died or proved unacceptable, but they would try to depose one or more of the heirs apparent in order to favor their own sons as they sensed that they were reaching the end of their reign.

The Abbasid caliphs (750–1258) continued the practice of naming an heir apparent, usually preferring their sons though not necessarily the eldest, but succession disputes were frequent among the sons, brothers, and cousins of the previous caliph. The most famous succession dispute is undoubtedly that which caused a four-year civil war (809–13) between Amin (r. 809–13) and Ma'mun (r. 813–33), sons of Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809). Ma'mun was the elder son, but Harun probably appointed Amin because his mother belonged to the Abbasid family, while Ma'mun's mother was a Persian woman. The war divided the entire empire in two, with Amin in control of the west, including Iraq and Syria, and Ma'mun in control of the east, including Iran. Ma'mun's forces eventually succeeded in capturing Baghdad and beheaded Amin. In a surprising move, Ma'mun named as his heir apparent 'Ali al-Rida, the eighth imam of the Imamis, while also recognizing Rida's son Muhammad as the next in line for the caliphate. 'Ali al-Rida died in 818, before this succession came to pass, but for a time it appeared that Ma'mun (r. 813–33) intended to restore caliphal rule from the Abbasid line—descendants of the Prophet's uncle 'Abbas—to the line of 'Ali.

The rise of the Seljuq dynasty (11th to 14th century) in the central Islamic lands introduced another type of political apparatus and mode of succession. The nomadic Turks created an appanage state, rule by family federation in which the paramount member of the family assigned male relatives parts of the conquered domain as semiautonomous realms. Thus the great Seljuq, Malikshah I (1072–92), divided up most of Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Anatolia among his relatives and also among his leading generals, creating several Seljuq states as well as the dynasties of the Saltuqids (1071–1202), Danishmendids (1086–1178), and others in Anatolia. This mode of succession usually required continual expansion by conquest to have any longevity; the empire was prone to fall apart into several warring kingdoms upon the death of the paramount ruler. After the death of Malikshah in 1092, for example, the Seljuq realm split between his brother and four sons, who immediately began internecine warfare.

The Mamluk dynasty in Egypt and Syria (1250–1517) provides another distinct, and unusual, mode of succession. Rule was restricted to Turkish warriors who had been bought as slaves and trained in the barracks of a military commander, also a slave. The offspring of these slave warriors were excluded from the office of sultan and other posts of high command, so hereditary succession was ruled out. Instead, the heir to the throne tended to be one of the protégés of the former sultan, who formed a tight and loyal group, unless a rival faction succeeded in ousting the incumbents.

Succession in the long-lived Ottoman dynasty (1299–1924) varied over time, but its modes of successions were formative. Beginning with the reign of Mehmed II (r. 1444–46, 1451–81) in the 15th century, a fratricidal system of succession that may be described as survival of the fittest son—and not necessarily the eldest—became the norm. The Ottoman sultans' practice was to assign governorships to the princes in order to prepare them for rule. When the sultan died, the princes would race with their supporters to Istanbul, the capital, in order to vie for the succession. The victorious prince would then have all of his brothers and half brothers immediately killed to prevent future coups d'état by rival claimants to the throne. Beginning in the 17th century, the fratricidal system was modified to one of permanent house arrest. Surviving brothers were confined for life to apartments in the harem of the Topkapi palace that came to be known as the Kafes, or "cage." Kept under constant surveillance by palace personnel, they were prevented from producing an heir by having access only to barren concubines. At the same time, there was a shift from succession by sons to one of agnatic seniority in the Ottoman family, so that a brother often succeeded instead of a son. This system remained in place until the end of the empire in 1924, despite attempts in the 19th century to establish primogeniture as the principle of succession.

Beginning in the 19th century a number of royal dynasties in the Muslim world, influenced by Western models, adopted primogeniture as their official modes of succession. They included the Muhammad 'Ali dynasty of Egypt, the Alaoui dynasty of Morocco, the Hashemi dynasty of Jordan, the Pahlavi shahs of Iran, and others. Other monarchies, such as those of Saudi Arabia and the Gulf countries, maintained a looser mode of succession related to traditional tribal systems of leadership, whereby primogeniture was not strictly required. An heir was chosen by a flexible system of agnatic seniority from among the deceased ruler's brothers, sons, or even nephews, who were viewed as highly competent and capable of bolstering the legitimacy of the dynasty and galvanizing support among the various factions within the ruling family.

See also authority; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); Shi'ism; Sunnism

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Joseph A. Kechichian, Succession in Saudi Arabia, 2001; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam, 1981; Wilferd Madelung, Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate, 1998; Al-Shahrastani, Al-milal wa-n nihal, 2 vols., 1988; W. Montgomery Watt, Islamic Political Thought, 1968.

FIAZUDDIN SHU'AYB

Sudan

The history of the interaction between Islam and politics in Sudan traditionally begins with the anticolonial revolution led by the "Mahdi" Muhammad Ahmad (a former Sufi turned messianic leader claiming to be the "rightly guided one," a figure from Muslim eschatology) in 1881. According to those who celebrate the current political order, it pauses for about 100 years, and then resumes with the Revolution of National Salvation (thawrat al-inqādh al-waṭanī) in 1989, which brought to power General 'Umar Hasan Ahmad al-Bashir with the backing of the National Islamic Front (NIF) and its erstwhile leader Hasan al-Turabi. President Ja'far Numayri's imposition of the shari'a in September 1983 is another convenient starting point for what is understood to be the current wave of Islamization. A more careful appraisal of Sudanese history, however, suggests that the relationship between Islam and politics in Sudan has been a consistent and complex feature of the development of the political order since at least the 16th century. Starting with the mutually beneficial relationship of Sudanese Sufi shaykhs with the leaders of the Funj kingdom of Sinnar and continuing during Turkish-Egyptian rule in the 19th century, Islamic politics wove through even British colonial efforts. Governor General Francis Reginald Wingate (r. 1899–1916) indeed deserves a seat among the great reformers of Sudanese Islam. It was under his initiative that the British created a new scholarly religious class ('ulama') in Sudan, which they hoped to appropriate, while suppressing the remnants of ecstatic Mahdism and other "local" varieties of Islam from which they feared a reemergence of Islamic political fervor. In the immediate postindependence years, political rule vacillated between a party affiliated with the Sufi Khatmi order (which went by several names) and a party affiliated with the sons (and religious organization) of the aforementioned "Mahdi" (Hizb al-Umma). "The Revolution of National Salvation" brought to power an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood for the first time, the NIF, which experimented with projects to create an Islamic economy, education system, legal apparatus, and social order, funneling significant resources to such projects. Since the coming of the Revolution of National Salvation, Islamic politics has by no means been stagnant, as the Islamic political project of the early revolution has been reworked to meet the demands of an ever-changing political context.

It is in this fertile ground that Sudanese Islamic political thought has flourished. The luminaries of the modern period—individuals such as Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932), the liberal Muslim reformer and "post-Sufi" Mahmoud Mohamed Taha (d. 1985), and the leader of the Umma Party Sadiq al-Mahdi (b. 1936)—are well covered in the modern literature. Less attention has been paid to the unique situation of a large class of Sudanese intellectuals who were perhaps the first in the Sunni world to put the ideas of resurgent 20th-century Muslim Brotherhood–style Islamism into practice with the foundation of the Islamic state in 1989. The period from 1989 until the present has provided a laboratory in which the utopian ideas of the Islamic Movement (al-ḥaraka al-islāmiyya) were reformulated in order to respond to realities on the ground. Forced to confront the religious and cultural diversity of Sudan (made up of more than 100 languages, a sizable Christian population, and followers of tribal-based religious systems), and an international and regional political landscape that responded negatively to Sudanese reforms, these Islamist thinkers had to factor in variables unimagined by their earlier brethren who had never tasted power. Despite the notoriety of thinkers like Turabi, the Revolution of National Salvation and its project of social reform (called by the intellectuals who led the movement the Civilization Project, al-mashrū' al-ḥaḍārī) has received little scholarly attention, and its leaders' agenda of Islamic renewal remains hidden in the pages of government reports of ministries such as Social Planning (Wizarat al-Takhtit al-Ijtima'i), in local periodicals, or in the multitude of cultural products produced by the government or its allies such as poetry and song.

Moreover, Sudanese Islamic intellectuals outside of the NIF and its offshoots, such as the leaders of Salafi groups, like Ansar al-Sunna and the shaykhs of myriad Sufi orders, put barely a word to the page, and thus their politically relevant thought is little known outside of Sudanese circles. Indeed, the true range of Sudanese Islamic political thought outside of the ruling Islamist elite has mostly gone unnoticed in scholarly literature, with the notable exception of the trend begun by Taha, the Republican Brotherhood movement.

Since the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) in 2005 with the majority non-Muslim and southern Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM) and the reorganization of the state it occasioned, some scholars have heralded the end of the Islamic experiment or the beginning of "post-Islamism," as if a failure of the ideas of an intellectual such as Turabi amounted to the failure of Muslim politics more broadly. A closer look at this period reveals that the problems faced by the ruling elite when it had to harmonize its vision of the Islamic state with political realities on the eve of the short-lived experiment with national unity, did not lead to a dead end for Islamic politics but rather to a new flourishing thereof. Muslim organizations from Sufis to Salafis took the opportunity that this opening of the political window afforded to offer new interventions into models of Islamic statehood, public order, and the proper relationship between religion and politics. With the separation of the south on July 9, 2011, some members of the ruling party in the north have promised to cancel the multicultural provisions of the Sudanese Constitution now that the non-Muslim southerners are "gone" and indeed are celebrating separation as a new birth for the project of Islamic statehood more broadly. In the new Republic of South Sudan, the southern Muslim minority is putting forth its vision for the role of Islam in this avowedly secular state, and its positions span from an embrace of a religion-blind secularism as the best way to achieve equal rights for all south Sudanese, to armed rebellion demanding 30 percent representation for Muslims in the new government. It is undeniable that Islamic political thought will play an important role in Sudan's immediate future in both the north and the south.

See also Mahdi of the Sudan (1844–85); Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed (1909–85); al-Turabi, Hasan (b. 1932)

Further Reading

Abdelwahab el-Affendi, Turabi's Revolution: Islam and Power in Sudan, 1990; Einas Ahmed, "Political Islam in Sudan: Islamists and the Challenge of State Power (1989–2004)," in Islam and Muslim Politics in Africa, edited by Benjamin Soares and Rene Otayek, 2007; Alex De Waal and A. H. Abdel Salam, "Islamism, State Power and Jihad in Sudan," in Islamism and its Enemies in the Horn of Africa, edited by Alex de Waal, 2004; Daisuke Maruyama, "Sufism and Tariqas Facing the State: Their Influence on Politics in the Sudan," Orient: Reports of the Society for Near Eastern Studies in Japan 46, 2011; Neil McHugh, Holy Men of the Blue Nile: The Making of an Arab-Islamic Community in the Nilotic Sudan, 1500–1850, 1994; Noah Salomon, "The Salafi Critique of Islamism: Doctrine, Difference and the Problem of Islamic Political Action in Contemporary Sudan," in Global Salafism: Islam's New Religious Movement, edited by Roel Meijer, 2009; Ruediger Seesemann, "Between Sufism and Islamism: The Tijaniyya and Islamist Rule in Sudan," in Sufism and Politics: The Power of Spirituality, edited by Paul Heck, 2007; T. Abdou Maliqalim Simone, In Whose Image? Political Islam and Urban Practices in Sudan, 1994; Gabriel Warburg, Islam, Sectarianism and Politics in Sudan since the Mahdiyya, 2003.

NOAH SALOMON

Sufism

Sufism (taṣawwuf) is the mystical current of thought in Islam, the individual mystic being known as a Sufi. Among the Companions of the Prophet Muhammad were persons who wanted to strive for more than the outward observance of the religious law and the customs founded by the Prophet. While fulfilling their religious duties, they also paid attention to what was happening to their souls and tried to harmonize these internal experiences with the external observances through asceticism and renunciation of the world. As a result of the great conquests, secularization of life and luxury, contrary to the ideals of the original Islamic community, became widespread, and the ascetics believed that the truly God-fearing person could save himself from such temptations only by withdrawing from the world.

The representatives of the ascetic movement wore rough woolen cloth (ṣūf) as a visible reaction against people who wore more luxurious clothing and possibly also as an imitation of the Christian monks.

In the eighth century, a fringe group of the movement called ṣūfiyya emerged. They developed views about the love of God, citing the Qur'an (5:54): "He loves them, and they love Him." They intensified this relation by playing music and reciting and listening to love poems (samā'). For the ṣūfiyya, God was the beloved celebrated in these poems, and the love relation described in them was their relation to God. Listening to these poems often put them in a state of ecstasy (wajd), brought about in particular by the exercise of dhikr allāh (recollection of God).

A Sufi was poor (faqīr), renounced this world, and devoted himself to the ardent service of God. In his eyes, an even greater enemy was his base self (nafs), experienced as the seat of all evil lusts, which impeded real renunciation of the world and exclusive surrender to God. It was therefore his task to exercise self-training in order to do away with the self and all impulses of its will. The final obliteration of personal activity was experienced as an absorption, a cessation of being, in God (fanā'). A road (ṭarīq or ṭarīqa, the later word for "dervish order") along which the mystic traveled (sulūk) led to this goal. In the internal experience, it led across a number of way stations (manāzil), locations (maqām), and situations (ḥāl). Already in early times, many interpreted this road as a journey toward God through the macrocosmos.

A center of intellectual mysticism developed in the Abbasid capital of Baghdad under the leadership of Junayd (d. 910), to whose authority almost all later Sufism refers. Other prominent early mystics include Sahl al-Tustari (d. 896) in Basra and the famous Hallaj, whose exaggerated and challenging sayings provoked the state authorities, leading to his execution in Baghdad in 922.

The 10th and 11th centuries were a period of consolidation in which great collections and textbooks appeared that gave Sufism its final orthodox tone. The writings of Sarraj (d. 988), Sulami (d. 1021), and Qushayri (d. 1074) collected information about Sufism and Sufis. Classical Sufism found a certain culmination in the activities of Ghazali (d. 1111). Originally a theologian, he converted to mysticism after a crisis in his life. In his main work, the Ḥiyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn (Revival of the religious sciences), he accomplished a synthesis of theological science and mysticism. Increasingly, the Persian language was also used in Sufi literature, which until far into the tenth century had been written only in Arabic. Sufism was to be of particular importance for the Persian poetry of 'Attar (d. 1220), Rumi (d. 1273), and Jami (d. 1492) and later in Turkish, Urdu, and other languages.

Since early times, Sufism was enriched by admitting non-Islamic ways of thinking, above all Neoplatonism. A broad influence set in only much later, however, through the works of Shihab al-Din Yahya al-Suhrawardi (d. 1191), who was from Persia, and Ibn al-'Arabi (d. 1240), who was from Spain but died in Damascus. Suhrawardi joined mystical experiences with older Iranian traditions. Ibn al-'Arabi drew up a Neoplatonic-Gnostic system dominated by the idea of the unity of all beings (waḥdat al-wujūd). Later, opposition arose against aspects of Sufism, which Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) considered as abuses.

Mystic life was increasingly cultivated in the orders (ṭuruq), which have been its characteristic home. The orders originated in the 12th and 13th centuries, during which Sufi groups were formed with fixed rules and a hierarchal leadership.

The most important orders, each with suborders and secondary branches, are the Qadiris (found throughout the entire Islamic world, with the exception of Shi'i Iran); Kubrawis (who were spread throughout Central Asia); Naqshbandis (who arose in Central Asia and spread to India, the Caucasus, Kurdistan, and South Arabia); Khalwatis (who were spread throughout the Ottoman Empire and grew in Egypt and the rest of the Arab world from the 17th to 18th centuries, with branches, such as the Sammanis and Tijanis, that are important to more recent history in Africa); Shadhilis (who arose chiefly in North Africa); Mevlevis, known as "the whirling dervishes" (who traced their origin to Rumi but were founded in the 14th century and were influential within the Ottoman Empire); and Bektashis (who are said to have been founded by an Anatolian saint, Hajji Bektash [d. ca. 1270], and developed in the Ottoman Empire).

The orders generally have fixed, written rules, which usually include the following points:

The order's affiliation. They state the order's affiliation (silsila), which is traced back from the present leader to the Prophet Muhammad and may comprise 30 to 40 degrees. These affiliations are frequently not very historical; in the various orders, they often coincide from the Prophet onward to the foundation of the specific order in the 13th to the 15th century, but after that date, differentiation appears.

The conditions and rituals for admission into the order. Some orders take men and women, some only men. The novice owes the shaykh unconditional obedience in the affairs of everyday life.

Instructions for the use of the formulas for the dhikr (remembrance of God). These deal with the regulation of breathing, the rhythms in which these formulas must be recited, and the speed at which they must be performed.

Instructions regarding seclusion (khalwa). The Sufi often withdraws for a length of time, which may span weeks, in a special, screened-off, small room in order to devote himself to dhikr exercises. Precise instructions are given for the site and the arrangement of space, the length of the seclusion, the sequence of the formulas and litanies, the prescriptions for posture, and practical points such as maintenance and cleanliness.

Advice. Often advice is also given concerning the relations between the members of the order.

The most important practice of the Sufis and of the Sufi communities is the dhikr, and with some orders music and dance play a large role. These were rejected by the theologians, as well as by Ibn Taymiyya and his school; others, like Ghazali, accepted music (samā') but rejected dance.

In early times, even during the Prophet's lifetime, dhikr could involve picturing God in one's mind and thinking of Him, for which purpose meetings were held. The early ṣūfiyya recited certain formulas in common. Later, dhikr means to have God's name (allāh) always present and to pronounce it while paying attention to certain breathing techniques. This recital of God's name could lead to a state of ecstasy accompanied by visions. At times, the schools or orders developed specific methods for remembering God. Upon admission into the order, these methods were "implanted" into the novice by the teacher (talqīn al-dhikr).

Many prominent teachers and personalities of Sufism attained sainthood soon after their deaths, some even during their lifetimes. They were said to have supernatural knowledge and the power to work miracles, and their tombs often became places of pilgrimage. Garlands of stories and legends developed about their lives and works, forming the basis of hagiographies.

The model for miracle-working saints was the Prophet Muhammad himself, to whom supernatural features were ascribed by the Sufis. The Prophet's life (sīra) and his sayings and actions (sunna) were an example to follow. The Sufis not only imitate the Prophet with body and soul (imitatio Muhammadi) but also exert theselves to keep Muhammad ever-present in their thoughts and feelings, and this practice could be so intense that the Sufis thought they saw Muhammad in person and heard his words and advice. They were convinced that Muhammad lives on after his death in a transformed existence, and in later times the term "Muhammad's path" (ṭarīqa muhammadiyya) was used in this context.

The mystical path is in principle open to every Muslim. According to the Sufis, therefore, anyone can arrive at higher forms of religious knowledge. On the other hand, Shi'is, for whom religious authority and knowledge are associated with degrees of consanguinity with the Prophet Muhammad through the imams, were hostile to the "democratic" idea of knowledge upheld by the Sufis.

Groups founded on the basis of strong "ideological" ties were capable of developing strong sociopolitical powers. For example, a shaykh with a charismatic personality could receive from worldly rulers rich gifts that he might use to further the worldly influence of his order. He might win the loyalty of entire tribes if, as often happened, he succeeded in the role of peacemaker in tribal society. He might establish a community around his rule that swore allegiance to him. The state of Sanusi in Libya, for instance, emerged on the basis of its peacemaking function. If the power of the order was directed outwardly in military undertakings, such as was the case with the Safavids at the end of the 15th century in Iran, it was even possible for an empire to form.

European observers in the 19th century, especially colonial officials whose job it was to watch over Islamic opposition movements, noticed this strong group solidarity. They noted that Sufi shaykhs and groups often supported resistance to European colonialization. One example is the famous Shamil in Daghestan, who organized resistance to the Russian conquest. In North Africa, there were the Sanusis and the amir 'Abd al-Qadir, who was a member of the Qadiris. The so-called littérature de surveillance produced by the colonial officials created the image of a dark conspiracy across an immense international network led by secretive Sufi shaykhs against European civilization. This literature, often based on the most unreliable sources, exerted a considerable influence on European scholarship.

In contemporary times, many Western-oriented Muslim reformers see dervish orders as a cause of weakness and decadence in the Muslim world. In Turkey, orders have been prohibited since 1925. For the so-called fundamentalists, such as the Wahhabis, who are dominant in Saudi Arabia, Sufism is an aberration of what they see as the true form of Islam. The Wahhabis view the veneration of shaykhs, an essential feature of the orders, as a form of idolatry, the suppression of which they consider to be pleasing to God. Consequently, Sufi orders are also forbidden in Saudi Arabia, and the Saudi regime spends sizable sums of money throughout the Islamic world to combat the influence of Sufi orders. Several orders have moved their center from post-revolutionary Iran to Western countries, especially England and America. The internal Sufi discussion concerning this double challenge by Western rationalism and Islamic fundamentalism has scarcely begun.

See also brotherhoods; shaykh, ptr

Further Reading

Julian Baldick, Mystical Islam, 1989; Richard Gramlich, Die Wunder der Freunde Gottes, 1987; Louis Massignon, Essai sur les origines du lexique technique de la mystique musulmane, 1955; Alexandre Popovic and Gilles Veinstein, Les Voies d'Allah, 1996; J. Spencer Trimingham, The Sufi Orders in Islam, 1971.

BERNDE RADTKE

al-Suhrawardi, Abu Hafs 'Umar (ca. 1145–1234)

Shihab al-Din Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi was a celebrated 13th-century Sufi master of Baghdad who, in addition to directing a number of the city's endowed residential lodges for Sufis, was a popular preacher, jurist, prolific author, and court diplomat of the ambitious 34th Abbasid caliph Nasir (r. 1180–1225). Hailing from a Persian-speaking family of Shafi'i scholars and Sufis who had made a name for themselves in Baghdad, he eventually drew the attention of the caliph, who in 1183—probably acting on the influence of his mother, Zumurrud Khatun (d. 1202 or 1203)—installed him as director of a newly endowed Sufi lodge known as the Ribat al-Ma'muniyya. As he routinely did with a number of Baghdad's more prominent Sufis and 'ulama', the caliph would call upon Suhrawardi over the next 30 years to conduct no less than four diplomatic missions in support of his al-da'wa al-hādiya (guiding call), a wide-ranging and sophisticated religiopolitical campaign aimed at reasserting and revivifying the long since de jure authority of the Abbasid caliphs.

In 1192 Suhrawardi was sent to the strategically important Armenian town of Akhlat in order to secure the loyalty of its military governor, a strategy that the caliph had already employed to great effect upon his accession in 1180. Similarly, in 1207–8, he sent Suhrawardi to the Ayyubid courts of Syria and Egypt, where he not only delivered caliphal diplomas and robes of honor but also conveyed the ceremonial trousers (sirwāl) marking initiation into the caliph's newly centralized futuwwa (chivalric) order. A later mission to the camp of the rebellious Khwarazm Shah 'Ala' al-Din Muhammad (r. 1200–20) in 1217–18 proved less successful, but in 1221 Suhrawardi found a much friendlier reception at the court of the Seljuqs of Rum in Konya, where he ceremoniously presented the illustrious 'Ala' al-Din Kayqubad (r. 1219–37) with the caliphal tokens of investiture. Owing to the caliph's support, Suhrawardi succeeded toward the end of his life in managing at least five separate endowed Sufi lodges in Baghdad as well as drawing around himself a sizable group of often well-positioned associates, students, and disciples.

Replicating the practice of the Great Seljuqs, and in an effort to legitimate their rule, both the caliph and his competitors systematically drew upon the popular religious and moral authority held by urban Sufi masters and 'ulama' such as Suhrawardi, often to measurable effect. As but one figure in a much larger group of Sufis and 'ulama' whom the caliph drew upon in support of his grand political aims, Suhrawardi is significant not for any particular contribution to the caliph's program but rather as a particularly well-documented example of someone important to the public and political life of the age. Although recent research has shown that previous scholarship overstated Suhrawardi's personal role in the far-reaching political agenda of the caliph (as he was neither the caliph's court theologian nor did he systematically propagate a new theory of the caliphate based on its unification with Sufism and the futuwwa), the Sufi master was nonetheless vigorous in support of his patron. He publicly affirmed allegiance to the Abbasid caliphate as an article of faith and was keen to buttress the caliph's carefully crafted image as a member of the 'ulama' by programmatically quoting hadith transmitted on his authority. As evinced in a polemical text against students of Greek philosophy he wrote near the end of his life, the Idalat al-'Iyan 'ala al-Burhan (Directing the sight toward decisive proof), Suhrawardi extended this support to the caliph's successor, Mustansir (r. 1226–42), characterizing the new caliph as a fully actualized Sufi and the institution of the caliphate itself as a mystical link between God and the Muslim community at large.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); caliph, caliphate; chivalry; Sufism; 'ulama'

Further Reading

A. Hartmann, an-Nasir li-Din Allah (1180–1225): Politik, Religion, Kultur in der späten Abbasidenzeit, 1975; Erik S. Ohlander, Sufism in an Age of Transition: 'Umar al-Suhrawardī and the Rise of the Islamic Mystical Brotherhoods, 2008.

ERIK S. OHLANDER

suicide

Suicide (qatl nafs, intiḥār) is strictly prohibited in the Islamic tradition. The Qur'an is ambiguous on the matter: in 4:29, "do not kill your selves" may refer to infighting between believers, not suicide, and in 2:195, "make not your hands contribute to your destruction" does not necessarily refer to self-killing. Tradition (hadith), however, clearly condemns suicide as a grave sin. Suicide has always occurred in the Muslim world but has remained relatively rare. Contemporary Muslim populations have very low official suicide rates, and quantitative studies suggest that belief in Islam reduces suicide rates more than belief in any other major religion.

While suicide is universally condemned by Islamic legal authorities, self-sacrifice for the good of Islam may be praised as martyrdom. This ambiguity has generated debates throughout Islamic history over self-sacrificial behavior in combat. In classical times debates centered on inghimās, the storming of an enemy target by an individual or small group at very high risk of death. Most medieval jurists condoned inghimās provided that certain conditions were met: the context must be one of legitimate jihad, the attacker's intentions must remain pure, and the attack must carry real military benefits. Irregular operations such as the assassinations by Azraqi Kharijis and Nizari Isma'ilis (known as the Assassins)—operations that usually involved the death of the attacker—were widely condemned.

Modern suicide bombings have revived this debate. Suicide bombing as a tactic was first introduced in the early 1980s by Shi'i militants in Lebanon. During the 1980s, Shi'i militants launched some 40 suicide bombings in Lebanon and Kuwait. The tactic was introduced to Sunnism in April 1993 by the Palestinian Islamist group Hamas, who, along with Palestinian Islamic Jihad, would launch close to 30 suicide bombings against Israel in the mid-1990s. Beginning in 2000, the number of attacks, perpetrating groups, and target countries all increased exponentially. Between 2000 and 2008, Islamist groups perpetrated around 1,500 suicide bombings, primarily in Palestine, Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan.

The introduction of suicide tactics in the early 1980s was linked to the rise, in the previous decade, of Shi'i Islamism as articulated by clerics such as Ayatollah Khomeini, Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, and Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah. Departing from traditional Shi'i quietism, these ideologues reinterpreted the martyrdom of the Prophet's grandson Husayn at Karbala as an ideal of self-sacrifice to be emulated in the modern world for the promotion of Islam. Revolutionary Iran promoted "martyrdom-seeking" (istishhād) as a virtue during the Iran-Iraq War, and the first modern "martyrdom-seeking operation" is said to have been a November 1980 attack on an Iraqi tank by a 13-year-old Iranian. Hamas's adoption of suicide bombings was directly inspired by the Lebanese group Hizbullah but also reflected the development of a Sunni Islamist discourse on martyrdom during the 1980s jihad in Afghanistan. Revolutionary Islamists in 1970s Egypt and Syria did not develop a suicide-martyrdom ideology; in fact, until the late 2000s, groups fighting Muslim regimes rarely undertook suicide operations. The causes of the growth in the 2000s remain a subject of debate; some scholars stress the role of non-Muslim military interventions in the Muslim world, others the spread of a cult of martyrdom, and yet others intergroup tactical learning.

Suicide bombing was initially more controversial in the Sunni world than in Shi'ism, where istishhād was sanctioned from the top of the clerical hierarchy. The Sunni debate, particularly intense in 1996 and 2002 following bombing waves in Israel, tended to pit Muslim Brotherhood ideologues (such as Yusuf al-Qaradawi) against official clergy in Egypt and Saudi Arabia. The second Palestinian intifada caused a clear shift in clerical as well as popular attitudes in favor of suicide bombings against Israel. Suicide bombings outside Israel are more controversial, especially since al-Qaeda attacks have resulted in substantial Muslim deaths and injuries.

In addition to the pragmatic argument that military asymmetry forces the weaker side to use irregular tactics, proponents of such attacks typically rely on three theological arguments. First, they say that the conditions for martyrdom are present, since the attacker's intention is pure and the tactic causes major damage, including instilling fear in the enemy's ranks. Second, they argue that Qur'an 4:29 is qualified by 4:30 ("whoever does this aggressively and unjustly, We will soon cast him into fire"), and that the classical story of the "People of the Ditch" (Q. 85:4–10), in which a believer instructed disbelievers how to kill him, in order to convince the latter of God's power, invalidates the distinction between direct and indirect self-killing. Third, they compare suicide bombings to inghimās. This involves a controversial interpretation of the Qur'an passage (Q. 9:111) where the phrase "they fight in Allah's way, so they slay and are slain" has been used by opponents to argue that the killing of the enemy must precede the death of the attacker, whereas in a suicide bombing the perpetrator dies before his victims.

See also jihad; martyrdom; terrorism

Further Reading

David Cook, Martyrdom in Islam, 2007; Bernard Kenneth Freamon, "Martyrdom, Suicide, and the Islamic Law of War: A Short Legal History," Fordham International Law Journal 27 (2003); Farhad Khosrokhavar, Suicide Bombers, Allah's New Martyrs, 2005; Maghreb-Machrek, no. 186 (2005); Assaf Moghadam, The Globalization of Martyrdom: Al Qaeda, Salafi Jihad, and the Diffusion of Suicide Attacks, 2008; Robert Pape, Dying to Win: The Strategic Logic of Suicide Terrorism, 2005; Franz Rosenthal, "On Suicide in Islam," Journal of the American Oriental Society, no. 66 (1946); David Jan Slavicek, "Deconstructing the Shariatic Justification of Suicide Bombings," Studies in Conflict and Terrorism 31, no. 6 (2008).

THOMAS HEGGHAMMER

Süleiman the Magnificent (1494–1566)

Süleiman the Magnificent was one of the most influential Ottoman sultans. His long reign (r. 1520–66), in terms of political imagination, falls into two distinct periods. The first, extending to roughly 1550, is dominated by a millenarian and messianic discourse as justification for universal monarchy. The second is characterized by the articulation and elaboration—institutional, cultural, and administrative—of a distinctively dynastic and Sunni Muslim imperial identity both within and without Ottoman borders.

The scene for the threats and crises that Süleiman faced in the first years following his accession was set by the brief but eventful reign of his father Selim (r. 1512–20). Selim established his reputation for martial ferocity by leading an army from Istanbul to Çaldıran in eastern Anatolia to confront and defeat the Safavid Shah Isma'il (r. 1501–24) in 1514. Isma'il's successful messianic claims, in an Anatolia that the Ottomans did not yet control, rivaled Selim's own equally grandiose and messianic ambitions. In the following years (1515–17) Selim pursued his quest for recognition as the astrologically foretold and widely expected ṣāhib-qirān (the Master of the Auspicious Conjunction and millennial world conqueror) by swiftly overrunning southeastern Anatolia, Syria, and Egypt. He advanced as far as Cairo, where the last Mamluk sultan was captured and executed.

Süleiman inherited the tremendous challenges represented by the simultaneous enormity and instability of his charismatic father's ideological legacy. He had first to establish both his personal prestige and a measure of actual authority over nominal dominions now twice the size of those Selim had inherited in 1512. After proving his political and martial credentials with the capture of Belgrade (1521) and Rhodes (1522), Süleiman elevated his own slave and confidant Ibrahim to the grand vizierate in 1523. For the next ten years Süleiman and the adherents to his cause pursued a program of self-consciously imperial expansion, based on the cultivation of a messianic image. A central theme of the prophetic literature current throughout the Mediterranean at this time was the capture of Rome and the recognition of Süleiman as the Last World (or Roman) Emperor of Christian and, latterly, Muslim apocalyptic tradition. The military high points of this program included the conquest of much of the Hungarian kingdom (1526); the siege of Vienna (1529); the German Campaign (Sefer-i Alaman, 1532), which sent Ottoman raiders into the Friuli and Carinthia; and the Campaign of the Two Iraqs (Sefer-i Irakeyn, 1533–36), which established direct Ottoman control from the northern Euphrates to the Persian Gulf.

Following Ibrahim Pasha's death (at Süleyman's command) in 1536, Süleiman's image as the uncontested ṣāhib-qirān was ever more richly articulated. He was identified simultaneously as the renewer (mujaddid) of the tenth Islamic century, the 30th quṭb al-aqṭāb (Axis Mundi), the one awaited for at the end of history who would realize a single society over which perfect justice reigned. This aura of prophetic kingship, reuniting universal temporal and spiritual authority, secured Ottoman dynastic legitimacy and expressed claims to supremacy over non-Muslim rivals and to priority in the Islamic world.

After the mid-1540s this new imperial persona and program was increasingly defined with reference to Islamic and Hanafi identity. It was embodied further in the form of a more bureaucratic administrative and judicial apparatus supervising the application of both kanun (sultanic prerogative and decree) and shari'a. The Ottoman pairing of kanun and shari'a was informed at once by the dynastic experience and the particular realities of the Ottoman Empire. Within a single reign, a military conquest venture based in the Balkans, where a small and heterogeneous Muslim military elite controlled substantially non-Muslim populations, was transformed into an empire. Within imperial Ottoman society Muslims of various sectarian and legal affiliations constituted a majority, and increasingly well-defined, protected non-Muslim communities formed a plurality.

See also Ottomans (1299–1924)

Further Reading

Virginia H. Aksan and Daniel Goffman, eds., The Early Modern Ottomans: Remapping the Empire, 2007; Esin Atıl, The Age of Sultan Süleyman the Magnificent, 1987; Cornell Fleischer, Bureaucrat and Intellectual in the Ottoman Empire: The Historian Mustafa Âli (1541–1600), 1986; Halil İnalcık and Cemal Kafadar, eds., Süleymân the Second and His Time, 1993; Metin Kunt and Christine Woodhead, eds., Süleyman the Magnificent and His Age: The Ottoman Empire in the Early Modern World, 1995; J. M. Rogers and R. M. Ward, Süleyman the Magnificent, 1988.

CORNELL FLEISCHER AND KAYA ŞAHİN

sultan

The word "sultan" in Arabic means, literally, "authority." The term appears in the Qur'an 37 times, both in the straightforward sense of authority or power over others (e.g., Q. 14:22; 17:33; 69:29) as well as in the sense of authentication, permission, or proof that a claim is true (e.g., Q. 27:21; 30:35; 37:157; 55:33), and in both cases is usually seen as granted by God. On seven occasions, "sultan" is something possessed by Moses (e.g., Q. 11:96: "We had indeed sent Moses with Our signs and a manifest authority"; similarly, Q. 23:45; 4:153; 28:35; 40:23; 44:19; 51:38). The term is never used in explicit personal attribution to any other apostolic figure in the Qur'an.

The Concretization of "Sultan" in the Early Islamic Period

With the collapse of the Abbasid caliphate, a process beginning in the mid-ninth century and completed in the first part of the tenth century, governing authority devolved upon a series of autonomous rulers, and, as caliphal authority devolved, so (more slowly) did the epithets associated with the caliphal position. By the late tenth century, the term "sultan" had begun to be applied as an appellation, not an official title, to various noncaliphal rulers; it was never used as a title on the coinage or on official inscriptions before the Seljuqs.

"Sultan" as a Title

The autonomous Sunni Muslim potentates who arose and arrogated power to themselves in the central caliphal lands from the mid-ninth century through the early 11th century were faced with a dilemma regarding the title they should adopt for themselves: mainstream Islamic law and theology at this time left no theoretical room for any sovereign ruler other than the caliph, and the Arabic term for king, malik, is a negative one in Islamic political parlance.

Thus most of the autonomous Sunni rulers of the ninth and much of the tenth century were known officially as amirs or commanders in order to maintain the pious fiction that their power and authority were delegated by the universal caliph, although the Buyids, for instance, adopted the slightly more descriptive title amīr al-umarā' ("commander of the commanders," a parallel construction to the caliphal "commander of the faithful"). Terms based on the ancient Iranian titles of shāh or pādishāh (king) and shāhānshāh (king of kings) were also employed, both by the Buyids and other dynasties, but these Persian titles obviously lacked a Qur'anic resonance and aura of Islamic legitimation.

Many of the literary sources attribute to Mahmud of Ghazna (r. 998–1030) the first adoption of the title "sultan." It is probably more correct, however, to state that he is the first ruler named to whom this term is applied as a title, although he himself never employed it in self-reference. That is, before the mid-11th century this use of the term "sultan" as a title meaning "ruler" was limited to speech, literary works, and documents addressed to the ruler. Independent rulers did not at the time use "sultan" as a title when referring to themselves in the official titulature of coins and inscriptions, nor in official documents they issued. The Fatimid caliphs are also addressed by this epithet in a late tenth century-literary dedication.

The Adoption of the Title by the Seljuqs

A major change in the use of the term "sultan" came about in the mid-11th century with the coming of the Seljuq Turkmen dynasty, who conquered the Islamic heartlands and became the first Sunni dynasty to rule directly over the Abbasid caliphs. The Seljuqs soon made the epithet "sultan" into the official title of the ruler and the preferred one on their official coinage and inscriptions—an example that was followed shortly thereafter by their rivals the Ghaznavids, whose rule was now confined largely to India.

The Seljuqs apparently used this caliphal epithet as an official title in a deliberate fashion, in order to stake their claim to universal political authority as a counterpart to the caliph's universal but symbolic religious headship as imam of the Muslim ecumene. The Seljuq reordering of the Islamic world, signaled by their adoption of the title "sultan," heralded a new political reality: it was no longer possible to maintain that some powerful Sunni would one day restore rule to the caliph. Although they were unquestionably a Sunni dynasty, the Seljuqs made no pretense that they were simply one among the caliph's many commanders, holding delegated authority over a limited area at the caliph's behest and positing that the caliph would, at least theoretically, one day be freed from outside control.

Rather, the Seljuqs actually did "free" the caliphs from heterodox control—and, far from restoring rule to the caliph's hands, they promptly placed him under their own sway while arrogating to themselves all political power. Moreover, the Seljuq sultans openly aimed at a universal, independent, and dual caliphal-sultanic authority, in which the caliph was deprived of all temporal power and the sultans actually ruled. The title "sultan" in Seljuq hands, therefore, constituted a usurpation not only of the title but also of the substance of caliphal political authority; it signaled a claim to be the temporal counterpart to a caliphal role that was meant to be limited thenceforth purely to the spiritual sphere.

This constituted a decisive break with Islamic political theory up until that time and a de facto separation of the temporal and spiritual roles of government. This disturbing new political reality elicited in response the writing of a flurry of innovative works of political philosophy—most notably those of Juwayni (d. 1085), Ghazzali (d. 1111), and Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1209)—during the Seljuq era and shortly thereafter, all of which attempted to supply a theological rationale for the new division of power and authority in the Islamic lands. Historically, this division of authority and rule between the caliphate and sultanate resulted in perpetual tension and even outright hostility between the representatives of the two institutions and to the unremitting efforts of the Abbasid caliphs to reassert their political sway.

Given this new definition of the role of a sultan, it is unsurprising that the Seljuqs themselves used the term "sultan" only for princes of the blood. Since their empire was ruled as a family confederation, however, there were always numerous sultans at any given time. They distinguished therefore between "sultan" (in the sense of ruler or the embodiment of authority) or subordinate regional prince on the one hand and the great sultan or Sulṭān al-mu'aẓẓam (the sovereign ruler or the most powerful embodiment of authority) on the other.

The appropriation of erstwhile caliphal epithets by and for the Seljuqs was not limited to the term "sultan" but also extended to such titles as ẓill Allāh fī al-arḍ (the shadow of God on Earth) and khalīfat Allāh (God's deputy) to the sultans. This trend only accelerated after the extinction of the caliphate in the mid-13th century, reaching its logical culmination in the late 15th and early 16th centuries, when the title most closely associated with the caliphal office, amīr al-mu'minīn (Commander of the Faithful), was officially employed by Ottoman sultans such as Bayazid II and Süleiman I in formal inscriptions on public edifices, including, for instance, the Grand Mosque of Medina and the Jerusalem Citadel.

The Later Middle Ages and Modern Times

With the disintegration of Seljuq rule in the 12th century, the title "sultan" became universal, and by the 13th century, from Anatolia and Egypt to India, Central Asia, and Sumatra, it was used to denote any independent Muslim ruler. With the exception of the Mongol polities, which invariably preferred Turkic and Persian titles, most of the major late medieval Muslim principalities—including the Mamluk Sultanate of Egypt, the Delhi Sultanate, and the Ottoman Sultanate—employed this title for their governing figure. By the 16th century, it came to be used even in Shi'i Iran, where the Safavid and Qajar rulers, while preferring to be known by the Persian title of "shah," are occasionally called "sultan" on their coins. At the Western end of the Islamic world, the title was adopted for the first time, in the 18th century, by the rulers of Morocco.

In the 20th century, however, as a result of European influence and the desire to accrue prestige on the broader world stage, many Muslim rulers exchanged traditional Muslim titles such as amir, sultan, and sharif, for the previously eschewed "king." These include the current and former ruling dynasties of, for instance, Egypt, Jordan, and Morocco, although one still finds a small handful of Muslim rulers, such as the sultans of Brunei and Oman, who continue to employ the more traditional Islamic term.

It is important to note that all the earlier meanings of the term, particularly both the abstract concept of "authority" and the impersonal reified use of "sultan" for "the authorities," at all times continued and still continue to coexist with the later personalized and titular significations.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526); Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); ghāzī; Ghaznavids (977–1086); Mamluks (1250–1517); Ottomans (1299–1924); Seljuqs (1055–1194); shāhānshāh

Further Reading

W. Barthold, "Caliph and Sultan," translated by N. S. Doniach, The Islamic Quarterly 7 (1963); Idem, Turkestan Down to the Mongol Invasion, translated by T. Minorsky and edited by C. E. Bosworth, 1968; C. E. Bosworth, "The Titulature of The Early Ghaznavids," Oriens 15 (1962); Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; H.A.R. Gibb, "Some Considerations on the Sunni Theory of the Caliphate," in Studies on the Civilization of Islam, 1962; S. D. Goitein, "Attitudes towards Government in Islam and Judaism," in Studies in Islamic History and Institutions, 1966; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam: An Introduction to the Study of Islamic Political Theory: The Jurists, 1981; Bernard Lewis, The Political Language of Islam, 1988; Émile Tyan, Institutions du droit public Musulman: II. Sultanat et califat, 1956.

D. G. TOR

sunna

"Sunna" is a term of pre-Islamic origin for established custom, the approved practice handed down from the past. In Islam, sunna came to mean the practice of the Prophet, whose example all Muslims should follow: in effect, Islamic law. Initially, the Prophet's sunna was not sharply distinguished from that of his Companions and other righteous figures of the past, who were assumed to have acted as he did or in his spirit when they had innovated. The righteous figures in question seem to have included the caliphs, regarded as sources of sunna by virtue of their office, but their role had been rejected by 750, when the Umayyads were replaced by the Abbasids. Initially, the sunna was inferred from Qur'anic rulings (on the assumption that the Prophet and other moral exemplars had followed them); from the behavior of upright people; and from short reports, known as hadiths, recording their words or acts on a particular occasion. Such reports began to proliferate in the course of the first Islamic (hijrī) century, with reports from the Companions predominating. Their validity as sources for Islamic law was disputed. Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi'i (d. 820) is usually held to have been the first major proponent of the belief that "sunna" meant the sunna of the Prophet as documented in the hadith alone, with reports about the Companions as a subsidiary source. This eventually came to be generally accepted. In the course of the century after Shafi'i's death, the reports from which the Prophet's sunna was known, by then circulating in very large numbers, were sifted and tested for authenticity on the basis of the chain of transmitters attached to them, and several collections of those deemed authentic were made from the mid-ninth century onward. Six of these became canonical. In principle, Islamic law is based on both the Qur'an and hadith, but in practice the hadith was by far the more important source. Though the word "sunna" came invariably to conjure up that of the Prophet, it also continued to be used in its old sense of established practice without reference to any particular authority, as when a particular practice was deemed to have "become sunna."

The concept of sunna as the practice of the Prophet documented in the hadith is fundamental to Sunnism. It concentrated all religious authority in one man in the past and effectively ruled out that supreme religious authority could ever be acquired by anyone in the present. Muhammad did have such authority, but only because his knowledge was of divine origin, and as the seal of the Prophet he was the last recipient of revelation. After his death, his message was preserved in the Qur'an and hadith, which were, and are, accessible to everyone. Religious authority rested on mastery of these two sources and associated disciplines, achieved in varying degrees by the scholars, who were in principle just learned laymen and who often disagreed. In practice, the scholars did come to be institutionally separate from the laity in the course of time, and something in the nature of a religious hierarchy also emerged. But though some scholars were more authoritative than others, no one person or body was empowered to sit in final judgment of what was or was not Islamic law and doctrine. Determining and interpreting the will of God was a cumulative endeavor fraught with uncertainty, and the only final arbiter was consensus (ijmā'), an entirely informal and retrospective mechanism consisting in the observation that the community had in practice acted in accordance with a particular rule for so long that the rule in question must count as vindicated. The Prophet is on record as having said that "my community will not agree on an error," and the ultimate arbiter of what did or did not count as Islamic was in fact the community. There could be no equivalent of papal authority in Sunni Islam and also no "Caesaropapism." This is still the case. Accordingly, Sunni Islam cannot quickly be made to turn around or change direction, nor does it have the vulnerability of communities dependent on a leadership defined by special descent, status, or office.

It is above all in its concept of religious authority that Sunni Islam differs from Shi'ism. Like all Muslims, Shi'is accept the sunna of the Prophet as authoritative, but they see their imams as continuing it as authorities in their own right, not just as mere transmitters of the hadith documenting the sunna. To Shi'is, the divine guidance mediated through a human being (prophet or imam) could never be cut off. The Imamis eventually ruled that the Twelfth Imam had gone into occultation in 874, so that to them as to the Sunnis, religious authority came to rest on fallible scholarly learning, but by then they had developed a different corpus of the hadith and a different law. Both the Zaydis and the Isma'ilis continued to concentrate religious authority in imams in the here and now, with the proviso that there might be periods without such imams (or without such imams in the open) in between.

Even within Sunnism the classical concept of sunna was never unchallenged. Sufis claimed religious authority as saints endowed with supernatural powers rather than book learning, the value of which they sometimes rejected altogether. Scholars, too, might claim to be saints or, more drastically, to be the messiah (Mahdi), thereby endowing themselves with supreme authority that was not normally available. In modern times the very concept of the Prophet's sunna has become an object of debate, with much discussion of the authenticity of the hadith and even outright rejection of it in favor of exclusive reliance on the Qur'an. Some of the most influential thinkers in modern times have been laymen without scholarly training. But the classical distribution of religious authority still prevails.

See also hadith; al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820); Sunnism; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Daniel W. Brown, Rethinking Tradition in Modern Islamic Thought, 1996; Jonathan A. C. Brown, The Canonization of al-Bukhārī and Muslim: The Formation and Function of the Sunnī Ḥadīth Canon, 2007; Idem, Hadith: Muhammad's Legacy in the Medieval and Modern World, 2009; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; G.H.A. Juynboll, The Authenticity of the Tradition Literature: Discussions in Modern Egypt, 1969; Bernard G. Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998.

PATRICIA CRONE

Sunnism

Sunnism is the form of Islam to which the majority of contemporary Muslims (close to 90 percent) adhere. In formal terms Sunnism is defined by acceptance of the authoritative nature of the Prophet's sunna (paradigmatic behavior and beliefs) as transmitted through his Companions and by recognition of the first four caliphs (Abu Bakr, 'Umar b. al-Khattab, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, and 'Ali b. Abi Talib), drawn from the Companions, as legitimate caliphs and moral exemplars. By contrast, the Kharijis do not recognize the third and the fourth caliphs, and most forms of Shi'ism do not recognize the first three. The Khariji and Shi'i positions rendered all later caliphs illegitimate, a view once seen as tantamount to the entire community living in sin: a legitimate caliph was required for the performance of public religious duties such as the Friday prayer, the conduct of jihad, and the execution of certain punishments known as ḥudūd. The Sunnis preferred to differentiate between practical requirements and moral perfection and so adopted less utopian standards for legitimizing a claimant to the office of the caliph, but even these standards were difficult to enforce. The Sunnis thus chose to recognize anyone who seized power as the caliph as long as he was a Qurashi (a member of the tribe of the Prophet), partly to minimize bloodshed and partly to ensure that they would retain some moral hold on the state. Sunnis do not consider caliphs after the first four as moral exemplars, nor were their actions, executive proclamations, or decisions on points of law regarded as having any value as precedents, so their often reprobable behavior did not endanger Islamic norms.

The Sunnis tended to hold that all de facto holders of public power (initially caliphs, thereafter sultans and amirs) were to be obeyed, whether formally legitimate or not and regardless of their mode of government, however unjust, unless they violated God's commands. Resistance, according to the Sunni view, should be passive rather than armed; the martyrdom of individuals was preferable to the large-scale bloodshed and general instability that accompanied revolt. All Muslims eventually came to live under rulers who were technically illegitimate in terms of the stipulations laid down for the caliphate (or, as it is usually called in this context, the imamate). But the Sunnis went further than others in accommodating these rulers, and in so doing they made most of Islamic history their own.

Like other Muslims, however, they lived under unstable regimes, many of them established by the pastoralist tribes that formed a warlike base outside the cities or beyond the borders of the Muslim world. These tribesmen often seized power by invasion (e.g., the Almohads or Almoravids in Andalus, and the Seljuqs, Mongols, and Safavids in the east), or they supplied the bulk of soldiers for existing armies, as free men or slaves, usually monopolizing political and military offices as well, leaving only the bureaucracy and religious affairs in the control of the existing urban elites. Determined though the Sunnis were to domesticate all regimes (as long as they were Muslim) and make them serve the cause of Islam as best they could, their relationship with these regimes was balanced by both cultural and political alienation from them.

Historically the bearers of Sunnism are religious scholars who are in principle learned laymen rather than religious specialists marked off from the laity by special gifts or institutional affiliation, making for a dispersed pattern of religious authority. But keeping the community together is a fundamental Sunni value, and internal disagreement never reached the point of producing enduring schisms.

Religious scholars ('ulama') are authoritative only to the extent that they master the Qur'an and hadith (the mass of short reports recording aspects of the sunna), as studied and interpreted through the sciences devoted to them, most prominent among these being the study of the shari'a. It is their learning, and that alone, which sets the scholars apart from everyone else. In terms of legal doctrine, this means that the ultimate legal authority is vested in the Qur'an and the hadith (both treated as revelation) rather than in an office or a person endowed with special sanctity, whether by descent or special grace, such as the Shi'i imam or holy men.

It was around 800 that the Qur'an and authenticated hadith reports came to be seen as the sole legitimate source of Islamic legal norms reflective of God's will. The theory is best exemplified in the thought of Shafi'i (d. 820). Although he was motivated primarily by the desire to overcome regionalism, his jurisprudential system denied the political ruler the ability to create Islamic law. Sunni scholars held that the ruler could issue administrative rules and other regulations, but he could not create legal institutions or norms that reflected the divine will. Authorized by his own ability to engage in competent interpretation (ijtihād), the ruler could, however, decide which legal rule the courts were to apply when juristic interpretation yielded several legitimate interpretations, as they usually did. In the past, many dynasties used this ability to favor a particular legal school (often the Hanafi).

The Siyāsa Shar'iyya Tradition

While Sunni religious scholars were more accommodating of de facto rulers than their Shi'i counterparts, the public law they taught was often impracticable and highly idealized. They made up for this by granting rulers wide authority to make discretionary rules for the sake of public order. The administrative and criminal law generated in this way was deemed to be merely instrumental, devoid of the moral authority of Islamic law. The 14th-century jurists Ibn Taymiyya and his student Ibn al-Qayyim, however, sought to place this law, and public policy in general, on a firmer moral footing and bring it into the purview of the shari'a by modifying some of the inflexible and impractical rules. The outcome was labeled siyāsa shar'iyya, or shari'a-oriented governance. Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn al-Qayyim hoped to engender greater cooperation between lay Muslims, religious scholars, and rulers by orienting all of them toward establishing a just society in conformity with a broader vision of the shari'a. Siyāsa shar'iyya thus does not represent a reluctant move to accommodate alien rulers but rather an attempt at further integration of society and political elites.

The Rise of the Activists

In the early 20th century, Sunnism saw an unprecedented form of politics: the mass political movement. This is perhaps best exemplified by the rise of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, founded in the late 1920s, to national prominence during the events preceding and following the Egyptian Revolution of 1952. Abandoning the quietist attitude that had prevailed in much of the scholarly establishment even in the colonial period, and taking advantage of Sunnism's relative lack of formal authority, the Muslim Brotherhood refused to trade legitimacy for patronage by normalizing or accommodating the foreign, non-Muslim occupation of Egypt. Backed by laymen and led by one, Hasan al-Banna, they demanded an immediate end to British presence on Egyptian soil and at the very least a more public display of Islamic symbols and application of Islamic norms, if not the application of the shari'a as the law of the land.

In the aftermath of the end of formal colonial occupation in the late 1940s and 1950s, two Sunni thinkers emerged who were to exert an enormous influence on Islamic political thought: Mawdudi of Pakistan and Sayyid Qutb of Egypt. Both thinkers gave a more concrete form to the amorphous demands of movements such as the Muslim Brotherhood. Neither was a religious scholar by profession. Mawdudi, though trained in the Islamic sciences at an early age, was a journalist, while Qutb, who worked as a literary critic in his early life, had no formal religious training at all. Unlike medieval Sunni scholars, who tended to have a realistic conception of political possibilities, both thinkers had a utopian streak. Both sought to mobilize all Muslims for the transformation of Muslim society from its present state of Western-inspired decadence and corruption to a state of perfect individual and collective obedience to God's will. In their view, Muslim rulers must actively seek to uphold and implement the shari'a to count as legitimate: mere confessional membership in the Muslim community did not suffice. Mawdudi provided a more detailed account of a government that could count as Islamic than Qutb, who was content to assert that it was only through subservience to God and obedience to Him that human beings could break their servitude to one another. Both, however, stressed that sovereignty belonged to God alone and inferred that rulers whose government failed to accord with His will had to be actively resisted. Qutb advocated open rebellion; Mawdudi did not. Mawdudi further proposed that only God could legislate and that Islam required all Muslims to work actively for the establishment of an Islamic state. Such a state would have a representative institution charged with the function not of legislating but rather of discovering God's law and offering advice to the executive on the best way to implement it. The political programs of many Islamist movements of the 1960s through the 1990s were rooted in Mawdudi's and Qutb's ideas, but the most radical movements of the early 21st century have gone well beyond them by extending the legitimacy of revolt to attacks on the foreign powers that sustain the corrupt regimes of the postcolonial Muslim world. On the other hand, the vast majority of Sunni Islamist thinkers and political movements have categorically rejected Qutb's call for rebellion against illegitimate regimes. These movements tend either to adopt participation in the electoral process to acquire political power or else to channel their energies into the provision of social services for the poor. Recent Sunni Islamist thinkers have also moved away from the idea that belief in God's exclusive sovereignty excludes the possibility of democratic government. The popular religious scholar Yusuf al-Qaradawi, in fact, insisted that voting is a perfectly acceptable method for the Muslim community to decide issues relevant to their common good, specifically where there are historical differences of opinion in Islamic law.

See also consensus; hadith; ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence; shari'a; sunna

Further Reading

Mohammed Ayoob, The Many Faces of Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Muslim World, 2007; Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought: From the Prophet to the Present, 2001; L. Carl Brown, Religion and State, 2000; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Roxanne Leslie Euben and Muhammad Qasim Zaman, eds., Princeton Readings in Islamist Thought: Texts and Contexts from al-Banna to Bin Laden, 2009; Roy Jackson, Mawlana Mawdudi and Political Islam: Authority and the Islamic State, 2011.

MAIRAJ SYED

Syria

Syria (Shām, "the left-handed region," when one faces the rising sun in the Arab heartlands) falls naturally into an eastern mountain range along the Mediterranean with its major cities of Damascus and Aleppo and into a western section with a plain of steppes and deserts. Prior to the Muslim conquest, Syria had been a wealthy Roman province (64–300), with Antioch as its capital, and had continued to flourish in its golden age during the Byzantine period (300–634). Conquered by Muslim Arab forces in 635–36, Syria became the center of the Arab Empire under the Umayyad dynasty, with Damascus as its seat of government (658–750). During the first phase of the Abbasid Empire (750–945), with Baghdad as the seat of the caliph, Syria lost its central position to Iraq, became the principal Muslim province bordering on the Byzantine Empire to its north, was drawn into tribal conflicts between southern and northern Arabs, faced attempts by Muslim rulers of Egypt to extend their hegemony over its territory, and became the theater of competing Sunni-Shi'i influence. During the second phase of Abbasid rule (945–1258), Syria initially experienced a period of renaissance under local dynasties, foremost among them the Shi'i dynasty of the Hamdanids ruling from Aleppo, at the same time coming under the increasing influence of the Isma'ili Fatimid dynasty, which sought to extend itself from its base in Cairo, the capital of its counter-caliphate. With the Sunni revival patronized by the Turkic Seljuq sultans after their takeover of Baghdad in 1055, Syria soon came under the control of Seljuq atabegs (tutors), among them the Turkic Zengids of Aleppo and the Kurdish Ayyubids of Damascus. The Ayyubid Saladin brought Fatimid rule to an end in 1171 and defeated the Crusaders at Hattin in 1187, thereby restoring Jerusalem to Muslim control and firmly establishing Sunni rule over Syria.

At the time of the Mongol invasions of the Iranian lands that brought the Abbasid caliphate in Baghdad to its end in 1258, the Mamluks succeeded to the rich heritage of the Ayyubids in both Egypt and Syria after having definitively arrested the Mongol advance westward in 1260 at the Battle of 'Ayn Jalut. For its part, Syria flourished under Mamluk rule as a land of prosperity and a center of learning but was dealt a harsh blow by Tamerlane's invasion in 1401, which devastated Aleppo and Damascus. Thereafter Syria's culture declined, and the country was conquered in 1516 by the Ottoman Turks, who had established themselves in Anatolia and the Balkans and had conquered Constantinople in 1453, renaming it Istanbul and taking it as the capital of their expanding empire. Under the Ottomans, Syria continued for three centuries as a province ruled by Turkish pashas, administrators appointed by the Ottoman sultans, while much of local urban politics was dominated by the powerful influence of prominent Arab families, such as the 'Azms.

Over the centuries, Greater Syria (including the regions of today's Palestine, Lebanon, and Jordan) made significant contributions to Islamic culture and civilization out of proportion to its geography and population within the spectrum of the Muslim world. Umayyad caliphs built the first great monuments of Islamic architecture: the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem and the Umayyad Mosque in Damascus. Syrian Nestorian Christians, foremost among them Hunayn b. Ishaq al-'Ibadi (d. 873), were the principal translators of Greek works of philosophy and science into Arabic. During Abbasid times the great Arab poets Mutanabbi (d. 965) and Ma'arri (d. 1058), the philosopher Farabi (d. 950), and the anthologist of Arabic poetry Abu al-Faraj al-Isfahani (d. 967) flourished in Aleppo. Ibn 'Asakir's (d. 1175) magisterial history of Damascus and Ibn al-'Arabi's (d. 1240) definitive synthesis of Sufi mysticism were both completed in Damascus. In Mamluk times Damascus produced a plethora of scholars, among them the ideologue Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), the historian Dhahabi (d. 1348), the biographer Safadi (d. 1363), and the exegete Ibn Kathir (d. 1373). In modern times the Academy of Damascus, founded in 1919, and the Arab Academy began an active literary production under the aegis of Arab nationalism.

During World War I the British wrested Syria from Ottoman control with the help of an Arab army, and the five provinces of Syria became a French mandate after the war; the French influence was more pervasive in the region of Mount Lebanon, and France accordingly declared it a separate Lebanese republic in 1926. A year prior, the People's Party was formed to work for Syrian independence and national unity. The outbreak of World War II prevented total independence from being realized, but with the departure of the last French soldiers in 1946, Syria gained full sovereignty and adopted a new civil code in 1949, replacing the Ottoman code of the Mecelle. After World War II and articulated in opposition to foreign rule, Arab nationalism emerged as the leading ideology and allowed Syrians of all confessions—Sunni, Shi'i, 'Alawi, Druze, and Christian—to unite against European powers whose colonial presence all over the globe was steadily eroding. This secular and nationalist trend, however, encountered the opposition of grassroots organizations, cultural institutions, and benevolent associations that had developed between the two world wars in several cities in Syria, characterized overall by a strong Islamist trend that sought to combat immoral foreign influence and propagate Salafi religious education. Two movements took the lead in Syrian society: the secularist and nationalist Ba'th Party and the traditionalist and Islamist Muslim Brotherhood. On the political front, military coups followed in rapid succession, one of which established a brief union with Egypt in 1954 as the United Arab Republic. This was overturned in 1961, followed by a military coup in 1963 that firmly established Ba'thist military autocracy. Islamist uprisings in 1964 and 1973 were put down by force. The Syrian Arab Republic took part in the Six Day War in 1967, during which it lost the Golan Heights to Israel.

In 1970 Hafiz al-Assad, a military man and a Ba'thist belonging to the 'Alawi sect, seized power and was sworn in as president. Under his rule a progressive front of political parties was granted a semblance of political freedom, but power remained in the hands of the military and secret police. In 1973 Syria joined Egypt in a surprise attack on Israel in the so-called October War; in 1975 Syrian troops were dispatched to restore order during the Lebanese Civil War. In 1982 an Islamist uprising in Hama was ruthlessly quelled and Syrian troops clashed with the Israeli army in its invasion of Lebanon. The Ta'if Accords of 1989, drafted under Saudi and American patronage, legitimized the Syrian military presence in Lebanon, but Syria did not enter into a peace agreement with Israel, despite American support to this end. Assad died in 2001 and was succeeded as president of Syria by his son Bashar. The governments of France and the United States pushed for the withdrawal of Syrian troops from Lebanon by isolating Syria diplomatically. When the Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri was assassinated in Beirut in 2005, suspicion turned to Syria as the instigator together with Hizbullah, the most influential Shi'i party of Lebanon. After a massive popular demonstration in Beirut on March 14, 2005, Syria withdrew its troops from Lebanon, and a UN resolution established an international tribunal to prosecute those responsible for Hariri's death. As of early 2011, Syria had begun to experience the first signs of popular protest for greater freedoms that had begun to shake the Arab Middle East since January of that year, in Tunisia and Egypt in particular.

The wave of unrest in the Arab Middle East that began in Tunisia and Egypt as the "Arab Spring" erupted in March 2011 in Dara'a in southern Syria and soon found its center in Homs, the third most populated city of the country. The regime of Bashar al-Assad decided to crack down on the uprising with brutal military force, while making empty promises of political reform. By December 2011, the regime, led by the minority 'Alawi constituency and supported by its military and elite security forces, faced a growing opposition of Sunnis, representing the majority of the people, who attempted to establish a Syrian National Council in exile and began to form a Free Civil Army, led by defectors from the Syrian military. The United States, the Arab League, and neighboring Turkey favored the opposition but were unwilling to be involved militarily, while Russia and China tried to keep the regime in place through diplomatic maneuvering. The insurgency also burst out in northwestern Syria, focused on the town of Idlib, but it did not engulf Aleppo or most of Damascus. By early 2012, the conflict had resulted in more than 9,000 dead and thousands displaced, many of them finding refuge in Turkey and Lebanon. Neighborhoods in Homs were violently destroyed, and many inhabitants of smaller towns and villages were driven out. The country appeared on the verge of a civil war but became locked in a stalemate between the overwhelming firepower of the regime and the determination of the unprepared and ill-equipped opposition. Efforts by the United Nations through a special envoy and its tentative six-point peace plan led to a precarious cease-fire that diminished the fighting but did not shift the regime. In April 2012, after much diplomatic haggling, a group of United Nations observers entered the country to monitor the cease-fire. Nevertheless, the threat of a severe humanitarian crisis remained as demonstrations and government shelling continued and violence flared up all over the country.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Baghdad; Egypt; al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); Jordan; Lebanon; Ottomans (1299–1924); Saladin (1138–93); Seljuqs (1055–1194); Tamerlane (1336–1405)

Further Reading

Umar F. Abd-Allah, The Islamic Struggle in Syria, 1983; J. F. Devlin, Syria, Modern State in an Ancient Land, 1983; Raymond A. Hinnebusch, Authoritarian Power and State Formation in Ba'thist Syria, 1990; Philip K. Hitti, History of Syria, 1951; Philip S. Khoury, Syria and the French Mandate: The Politics of Arab Nationalism, 1987; P. Seale, The Struggle for Syria, 1987; A. L. Tibawi, A Modern History of Syria, 1969.

GERHARD BOWERING

Tablighi Jama'at

Arguably the largest Islamic faith movement in the contemporary world, the Tablighi Jama'at (Jama'at al-Da'wa wa-l-Tabligh, "The Party of Preaching and Proselytizing") operates in many countries and has directly influenced the religious practice of millions of Sunni Muslims. According to the movement's teachings, all Muslims are encouraged to devote a minimum of one-tenth of their lives (2.5 hours per day, 3 days per month, and 40 days per year) to nurturing within themselves and calling other Muslims toward six qualities: certainty of belief in the Muslim profession of faith, timely prayer (salat) with concentration and devotion, a basic knowledge of the obligations of Islam combined with the remembrance of God, service to other Muslims, purification of intention, and "going out in the path of God" for the sake of da'wa (preaching, in this case to fellow Muslims). These six qualities are said to be derived from the lives of the Companions of the Prophet, and it is through their implementation that, according to believers, the Muslim community is expected to one day return to a proper Islamic order, which in turn would inspire much of the non-Muslim world to convert to Islam as well. In pursuit of these goals, ad hoc bands of itinerant Muslim preachers devote their own time and resources to the Tablighi cause, often traveling to distant and foreign lands "in the path of God" to revive their own faith and that of other wayward Muslims. The Jama'at's loosely defined global membership base is drawn from a broad array of ethnic and socioeconomic backgrounds and is largely filled by nonscholars, as da'wa to Muslims is seen as a form of "commanding right and forbidding wrong" and is thus an individual obligation and not simply the duty of a scholarly elite. Women may also participate in Tablighi activities, albeit under stricter guidelines and in the company of their husbands, fathers, or sons.

Both in the path of God and in a member's home, books on the virtues of devotional works (faḍā'il) form the primary manuals for daily piety. Arabic-speaking jama'ats are instructed to read from Imam Nawawi's (d. 1278) Riyad al-Salihin (Gardens of the righteous), while all other language groups rely on Muhammad Zakariyya al-Kandhalawi's (d. 1982) Faza'il-i A'mal (Merits of righteous deeds, originally Tablighi Nisab or "curriculum") in its original Urdu or in translation. Muhammad Yusuf al-Kandhalawi's (d. 1965) Hayat al-Sahaba (The lives of the Companions) also plays an instrumental role in inspiring the activities of Tablighi participants. The Tablighi leaders who guide the functioning of the movement, however, pass on much of their teachings through nonliterary means. All participants are encouraged to undertake, at least once in a lifetime, a four-month initiatory pilgrimage to the Indian subcontinent in order to learn Tablighi norms from their source.

The Tablighi Jama'at originated as an indirect response to the Hindu shuddhi movement of North India in the 1920s. Muhammad Ilyas (d. 1944), a scholar of the Deobandi reformist tradition, received a vision during his pilgrimage to Mecca in 1925–26 and returned to Delhi to redirect his late father's proselytizing activities among the semi-Islamized Meos of the Mewat region to the southwest of Delhi. In the few years before his death, Ilyas would develop a proselytizing methodology that has come to form the crux of the Tablighi da'wa principles. Working out of a mosque complex near the Nizamuddin shrine in Delhi that has remained the global Tablighi headquarters to this day, he attracted a devoted core of preachers numbering in the thousands. The Tablighi movement was next led by Muhammad Yusuf al-Kandhalawi, who shaped it into an international movement. Subsequently, under the leadership of In'am al-Hasan (d. 1995), control of the Jama'at shifted toward wealthy Gujarati merchants who were able to provide the capital for further global penetration. Since Hasan's death, Tablighi leadership around the world has generally moved toward a more decentralized consultative (shūrā) structure. Two secondary global headquarters exist today in Raiwind, Pakistan (near Lahore), and Dhaka, Bangladesh.

The Tablighi Jama'at remains nominally apolitical, though it has played some role in the Islamization of many Muslim societies and minority communities across the globe, sometimes with distinctly political repercussions.

See also Deobandis; preaching; quietism and activism; revival and reform; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Muhammad Khalid Masud, ed., Travellers in Faith: Studies of the Tablighi Jama'at as a Transnational Islamic Movement for Faith Renewal, 2000; Barbara D. Metcalf, "'Traditionalist' Islamic Activism: Deoband, Tablighis, and Talibs," ISIM Papers, no. 4 (2002); Sayyed Abul Hasan Ali Nadwi, The Life and Mission of Maulana Muhammad Ilyas, 1983; Yoginder Sikand, The Origins and Development of the Tablighi Jama'at (1920–2000), 2002.

MATTHEW B. INGALLS

Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed (1909–85)

While Mahmoud Mohamed Taha founded and led a political party that worked toward the independence of Sudan, he devoted his life to leading his followers to a new understanding of Islam that had emerged from his own Sufi training. Taha essentially eschewed politics as he focused on his movement to redirect Muslims to the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad, but in a Sudan that had never experienced completely secular governance, Taha and his movement were frequently confronted with the political consequences of their beliefs.

Taha was born in 1909 in the Blue Nile village of Hijaleej, about 100 miles south of Khartoum. He was raised surrounded by the intense Sufi teaching atmosphere of Sudan's Gezira region, but he never affiliated himself with a particular sect. He received the best Western education a man in colonial Sudan could obtain, studying engineering at Gordon Memorial College, the precursor of the University of Khartoum. He found work in Sudan's growing railroad sector and also in the many agricultural schemes started by the British. He also joined the Graduates Congress, the Khartoum University alumni group that stimulated and organized much of Sudan's independence activity.

Sudan's struggle for independence from Anglo-Egyptian control was largely dominated by the Umma Party, followers of the 19th-century Mahdi, and the Democratic Unionist Party of the Khatami Sufi sect. The former sought to rule Sudan through the descendants of Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdi, and the latter had close ties to Egypt. Taha wanted Sudan to be free and independent of these influences, and to that end he founded in the early 1940s the Republican Party, whose objective was to found a Republic of Sudan. Taha was elected president of the Republican Party at its first meeting, and the group quickly published its manifesto, "Say, This Is My Path!," which advocated party principles that spoke to Islamic ideals. Taha and several other party members were arrested by the colonial police for distributing pamphlets, becoming Sudan's first political prisoners. The group was released quickly, but Taha himself soon again ran afoul of colonial proscriptions. A woman was arrested near Taha's hometown for performing on her young daughter female circumcision, an ancient and non-Islamic practice that was still common throughout the Horn of Africa and Egypt but that had been banned by the British colonial authorities. Taha led a demonstration at the Hassaheisa jail where the woman was held; he was arrested and sentenced to a two-year term, under the impression that Taha was in support of female circumcision. Taha's point, however, which would become a cornerstone of his later movement's work, was that the British could not legislate Sudanese morality and that female circumcision would continue in Sudan until girls and women were given equal access to education.

Sudan achieved its independence on January 1, 1956, but Taha spent the 1950s formulating his New Islamic Mission, the religious movement that grew out of his political party. The movement was popularly known as the Republican Brotherhood, in recognition of its party roots, and most of Taha's early followers were members of his party.

Taha's postprison time in retreat generated the themes of his New Islamic Mission. He studied the Qur'an and came out with an understanding of the qualitative difference between the Meccan and Medinan verses of the Qur'an. The Medinan verses, he said, were meant for the unsettled society of the Medinan era and included much of the Qur'an's revelations about war, the obedience required of women to men, and strict social controls, while the Meccan verses, which contained the Prophet's own sunna, or personal conduct, were meant to be practiced by all humankind all the time, which Taha called Islam's "second message."

Taha spelled out this Islamic social philosophy in his best known book, The Second Message of Islam (1967, trans. 1987). Through the 1960s and 1970s he continued to lecture around the country and to attract a small group of men and women, known as the Republican Brothers and Sisters, to his teachings. He was taken to court or tried on charges related to "apostasy" over these two decades, and Taha emerged invigorated in each case. His small movement grew a little; his followers took on his writings and speeches, particularly after he was banned from speaking in public or publishing his work, and distributed about two million copies of Republican tracts all over Sudan, largely through individual sales.

When Sudan's president Ja'far al-Numayri declared his version of the shari'a as state policy in 1983, the Republican Brotherhood launched a public attack on these laws, considering them dangerous in a multireligious secular society. About 70 members of the group, including Taha and four women from the Republican Brothers and Sisters, were arrested in 1983 and were released about 18 months later. They immediately took to the streets again with a new pamphlet, and Taha and four of his followers were arrested on "apostasy" charges. The four followers were forced to denounce their leader on national television in early January 1985. Taha, who would not recant, was tried and convicted of apostasy. He was executed by hanging at the age of 76 on January 18, 1985, before a crowd of 10,000 onlookers. The Arab Human Rights Organization declared that day "Arab Human Rights Day."

See also excommunication; Sudan

Further Reading

Abdullahi An-Na'im, Toward an Islamic Reformation, 1990; Steve Howard, "Mahmoud Mohamed Taha: A Remarkable Teacher in Sudan," Northeast African Studies 10, no. 1 (1988); Idem, "Mahmoud Mohammed Taha and the Republican Brotherhood: Transforming Islamic Society," Journal for Islamic Studies 21 (2001); Mahmoud Mohamed Taha, The Second Message of Islam, translated by Abdullahi An-Na'im, 1987.

STEVE HOWARD

Taliban

The term ṭālibān is the Persian plural form of the Arabic word ṭālib (seeker or student). As a general term, ṭālibān, or its Arabic equivalents ṭullāb or ṭalaba, refers to madrasa students. Since 1994, Da Afghanistan da Talibano Islami Tahrik (Islamic Movement of Taliban of Afghanistan), or "Taliban," has become known internationally as the name chosen by a hitherto unknown group formed mainly from the ranks of the Afghan mujahidin—resistance groups fighting the Soviet forces and their proxy governments in Kabul from 1978 to 1992. As a political-military organization, the Taliban came to the scene of Afghan politics in Kandahar in 1994 with direct military and diplomatic support from Pakistan and was initially backed with financial and political support from Saudi Arabia. The original leaders and members of the Taliban claimed to be madrasa students from schools run mainly by Pakistan's Jamiat-Ulama-i Islam (Assembly of Islamic Clergy).

Consolidation of Power: 1994–96

The Taliban gained international notice in early November 1994 when the group freed a convoy of Pakistani trucks commandeered by a local Afghan mujahidin group; in the same month, they captured Kandahar. The Taliban became the de facto government of Afghanistan in September 1996 when it seized control of the Afghan capital, Kabul, ousting the nominal government headed by President Burhan al-Din Rabbani. Mulla Muhammad 'Umar Mujahid, who had in April 1996 proclaimed himself amīr al-mu'minīn (Commander of the Faithful), became the ruler of Afghanistan. With the capture of Mazar-i Sharif, the last significant Afghan city not under its control, in May 1997, the Taliban was recognized by Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates as the legitimate ruler of Afghanistan. This transformed the internal structure of the Taliban movement from loose pockets of fighters led by a consultative council in which Mulla 'Umar was first among equals, into a theocratic regime with power consolidated under one figure. The change of the Taliban's method of governance to a centralized, autocratic system is also attributed to the increasing ties between Mulla 'Umar and al-Qaeda leadership. Al-Qaeda wanted to establish a presence in Afghanistan through access to and control over an identifiable group of leaders. Osama bin Laden had arrived in Jalalabad, Afghanistan, in 1996 before the Taliban had control of that city.

In August 1998, the bombings of two U.S. embassies in Africa by affiliates of Bin Laden, and the Taliban's refusal to surrender him, prompted the United States to launch cruise missile attacks on suspected terrorist camps in Afghanistan and to spearhead an international effort to isolate the Taliban through unilateral and UN sanctions. The fate of the leadership of the Taliban and al-Qaeda became interconnected while their strategies remained divided: the former were more concerned with internal affairs of Afghanistan while the latter concentrated on expanding its international reach.

Demise and Resurgence: 2001–10

The September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States were immediately attributed to al-Qaeda. The U.S.-led war of retaliation resulted in the removal of the Taliban government from power and the routing of al-Qaeda forces from Afghanistan. However, the majority of both organizations' leadership reached safe havens in neighboring Pakistan.

Beginning in 2002, insurgents opposed to the Western-backed government in Afghanistan began armed operations and propaganda campaigns. These insurgents, who formally referred to themselves as mujahidin, were popularly referred to as the Taliban. This neo-Taliban became increasingly active in the eastern and southern parts of Afghanistan and fed on the lack of coordination of foreign objectives and efforts in Afghanistan; profits from the uncontrolled narcotics trade; foreign financial support; and weakness, corruption, and, not infrequently, the absence of the Afghan government. Over the following years, it managed to become more than a menace, morphing into a full insurgency, with increasing reliance on suicide attacks and terror tactics.

The neo-Taliban is not a monolithic group, nor do all of its elements share a common vision for the future of Afghanistan. The insurgency consists of a loose unofficial alliance of the following: former Taliban leaders (known as the Quetta Shura Taliban); elements of pre-Taliban mujahidin leaders and commanders (mainly elements of Hizb-i Islami led by Gulbuddin Hekmatyar and loyalists of Jalal al-Din Haqqani, a former commander affiliated to Hizb-i Islami of Muhammad Yunus Khalis); al-Qaeda and other nonindigenous organizations; Pakistan-based Taliban offshoots such as Tahrik-i Taliban Pakistan; Pashtun political leaders sensing loss of power and legitimacy; narcocriminals; and opportunist warlords benefiting from lack of governance in their areas of operation. By 2010, from among these groups, the Quetta Shura of Taliban (in the south), Haqqani's network (in the southeast), and Hekmatyar's Hizb-i Islami (in the northeast) were the most militarily active elements and as a collective had become what is generally referred to as the Taliban.

The main demands of the neo-Taliban focus on the withdrawal of foreign forces from Afghanistan and the restoration of a stricter interpretation of Islam in that country. However, there is no coordinated position or vision for the future of the Afghan state or the fate of the political structure established after the 2001 defeat of the original Taliban regime, either within the Quetta-based Taliban itself or among the various active insurgents.

The strength of the insurgency in Afghanistan and the inability of the Afghan government to gain widespread national legitimacy forced elements of Kabul's power structure to look for peace with elements of the neo-Taliban movement as early as 2002. Afghanistan's international partners reluctantly joined the reintegration process leading to official meetings between elements of

(1501–1722); Seljuqs (1055–1194); shari'a; succession; sultan; Sunnism; Timurids (1370–1506)

Further Reading

Beatrice F. Manz, The Rise and Rule of Tamerlane, 1989; Justin Marozzi, Tamerlane: Sword of Islam, Conqueror of the World, 2004.

MATTHEW MELVIN-KOUSHKI

Tanzimat

The plural of the Arabic verbal noun tanẓīm, which means "arranging," "regulating," or "reforming," the term "Tanzimat" historically refers either to the Ottoman Gülhane Hatt-ı Hümayunu (Noble Edict of the Rose Chamber) of November 3, 1839, or to the era beginning with the announcement of this imperial decree and ending in 1871 or 1876. The edict, prepared by Grand Vizier Mustafa Reşid Pasha and issued by Sultan Abdülmecid (r. 1839–61), promised new laws that would guarantee the right to life and property, prohibit bribery, and regulate the levying of taxes and the conscription and service time of soldiers. The edict further pledged to enact legislation that would outlaw execution without trial, confiscation of property, and violations of personal chastity and honor. It also undertook to abolish tax farming and to establish an equitable draft system. The text of the decree draws inspiration from the 6th, 7th, 13th, and 17th articles of the French Déclaration des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen. There are also conspicuous similarities to the Virginia Bill of Rights of 1776. Accordingly, the proclamation may be viewed as the belated Ottoman response to the New Order that emerged in Europe in the wake of the American Independence and the French Revolution. It represents the culmination of the reform process begun under Sultan Mahmud II (d. 1839) and the launching point for a bold new program of change.

Codification of law, restructuring of institutions, centralization of government, and formation of a new state ideology were major components of the Tanzimat era. The regulation of life in the empire entailed the adoption of modified versions of Western (especially French) legal texts, such as the Ottoman penal code of 1858, which was adapted from the French penal code of 1810. One major exception was the Majalla—a comprehensive compendium of Hanafi fiqh (canonical jusriprudence)—which, along with other codifications, produced a dualism in the Ottoman legal system. New civil courts (Niẓāmiye) were established alongside the old shari'a courts, which continued to function. The Majalla coexisted with the new legal system inspired by the West within the new court system.

The Tanzimat era gave momentum to the radical reform of the bureaucracy begun by Sultan Mahmud II. By the 1870s, the Ottoman administrative structure closely resembled its European counterparts. In the process of implementing an ambitious program of top-down transformation, the Sublime Porte acquired unprecedented power at the expense of the court and the religious establishment, becoming the dominant force in Ottoman politics. Inspired by the Austrian prince Metternich, Ottoman statesmen such as 'Ali and Fu'ad Pashas established a bureaucratic dictatorship through which they administered the empire until 1871, when Sultan Abdülaziz (d. 1876) began to reclaim the powers of the court.

In an effort to reverse the fragmentation of the empire, the Tanzimat statesmen placed great emphasis on centralizing Ottoman administration. They crushed surviving local dynasts in Anatolia and Rumelia, reconquered remote and loosely held regions such as Yemen and 'Asir, obliged local Arab leaders in the Arabian peninsula to pledge allegiance to the sultan, and reestablished central government in areas under the control of local chieftains and notables in Albania and Kurdistan.

To increase the cohesiveness of their multinational empire in the age of nationalism, the reformers strove to create a new identity that superseded religious and ethnic divisions. Accordingly, they replaced the official ideology of the state, Islam, with a secular ideology, Ottomanism. As embodied in the Ottoman Law of Nationality of 1869, the new legal term "Ottoman" replaced the old distinction between Muslims and non-Muslims (*dhimmī*s). At the same time, the Tanzimat statesmen did not aspire to eliminate the traditional Ottoman *millet*s (religious communities) entirely and instead attempted to reform them from within. First the Greek Orthodox (1862), then the Armenians of the Apostolic Church (1863), and finally the Jews (1865) received new organic regulations, which granted representation within religious communities. Finally in 1870, the state recognized the Bulgarians as an independent millet under the administration of an exarch.

The Tanzimat era produced drastic changes in the economic realm as well, which resulted in a policy of laissez-faire first embodied in the Anglo-Ottoman Commercial Treaty of 1838. The Tanzimat era abolished forced labor, afforded legal recognition to ownership of private land, monetarized the economy, dissolved the timar (fief) system definitively, and standardized tax collection. The official abrogation of tax farming following the issuance of the Noble Edict of the Rose Chamber proved less enduring, however, and the sharp decline in revenues compelled a swift return to this traditional practice in 1841–42.

Although some historians date the end of the Reforms era to the death of the great reformer Mehmed Emin Ali Pasha in 1871, the commonly accepted date is 1876, when Sultan Abdülhamid II promulgated the first Ottoman Constitution.

See also modernism; Ottomans (1299–1924)

Further Reading

Roderic Davison, Reform in the Ottoman Empire, 1856–1876, 1963; M. Şükrü Hanioğlu, A Brief History of the Late Ottoman Empire, 2008.

M. ŞÜKRÜ HANIOĞLU

the neo-Taliban and the Afghan government and including formal discussions between the Afghan government and members of Hekmatyar's Hizb-i Islami. These meetings increasingly resembled the talks from the 1990s to bring about a peaceful, shared system of governance for Afghanistan in which each Afghan party and its foreign patron jockeyed for more power. In 2010, NATO's International Security Assistance Force and its troop-contributing states sought an honorable exit strategy that would leave behind an Afghan government with at least minimal exercise of sovereignty over major urban centers of the country and some capability to prevent it from becoming an incubator for international terrorist organizations such as al-Qaeda. The neo-Taliban, for its part, seemed inclined to wait out the military phase of the international commitment in Afghanistan with aspirations to reemerge as a major political player a decade after its total defeat.

See also Afghanistan; Deobandis; madrasa; Mulla 'Umar (b. 1959); Pakistan; al-Qaeda

Further Reading

Robert D. Crews and Amin Tarzi, eds., The Taliban and the Crisis of Afghanistan, 2008; Antonio Giustozzi, ed., Decoding the New Taliban: Insights from the Afghan Field, 2009; Ahmed Rashid, Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil and Fundamentalism in Central Asia, 2000; Abdul Salam Zaeef, My Life with the Taliban, edited by Alex Strick van Linschoten and Felix Kuehn, 2010.

AMIN TARZI

Tamerlane (1336–1405)

The last great nomadic conqueror to come out of the Central Asian steppe after Chingiz Khan (r. 1206–27), Tamerlane aimed to reestablish the vast Mongol Empire on a dual Chingizid and Sunni base of authority. He is remembered to this day as a figure of romance and horror, a supremely charismatic, erudite, and ferocious razer of cities who often built pyramids of the skulls of his victims. His name is properly Temür, a Turkic name meaning "iron"; such European forms as Tamerlane or Tamburlaine come from the Persian Timūr-i Lang, Timur the Lame, referring to battle wounds to his right arm and right leg sustained during a raid in his youth. Though his territorial conquests rivaled those of the Mongols, Temür styled himself only as amir, or commander, and güregen, or royal son-in-law, through his marriage to a princess of the Chingizid line, and ruled through a puppet khan of the Chaghatay; this political front was not continued under his descendants, who ruled as Timurid sultans in their own right.

Despite his illiteracy, Temür was an avid patron of learning and poetry, and Ibn Khaldun, who famously met Temür in Damascus, describes him as intelligent and fond of scholarly debates. In the course of his conquests he transported many scholars and artists to Samarkand and created a brilliant court there, with special attention to religious scholarship, monumental architecture, and historical writing; with this precedent, the long Timurid century in Iran (1370–1507) witnessed a cultural efflorescence under the patronage of Timurid rulers and princes. In creed Temür was a Sunni of the Seljuq brand, though with pronounced ʿAlid sympathies, and like the Mongol Ilkhanids he showed special deference to Sufi masters and included them in his retinue.

After rising to power within the nomadic confederation of the Ulus Chaghatay in Transoxiana, Temür embarked on a series of wide-ranging campaigns between 1382 and 1405. From his base in Transoxiana, with Samarkand as his capital, he succeeded in subjugating Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Anatolia to the west (including a major defeat of the Ottomans in 1402); the steppe of the Golden Horde and Russia to the north; and India to the south. He died on campaign against China. Yet he was an inefficient conqueror; most of his campaigns were undertaken for the sake of booty and to demonstrate his supremacy within the Islamic world, and he often had to resubjugate rebellious territories.

The government established by Temür continued the Seljuq and Ilkhanid pattern, with separate administrative spheres or dīwāns for the seminomadic Turkic amirs as military elite on the one hand and settled Persian bureaucrats on the other; the latter, termed the dīwān-i aʿlā, administered financial affairs, tax collection, and aspects of local government, among other responsibilities. True to its nomadic roots, the dominant Turkic component of Temür's government was constituted by his family and personal following whose loyalty attached to him directly and who in return received leading administrative offices in the new empire. Temür curbed the apparent arbitrariness of tribal politics and its tendency toward warfare with the administrative structures and imperial ideology he inherited from the Mongol Empire; his highly personal government was thus not without system but had the advantages of political fluidity and institutional confusion, with the ultimate basis of rule being consent. However, Temür bent this nomadic-imperial template to his own ends by subverting and realigning all political structure to sole dependency on his own person and destroying the existing tribal aristocracy. His death accordingly led to a long and debilitating succession struggle between his sons and their factions in which much of the vast territory he conquered was lost to Timurid control. Equally debilitating was the ideological crisis that emerged following Temür's death, which shook the uneasy marriage of Chingizid and Sunni principles of government appealing simultaneously to Mongol dynastic law (Yasa) and Islamic shariʿa. Nevertheless, during the 15th century this Perso-Islamic Turco-Mongol culture became entrenched in the Near East and at the beginning of the 16th century would give rise to the three great empires of the early modern era, Ottoman, Safavid, and Mughal.

See also Central Asia; China; Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406); India; Mughals (1526–1857); Ottomans (1299–1924); Safavids

al-Tawhidi, Abu Hayyan (ca. 950–1023)

Abu Hayyan al-Tawhidi, ʿAli b. Muhammad b. al-ʿAbbas, is one of the most accomplished and creative writers of Arabic classical prose in the medieval period. Born to a poor family, probably in Baghdad, in the early tenth century, he associated in his early life with Sufis and then became a professional manuscript copyist. His profession gave him close association with books and encouraged him to pursue higher education in the Arabic linguistic and religious sciences. This education, together with a burgeoning literary talent, made him aspire to improve his social position, and he thus traveled to Rayy (near modern Tehran) three separate times in 12 years (968–80), seeking the patronage of three of its successive, powerful viziers: Abu al-Fadl b. al-ʿAmid (d. 970), his son Abu al-Fath (d. 976), and al-Sahib b. ʿAbbad (d. 995). All his journeys were resounding failures that filled him with frustration and resentment and led him to write a book, Akhlaq/Mathalib al-Wazirayn (The slanders of the two viziers; published in Damascus, 1965), in which he exposed the vices of the three viziers he had encountered. Back in Baghdad, he finished a ten-volume literary anthology, al-Basaʾir wa-l-Dhakhaʾir (Insights and treasures; Beirut, 1988), and, more importantly, added to his education a Greek dimension by attaching himself to a circle of Aristotelian philosophers, about whose discussions he wrote in yet another book, al-Muqabasat (Acquisitions; Baghdad, 1970). During this period, he finally attained literary and scholarly recognition from the vizier Ibn Saʿdan (d. 985), who made Abu Hayyan his private interlocutor, educator, and informant; Abu Hayyan's three-volume book al-Imtaʿ wa-l-Muʾanasa (Pleasure and enjoyment; Cairo, 1939–44) is a record of his conversations with the vizier. After the vizier's death, and still poor, Abu Hayyan possibly sought patronage in Shiraz, but no success is recorded there. In his 80s, he wrote a book on friendship, his al-Sadaqa wa-l-Sadiq (On friendship and friends; Damascus, 1964), in which he complained bitterly about his lack of friends and persistent destitution, and another book, al-Isharat al-Ilahiyya (Divine intimations; Beirut, 1973), in which he addressed God with meditative pieces in a pronounced Sufi vein. In 1010, he burned his books and wrote a poignant letter describing the forbidding existential circumstances that had led him to undertake that heinous act. He died in Shiraz 14 years later in 1023, leaving behind the 6 books mentioned above, along with 6 additional books and 10 letters and treatises, some of which have not survived and are known to us by title or citation.

Abu Hayyan's contribution to Islamic political thought is to be culled not only from a letter of advice he wrote to Ibn Saʿdan (included in his Imtaʿ) but also from almost all his works, where his political opinions are scattered, and from his experience as a political observer as well as a client to several patrons and politicians. It is because of the latter aspect of his experience that this contribution centers on analyzing, uniquely from the point of view of intellectuals, the dilemma faced by intellectuals: whether to attach themselves to the politically powerful, knowing that they are more accomplished than the powerful. Theoretically, forging such attachments by intellectuals is wrong, according to Abu Hayyan, given the religious, moral, and practical perils they pose to intellectuals. In the real world, however, intellectuals cannot but forge such attachments, because intellectuals are subject to the weaknesses of human nature, and they desire to put their knowledge into practice, spread their values among wide audiences, and earn sufficient prominence in society to protect themselves from the negative consequences of poverty and cynicism. These attachments must, however, be based on mutual respect between politicians and intellectuals, and politicians must give intellectuals complete freedom of expression and direct, unfiltered access to them and also allow them to participate in drawing state policy. In return, intellectuals must grant politicians access to their vast knowledge, help them bring to politics the precepts of religion, and act as intermediaries between them and the people. In the final analysis, a good politician is someone who knows how to recruit the right persons for his administration, who makes firmness and generosity the foundations of his rule, and who is kind to the common people, since it is he who holds the keys to the people's prosperity or decline.

See also Mirrors for Princes

Further Reading

Ihsan ʿAbbas, Abu Hayyan al-Tawhidi, 1956; Marc Bergé, Pour un humanisme vécu: Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī, 1979; Wadad Kadi, "ʾAlāqat al-mufakkir bi-l-sultān al-siyāsī fī fikr Abī Hayyān al-Tawḥīdī," in Studia Arabica et Islamica, edited by Wadad Kadi, 1981; Eadem, "Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī: A Sunni Voice in the Shīʿī Century," in Culture and Memory in Medieval Islam, Essays in Honour of Wilferd Madelung, edited by Farhad Daftary and Josef W. Meri, 2003.

WADAD KADI

taxation

The Islamic system of taxation represents an attempt to reconcile the actual practices of taxation with Islamic principles and to harmonize the potential dissonance between administrative and religious concerns.

During the time of Muhammad, there was no established system of taxation. The community's income was based on ad hoc support for specific purposes, on donations, and on part of the booty from raids. In addition, an alms tax (zakat or ṣadaqa) was levied on Muslims, while subdued tribes or communities had to pay a tribute called jizya. With the early Islamic conquests, the situation changed. The Muslims concluded treaties of submission with conquered cities, which varied widely with respect to the taxes or tributes to be paid. They also inherited the elaborate tax systems of the Byzantine and the Sasanian empires and at first relied on the same personnel and the same administrative procedures in collecting the taxes. The diversity and heterogeneity of these systems accounts for many discrepancies in the legal rulings and in the use of technical terms in the literature on taxation.

From the eighth century onward, jurists made various attempts to develop an Islamic concept of taxation based on the Qur'an and the examples set by the Prophet Muhammad and the first caliphs. Although the jurists disagreed in many details, the theoretical framework of the classical taxation system is rather uniform, relying on a more or less fixed corpus of scriptural sources. This theoretical framework did not change fundamentally in the centuries to come, although it did not comply with the fragmented practice of actual taxation.

The development of an Islamic tax system can also be interpreted as the emancipation of legal thinking from the constraints of practical politics. While in early Islamic times rulers did not face serious religious opposition when they fixed taxes, scholars now reduced the religiously sanctioned options of raising taxes or imposing new ones. Although numerous taxes and customs duties were levied, they were mostly disapproved of by the jurists. It was only in Ottoman times that the rulers succeeded in controlling the legal community more effectively and therefore received religious sanction for their fiscal measures.

The Islamic laws of taxation are based on the legal status of the taxable land, on the one hand, and on the communal or religious identity of the taxpayer, on the other hand. All Muslims were liable to an alms tax on a specified part of their property. Non-Muslims under Islamic dominion (dhimmīs) had to pay a poll tax (called jizya like the tribute of earlier time) of a fixed amount. The land tax (kharāj), which accounted for the largest part of the state revenue, was at first imposed only on non-Muslims but was soon considered to be incumbent on the land and therefore due on Muslims as well.

The various taxes were different in character and served different purposes. Zakat is a religious duty—in fact, one of the Five Pillars of Islam—and served the purification of the giver. It was meant to contribute to the reduction of social and economic disparities, and it was to be paid even if there was no legitimate government to collect it. Jizya, on the other hand, was intended, among other things, to demonstrate the inferior status of the dhimmī. Other taxes, like the land tax, did not have specific religious connotations.

At least in theory, the revenues from the different taxes were to be kept in separate accounts, since there were religious sanctions as to their respective distribution. During classical times, the military and the palace administration accounted for most of the expenditures of the state. As the revenues depended heavily on the amount of land to be taxed, both territorial losses and the practice of assigning land to military leaders decreased revenues and made tax assessment a difficult task.

In modern times, some Muslim states attempted to reintroduce an Islamic system of taxation; mostly this involved the levying of zakat in addition to other, not specifically Islamic taxes, such as income tax. The revenue from zakat usually amounted only to a small percentage of the total tax revenue. In contemporary Islamist discourses, writers call for the reintroduction of zakat for Muslims and the imposition of jizya for non-Muslims.

See also economic theory; jizya

Further Reading

Abu 'Ubayd al-Qasim b. Sallam, The Book of Revenue (Kitāb al-Amwāl), translated by Imran Ahsan Khan Nyazee, 2002; Nicolas Aghnides, Mohammedan Theories of Finance, 1916; A. Ben Shemesh, Taxation in Islam, 3 vols., 1958–69; Daniel C. Dennet, Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam, 1950; Baber Johansen, The Islamic Law on Land Tax and Rent: The Peasants' Loss of Property Rights as Interpreted in the Hanafite Legal Literature of the Mamluk and Ottoman Periods, 1988; Frede Lokkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classical Period, 1950; Abu al-Hasan al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government (al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyya w'al-Wilāyāt al-Dīniyya), translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 1996.

ANDREAS GÖRKE

terrorism

Terrorism is a politically charged concept with no commonly accepted definition. First used to describe state repression during the French revolution, the term later became associated with indiscriminate political violence by rebel groups and other nonstate actors. The label "terrorist" has pejorative connotations and is used by political actors, usually states, to delegitimize their militant opponents. Western legal definitions of terrorism were first formulated in the late 20th century and differ among countries. Social scientific definitions also vary but share three core criteria: that terrorism has political aims, targets noncombatants, and has a communicative dimension. Its symbiotic relationship with mass media distinguishes terrorism from other forms of political violence and makes it a fundamentally modern phenomenon.

Terrorism as such is not treated in the Islamic legal tradition. The root of the modern Arabic word for terrorism (irhāb) features in the Qur'an (8:60) in the general sense of "striking fear in the enemy," but irhāb never emerged as a distinct conception of warfare or as a legal category (although many contemporary Muslim states have Western-inspired antiterrorist legislation). However, the rich Islamic legal tradition on warfare considered certain forms of violent activism and certain military tactics as illegitimate.

Classical Muslim jurists distinguished, from a jus ad bellum (right to wage war) perspective, among three forms of violent activism: jihad (war against non-Muslims), baghy (rebellion against Muslim rulers; Q. 49:9), and ḥirāba (brigandry; Q. 5:33). Jihad was legitimate but subject to caliphal authorization or specific casus belli such as outside invasion.

Both baghy and ḥirāba were considered illegitimate, but only ḥirāba carried severe sanctions. Rebels (bughāt) of a certain number (shawka) with a reasonable cause (ta'wīl) should be stopped but not punished. Ḥirāba connoted senseless violence by small groups spreading fear in the general population (al-mufsidūn fī al-arḍ) and thus represents the Islamic legal notion closest to terrorism. Jurists often disagreed on the classification of specific militants, notably the late seventh-century Kharijis, as rebels or brigands. The name "Khariji" itself thus eventually became a general term for illegitimate militants with a meaning close to "terrorist."

Jurists also developed detailed guidelines for conduct in jihad (jus in bello). These rules reflected a concern for proportionality and discrimination and were analogous, though not identical, to those of the Western just war tradition. Fighters should not cause more bloodshed or material destruction than necessary for the achievement of their objective. They should use clean tactics and avoid killing noncombatants, as suggested by the prophetic tradition: "do not cheat or commit treachery, nor should you mutilate or kill children, women, or old men." Treaties should be respected and prisoners of war well treated until their fate was decided. Irregular tactics such as abductions, poisoning of water wells, arson, torture, and rape were condemned and associated with ḥirāba.

Not all these prohibitions were absolute, however. For certain situations, many medieval jurists approved of tactics that violated these principles. This included the use of indiscriminate weapons such as catapults against besieged cities or the launch of night raids in which low visibility put noncombatants at risk. Attacks on enemy armies that used Muslims as human shields were generally permitted. Deception (khidā') was sanctioned if practiced upon non-Muslims who had broken truces. Most jurists (except Hanafis) allowed for the execution of male prisoners of war if the commander deemed it beneficial. The sanctioning of such tactics by at least some jurists, combined with their occasional use in the Prophet Muhammad's own campaigns, was later exploited by modern militants in their attempts to justify terrorist tactics.

Islamists were latecomers to the modern history of terrorism. Although the "secret apparatus" of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood had carried out bombings in the 1940s, terrorist activity by Islamists took substantial proportions only in the late 1970s, by which time secular militants such as the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the German Rote Armé Fraktion had established the principal methods associated with modern terrorism, such as bombings, hostage-takings, hijackings, and assassinations. However, Islamist terrorist activity steadily increased in frequency and brutality, and by the 2000s the majority of high-casualty attacks worldwide were undertaken by Islamists.

The modern history of Islamist terrorism began in Syria and Egypt in the 1970s, where militants conducted numerous attacks on government targets, including the successful assassination of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in 1981. In the 1980s, Shi'i Hizbullah undertook spectacular suicide bombings and hostage takings against Westerners in Lebanon and elsewhere. The 1990s saw extensive use of terrorist tactics, notably by the Groupe Islamique Armé in Algeria, al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya in Egypt, Hamas in Israel, Abu Sayyaf in the Philippines, Lashkar-e-Taiba in Kashmir, and Lashkar-e Janghvi in Pakistan. In the 1990s, Sunni militancy globalized, first with Armed Islamic Group of Algeria (GIA) attacks against France, then with al-Qaeda's operations against America, which culminated with the attacks on September 11, 2001. In the 2000s, al-Qaeda and related groups launched mass-casualty suicide bombings across the globe, notably in Bali, Istanbul, Riyadh, Madrid, London, Amman, Sharm el-Sheikh, and Islamabad, but nowhere more than in post-2003 Iraq. The abduction and murder of the American journalist Daniel Pearl in Pakistan sparked a wave of hostage takings from 2002 onward, especially in Iraq. Chechen militants took mass hostages in a Moscow theater in 2002 and at a Beslan school in North Ossetia in 2004. Although Islamists have executed hostages, they rarely tortured, raped, or mutilated them. Islamists have not successfully used chemical, biological, nuclear, or radiological weapons, but al-Qaeda has declared its intention to use, and attempted to develop, such weapons. In 2003 the radical Saudi cleric Nasir al-Fahd issued a fatwa sanctioning their use against Western civilians.

Islamist militants usually reject the label "terrorist." Instead they view themselves as mujahidin engaged in a legitimate defensive jihad against unbelievers. They circumvent jus ad bellum restrictions by arguing that the urgency of the infidel threat and the absence of a caliphate abrogate the need for caliphal authorization and individualize the duty for jihad. In the cases where the enemy is Muslim, militants resort to excommunication (takfīr) and declare these Muslims infidel. Jus in bello principles are sidestepped in different ways. Civilians are denied noncombatant status because they vote, pay taxes, work for the government, or may be called to serve in the military. Radical rulings on human shields or on night raids are exploited to justify noncombatant collateral damage. Visas are not considered pledges of security because they are issued by illegitimate authorities. Suicide bombings are framed as martyrdom-seeking operations, not self-killing. Mass casualty attacks are justified as a proportional response to infidel killing and oppression of Muslims.

Some activists have nevertheless embraced the terrorist label. The Palestinian ideologue 'Abdallah 'Azzam (d. 1989) wrote, "If preparations for jihād are terrorism, then we are terrorists." With reference to the Qur'an (8:60), the Saudi cleric Hamud al-Shu'aybi (d. 2002) ruled terrorism a duty in jihad. The Syrian ideologue Abu Mus'ab al-Suri considered "the jihād of individual terrorism" a crucial strategic option for today's mujahidin. "Irhābī" and "terrorist" are common nicknames on radical Islamist discussion forums on the Internet.

The late 2000s saw a Muslim public backlash against terrorism, partly in reaction to high Muslim civilian casualties. Mainstream Islamic scholars began to articulate a legal discourse banning terrorism, and several radical ideologues called for more discriminate tactics. Polls showed that most Muslims denounced al-Qaeda's tactics as terrorism. Fewer Muslims, however, condemned mass-casualty attacks against Israeli civilians in the context of the Palestinian Israeli conflict.

See also Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011); jihad; martyrdom; nonviolence; al-Qaeda; rebellion; violence

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; David Cook, Understanding Jihad, 2005; Bruce Hoffman, Inside Terrorism, 2006; Johannes Jansen, The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins and Islamic Resurgence in the Middle East, 1986; Gilles Kepel, Jihad: The Trail of Political Islam, 2003; Majid Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, 1966; Barry Rubin and Judith C. Rubin, Anti-American Terrorism and the Middle East: A Documentary Reader, 2004; David Aaron Schwartz, "International Terrorism and Islamic Law," Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 29, no. 3 (1991).

THOMAS HEGGHAMMER

theocracy

Theocracy (divine rule, from Greek Θεός/theós [God] and κρατεί/kratia [rule]) is a system of government in which religious and political authority are merged and which is ruled according to religious laws. The fact that the corresponding Arabic term hukūma dīnīyya denotes "religious government" rather than "divine rule" reveals the limited applicability of notions of theocracy in various traditions of Islamic thought.

A defining opposition with reference to theocracy is that between imamate and kingship, between rule according to the limits laid down by God and one indifferent to any such limits. The following saying, addressed to the second caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (d. 644), reveals this opposition: "A caliph only takes what is due and spends it where it is meant to be spent, whereas a king oppresses people by arbitrarily taking from some and giving to others." It is with reference to this understanding of just rule, based on sacred law, that invocations of the right of disobedience in early Islam may be understood. Religious law was seen as a check on political power. For instance, certain strands of Mu'tazili thought allowed for the right to disobey the ruler and to depose him when he broke the law. The Kharijis, like some Mu'tazilis, even preferred a non-Arab caliph on the grounds that, lacking strong tribal ties, he would be easier to depose than an Arab.

Religion as State Law in Islamic Political Thought

As a system of rule, theocracy requires some basic rules of government. Constitutional law, however, emanates neither historically nor conceptually from the schools of law (madhhab, pl. madhāhib) that emerged in the ninth century. Muslim scholars therefore have developed a variety of methodologies that derive from traditional Islamic roots for a basic law of the state. The Charter of Medina (ca. 624) is often portrayed as the first Islamic constitution. Shi'is also regard the rulings of the first Shi'i imam, 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661), as important principles of rule. However, neither the Charter of Medina nor the principles of rule that 'Ali stipulated in his writings present blueprints for a theocracy.

In what is regarded as the classic Sunni treatment of the subject, the Shafi'i jurist Mawardi (d. 1058) in his treatise al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government) postulates sovereignty on the basis of the Qur'an and the sunna. In this model of government, which Mawardi developed to justify and support Abbasid rule in the context of contending claims to rule by warlords in Egypt and Iraq, the caliph is installed by investiture (bay'a). He thereby relies on collective and formal acknowledgment on the part of the 'ulama' as well as the ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd (those who loosen and bind). Here, too, the caliph must govern in the framework of, and with guidance from, religious law.

Whither Theocracy: The Empirical Relationship between State and Religion

Commonly held views about the unity of state and religion in Islam (al-islām dīn wa-dawla) are contested by scholars and must be qualified historically as the exception rather than the rule. Some date the separation of religion and state to the emergence of the class of 'ulama' from the ninth century onward. Possessing semi-autonomous sources of financial and social support frequently allowed the 'ulama' to maintain a degree of independence from the caliph. Others date the separation of state and religion to the time of the Buyid intervention in Baghdad in 945 that terminated the Abbasid caliph's dual role as the temporal and spiritual leader of the umma (community of believers).

The bifurcation of the legal system into shari'a and maẓālim courts (dīwān al-maẓālim, board of grievances) in early Abbasid times can be seen as solidifying separate realms of religion and state, as it created a separation of "religious" and nonreligious courts, implicitly acknowledged a source of law outside of the Qur'an and the sunna, and stipulated a limited application of religious law. The very concept of siyāsa (politics, government) indicates a realm of administration and generation of rules in areas where no jurisprudence could be derived from the Qur'an and the sunna.

Characteristically, in the Ottoman Empire, sultans made ordinances that were complements to shari'a regulations but were not equal and not superior to shari'a. As a political ethics, shari'a functioned here too as a limit on executive rule rather than as a constituent to theocratic government.

Theocracy and the Modern State

Departing from the tradition of shari'a as a political ethics limiting executive rule, the 20th century saw the rise of juristic theories of theocracy as a state based on Islamic law. Due to the absence of Islamic constitutional thought, such juristic theories of theocracy, proposed by Islamist thinkers from Sayyid Qutb to Hasan al-Banna and from Mawdudi to Ayatollah Khomeini, have all reverted to civil law types of legal systems in order to envision their Islamic states.

Even though ten Muslim-majority countries designated themselves "Islamic states" in 2010 (Afghanistan, Bahrain, Brunei, Iran, Maldives, Mauritania, Pakistan, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and Yemen—comprising about 28 percent of the populations living in Muslim-majority states), strictly speaking none can be characterized as a theocracy, in that religious and political authority is not congruent (e.g., Saudi Arabia) or constitutional and republican elements limit religiopolitical authority (e.g., Iran). Indeed, the public law of the ten Islamic states incorporates numerous elements not specifically drawn from Islamic legal traditions. Dutch scholar Johannes Jansen consequently argues that it is not the reinterpretation of the Qur'an and the sunna that lies at the basis of theocratic formulations but the assumption that the Qur'an and the sunna have little to offer by way of constitutional law. Malcolm Kerr speaks here of the "empty spaces" in the sources, Konrad Dilger of the "silence of the legislator."

The public law of today's so-called Islamic states takes various forms. Saudi Arabia, which declares the Qur'an to be the country's constitution, has since 1992 adopted a Basic Regulation, placing quasiconstitutional limits on political authority. Political authority is primarily exercised by the king and the royal family, although the 'ulama' exercise legal authority by issuing fatwas on social and political matters and, following a strict Hanbali/Wahhabi tradition, by controlling shari'a courts.

The 1956 Constitution of Pakistan stipulated that no law shall be enacted that is repugnant to the injunctions of Islam as laid down in the Qur'an and the sunna. When a law was in conformity with the Qur'an and the sunna, the constitution allocated the decision-making power not to a council of religious scholars but to the National Assembly. The legal system was further Islamized when in 1980 military ruler Zia-ul-Haq decreed an Islamic legal code to be applied through shari'a courts. In 1991, the competitively elected National Assembly continued the Islamization process when passing a shari'a bill introduced by Nawaz Sharif's government.

A further case of a self-proclaimed Islamic state with yet another public law framework emerged in the late years of Ja'far Nimeiri's regime (1969–85) in Sudan, in alliance with the Sudanese Muslim Brothers led by Hasan al-Turabi. Passed as part of the emergency law of 1984, an Islamization project of the legal system was embarked upon that kept the existing public law framework largely intact and concentrated on Islamizing the criminal justice system by forming Islamic courts and applying ḥudūd punishments.

The 1979 Iranian Constitution provided perhaps the most ambitious project by creating a novel public law framework for an Islamic state by combining Shi'i concepts of government with republican traditions. Based on the Constitution of the French Fifth Republic (1958), the 1979 Iranian Constitution provides for a number of directly elected republican institutions, such as the presidency and the parliament, as well as the possibility of referenda as direct expressions of public will. Simultaneously, it also recognizes that the supreme leader (rahbar) has oversight over the three branches of power, requires of legislation to be "consistent with Islamic law" probed by a council of clerical and civil jurists (the "Guardian Council"), and recognizes divine sovereignty. As Asghar Schirazi, among others, has shown, the notion of the guardianship of the jurist (wilāyat al-faqīh) applied in the 1979 constitution constituted a radical reinterpretation of the conventional meaning of wilāya and thus a jurisprudential revolution in itself. Whereas in Ja'fari jurisprudence, wilāya had referred to the legal authority by the 'ulama' to act for orphans, the insane, and minor women who had no legal guardian, in the 1979 constitution this notion was expanded from the private to the public realm and narrowed from the collectivity of the 'ulama' to an individual: a high-ranking faqīh. This high-ranking faqīh would guard over and conciliate between the branches of power, command the army, and appoint the chief of the judiciary, among other matters. While the original constitution did not foresee a mechanism for constitutional reform, the amended constitution of 1989 invested the supreme leader with the initiating and certifying power of every constitutional amendment process and every referendum.

Beside the ten states designating themselves Islamic states, an additional 12 have chosen to declare Islam the official state religion, encompassing 30 percent of the population living in Muslim-majority states. Among these, the consequences for the status of religious law in the legal system vary from case to case. In some, it is limited to private law, and in particular family law, such as in Jordan and Malaysia. In other cases, the jurisdiction on the basis of religious law is broader, as in Yemen, where article 46 of the constitution provides judges with discretionary powers to interpret shari'a and apply punishments that may not necessarily be proscribed by positive law. Further, which institution is mandated to interpret the meaning and scope of religious law differs. In Egypt the role of interpreting the meaning of "shari'a" has fallen to the Supreme Constitutional Court, a body made up of judges typically not trained in Islamic law. In Pakistan the constitution specifically assigns this role to the Federal Shariat Court.

The juristic theory of shari'a poses fundamental challenges to legal reform and the accommodation of changing norms in jurisprudence. In Sunni-majority countries as well as in the Islamic Republic of Iran after 1988, the reform of codified Islamic law therefore often has been justified with reference to "public interest" (maṣlaḥa 'āmma). As a principle or method of law, maṣlaḥa derives its validity from the idea that the fundamental purpose of legislation is to secure the common good. In the classical view, maṣlaḥa applies only when the shari'a is silent on a given issue or when it can be proven that exigency requires the temporary suspension of certain legal practices prescribed by shari'a. For the doctrine of maṣlaḥa to be valid, the necessity should be reasonably certain; it should benefit the public at large, not only a certain segment of the population; it should not conflict with explicit or implicit Islamic ordinances; it should be rational and acceptable to people of sound intellect; and it should relieve or prevent hardship for the people. Expounding a different view, Khomeini, as the supreme leader of the Islamic Republic of Iran, decided in 1988 that the doctrine of maṣlaḥa permitted the temporary suspension of the primary rulings of Islam in emergencies or conditions of overriding necessity. He thereby empowered his own office to unilaterally revoke Islamic law where it was perceived to be contrary to public interest. To determine public interest, Khomeini created the Expediency Discernment Council in 1988, which was written into the 1989 amendments to the constitution. This novel adoption of maṣlaḥa, hitherto rejected in Shi'i thought, as a legal principle justifying both the reform of the fundamental laws of the state and the suspension of legal practices prescribed by shari'a can be interpreted as the attempted prioritization in legislation of pragmatism over dogma, while still remaining, at least formally, in the juridical framework of an Islamic state.

See also democracy; government; secularism; shari'a

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, Six Centuries of Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Konrad Dilger, "Das Schweigen des Gesetzgebers als Mittel der Rechtsfortbildung im Bereich des islamischen Rechts," in Festschrift für H. R. Roemer. Die Islamische Welt zwischen Mittelalter und Neuzeit, edited by Ulrich Haarmann and Peter Bachmann, 1979; Hans-Georg Ebert, "Tendenzen der Rechtsentwicklung," in Der Islam in der Gegenwart, edited by Werner Ende and Udo Steinbach, 1996; Muhammad Hashim Kamali, Principles of Islamic Jurisprudence, 1995; Malcolm Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida, 1966; Asghar Schirazi, The Constitution of Iran: Politics and the State in the Islamic Republic, 1998.

MIRJAM KÜNKLER

theology

Theology in Islam is defined equally by its reason-based dialectical method (kalām), from which its name derives ('ilm al-kalām), and by its topic of inquiry. It developed in response to the realities Muslims faced after the death of their prophet, when they came face to face with the intellectual and religious milieus of the newly conquered populations while at the same time grappling with problems of their own. The dialectical method they adopted had long been current in the Near East, where it was used above all in public disputations. The Muslims continued to debate many of the same questions, notably monotheism versus dualism, free will, cosmology, and the nature and limits of knowledge. One question, however, was quite new, engendered by the crisis of succession after Muhammad's death: who was entitled to the leadership of the community (imāma)? This question, which was highly divisive in both theological and political terms, in turn generated new questions regarding human-divine interaction, and some of these also had a political dimension. Thus the murder of 'Uthman b. 'Affan in 656 and 'Ali b. Abi Talib's acceptance of arbitration with Mu'awiya raised the question whether a grave sinner was still a member of the Muslim community or an unbeliever and what constituted faith. The solutions ranged from banishing a grave sinner from the community of believers (thus the Kharijis)—a position that would remain marginal in Muslim political thought—to accepting him or her as a full member on the grounds that faith did not include acts (thus the Murji'is, who prefigure Sunnism). The issue of free will and predestination acquired political relevance, too. The proponents of free will did not prevail in Sunnism, but the methods and questions they posed to those in power (the Umayyads) would have a lasting impact on the development of the doctrine of human action in that their positions posed the questions that the predestinarians had to answer before they could finalize their doctrine. Investigation into the nature of free will was part of the larger systematic inquiry into the nature of God and His attributes—in this particular case, His justice (rejected by all dualists, to whom a just God could not be a creator of evil)—that would later dominate theological inquiry. But God's attributes acquired political relevance again under the Abbasids in connection with the question of whether the Qur'an (God's speech) was pre-eternal or created in time. Even theodicy, epistemology, physics, and cosmology sometimes acquired political importance. Most theological problems were debated partly by reason-based kalām and partly by authority-based hadith (prophetic tradition), and the question of which of the two carried the greater weight was also a major issue. In the Islamicist literature, "theology" usually translates as kalām, however.

Theology and Orthodoxies

Although theology in the sense of kalām played a crucial role in the fashioning of Islamic doctrines, it largely disappeared as an independent science in Sunnism and survived, under substantial doctrinal restrictions, only in Twelver and Zaydi Shi'ism. The Sunnis opted instead for hadith-based traditionalism as a reliable source of their doctrines. In Shi'ism, the imam's authority allowed for a contained acceptance of theology, though not without the resistance of many Shi'i traditionalists.

The marginalization of kalām was a drawn-out process spanning the entire period from the early centuries to the dawn of the modern age. Hostility to theology had begun already in the eighth century, when the proto-Sunni traditionalists (ahl al-ḥadīth) opposed the doctrine of free will as represented by the Qadaris and later the Mu'tazilis, the latter being the most significant representatives of theology in Islamic history. In the ninth century, the traditionalists omitted hadith advocating free will from the canonical collections, which provided next to scripture the reservoir for their doctrinal positions. Their influence grew after the failure of Ma'mun's so-called inquisition (miḥna), which sought to impose not only the Jahmi and Mu'tazili doctrine that the Qur'an was created but also the method of reason-based theological argumentation for interpreting scripture. Traditionalism came to the fore in the 10th to 12th centuries, when it was supported by the Abbasid caliph Qadir (d. 991, famed for issuing the Qadiri Creed) and thereafter by the Seljuqs, who used madrasas as an instrument for linking up with, and ensuring the support of, the Sunnis. Despite the wish of the traditionalists to dissociate themselves from theology as practiced by Mu'tazilis, however, there arose in the second part of the ninth century groups best exemplified by Abu al-Hasan al-Ash'ari (d. ca. 934), who created a Sunni traditionalist theology. Ash'ari theology (and also that of the Maturidis) generated a long fight within traditionalism (including Hanbalism), which frequently overlapped with important political moments, exemplified by the trials and careers of the traditionalists Ibn 'Aqil (d. 1119) and Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328). The traditionalist theology affected a wide range of disciplines from Sufism (especially via the doctrine of the divine attributes) to Islamic philosophy and science, and its legacy continues to be felt.

Major elements of theology, specifically Mu'tazili theology, survived fully in Shi'ism, most importantly the doctrine of divine justice, but others were strongly circumscribed by the doctrine of the imāma, notably the doctrine of promise and threat (relating to the rewards and punishments of the afterlife) and the status of the grave sinner. It is to the Zaydi preservation of Mu'tazili manuscripts that we owe much of our knowledge about Mu'tazilis today.

See also Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855); free will; inquisition; Kharijis; Murji'is; philosophy; Shi'ism; Sufism; Sunnism

Further Reading

Josef van Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3. Jahrhundert Hidschra: Eine Geschichte des religiösen Denkens im frühen Islam, 1997; Sabine Schmidtke, "Neuere Forschungen zur Mu'tazila unter Besonderer Berücksichtigung der Späteren Mu'tazila ab dem 4./10. Jahrhundert," Arabica 45, no. 4 (1998); Idem, The Theology of al-'Allāma al-Hillī (d. 726/1325), 1991.

RACHA EL OMARI

Thousand and One Nights

The Thousand and One Nights, also known as the Arabian Nights, is a story collection, containing Indian, Persian, Greek, Arabic, and other elements and popularized in Europe through 18th- and 19th-century English and French translations. It is a perennial source of musical, dramatic, and cinematic adaptations. The earliest known Arabic manuscript of Nights dates to the ninth century, although Arabic authors identify the tales as Persian. The Persian tales, in turn, are evidently based on Sanskrit originals. Like other Arabic works in the Indo-Iranian tradition, notably the animal fables Kalila and Dimna, attributed to the sage Baydaba or Bidpai, Nights presents itself as a work of advice to kings. Its stories unfold in a world ruled by despots. The most important of these is King Shahriyar, who, betrayed by his wife, marries and executes one virgin after another. His murderous compulsion provides the pretext for the tales told by Shahrzad, the learned daughter of the king's vizier. After volunteering to marry the king, she saves her own life by telling stories and leaving them incomplete, thereby forcing him to spare her for another day. Her stories—or at least those that form the core of the collection—provide the king with object lessons in the use and abuse of power. Many stories in Nights feature brutal despots, among them the imaginary king Yunan, who wrongly executes the sage Duban and—in a denouement of great symbolic importance—is himself killed by the poison-soaked pages of a volume bequeathed to him by the sage. Kings are thus advised to heed their advisors and to submit to the lessons found in books. Not all the exemplary stories are negative: some feature (relatively) benevolent despots who—perhaps significantly—tend to be historical figures rather than mythical kings from far-off lands. The best known of these historical figures is the Abbasid caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809), who in the stories takes to the streets of Baghdad in disguise in order to examine the condition of his subjects. Typically, he is rescued from the ensuing predicaments by his resourceful vizier Ja'far al-Barmaki (also a historical figure, d. 803). After revealing himself as caliph, Rashid rewards the just and punishes the wicked. The motif of caliph as folk hero is present in tenth-century historical sources but in Nights apparently represents a later idealization of the early Abbasid period. This idealization was embraced by European readers, who pronounced themselves enamored of what the English poet Alfred, Lord Tennyson (d. 1892) called the "golden prime / of good Haroun Alraschid." To the extent that it tells tales of bad kings and offers good kings advice on how to do their job, Nights—or at least the core stories around which the collection grew—may be read as a criticism of the institution of monarchy. Yet the collection, which brings together stories from many times and places, should not be understood as providing an accurate account of political and social life in any particular premodern society. In modern times, the characters and situations of Nights have served the purpose of political allegory in several works of Arabic literature (e.g., Naguib Mahfouz's Arabian Nights and Days).

See also Abbasids (720–1258)

Further Reading

Husain Haddawy, The Arabian Nights, 1992; Robert Irwin, The Arabian Nights: A Companion, 2004; Muhsin Mahdi, The Thousand and One Nights (Alf layla wa-layla) from the Earliest Known Sources, vol. 1–3, 1984–95; Naguib Mahfouz, Arabian Nights and Days, translated by Denys Johnson-Davies, 1995; Alfred Tennyson, "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," in Poems, Chiefly Lyrical, 1830.

MICHAEL COOPERSON

Timurids (1370–1506)

Timurid political thought was shaped by an ideal combining Aristotelian ethics with the pre-Islamic "circle of justice." According to this the ruler depends on the army, which requires revenue; revenue is provided by the subjects, who depend on justice; justice is ensured by the ruler. The Timurids also honored the imperial ideologies of the Islamic caliphate and the Mongol Empire. Order in society was provided by an absolute ruler, sanctioned by God, governing through an administration divided into separate spheres—the men of the sword, largely Turco-Mongolian, and the men of the pen, mostly Persian bureaucrats. In practice the division between military and civilian, Persian and Turco-Mongolian, was less clear.

In his treatise Akhlaq-i Muhsin (The ethics of Muhsin; 1501–2) the Timurid scholar Husayn al-Wa'iz al-Kashifi, building on Nasir al-Din al-Tusi, presented the function of the ruler as the maintenance of justice—here meaning social order—keeping men in their proper places and curbing natural aggression. In practice, for city populations, a ruler's justice meant the promotion of economic welfare and security in return for taxation. Suffering under an oppressive or unsuccessful ruler, city notables might switch allegiance, and historians describe such action as reasonable.

When the Timurid founder Timur (Tamerlane, r. 1370–1405) rose to power, Chingizid rule had ended in Transoxiana and Iran, but in most regions power remained with Turco-Mongolian commanders loyal to both Islamic and Mongol traditions. Since Timur was not descended from Chingiz Khan, Mongol tradition did not permit him to assume the sovereign title "khan." He used the title amir (commander), ruled through a puppet khan, and increased his status by marrying into the Chingizid house. At the same time he gathered prominent 'ulama' at his court, honored Sufi shaykhs, and justified many campaigns as protection of the shari'a.

The end of the Abbasid caliphate and then of Chingizid rule encouraged experimentation with new ideologies and the rise of messianic movements like the Hurufis and the Nurbakhshis, which challenged existing rulers. Perhaps partly in response, the Timurids developed charismatic and religious claims. Timur emphasized his personal charisma, adopting the title sāhib-qirān (Lord of the Auspicious Conjunction) and encouraging stories about his spiritual power. By the end of Timur's reign, the force of Chingizid legal tradition was declining and Timur did not replace his second puppet khan when he died circa 1402–3. His successor Shahrukh (1409–47) ruled without a khan and announced in some quarters that he was abrogating the Mongol dynastic code. Some of Shahrukh's historians referred to him as mujaddid, or centennial renewer of religion.

During the same period the Timurids elaborated their Chingizid genealogical ties, developing a new myth that increased the dynasty's separate prestige. Timur's ancestor Qarachar Barlas, a relative of Chingiz Khan, had been chief commander to Chingiz's son Chaghatay; he was now reported to have been Chaghatay's chief advisor and to have passed his position to his descendants. This myth reached its full development under Shahrukh. He and later Timurid rulers could now assume Islamic and Mongol sovereign titles previously reserved for the puppet khan, most notably that of sultan (sovereign ruler). Shahrukh was also referred to as khaghan (great khan) in contemporary histories, and used the term khilāfat (caliphate) on some coins. The Timurid synthesis of Islamic and Mongol traditions was appealing to later dynasties such as the Mughals, Safavids, and Uzbeks, and a number adopted elements of Timurid legitimation.

See also Mongols; Tamerlane (1336–1405); al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

Further Reading

Shahzad Bashir, Messianic Hopes and Mystical Visions: The Nūrbakhshīya between Medieval and Modern Islam, 2003; Anne Broadbridge, Kingship and Ideology in the Islamic and Mongol Worlds, 2008; Beatrice Forbes Manz, Power, Politics and Religion in Timurid Iran, 2007; Maria Subtelny, "A Late Medieval Persian Summa on Ethics: Kashifi's Akhlāq-i Muhsinī," Iranian Studies 36 no. 4 (2003); John E. Woods, "Timūr's Genealogy," in Intellectual Studies on Islam: Essays Written in Honor of Martin B. Dickson, Professor of Persian Studies, Princeton University, edited by Michel M. Mazzaoui and Vera B. Moreen, 1990.

BEATRICE FORBES MANZ

torture

Torture, the infliction of physical or psychological pain or suffering on a person in custody of the law for the purpose of extracting a confession, or for punishment, is traditionally seen as part of Islamic political and legal thought. It may be considered as the outcome of a political conception of justice and a judicial tradition centered on physical punishment as rehabilitation.

Classical Islamic penal law distinguishes between two categories of offenses: crimes against "the rights of God" punishable by the hudūd, or "limits," sentences specified in scriptural sources for fornication, calumny, banditry, burglary, and drinking alcohol and other crimes that arise out of transactions between individuals. The law sets high standards of proof for sentences against fornication or repeated theft and banditry. Nevertheless, stoning (lapidation) for adulterers, men or women, is a "fixed sentence," the application of which is unavoidable. Similarly, crucifixion can be meted out to bandits, although jurists disagree over whether it should occur before or after the death of the accused. Where offenses differ from those covered by ḥudūd, they are punished according to ta'zīr (or chastisement) laws, which are left to the discretion of the ruler or the judge, usually the head of the police (ṣāḥib al-shurṭa), and thus open to arbitrariness. Ta'zīr sentences range from flogging and imprisonment to banishment but can also include the death penalty. Their extension to all criminal acts deemed inimical to public order, frequently for political reasons, has resulted in judicial torture, a preferred method of siyāsa shar'iyya (governance). Intentional wounding or murder is punished by qiṣāṣ law, comparable to private justice, which enables the victim or his kin to opt for retaliation instead of compensation.

Classical Muslim jurists evinced skepticism about the validity of torture as a method of proof. They argued that a judge can ascertain only the truthfulness of verbal testimony and not of facts, emphasized unconstrained and free testimony as guarantee of credibility, and insisted on the observance of formal procedure as a safeguard against arbitrariness. Nevertheless, recourse to judicial torture became routine from the end of the tenth century on as a result of changes in judicial practice, including a relaxation of rules of evidence, the vagaries of political power, and the blurring of functions between the judge (qadi), the head of the police, and the magistrate in charge of military justice (qāḍī al-'askar). Torture was also carried out extrajudicially by tax collectors, who frequently ordered individuals suspected of tax evasion to be exposed to the sun (with oil poured on their heads or jars suspended from their necks) or held in stress positions until payment was secured. The practice of muṣādara, or confiscation, institutionalized under the Abbassids, compelled public officials as well as rulers' political rivals, frequently with the use of torture, to divulge their (often) illegally obtained wealth for confiscation by the government. The tannūr, a machine comprised of a heated cylinder internally spiked with nails, invented by ninth-century vizier Ibn al-Zayyat (769–848), was one of the devices used against such officials. In spite of attempts at codifying penal law made by the Ottomans, recourse to torture did not diminish.

In the modern era, shari'a penal law has long been enforced in Saudi Arabia in accordance with a strict legal doctrine, as well as in Qatar. Under the influence of colonial rule, a number of countries, such as Algeria, Tunisia, Egypt, Jordan, and Syria, adopted Western-inspired penal codes and constitutions that prohibit torture. Nevertheless, torture frequently is used as a method of investigation by police and security services against political prisoners and persons of both sexes suspected of acts of terror and dissidence. Techniques of torture vary in degrees of sophistication but follow a pattern featuring sexual humiliation (including rape), physical and mental degradation, sensory deprivation, and disruption of psychological processes.

The emergence of faith-based political movements throughout the Muslim world beginning in the 1970s brought demands for a reinstitution of Islamic penal law as an assertion of political identity. Yemen, the United Arab Emirates, Iran, Libya, Sudan, Pakistan, and Northern Nigerian states adopted codified forms of the shari'a. Codification of Islamic penal law varies from country to country and frequently exacerbates inconsistencies inherent in the classical legal tradition. It has resulted in expansive definitions of offenses, selective fixing of ta'zīr sentences, lax rules of evidence, minors' criminal liability, and increased discretionary powers afforded to judges. Codified law enforces physical punishment and pain with various degrees of severity, as exemplified by public flogging, judicial cross amputation of the right hand and left foot (occasionally ordered under anesthesia or a physician's supervision), crucifixion, lapidation, and retaliation in cases of intentional homicide or wounding.

The use of torture, whether under shari'a law or modern penal code, violates the 1984 Geneva Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, to which these states (except the Islamic Republic of Iran) are signatories. It further contradicts conceptions of human rights and declarations formulated by the United Nations, as well as Islamic organizations.

Human rights organizations reported acts of collective torture in Jordan's Swaqa prison in August 2007 and abuse of capital punishment in the Islamic Republic of Iran (which also executes minors), Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Yemen, and Pakistan. Several countries, including Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and Morocco, also participated in a U.S.–sponsored program that transfers individuals suspected of acts of terror to friendly countries willing to use torture as a method of interrogation against them. Initiated in 1995 during the presidency of Bill Clinton, the program was expanded by President George W. Bush (2000–8) and retained by the Obama administration.

See also human rights; punishment; terrorism

Further Reading

Baber Johansen, "Vérité et Torture. Ius commune et droit musulman entre le Xe et XIIIe siècle," in De la Violence, edited by Françoise Héritier, 1996; Idem,"La découverte des choses qui parlent. La légalisation de la torture judiciaire en droit musulman (XIIIe–XIV siècles)," Enquête 7 (1998); Ann Elizabeth Mayer, Islam and Human Rights: Tradition and Politics, 4th ed., 2007; Rudolph Peters, Crime and Punishment in Islamic Law: Theory and Practice from the Sixteenth to the Twentieth Century, 2005.

MARNIA LAZREG

trade and commerce

Politics and trade have been closely intertwined in the Islamic world since the dawn of Islam. Perhaps the best known example of this connection is spelled out in the work of Montgomery Watt, who claimed that Mecca was the center of a vast trade hub across the Arabian Peninsula at the time of Muhammad. In this view, it was the social and moral disorder created by commercial wealth that facilitated the initial spread of Islam. Patricia Crone forcefully argues against this thesis, suggesting that Meccan trade centered on huñable goods, such as leather, clothing, and animals—not the types of goods that foster immense wealth or attract merchants from far away. It is clear, however, that the expansion of trade in the first few Islamic centuries was intimately tied to the growing power and stability provided by Islamic empires.

The Arab conquests of the seventh and eighth centuries, extending as far west as the Iberian Peninsula and North Africa and as far east as India, provided security and a unifying language and religion under which trade blossomed. This period is considered the Golden Age of Islam, and the success of trade was dependent on the rise of new Islamic polities. An agricultural revolution followed from the Arab conquests as a new set of crops and agricultural techniques were introduced, especially from India. The agricultural surplus and local agricultural trade that followed permitted the rapid growth of cities throughout the Islamic world. Likewise, the relative security provided by the Umayyads (661–750), Abbasids (750–1258), and Fatimids (909–1171) allowed for the unprecedented movement of people, ideas, and goods over huge areas. The flow of goods was extremely important to the development of cities and wealth in the early Islamic period. The importance of trade is perhaps best seen in the design of the Abbasid capital of Baghdad. It was located on the Tigris River and connected to the Euphrates River by canal, allowing shipments from the Mediterranean to be transported downstream toward the Persian Gulf and imports from India shipped upstream. Baghdad was constructed in a circular manner, with four gates leading outward to the major trading routes: Iran and Transoxiana in the northeast, Syria in the northwest, lower Mesopotamia in the southeast, and Egypt in the southwest. In part because of its role as a center of trade, Baghdad became one of the largest and most important cities in the world, with 500,000 to one million inhabitants. Many of the important Muslim cities in Persia and Central Asia, such as Nishapur, Samarkand, Tashkent, Kandahar, and Kabul, were depots on trade routes connecting Baghdad to China. Many of these cities existed before the Islamic conquest, while others such as Fustat, Qayrawan, Fez, and Tunis were the creation of the conquest or of later dynasties.

The caravans that traversed these trade routes were often extraordinarily large, employing numerous camels to carry goods over land. In the early Islamic period, the primary goods traded were spices, textiles, and glass from China; gold from Ethiopia; and slaves from Sudan and Ethiopia. In conjunction with these caravans, a bevy of financial instruments and arrangements arose to facilitate trade. Among the most important of these was the bill of exchange (suftaja), which allowed merchants to travel from one land to another without having to carry specie. The suftaja predated its important European counterpart by centuries. Other financial instruments created in the early Islamic period include transfers of debt (hawāla) and orders of payment (ruq'a or sakk). Trade was often financed through partnerships, structured according to Islamic law generally as sleeping partnerships (muḍāraba, or "mutual loan") or 'inān, in which both partners invested some capital. Although direct lending at interest (ribā) was illegal, it was easy to circumvent antiusury laws through legal fictions or partnerships. Documented evidence suggests that direct lending at interest did prevail at certain times and places in the Ottoman Empire.

Beginning in the 13th and 14th centuries, the center of trade slowly moved from the Islamic world to Europe—and with it, political and economic power. Some of this relative decline in trade can be directly attributed to political authorities. For example, the Egyptian Mamluks were notorious for squeezing revenues out of the spice trade, hence encouraging merchants to find alternate routes. A huge problem for the Mamluks was finding ways to divert trade from the Far East to Europe through the Red Sea instead of overland through Central Asia or (eventually) around the southern tip of Africa. The broader shift was one from the Middle East to the Italian city-states, placing the Islamic world more in the role of the "periphery" than in centuries past. Differing reactions to this sea change between the Mamluks and the Ottomans were among the key factors determining Islamic political power in the late medieval and early modern periods. The Mamluks, who controlled the most powerful Islamic state between the fall of the Abbasids and the rise of the Ottomans in the 15th century, did not integrate themselves (at least, relative to the Ottomans) in the new patterns of world trade, instead turning inward. The Ottomans, on the other hand, readily accepted many of the new goods coming from Europe—including firearms and artillery—and were able to defeat the Safavids and Mamluks, taking control of much of the Middle East, North Africa, and the Balkan Peninsula for centuries.

As in earlier Islamic empires, the security and rule of law offered by the rapid rise of the Ottoman Empire was a boon to trade and among the primary reasons for the early expansion of wealth of the empire. Ottoman policy was specifically designed to nurture the merchant class. Unlike farmers, whose actions were highly regulated by the state, merchants were free to accumulate and invest as much capital (māl) as desired. Indeed, merchants were largely viewed favorably by political authorities and as such were accorded a privileged position. As the primary holders of ready money, merchants were used to make loans to the state, ensure revenues through customs charges, and act as agents and ambassadors. On the other hand, merchants and moneylenders often faced hostility from the broader population. This was especially true in the smaller cities, where guilds dominated production, which was primarily in local markets. Within the guilds, excessive profit was frowned upon, and merchants were frequently demonized as speculators who drove up the price of raw materials or hoarders who caused coinage shortages.

Trade played an important role in Ottoman relations with the West. Although the Ottomans were able to threaten Europe numerous times in the 15th and 16th centuries—getting as far west as the gates of Vienna—their power in relation to the European powers began to wane by the end of the 16th century as trade imbalances grew. Perhaps most famously, the weakened Ottomans allied themselves with the French and English (against their mutual enemy the Habsburgs of Austria and Spain) through trade agreements known as "capitulations," whereby the French and English were granted the right to trade with reduced customs duties. The capitulations persisted for centuries and were symbolic of diminishing Ottoman power relative to Europe. By the end of the 18th century, it was clear that Europe was far in front politically and economically. Areas vital to Eurasian trade that had once been firmly in Islamic hands—such as intermediating Chinese-Indian and European spice and silk trades—were controlled by Europeans. The loss of the revenues associated with taxation of such trade greatly weakened the Ottoman Empire.

Enormous changes have occurred since the fall of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century. European nations attempted with varying levels of success to colonize much of the Islamic world, in many cases redrawing geopolitical boundaries. Yet trade still plays an extremely important role in the politics of the Islamic world. In the Middle East in particular, trade in oil has provided excessive wealth and has been used by some polities, such as Iran, to provide a level of stability in the face of an otherwise unpopular regime. A primary challenge of the 21st century for the oil-based economies of the Islamic world will be how they handle—both politically and economically—the worldwide transition away from oil as the essential fossil fuel and the immense political ramifications of this change.

See also economic theory; globalization

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Meccan Trade and the Rise of Islam, 1987; Ronald Findlay and Kevin H. O'Rourke, Power and Plenty: Trade, War, and the World Economy in the Second Millennium, 2007; Albert Hourani, A History of the Arab Peoples, 1991; Halil İnalcık, "Capital Formation in the Ottoman Empire," Journal of Economic History 29, no. 1 (1969); Andrew W. Watson, Agricultural Revolution in the Early Islamic World: The Diffusion of Crops and Farming Techniques 700–1100, 1983; W. Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Mecca, 1953.

JARED RUBIN

traditional political thought

In terms of political thought, as in so many other respects, Muslims today could be said to be bilingual. On the one hand, they speak the global political language of Western derivation marked by key concepts such as democracy, freedom, human rights, and gender equality; on the other hand, they still have their traditional political idiom, formed over 1,400 years of Islamic history and marked by concepts such as prophecy, imamate, and commanding right and forbidding wrong. The Islamic tradition is alien to most Western readers. What follows is an attempt to familiarize them with it to make it easier for them to follow the other entries in this volume.

The single most important difference between contemporary Western political thinking and the Islamic tradition is that contemporary thought focuses on freedom and rights whereas the Islamic tradition focuses on authority and duties. This separates contemporary political thought from that of all premodern societies, not just that of the Islamic world. Premodern political thought centered on authority and duties because government, law and order, and the agreeable forms of life that they make possible were precious goods that could not be taken for granted. How to maintain political unity, social stability, and collective welfare were more urgent problems than protecting the interests of minorities and individuals.

Islamic political thought is based on the assumption that humans are fundamentally antisocial animals constrained by their own needs to live in societies. By nature, it was said, human beings are given to the ruthless pursuit of their own interests at the cost of everyone else; without government the strong would eat the weak, and the social bonds required for reproduction and coexistence would unravel. In the European tradition this view is represented by Thomas Hobbes (d. 1679), who, writing at the time of the English Civil War, famously said that life in a state of nature would be "solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short." Yet man was also a social (or political) animal, the Muslims said, using Aristotle's no less famous phrase. What they meant was that humans had to come together and collaborate so that they could engage in division of labor and satisfy their many diverse needs. Even to produce a loaf of bread required cooperation; nobody could satisfy all his or her needs on his or her own, and without communal life, nobody would be free to pursue higher aims. How then was it possible for political society to be established? According to Hobbes, the creation of political society required an agreement whereby people surrendered their sovereignty to a single individual, the king. This was also the Muslim view. But whereas Hobbes envisaged people as signing away their freedom to a human king, the Muslims held them to sign it away to God, the king of the universe. In other words, God solved the problem by sending a prophet bearing a divine law; those who accepted this law would form a community together, ruled by God as represented by the Prophet and his successors. God, an infinitely superior and impartial party, defined the rules of communal life. Vis-à-vis God humans had no freedom at all, but by following God's law, they were freed from the tyranny of other human beings.

Prophets

To the Muslims, the answer to the question of how authority was to be created thus lay in divine revelation. Religion was the key to the creation of political society, not in the sense that it should legitimate an existing power structure but rather in the sense that it could supply such a structure. This reflected their own historical experience, for the Muslim community had in fact been created by a prophet, Muhammad, who had preached to the Arabs and freed them from tribal anarchy by uniting them in allegiance to God and His law. It also reflected an ancient tradition in the Near East, well known to Westerners from the case of Moses, who led his people out of Egypt at the command of God and founded the polity that was eventually to become the Davidic monarchy that lies at the heart of the Jewish political tradition.

More than anything else, it is probably this fusion of the religious and the political that makes Islāmic political thought a closed book to modern Westerners, accustomed as they are to thinking of religion and politics as belonging in separate compartments. Their thinking also has long historical roots. Christianity grew up inside the Roman Empire as a religion that transcended ethnic, social, and political divisions. The Christians abandoned the Jewish political tradition, remembering Jesus as having said that His kingdom was not of this world; and as subjects of the Roman Empire they left government to Caesar. Later they converted Caesar to Christianity, took over the empire, and Christianized it: this was the closest they could get to fusing religion and politics. But the empire was still a structure originating outside Christianity, with a history stretching back into pagan times, and however entangled their jurisdictions became, state and church always remained distinct. This is what allowed for their gradual separation in modern times, and it is thanks to this separation that modern Westerners find it difficult to envisage politics as intrinsically religious: they always react by trying to separate the two, wondering whether this or that is really religious or really political or seeing the religious element as mere wrapping for secular aims. But Islam shares with secular belief systems such as nationalism or communism the feature that it can define political aims, not just legitimate them (though of course it can do that, too).

Religion serves to create authority because people defer to the divine. They throw themselves to the ground in fear and awe in encounters with God or angels; they go down on their knees and kiss the hands or feet of religious leaders such as the Pope or ayatollahs. A man of God can gather people around him without any need for armies and police; people come to him of their own accord, attracted by his sanctity, and directed by him, they can take political action. The reader who still finds it hard to envisage a prophet as a political leader could do worse than read Naguib Mahfouz's Children of Gebelawi, an allegorical novel about human history from the expulsion of paradise to the modern age set in the slums of Cairo. It brilliantly captures the prophets as political activists in the portraits of Moses and Muhammad, both very vivid, whereas that of Jesus is flat and lifeless: he was only a spiritual leader. Needless to say, the Muslims saw the prophets as spiritual figures, too; Muhammad, the object of immense devotion, was eventually to be elevated to a quasi-divine position in Sufism. But this was not meant as a denial of his political role. In the period after the Mongol invasions, holy men and leaders of Sufi orders also came to found states in the Middle East and North Africa; it is thanks to the leader of a Sufi order that Iran is a Shi'i country today. Holy men led the resistance to Western colonialism in several parts of the Muslim world as well.

Like everyone else, medieval Muslims took their own historical experience to be paradigmatic and so assumed that polities were normally founded by prophets bringing revealed law. (There had also been prophets of other kinds, but we can ignore them here.) When Plato and Aristotle were translated into Arabic, their Muslim readers understood their accounts of Greek lawgivers as descriptions of prophets. They thereby inaugurated a philosophical tradition of political thought that became highly influential in the Middle East among Muslims, Christians, and Jews alike and also came to play a role in medieval Europe via Jewish intermediaries. Muslim philosophers subscribed to the idea that all polities rested on religious law brought by a prophet. In the 14th century, two thinkers (Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn Khaldun) noted that they were wrong: it was perfectly possible to base a polity on man-made rather than revealed law, and many people had in fact done so, they observed. Eventually, this was to become all too well known, for the peoples in question included the Europeans, and it was when they rose to world dominance that the idea of a purely man-made law and political order had to be taken seriously. From a traditional Muslim point of view, it looked like a recipe for anarchy and oppression.

Caliphs and Imams

Having created authority by recourse to the concept of prophets, the Muslims faced the problem of how to maintain it when Muhammad died in Medina in 632. They reacted by establishing the caliphate or imamate. A caliph was a "deputy of God" (khalīfat Allāh), another direct representative of God on Earth; just as God and his subordinates, the angels, rule the created world, so the deputy and his subordinates, his governors, rule the part of humanity that has submitted to God. An imam is somebody whose example is to be followed in religious and moral matters; a prayer leader is an imam, for instance. Applied to the head of state, the term stressed his presumed moral perfection, the quality that caused others to follow him and entitled him to high office; in principle he was the most meritorious Muslim of his time (al-afḍal). Most Muslims held that the first caliphs in Medina had been such paragons of virtue. Having embarked on conquests, however, the caliphs came to preside over a huge empire that rapidly gave them political interests and personal tastes at variance with those of their subjects, and they were soon deemed undeserving of their office. The problems posed by morally flawed and increasingly tyrannical occupants of the caliphal office generated three civil wars between 656 and 750 and led to the emergence of the three main groups into which the Muslims are still divided: the Kharijis (now an insignificant minority represented only by the Ibadis); the Shi'is (Zaydis, Imamis, Isma'ilis and others, perhaps 10 percent of Muslims today); and the Sunnis (around 90 percent of Muslims today), a residual category formed around the scholars who called themselves ahl al-sunna wa-l-jamā'a and whom Western scholars usually call Traditionalists.

The First Civil War (656–61) was won by the Umayyads, who moved the capital from Medina to Syria. Both the Kharijis and the Shi'is regarded the Umayyads as usurpers, but they fully accepted that the legitimate head of the community would be a caliph in the sense of deputy of God and imam, a moral exemplar endowed with overriding religious authority. They differed radically about everything else about him. According to the Kharijis, moral perfection was assessed by the community. Any free Muslim man might be deemed to possess it and so qualify for the highest office, but he had to be deposed if he lost his superior merit. It obviously would not be possible to run an empire on this basis. The Shi'is, on the other hand, took the view that moral perfection was to be found only in the Prophet's family, and the Imami Shi'is limited the pool of candidates to one particular line in which the imamate passed from father to son so that the identity of the true leader of the community was always known. This man was the true caliph in the here and now, endowed with overriding, indeed infallible, authority in matters of law and doctrine. He was never put to the test of actually having to govern, however, and in 874 the 12th of the line was deemed to have gone into hiding, from which he would not emerge until the end of times. To the Imami Shi'is, the imams had become more important as religious than as political figures. The imams kept their political role in Zaydi Shi'ism, but here as in Kharijism, they did so in a form incompatible with stable government. It was only on the tribal fringes that the Kharijis and the Zaydis enjoyed a measure of political success.

In effect, then, both the Kharijis and the Shi'is retained the ideal of morally perfect government by divorcing it from political reality. By contrast, the Traditionalists, eventually followed by the vast majority of Muslim thinkers, accepted that the head of state could not be morally perfect and that one had to look elsewhere for imams in the sense of paragons of virtue. Their solution was to redefine the nature of the caliphal office so as to detach religious guidance from it. God was still the ultimate source of all authority, but He had no direct representatives on Earth any more, they said; Muhammad was the last, and all authority now came from him, not directly from above. In their opinion the caliphal title stood for "successor of the messenger of God" (khalīfat rasūl Allāh), and this, they said, was the form in which the first caliph had adopted it. (In practice, the only caliphs to have used this version seem to be the early Abbasids, who adopted it along with the title of imams, not instead of it.) When Muhammad died, his political position had passed to the caliphs and his religious leadership to his Companions, the Traditionalists said; the latter had passed on their knowledge of what Muhammad had said and done to the religious scholars ('ulama').

A religious scholar was a person who had acquired knowledge ('ilm) of the Qur'an and the hadith, in other words, the reports of what Muhammad said or did on particular occasions. These were the primary sources of Islamic law and doctrine. The law (shari'a) on which the Muslim community was based was divine, not only in the sense of being in accordance with God's will but also in the sense of being actually given by Him. God had revealed His will in the Qur'an, His own words. But the Qur'an needed both interpretation and supplementation, and the question was who was authorized to provide it. The early caliphs apparently thought that they were, but they were overruled by the scholars, who held the key supplement to the Qur'an to be the hadith as expounded by themselves. With the victory of the scholars, Islamic law came to be a law elaborated by private scholars rather than the government, like Jewish law. The shari'a seeks to establish what is obligatory, allowed, and forbidden in the eyes of God and also what is morally preferable or disapproved within the category of the allowed. This is an endeavor full of uncertainty and disagreement, for although God's will is eternal and unchanging, every scholar is just a fallible human being, and scholarly interpretations differ. Some scholars are more learned and authoritative than others, but nobody can settle controversial questions on behalf of all. Every juristic decision is uncertain and provisional until it has been accepted by so many for so long that it counts as validated by consensus. Consensus is the ultimate authority, for although every scholar is individually fallible, collectively they cannot go wrong: "My community will never agree on an error," as the Prophet is believed to have said.

Where the Imami Shi'is concentrated religious authority in the imam, the Sunnis thus dispersed it in the community. When the Twelfth Imam went into hiding, much the same pattern came to prevail in Imami Shi'ism. The caliph was only the executor of the law; his legitimacy no longer rested on moral superiority but rather on his ability to cooperate with the scholars. Though he was to be replaced by rulers of other types and new religious leaders were to appear in the form of Sufis, this was essentially the division of labor that prevailed in the Sunni world until modern times.

Islamic history is punctuated by the periodic appearance of religious leaders who tried to concentrate religious authority in their persons again in order to introduce radical religiopolitical change. Most commonly, they would claim to be the Mahdi, the savior expected to appear at the end of times, but they might also cast themselves as the "renewer" (mujaddid) expected to appear in every century or claim a special relationship with God as Sufis; some even claimed prophetic status or divinity, though this put them beyond the pale. There were also attempts by political rulers to organize the religious scholars within their realm on a hierarchical basis, notably in the Ottoman Empire. Something in the nature of a hierarchy also developed in Shi'i Iran. But the dispersed pattern was the default mode, and in the Sunni world it still prevails.

Amirs, Kings, and Sultans

In 750 the Umayyad caliphs were replaced by the Abbasids, who were members of the Prophet's family (though not 'Alids) and who moved the capital from Syria to Iraq, where their dynasty survived until 1258. In practice, their power began to disintegrate already in the ninth century, when autonomous rulers took over the provinces and they themselves were reduced to mere puppets at the center. The new rulers used secular titles such as king, amir (governor), or sultan (power, authority), and since there were no provisions in the religious law for wielders of power other than the caliph and his delegates, most of the new rulers tried to legitimate their position by seeking a letter of appointment from the caliph, acknowledging that all legitimate power came from him. In 1258, however, the Mongols conquered Baghdad and put the caliph to death without setting up another in his place. The succession of men who were both relatives of the Prophet and rulers of the community (umma) that the Prophet had founded thus came to an end. The Muslim world had long ceased to be a single political unit by then, but now it did not even have a single figurehead any more. For all that, the Muslims continued to feel that they lived in a single Muslim society.

In fact, a caliphate of sorts did survive, for the sultans of Mamluk Egypt (1250–1517) enthroned an Abbasid as caliph in Cairo, but this caliphate was both politically impotent and devoid of general recognition. Its significance lies mainly in the fact that when the Ottomans conquered Egypt in 1517, they claimed the caliphal title for themselves. By then the title was devalued currency, for many others had claimed it, too, often without fulfilling the legal requirement that the caliph must be a member of Muhammad's tribe (Quraysh). But though the Ottomans did not fulfill this requirement either, they came close to reuniting the Muslim world, and this, as well as their control of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, made their claim to caliphal status meaningful. It came as a shock to many when Atatürk abolished the Ottoman caliphate in 1924. All rulers of the Islamic world today are either kings, amirs, sultans, or presidents, with the partial exception of Iran; there the head of state, ranking above the president, is simply called leader (rahbar), popularly "supreme leader," a new title coined in the Iranian Revolution of 1979. There are, however, still Muslims who dream of reestablishing the caliphate, associated as it is with the heyday of Islamic power.

Political Freedom

The early Muslims had a strong sense that Islam had arrived to free mankind not only from tribal anarchy but also from kings, meaning those who ruled in accordance with their own whims rather than God's dictates. ("King" was a term of abuse when contrasted with caliph or imam, though not otherwise.) When the conquests endowed the caliphs with imperial power, the Muslims accused them of "turning the caliphate into kingship" and vigorously resisted what they perceived as despotic rule. But three civil wars over less than a hundred years deprived most of them of their taste for activism. All rulers turned into kings, as some observed; fighting to replace one with another was too costly in terms of lives, general security, and Muslim solidarity to be worth it. What then were the alternatives? A rebel in eastern Iran in the 730s experimented with ideas of setting up an institution to control the local governor, a few thinkers around 800 held that it might be possible to do without a ruler altogether, and the Mu'tazili theologian Nazzam (d. ca. 845) thought that it might be best to replace the caliph with a federation of locally elected rulers. But nothing came of these ideas.

The Traditionalists around whom the Sunnis were formed held that it was best simply to tolerate tyranny while at the same time withdrawing as much of communal life as possible from the caliph's control. In their view even a morally flawed and oppressive ruler had to be obeyed as long it did not entail a violation of God's command. The ruler's moral status did not affect the law, they said (in disagreement with the Shi'is). Even a sinful ruler could lead the prayer or conduct holy war, and participation carried the same divine rewards as when they were led by a righteous imam. One was not to rebel, since the rightly guided nature of the community did not depend on the head of state, and keeping the community together was all important. The only remedies against oppressive rulers were hellfire sermons and books of advice designed to inculcate virtue. A great many of such were produced, but needless to say their effectiveness was limited.

The jurists writing in the 11th and 12th centuries did hold that a wrongful caliph could be deposed. There were even some who held that it was a religious duty to do so. But they did not specify who should determine when or on what grounds a caliph merited deposition or how his removal was to be effected. Those who had chosen him should remove him, they said, but this simply delegated the task to whoever wielded power and influence at the center at any given time. It was never suggested that the courts should play a role in the proceedings, and there were no other formal institutions, such as a privy council or parliament, to which the task could be assigned. When the caliph lost his power to upstart rulers, even the principle that the head of state could be deposed was abandoned. God raised them up, it was said, and God would raise up others in their stead if they sinned. There is nonetheless an interesting example of a local ruler by the name of Ahmad Khan being taken to court, deposed, and executed in Samarqand (now Uzbekistan) in 1095. The charge was a heresy so grave that it amounted to apostasy. Of this he was probably innocent, but he had been a terrible oppressor, and a conviction of apostasy was an effective way of securing his removal. Why the military leaders who formed part of the coalition against him did not simply assassinate him, the normal solution, is not clear, but it did not set a precedent.

Tyranny was bearable because large parts of life were not affected by the state at all. The main way in which the government made its presence felt was through taxation, here as elsewhere a heavy burden on the peasantry. It was also a constant bone of contention between rulers and scholars, for the scholars had elaborated the fiscal law of the shari'a in such a way that did not allow enough resources for the state in such a way that rulers were forced to impose additional taxes, which the scholars denounced as uncanonical (maks). The taxes went to finance the state apparatus, war, building projects, and cultural life, especially at the court. But schooling, educational training, funding, loans, health care, and the running of local affairs—all these and many other things now taken over or supervised by the state—were then in the hands of family, neighbors, friends, religious scholars, and local notables, with only intermittent attention by the government at best and often none at all. The closer one came to the center of power, the more dangerous life became (while at the same time becoming vastly much more rewarding in material terms); a great many of those who rose to powerful positions came to a violent end. But though others certainly suffered from time to time, the main problem posed by government was not usually that it was oppressive but rather that it was arbitrary and inefficient. General insecurity and local oppressors were probably more of a problem to most than the tyranny of kings, though these factors are not easily separated.

The modern state brought higher levels of security, but it also assumed a far greater role in people's lives than was formerly the case, and in combination with modern means of communication and surveillance, this transformed the old-style tyrants into dictators of a new and more totalitarian kind.

Religious Freedom

In a society based on religious law, there evidently cannot be religious freedom in the modern sense that anybody is free to choose whatever religion (if any) that he or she prefers. What Muhammad had founded was a community of believers, not a territorial state, and a community of believers it remained, even though it was eventually divided into many states. There was no room in it for unbelievers.

It is nonetheless possible to speak of religious freedom in the Islamic world. The Muslims themselves never used the expression "religious freedom" until they learned it from the West; indeed, it has an offensive ring to it from a traditional point of view, suggesting as it does that people have no obligations to their creator. But there were in fact mechanisms whereby adherents of divergent beliefs, whether infidel or just heretical, could be accommodated. As regards the former, unbelievers could be accepted as protected peoples (*dhimmī*s), at least if they were Jews, Christians, or Zoroastrians; even pagans qualified according to some legal schools. *Dhimmī*s were entitled to practice their ancestral religion and manage their own internal affairs under Muslim sovereignty, though they were subject to certain conditions, including payment of a special tax that was meant as a mark of humiliation. This was a right granted to communities, not to individuals, and individuals retained it only as long as they retained their ancestral faith. If they wished to convert, they could in principle do so only to Islam. Entrance into the Muslim community was open to all, but the exit was closed, so that once people had become Muslims, they were not allowed to convert to another religion at all. Apostasy was a betrayal of the community and punishable by death. A Muslim who converted to another religion would be safe only if he left the Islamic world for a country professing the religion for which he had betrayed his own.

Regarding fellow Muslims, the schisms between Kharijis, Shi'is, and the majority Muslims were deeply regretted by all involved, but the majority rarely tried to impose their own views on the minorities, except in the sense that the latter risked harassment when they ventured out of their own quarters (adherents of different beliefs tended to segregate physically). Local fighting between Sunni and Shi'i quarters was common at times, but the government took military action against dissident communities only when the latter took to arms themselves. Virulent though their polemics were, the three branches of Islam in effect accepted one another as legitimate in the sense that nobody had the right to eradicate the others by force. The habit of toleration inculcated by the recognition of non-Muslim communities may have made it easier to accept the presence of sectarian communities as well. It was only when religious leaders set out to seize political power and reform the world that the pattern of toleration was broken, usually because all normal political and social relations were thrown into turmoil, not because the leaders saw themselves as called upon to eliminate other religious groups. The only major exception is the Safavids (1501–1732), who imposed Shi'ism on Iran and engaged in the forcible conversion of Christians and Jews as well.

The fundamental schisms apart, Muslims tolerated divergent beliefs by distinguishing between external observance and inner conviction and insisting on the former alone for purposes of membership. All Muslims were expected to observe the rules relating to food, marriage, divorce, inheritance, purity, and ritual, meaning the five daily prayers (which can be performed anywhere), the weekly Friday prayer (a public ritual that men must perform in a jāmi' or "cathedral mosque"; whether women can or must is disputed), the annual fast (observed by all healthy adults), the pilgrimage to Mecca once in a lifetime for those who had the means to undertake it, and the annual payment of alms. These rituals served visibly to mark out the community from others. Their neglect might be tolerated as long as it was intermittent rather than systematic, but principled denial of their validity amounted to apostasy.

Most Muslims, however, soon came to supplement this "external" religion, as some called it, with religion of a more personal kind, such as philosophy, mysticism, or esotericism, which established a direct relationship between the individual and God. (Philosophy was not a secular pursuit directed against religion but rather a rival form of it.) Only the Traditionalists did their best to live by the Qur'an and hadith, and even they were gradually sucked into Sufism, all dominant in the post-Mongol world. Since the new forms of religion were pursued by individuals in search of their own private salvation, they often brought their adherents into conflict with the law. All downplayed the importance of the law one way or the other by holding salvation to lie in spirituality or human reason or in the mixture of the two known as theosophy. The law was deemed to be no more than a first step on the ladder to the truth, or just a metaphorical version of the absolute truth for those unable to understand higher things. In some cases, the law was not even deemed a metaphorical version of the truth but simply a utilitarian institution required for social life or even chains and fetters that had to be cast off by those in search of salvation. There were also those who accepted the law as a genuine but temporary form of religion that would be swept away when the Mahdi came to transfigure the world, so that all would be able to experience the truth directly and worship God of their own accord without the need for all the paraphernalia of institutionalized religion. Such views were widely perceived as attacks on the very foundations of Muslim society, but most of them could be tolerated as long as the "external" religion was respected and the private convictions were handled with discretion.

Freethinkers could discuss their views with like-minded individuals in private salons, in learned gatherings at the court, and to some extent in books and even more so in poetry, where things could be put ambivalently. One could also debate radical propositions as if for the sake of argument alone or voice them as part of mujūn. Mujūn was playful behavior or writing that violated the normal rules of propriety, an accepted part of the high culture which allowed people to say things that bordered on the blasphemous, the scurrilous, or the pornographic as long as they did so with literary elegance and wit and had a good sense of where to stop. There was no institutionalized confession of sins, no inquisition, and no prying into people's hearts. The authorities were responsible for the maintenance of the society in which Muslim law was practiced and without which there could be no salvation, but they were not responsible for the salvation of individuals, and what people concealed in their innermost consciences was between them and God.

In short, freedom lay essentially in privacy. The public sphere was where public norms had to be maintained, where there might be censors or private persons fulfilling the duty of "commanding right and forbidding wrong" who would break musical instruments, pour out wine, and separate couples who were neither married nor closely related. But their right to intrude into private homes was strictly limited. Here the veils came off. What went on privately was not meant to become public knowledge, and those who knew one's private life should not reveal it. Casting a veil over other people's faults was as virtuous as covering one's own; one certainly should not wash dirty linen in public. A sin that was kept secret only harmed the person who had committed it, as it was said, whereas once it was revealed, it had to be denounced lest everyone be harmed by it (in that it would weaken public norms). For the same reason, it was wrong to give clear accounts of heretical views. All these attitudes were deeply ingrained in the Near East and by no means limited to Muslims.

Again, the modern state ruined the traditional pattern. It imposes its law directly on all inhabitants of a particular territory regardless of faith and awards citizenship on the basis of criteria of secular origin, in principle awarding all citizens the same rights and duties, so that Muslims, non-Muslims, Sunnis, and Shi'is were brought out of their separate communities as members of the same national state. The national and the religious principle now coexist uneasily in the Muslim world. At the same time nationalism highlighted ethnic cleavages hitherto masked by religious fellowship. Tensions formerly defused by segregation and hierarchical ordering (with the Muslims on top) thus became difficult to contain. In addition, the home ceased to be a castle shielding the family from external intrusion. The faces and voices of the outside world, including the government, came to be seen and heard on radio, television, cassettes, and so on, and the old respect for boundaries was eroded. After the Iranian Revolution, the religious police would routinely raid private homes. Thanks to the modern economy, even the family itself is changing, as women are entering the work force and rebelling against their traditional subordination, while a growing number of the young are escaping parental supervision in cyberspace, which offers instant access to both peers and the rest of the world. All this is inevitably affecting political thought.

Outsiders

Like many other peoples, the premodern Muslims conceived of the world in which their own norms prevailed as a haven of peace and safety surrounded by threatening outsiders lacking in civilized standards; they called the former "the abode of Islam" and the latter "the abode of war." Again like many, they saw themselves as called upon to expand their haven of peace and moral rectitude so that others, too, could enjoy its benefits. Unlike the Greeks, Romans, Chinese, French, British, and others who have entertained comparable ideas but like the Spanish, the Muslims saw themselves as bringing not only benefits in this world but also salvation in the next, obedience to God being the key to both. Expanding the sovereignty of God was the aim of jihad, the Muslim form of holy war. Once brought under Muslim law, non-Muslim populations could retain their religion as dhimmīs, but it was hoped that they would convert, and many invariably did with the passing of time. The jurists identified jihad primarily as missionary warfare.

To the Christians, jihad has always been a stumbling block. Jesus did not use force to establish, or even to defend, himself but rather died as the victim of coercive power; the early Christians also preferred martyrdom to the use of arms. By contrast, Muhammad waged war to establish his message and died as the leader of a polity, whereupon his followers set out to conquer the world. This contrast has figured in Christian polemics against Islam for over a thousand years, often in a manner suggesting that holy war is the opposite of no war, whereas in fact it is merely the opposite of secular war (i.e., war lying outside the religious domain). The Muslims elevated one type of war to religious status, whereas their Christian counterparts assigned all war along with politics to a compartment separate from that of religion. But this does not mean that the Christians stopped fighting wars of expansion or even that they refrained from doing so in the name of religion.

The Muslim jurists identified jihad as a duty imposed on the community rather than the individual, except when it was conducted for the defense of Islam rather than its expansion, and it was typically discharged by the ruler and his troops. Volunteering was highly meritorious, however, and jihad was lawful even without official direction or authorization. Self-help was also authorized against other Muslims when they were deemed to be apostates. If a religious scholar declared a certain person to be an infidel, any Muslim could kill him with impunity. (A person found guilty of unbelief by a court would normally be executed by the authorities.) Muslims frequently declared one another to be infidels, often, it would seem, without anything happening, presumably because the declarations were confined to books. If they were widely publicized, however, the alleged infidel might be no better off than the outlaw in medieval European society. Self-help was likewise authorized in the maintenance of public morality. Any Muslim could, indeed should, command right and forbid wrong by counseling people if he saw them acting contrary to what he knew to be the law or even by using force, though this was a contentious issue.

The early jurists who divided the world into an abode of Islam and an abode of war took it for granted that a Muslim could not live permanently outside the Islamic abode. To be a Muslim was to live under the sovereignty of God as represented by a Muslim ruler upholding Islamic law. In practice, however, Muslims soon came to live as (usually commercial) minorities in other countries, while conversely parts of the Muslim world eventually came to be ruled by non-Muslims in the form of Crusaders, Mongols, and Europeans, so the abode of Islam came to be understood as anywhere that Islam could be openly practiced; political sovereignty was not required. Today a full third of all Muslims live as minorities under non-Muslim sovereignty.

These developments have put an end to jihad of the traditional type. In the later 19th century, the Muslims of British India began to reinterpret the duty as purely defensive, and this has become the prevalent view today; many Muslims even deny that it has ever meant expansionist war, dismissing the traditional concept of jihad as an Orientalist invention. Instead, a new type of global jihad has appeared. That, too, is cast as defensive and thus defined as as an individual duty, not simply a communal one that can be discharged by some on behalf of all. Conducted by way of self-help without government direction, it is distinguished by systematic disregard of traditional boundaries. The same is true of self-help against apostates. When the Shi'i Ayatollah Khomeini declared the novelist Salman Rushdie to be as an apostate, many tried to kill him, even though Rushdie lived in England rather than a Muslim state (and had never been Shi'i). Similarly, offensive Westerners such as the Dutch filmmaker Theo van Gogh or the Danish cartoonists who drew mocking images of Muhammad were treated as if they were *dhimmī*s under Muslim rule. All these cases are exceptional, but they illustrate the flux into which traditional concepts have been thrown by modern changes.

Overview

Religion in the broad sense of appeals to the supernatural has played a major role in all political thought wherever it is found, but there is no denying that it is particularly prominent in Islam. In line with this, Muslim thinkers display strong awareness of the degree to which reality is shaped by constructions put on it and of the power to be derived from working people's minds. In that sense they could be said to be the true heirs of the Christians, who succeeded in taking over the Roman Empire armed with nothing but the power of their convictions. Islamic political thought is also unusual in the degree to which it endorses self-help, as opposed to reliance on political or ecclesiastical authorities, and not just in matters involving the use of force. The standard example is the lunar calendar. Even illiterates can handle it because the beginning and end of each month is established on the basis of a sighting of the new moon rather than astronomical calculation (though scientists liked to engage in that, too). The religion is institutionally lightweight; indeed, there is a vision in some juristic writings of every Muslim as personally responsible for the maintenance of Muslim norms for himself and his neighbors—a view often in a state of tension with authoritarian respect for social and political hierarchies.

The historical roots of this vision lie partly in the tribal heritage of Arab conquerors who founded Muslim society in the Middle East and partly in the colonial past of the provinces in which they established their first capitals. As tribesmen from a stateless society, the Arabs were used to managing their own affairs without recourse to political and ecclesiastic hierarchies, and having been ruled by Greeks and Persians for close to a thousand years, the inhabitants of Syria and Iraq, as well as Egypt, had a long tradition of living communal lives separate from those of their imperial masters without renouncing obedience to them. When the Muslims discovered that their own caliphs kept turning into kings, most of them in effect opted for the same solution: what mattered was communal life, not the state, which they saw as a mere protective envelope; certainly, this envelope had to be maintained, but in terms of the morally significant domains of life, the believers took charge of themselves. This gave Islamic political thought a very different character from that of Western Christendom, where an immense amount of attention was devoted to a hierarchical institution, the church.

See also authority; caliph, caliphate; government; minorities

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2005.

PATRICIA CRONE

Transoxiana

"Transoxiana" (mā warā' al-nahr) designates the territory between the rivers Oxus (Amu Darya) and the Jaxartes (Sir Darya), roughly equivalent of most of modern Uzbekistan and Tajikistan (but not including Khwarazm on the north and Farghana on the south). More generally, it sometimes refers to everything beyond the Oxus, all the way to China—that is, a general name for Central Asia.

Before the Muslim conquest, the region between the Oxus and the Jaxartes was not under direct imperial rule (although Turks and Chinese competed for nominal sovereignty) but was divided among city-states, most important of which were Bukhara and Samarqand, and nomads living in the deserts around these cities. The main income of the city-states came from long-distance trade along the Silk Roads, conducted mainly by Sogdian traders. The region was highly diverse religiously, ethnically, and linguistically, though most of the population spoke Iranian languages.

Muslim invasions into Transoxiana began in the seventh century, but the region was conquered by the Umayyad governor of Khurasan Qutayba b. Muslim (705–15). It has retained close connections with Khurasan, Khwarazm, and Farghana, also conquered by Qutayba, ever since. Conversion to Islam had begun already in Umayyad times (660–750), but the integration of Transoxiana into the Muslim empire began in earnest under the Abbasids (750–1258). In early Abbasid times several rebellions that united sectarian Islamic and non-Islamic religious dissent from politicosocial resentment at Arab domination took place in Transoxiana, the most renowned of which was the rebellion of Hashim b. Hakim (known as al-Muqanna', the Veiled One) in 777–79. Yet Transoxiana's importance for Islamic political thought was mainly in two later periods: the Samanid (819–1005) and the Timurid (1370–1501).

The Samanid period, in most of which Transoxiana and Khurasan were ruled from Bukhara, was a time of economic and intellectual efflorescence. It saw the rise of New Persian to the status of literary language and the recording of Iranian literature and traditions that culminated in Abu al-Qasim Firdawsi's Shahnama (Book of kings, completed under the dynasty after the Samanids, the Ghaznavids), an epic and Mirror for Princes that has remained significant for Iranian and Turkic Muslim rulers ever since. The Samanids also actively promoted the Islamization of the Turks, and the Turkic dynasties that replaced them (and that began the region's Turkicization), mainly the Qarakhanids (ca. 950–1213) and Seljuqs (ca. 1055–1194), used Samanid models for their administration.

The Mongol period was the watershed in the history of Muslim Transoxiana, introducing into the region the Chingizid political tradition, which remained valid there until the 18th century. As one of the first regions to be conquered by the Mongols, in the 1220s, Transoxiana's resources—human and material—were channeled to the needs of the ever-growing empire, thereby eliminating a considerable segment of the region's elites, artisans, and soldiers. Marginalized under the rule of the Chaghatayid khanate (ca. 1260–1347, descendants of Chingiz Khan's son, Chaghatay), Transoxiana came to full bloom under Tamerlane (r. 1370–1405), who replaced the decaying Chaghatayids, made Samarqand his capital, and strove to revive the Mongol Empire. Tamerlane created a new form of legitimation, which combined Chingizid, Muslim, and personal elements, and used monumental building and historiography to strengthen it. This legitimation became a model for future rulers in the region and beyond (the Timurids, the Mughals in India, Nadir Shah in Iran and Transoxiana, the Kokand Khanate in Farghana). With the political and economic decline of the region from the 18th century onward, Tamerlane also became Transoxiana's popular hero and political symbol, a precedent to his prominent position in contemporary Uzbekistan. Another political tradition, developed mainly under the Timurids, was the leading role of Sufi shaykhs, especially of the Naqshbandi order, in the region's economic and political life: in 15th-century Transoxiana the Naqshbandi Khwaja Ahrar became the factual ruler of the region, more powerful than the Timurid princes, whose capital had by then moved to Khurasan.

Under the Chingizid Uzbeks, who deposed the Timurids in 1501, Chingizid political concepts were revived. Thus only descendants of Chingiz Khan could become legitimate khans, and the Yasa, the collection of laws ascribed to Chingiz Khan, remained valid, especially in the fields of political and criminal matters and court etiquette, coexisting with the shari'a. The decline of the Chingizid concepts throughout the 18th century led to the rise of non-Chingizid rulers; thus the Manghit emirate of Bukhara replaced the declining Chingizids in 1753. Yet only the Russian conquest of 1865 brought modern political concepts into the region.

See also Central Asia; Mongols; Mughals (1526–1857); Samanids (819–1005); Shahnama; Tamerlane (1336–1405); Timurids (1370–1506); Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Yuri Bregel, "The New Uzbek States: Bukhara, Khiwa and Kokand: c. 1750–1886," in The Cambridge History of Inner Asia, vol. 2, The Chinggisid Age, edited by Nicola Di Cosmo, Peter B. Golden, and Allan Frank, 2009; Étienne de la Vaissière, Sogdian Traders: A History, 2005; Richard N. Frye, Bukhara: The Medieval Achievement, 1996; Beatrice F. Manz, Power, Politics and Religion in Timurid Iran, 2007; Robert D. McChesney, Central Asia: Foundations of Change, 1996; Svat Soucek, A History of Inner Asia, 2000.

MICHAL BIRAN

treason

In common parlance, "treason" refers to the act of betraying one's country to the benefit of another, usually an enemy or a rival. Historically, in English common law, this understanding was denoted by "high" treason, as opposed to "petty" treason, which could entail a servant killing his master, a wife killing her husband, or adultery between a servant and his master's wife. Throughout its usage, however, "treason" has been largely synonymous with "sedition"; the difference between the two words—namely, that treason carries the additional connotation of allegiance to a foreign power—is a modern convention. Practically speaking, treason would typically include such acts as political assassination, sabotage, and military desertion.

Examples of treason in Islamic history are many and varied. Perhaps the first prosecution of treason in Islamic history belongs to the first caliph, Abu Bakr (r. 632–34). Following the Prophet Muhammad's death, a group of Muslim tribes in the Najd refused to pay the alms tax (sadaqa) to the caliph in Medina. Abu Bakr considered this a kind of treason—more precisely, apostasy (ridda)—and sought to bring the rebels back into the taxpaying fold by force.

This episode adds an important dimension to the definition of treason in an Islamic context. Was treason against a ruler also considered a religious transgression? Certainly, one can imagine that any ruler would favor such a conflation, but the question could be, and was, easily turned around. Was "treason" against a tyrannical ruler a religious duty? There is no clear answer to this question, and opinions among Muslims have been varied. Nor was there a standard response to treason from medieval rulers. Some groups rebelling against caliphs were punished with extreme prejudice, while others were granted clemency.

The period known as the First Civil War (fitna; 656–61) was also thick with examples of treason. The caliph 'Uthman b. 'Affan was murdered by treasonous mutineers dissatisfied with his leadership of the community. 'Ali b. Abi Talib was acknowledged as caliph by many, but 'Uthman's relative Mu'awiya dismissed 'Ali's leadership, claiming that 'Ali was complicit in 'Uthman's assassination. 'Ali's camp regarded Mu'awiya as a traitor, while Mu'awiya's camp regarded 'Ali as guilty of treason against 'Uthman. In the midst of the battle between the two forces, Mu'awiya's troops sued for arbitration, to which 'Ali agreed. Some of 'Ali's stalwart supporters felt that his capitulation to a traitor (Mu'awiya) was itself betrayal, and they deserted him, thus forming the Kharijis. The arbitration did not go well for 'Ali's claim, prompting accusations of treason against the arbitrators. However, shortly thereafter a Khariji assassinated 'Ali, and Mu'awiya became caliph.

This early episode proved extremely divisive. For subsequent generations, it was also a painful and disquieting memory, given that some Companions of the Prophet had fought and killed others. While intrigue and the threat of treason always lurked in the courts and corridors of power, these two very different early examples of treason in Islamic history certainly further complicated Muslim attitudes toward political legitimacy, the possibility of rebellion, and loyalty.

See also apostasy; rebellion

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; Patricia Crone, God's Rule, 2004; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad, 1996.

NICHOLAS G. HARRIS

Treaty of 'Umar

The Treaty of 'Umar is the title given to the canonical document that sets forth the rules and restrictions pertaining to non-Muslims living under Muslim rule. Various other documents were intended to serve the same purpose but have not been accorded the same authority. Although it was not always systematically or strictly enforced between the 9th and the 11th centuries, the Treaty of 'Umar seems progressively to have become the accepted norm in later centuries.

A treaty allegedly signed between the Muslim conquerors and the Christians of one city following the Islamic conquest, the document lists a series of obligations made by the conquered in return for the assurance of protection (amān) given to them by the Muslims. It includes clauses regarding the obligation to host the Muslims and to be loyal to them; a prohibition on building new prayer houses; a list of restrictive measures regarding religious customs such as refraining from beating a clapper (nāqūs) loudly as a call to prayer, praying loudly, forming processions on holidays and for funerals, displaying crosses and lights on the roads, and selling pigs and wine; clauses regarding behavior in the presence of Muslims, such as the obligation to respect the Muslims and to give them priority on the road as well as in seating and the prohibition of burial next to them, peeking into their houses, and the possession of Muslim slaves; and a series of clauses requiring the adoption of differentiating signs (ghiyār), including an obligation to wear the girdle (zunnār) and distinct clothing and the prohibitions of resembling Muslims in appearance, using saddles, adopting seals in the Arabic language, bearing arms, and teaching Christian children Arabic.

Traditionally attributed to 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), the document in its final form is a later product portraying a state of established coexistence between Muslims and non-Muslims and was formed, according to most scholars, sometime around the end of the eighth or beginning of the ninth century. Opinions are divided over the process of its formation. While Arthur Stanley Tritton and Antoine Fattal regard the document as a product of jurists of the ninth century, other scholars such as Salo Baron, Norman Stillman, and Habib Zayyat claim that the 'Umar referred to is the Umayyad caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (r. 717–20), in whose days the initial document was forged. Bernard Lewis, Albrecht Noth, and Mark Cohen believe that many of the clauses in the document reflect the conditions of the immediate postconquest period, although all agree that it underwent a process of elaboration and editing at the hands of later jurists.

Noth, who proposed an early date for the Treaty of 'Umar, suggested that it initially aimed at protecting the Muslim minority from the non-Muslim majority. However, in its final form the treaty reflects the transformation undergone by Muslim society, from insecure and at times rejected conquerors to secure and confident lords and masters. Thus while the initial conquest agreements represented a tolerant, minimally invasive approach, demanding in general only the payment of the jizya (poll tax) in return for amān and the inhabitants' right to observe their ancient customs, the Treaty of 'Umar replaced these with an intolerant and restrictive approach. The document reflected the new social order, according to which the Muslims were the superior, ruling class, while the non-Muslims were the inferior and humiliated class. This new order was entrenched in the ethos of class-stratified Sasanian society, which was now turned to the advantage of the Muslim rulers. Like Sasanian society, Muslim society distinguished between the ruling class and the subject class through distinguishing marks such as clothes and paraphernalia, riding habits, and privileges in the public sphere.

See also minorities; 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (ca. 680–720); 'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644)

Further Reading

Mark Cohen, "What Was the Pact of 'Umar? A Literary-Historical Study," JSAI 23 (1999); Milka Levy-Rubin, Non-Muslims in the Early Islamic Empire: From Surrender to Coexistence, 2011; Idem, "Shurut 'Umar and Its Alternatives: The Legal Debate on the Status of the Dhimmīs," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 30 (2005); Albrecht Noth, "Problems of Differentiation between Muslims and Non-Muslims: Re-Reading the 'Ordinances of 'Umar'," in Muslims and Others in Early Islamic Society, edited by Robert Hoyland, translated by Mark Muelhaeusler, 2004; Arthur Stanley Tritton, The Caliphs and Their Non-Muslim Subjects, 1930.

MILKA LEVY-RUBIN

tribalism

Islam was born in a tribal environment, and tribes have played a large role in Islamic history. Except, however, in the work of the great historian and sociologist Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406), tribalism—the values and attitudes that are characteristic of tribes—has not been an important topic in Islamic political theory. Nor is it likely to become so, for even in places where the tribes were once dominant, they are mostly no longer important actors. Yet tribalism, at least in some regions, continues to influence the way that people think about politics and indeed about other topics.

Although the word "tribe" has never been defined in a satisfactory fashion, scholars who write about the Middle East and North Africa agree, broadly speaking, as to which groups should be called tribal. In this usage, which will be followed here, virtually all nomads are tribal, but not all tribes are nomadic.

This entry focuses on the Middle East and North Africa, with particular attention to the Arabic- and Berber-speaking parts of the region.

Tribalism and Islam

Islam is hostile to tribalism, and this hostility goes back to the time of Muhammad. He wanted to convert not only his fellow townspeople but also the Bedouin tribes of Arabia. The new religion offered a view of the world that centered on the supernatural—God, the afterlife, and the Day of Judgment—and that demanded revolutionary changes in people's behavior and beliefs. The Bedouin, however, were down-to-earth people, with little interest in things they could not perceive and a deep attachment to their ancestral way of life. The Prophet did not have an easy time with them.

Eventually all the Bedouin converted to Islam, although those who remained nomads retained many of their traditional values and practices. Some medieval Arab historians, writing centuries after the nominal conversion, used the term muslimūn (Muslims) to refer to the settled population as opposed to the 'arab (Bedouin). Islamic religious literature generally shows them in a poor light, and Islamic law either prohibits many of their customs (e.g., blood revenge carried out on someone other than the perpetrator) or else makes no allowance for them. For example, virtually every Bedouin tribe has its own particular territory, but Islamic law does not recognize tribes as corporate entities and therefore cannot entertain any territorial claim that a tribe might make.

Until well into the 20th century there were still Bedouin whose way of life was un-Islamic, even though they mostly felt a deep loyalty to their faith. Many pious Muslims have been of the opinion that nomads cannot not be good Muslims. When the Saudis, for instance, reestablished their kingdom at the beginning of the 20th century and encouraged the spread of Wahhabi doctrines among the tribes of Arabia, they attempted at the same time to settle the nomads. But old customs are tenacious, and the authorities in Saudi Arabia, a state that more than any other in the Arab world attempts to follow Islamic law, still find it necessary to recognize tribal territories. Discrimination between individuals according to their tribal (or other) origin, something that has generally been condemned by Islam, remains a significant feature of Saudi life.

The only region where there were nomads who followed the prescriptions of Islamic law as strictly as possible was the Western Sahara, where the Zawaya tribes maintained high standards of piety, and indeed religious scholarship, for centuries. The Western Sahara was also inhabited by other Arabic-speaking nomads, notably those referred to as the warrior tribes. The Zawaya looked on them as little better than infidels.

The History of Tribes in the Islamic Middle East and North Africa

Until the 20th century there had, throughout the Islamic period, been a flow of tribespeople from the Arabian Peninsula into the Fertile Crescent. This flow began well before the appearance of the Prophet Muhammad, but up to the time of his death it was on a modest scale. The conquests that followed the demise of the Prophet were accompanied by a massive outpouring as the Muslims destroyed the Sasanian Empire (Iran and the eastern part of the Fertile Crescent) and took over much of the territory of the Byzantine Empire (the western part of the Fertile Crescent, Egypt, and some coastal regions of North Africa).

The population of the new Muslim empire was made up predominantly of townspeople and peasants (i.e., nontribal agriculturalists). The Arab tribes, which soon fell to fighting among themselves, remained a significant force for many decades after the conquest, but the cities and villages of the new Muslim empire did not generally suffer lasting damage. Arabic became the dominant language in the Fertile Crescent and Egypt but not further east. Apart from the Arabs, the main tribal elements in the previously Sasanian and Byzantine domains of Asia were the speakers of various Iranian languages, notably the Kurds, the Lurs, and the Baluch. They do not seem to have been particularly numerous or influential in the early Islamic period, but during the era of extreme political fragmentation in the late 10th and early 11th centuries a number of short-lived Kurdish principalities appeared in eastern Anatolia and western Iran.

A second tribal flood burst out of Arabia in the 10th century, when the Bedouin again flowed north, especially into Iraq. Certain Isma'ili groups (the Qarmatians) made their influence felt on the Bedouin during these years, but the degree to which this influence can be linked to the migration is uncertain. At the same time the Arab tribes of northern Syria grew stronger, and some of them may have moved east across the Euphrates. In the late 10th and early 11th centuries these Bedouin groups founded a number of small states in the Fertile Crescent. This was accompanied by considerable destruction and population decline, as is shown, among other things, by the archeological evidence. At least in the western part of the Fertile Crescent there was a revival of urban life some 200 years later, though it has been suggested that there was further substantial Bedouin immigration from Arabia around the year 1200.

The third, and last, great Bedouin emigration began in the late 17th century and continued until early in the 19th century. It occurred at a time when the Ottoman Empire was weak, and in its later stages it was linked to the Wahhabi movement. This wave, which brought the Shammar and 'Anize tribes into the Syrian steppes, determined the tribal composition of the region as it remains to this day. All indications are that it was accompanied both by a decline in the overall population and by an increase in the proportion of nomads in that population.

Bedouin tribes reached Egypt at the time of the Islamic conquests and were reinforced in the centuries that followed. Some of the tribespeople lost their tribal identity, but others, especially those in Upper Egypt, did not. At least from the 14th century onward, the tribes were powerful, and sometimes dominant, in Upper Egypt, and they remained so until early in the 19th century.

It was from Egypt that the Muslims conquered the Maghrib. Here, in contrast to the East, they found a rural population that was itself largely tribal. These rural people—nomads and sedentaries—mostly spoke, and continued to speak, Berber languages. Only in the middle of the 11th century did Arab tribespeople begin to appear in large numbers in the Maghrib. The first wave consisted of tribes that had long been resident in Egypt, and their advance, which was accompanied by considerable destruction, is known to history as the invasion of the Banu Hilal. The Bedouin gradually moved westward, reaching Morocco at the end of the 12th century and entering the Western Sahara in the 15th century. There they eventually extended about as far east as Timbuktu. Before the arrival of the tribes, the Arabic language in North Africa had been confined largely to the cities; now Arabic spread to the countryside, and there came into being the pattern that exists to this day, in which, very broadly speaking, Arabic is spoken in the plains and Berber in the mountains.

Arab tribes also flowed into the northern parts of the present-day states of Sudan and Chad, a region referred to here as eastern Sudan. They began to enter this part of Africa in large numbers in the 14th century, mostly traveling up the Nile from Egypt. Once south of the Sahara they spread westward, eventually reaching as far as Lake Chad.

Wherever they went, the Arabs mixed sooner or later with the local population, which in Africa was either Berber or black. The term "Arab tribe" is used here simply to refer to a tribe whose native language is Arabic; in many cases it is clear that the ancestors of what is now an Arab tribe were mostly non-Arabs. These Arab tribes often show cultural traits that are characteristic of the local people rather than of the inhabitants of the Arabian Peninsula. In the case of Africa one might mention, for instance, the prevalence of monogamy in the Western Sahara and the use of drums as tribal symbols in eastern Sudan.

The second great reservoir of tribes, after Arabia, was Central Asia. Turkic nomads began moving westward across Iran into Azerbaijan and Anatolia from about the year 1000, and in the last decades of the century they entered Anatolia in large numbers. Anatolia had suffered greatly during the preceding centuries, but though the population was thin, it apparently did not include, at the time of the Turkic invasions, a high proportion of tribal people. After the first wave of Turkic tribes in the 11th century, there was a second one in the 13th century, the result of Mongol pressure from the East. In contrast to what happened in North Africa, the arrival of the nomads in Anatolia was not accompanied by lasting demographic or economic decline. Some of them, indeed, turned back to the East: between the 14th and 16th centuries there were three waves of Turkic nomads, associated respectively with the Qara Quyunlu, the Aq Quyunlu, and the Safavids, that moved from Anatolia to Iran. Of the tribespeople who remained in Anatolia, many became sedentary. Those who continued as nomads generally spent the winter on the Mediterranean coast or on the northern fringes of the Fertile Crescent and then moved into the mountains and spent the summer with their flocks on the interior plateau. The Ottoman authorities made some use of the nomads as soldiers but also invested considerable effort in attempts to settle them, beginning in the 17th century.

Incomparably the most destructive of the tribal invaders were the Mongols, who swept over Iran and the eastern half of the Fertile Crescent in the 13th century. The Mongols, unlike the Turks and the Arabs, left no lasting linguistic heritage in the region. At least from this time on, both Iraq and Iran were thinly settled countries with large tribal populations; the population levels of the early Islamic centuries were not to return before modern times.

The Tribal Population in 1800

The preceding section gives only a schematic view of events; at the local level there were innumerable ups and downs over these many centuries. It is likely, however, that in relation to earlier periods of Islamic history, the populations of the Arab world and Iran reached a new low, and the proportion of tribespeople a new high, some time in the decades around 1800. These are significant years, for they mark the time when Western influence on the Middle East begins to have revolutionary effects.

The population of all the Arab lands, from Morocco to Iraq, and including the Berbers, may have been about 15 million in 1800; a more miserly estimate gives a similar figure for all the Arab lands plus Anatolia, and even the most generous would not set the Arab and Berber population above 20 million. The area covered by present-day Turkey contained at most about 10 million people, while the population of Iran was perhaps five or six million. To put these figures in proportion, it is worth noting that the population of India was at this time perhaps 200 million (with a wide margin for error), while the population of China, for which the evidence is much better, is generally agreed to have been not less than 300 million.

The people of the territory covered by present-day Iran, Turkey, Israel, and the Arab states were divided, in the first place, between town and country. Here we are confronted not only by factual problems but also by conceptual ones, since there is no wholly satisfactory way of drawing the line between urban and rural settlements. But by almost any measure, at least 80 percent of the population was rural in 1800.

Next, there is the delicate question as to what proportion of the rural population was tribal. Many nomadic Turkomans still inhabited Anatolia in the 18th century, and eastern Anatolia also contained many Kurdish tribespeople. Quantitative estimates, however, are few, and the rural population of early 19th century Anatolia, though it appeared sparse to European observers, was evidently denser than that of any area of similar size in the Arab lands or Iran. It is only in parts of central and eastern Anatolia that the nomads were dominant.

For Iran, an estimate from the beginning of the 19th century that about half the population was nomadic seems to be generally viewed as plausible, as does another that about a quarter of the population remained nomadic at the beginning of the 20th century. Even without allowing for the possibility of sedentary people who were tribally organized, this implies that more than half the rural population of Iran was tribal in 1800.

In the Arab world there were extensive regions where almost the whole rural population was tribal in 1800. It goes practically without saying that this was true of the Western Sahara, eastern Sudan, and Libya. In Morocco and Algeria there was a large, and in some places quite dense, Berber population in the mountains, most of it sedentary, some of it more or less nomadic, and all of it tribal. The plains of Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia were largely occupied by Arab tribes, and even those whose main occupation was agriculture were not fully sedentary. Each agricultural tribe had a territory, only part of which was cultivated in a given year; the people lived in lightly built huts that they would move from time to time. One of the main reasons for moving was to allow one area of the territory to lie fallow while another was cultivated. The most urbanized area of the Maghrib was Tunisia, the only part of the region where there was a significant number of Arab villages in the plains that probably had roots in the pre-Hilalian population. Yet even in Tunisia it is believed that in the 19th century nomads constituted a majority of the population.

Turning now to the east, it is clear that the great majority of the population of the Arabian Peninsula was tribal in 1800. Perhaps half of that population lived in the Yemen, mostly in stable, long-established mountain villages, but here too tribal organization was predominant. The situation in Iraq was, broadly speaking, similar to that in Algeria and Morocco, with the Kurds taking the place of the Berbers. In the territories controlled by the present-day states of Syria, Jordan, Lebanon, and Israel (Greater Syria), the tribes were somewhat less prominent, at least in those regions that lie not more than a hundred miles or so from the Mediterranean. The cities were particularly strong in this region, and here, as in most places in the Middle East, there were peasants in the immediate vicinity of each city. Beyond the immediate environs of the cities, however, the flatlands were everywhere dominated, or at least menaced, by the Bedouin. What distinguishes Greater Syria is that peasants were also to be found in at least some of the mountain regions, the Maronites of Mount Lebanon being the best known group of this kind.

ʿAli al-Wardi (1913–95), an eminent Iraqi sociologist who proposed ideas similar to those expressed here, viewed Egypt, and especially Lower Egypt, as the only Arab country in which sedentary influences clearly outweighed nomadic ones. There is much to be said for this view. Upper Egypt is to this day a region with marked tribal traits, but Lower Egypt, even in 1800, retained a large peasant population.

Tribal Influences

During the long centuries when they dominated much of the countryside, the Bedouin had a marked influence on the nontribal population. Peasants adopted many elements of Bedouin culture. So, for instance, the traditional kinship structures and laws of the Palestinian villagers are merely variants of the corresponding institutions among the nomads, and there can be little doubt about who influenced whom. The age-old hostility between the desert and the sown land was no barrier. Mark Sykes, an English traveler, wrote of the Syrian peasants, "Their manners and customs are borrowed from the Bedawin, whom they dread as their hereditary foes, and against whom until lately they have had to defend themselves" (Dar ul-Islam, 1904). Like so many other Islamic peoples, these peasants were often proud to proclaim themselves descendants of the old Arab tribes.

Even towns and cities were not always immune to tribal influence. One of the most striking examples comes from Iraq: the Muslims of Baghdad ceased at some point to speak their ancient urban Arabic and instead adopted a Bedouin dialect. A similar process took place in a number of cities in North Africa, where almost all the rural dialects of Arabic are of Bedouin origin. Bedouin forms of social organization sometimes penetrated the towns. Agreements relating to the payment of blood money that are clearly based on Bedouin models are recorded for Nazareth in the 19th century and for Najaf early in the 20th century.

In some places, certain institutions of tribal society still retain their vigor in the early 21st century, above all where governments are weak. This is amply illustrated by recent events in the Sudan, Yemen, Iraq, and Palestine, where tribes or clans have often appeared as political forces. Even in a firmly governed country like Egypt, a large amount of dispute settlement, especially in the south, takes place according to the haqq al-'arab, the villagers' version of Bedouin law.

It is not, however, institutions that constitute the most important part of the tribal heritage of the Arab (and Berber) world but rather values and attitudes. This is an idea that has often been adumbrated, though it has been developed at length only in the work of Wardi. It would be desirable to specify these values and attitudes with precision, to offer good evidence that they are widely held in the relevant population, and then to prove that they originated among the tribes. In practice, unfortunately, none of these things can be done, but many of the suggestions that have been raised in this context are nevertheless worthy of attention.

One common observation is that those who cultivate the soil in the Arab lands, unlike their fellows in other parts of the world, show little interest in, or little respect for, agriculture as an activity. There are clear exceptions to this, notably in the mountainous areas and in parts (at least) of Egypt, but there is no doubt that the attitude is widespread. It can plausibly be ascribed to nomadic influence.

Two other frequently made observations are that "extreme individualism" is prevalent among the Iranians and Arabs and that these same people "develop intense loyalty to certain small units, such as the family, the clan, the tribe, or the religious sect," but not to large ones, notably the state (Charles Issawi, "Economic and Social Foundations of Democracy in the Middle East," International Affairs 32, 1956). Issawi does not discuss the question of just how these qualities can coexist, but perhaps what those who have made these observations have in mind can best be captured by substituting the word "assertiveness" for "individualism" and by remembering that it is not uncommon for someone who is assertive in one relationship to be just the opposite in another. Assertiveness is not a trait that one would expect among peasants, but it is characteristic of many Middle Eastern tribes, which stress respect for the autonomy of the individual man. This respect is perhaps linked to the facts that where the tribes flourish, there is no effective central authority, and that a nomad and his family form a mobile and fairly independent economic unit. The absence of an authority that maintains the peace also helps explain the loyalty to a small group, which often consists of agnates: a man depends on such a group to defend his vital interests, not least his physical integrity and that of his dependents.

Wardi viewed the central feature of Bedouin culture as taghâlub, by which he meant something like competitive striving for domination, and he argued, mainly with respect to Iraq, that this had been inherited or adopted by the sedentary population, though often in a debased form. The Bedouin, writes Wardi, whether as an individual or as a member of his tribe, "wants to be the despoiler and not the despoiled, the transgressor and not the victim of transgression, the giver and not the receiver, the one whom others seek out and not the one who seeks out others, the one who makes demands and not the one of whom demands are made, the one who helps others and not the one who seeks help, the protector and not the one who seeks protection" (Dirasa fi Tabi'at al-Mujtama' al-'Iraqi [A treatise on the nature of Iraqi society]).

The tribal environment was one in which it was necessary always to broadcast the message nemo me impune lacessit (no one attacks me with impunity). Every man was armed, and the absence of security meant that a man always had to be ready to use his arms. Disgrace would follow a failure to resort to violence when—in the local view—it was demanded. The emphasis on individual rights and the continual fear of their being infringed meant that disputes were frequent and protracted and the spirit of cooperation limited in scope. These features have also often been observed in the peasant societies of the Middle East. Thomas Russell, a British police officer with decades of experience, wrote of the Egyptian peasant that "brought up from childhood to stories of violence . . . he almost welcomes an affront so as to demonstrate to the world his manliness in avenging it" (Egyptian Service, 1949). Cathie Witty, an American anthropologist who studied disputes in a village in the Biqa Valley of Lebanon, wrote of the women that "they are quick to anger, as are men, and they engage in conflict with a vitality and tenacity that usually astounds Westerners" (Mediation and Society, 1980).

Much of South and East Asia entered the modern era with a relatively dense population that consisted largely of peasants. The Arab world and Iran started with a thin population that consisted largely of tribespeople. In the Arab world, moreover, even many of the peasants were suffused with tribal values. These are not the values characteristic of peasants in, say, India or China, and it may be that some of the difficulties that the Arabs and Iranians have faced in adapting themselves to the changes of the last two hundred years are a result of having started with a society in which the broad masses of the population were heirs to values and attitudes that have their roots in a tribal, rather than a peasant or urban, society.

See also ethnicity; genealogy; household; kinship; solidarity

Further Reading

Nâjwa Adra, Qabyala—The Tribal Concept in the Central Highlands of the Yemen Arab Republic (PhD diss., Temple University, 1982); Werner Caskel, Die Bedeutung der Beduinen in der Geschichte der Araber, 1953; Kurt Franz, Vom Beutezug zur Territorialherrschaft: Das lange Jahrhundert des Aufstiegs von Nomaden zur Vormacht in Syrien und Mesopotamien, 286–420/899–1029, 2007; Ignaz Goldziher, Muslim Studies, vol. 1, 1967; Stefan Heidemann, "Arab Nomads and Seljuq Military," in Shifts and Drifts in Nomad-Sedentary Relations, edited by Stefan Leder and Bernhard Streck, 2005; Anne K. S. Lambton, "The Tribal Resurgence and the Decline of the Bureaucracy in Eighteenth Century Persia," in Studies in Eighteenth Century Islamic History, edited by Thomas Naff and Roger Owen, 1977; William Marçais, "Comment l'Afrique du Nord a été arabisée," in William Marçais, Articles et conférences, 1961; X. de Planhol, Kulturgeographische Grundlagen der islamischen Geschichte, 1975; Yossef Rapoport, "Invisible Peasants, Marauding Nomads: Taxation, Tribalism, and Rebellion in Mamluk Egypt," Mamluk Studies Review 8 (2004); 'Ali al-Wardi, Dirasa fi Tabi'at al-Mujtama' al-'Iraqi, 1965.

FRANK H. STEWART

Tunisia

In March 1956, both Morocco and Tunisia were granted independence as France focused its colonial efforts in North Africa on keeping a firm grip over Algeria. The first 30 years of independent Tunisia were marked by the leadership of Habib Bourguiba (1903–2000), a French-educated lawyer referred to as al-mujāhid al-akbar (the Supreme Combatant), who became the dominant figure in the Tunisian nationalist movement and the architect of modern Tunisia. His philosophy of state building rested on a reformist platform. Although Tunisia was often viewed in the Western media as a secular state, Bourguiba insisted that he was a proponent of a reformist, progressive, and rational Islam, and Article 1 of the 1959 Tunisian constitution stated the Islamic identity of Tunisia.

Bourguiba's views on religion were first reflected in the country's adoption of a code in August 1956 that outlawed polygamy and gave women rights not accorded in traditional Islamic law. Tunisian women had the right to vote and to be candidates in municipal and general elections. The one major exception to this feminist trend was the adherence (with minor amendments) to Islamic law in matters of inheritance because of clear Qur'anic texts relevant to the issue. Bourguiba focused on the establishment of a modernist educational system and the extension of health care to the rural areas. Religious endowments (known as habūs) were dissolved and the traditional religious schooling system was abandoned. Centers of family planning were created in the early 1960s. Until his removal in 1987, Bourguiba was the undisputed ruler of Tunisia and his party, the Neo-Destour (renamed in 1964 the Socialist Destourian Party), the overwhelming political force with no distinction between the authority of the state and the party. On July 25, 1957, Tunisia was declared a republic, thus ending the rule of the Husayni dynasty (1705–1957). The Tunisian constitution reflects a powerful presidential system tailored to Bourguiba's stature. He was the head of state, the leader of the ruling party, the social reformer, and the modern-day reformist theologian. The position of mufti of the Republic, theoretically the highest religious position in Tunisia, was kept but was hollowed of any authority. This became evident in the early 1960s when the mufti was dismissed because he did not adhere to Bourguiba's view that Tunisia was in the midst of a national jihad to overcome underdevelopment. During the same period, orders were issued for businesses and institutions to operate during the month of Ramadan according to the same schedule as the rest of the year. In the 1980s and following the success of the Iranian Revolution (1978–79), the Bourguiba regime took repressive measures to curb the influence of religiously oriented movements. This perceived threat, together with Bourguiba's advanced age and poor health, led to an atmosphere of court intrigue and competition over who would succeed Bourguiba. On November 7, 1987, Zine El-Abidine Ben Ali, then prime minister, staged a bloodless coup by declaring Bourguiba medically unfit to continue as head of state. Article 57 of the Tunisian constitution made the prime minister the automatic successor to the presidency in case of vacancy. Bourguiba ended his days under virtual house arrest in his native town of Monastir, where he died on April 6, 2000.

Zine El-Abidine Ben Ali's professional background was rooted in the military and civilian security services. During his 23 years in power, Ben Ali continued Bourguiba's social policy, granting further legal rights to women: creation of family judgeships, premarital agreements allowing joint property, and other benefits for women with children in cases of divorce. His rule, dubbed as the period of Taghyīr (Change), made an effort to erase Bourguiba from Tunisian collective memory, starting with, in 1988, changing the name of the Socialist Destourian Party into the Constitutional Democratic Rally. Any manifestation of political Islam was harshly repressed, and the movement leaders faced either exile or long jail sentences. This trend reached its height after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attack in the United States and the subsequent passage of Tunisia's antiterrorist laws. Ben Ali's regime was increasingly viewed as having reduced the country to a repressive police state, and some dubbed it a kleptocracy for its rampant corruption. High unemployment rates, especially among university graduates, added to the general discontent. Ben Ali and his family fled to Saudi Arabia on January 14, 2011, as a result of a revolution sparked by the self-immolation of a street vendor in the town of Sidi Bouzid on December 17, 2010.

See also Egypt; nation-state; North Africa

Further Reading

Nicolas Beau and Catherine Graciet, La régente de Carthage: Main basse sur la Tunisie, 2009; Nicolas Beau and Jean-Pierre Tuquoi, Notre ami Ben Ali: L'envers du "miracle tunisien," 1999; Mounira M. Charrad, States and Women's Rights: The Making of Postcolonial Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco, 2001; Derek Hopwood, Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia: The Tragedy of Longevity, 1992; Kenneth J. Perkins, A History of Modern Tunisia, 2004; Norma Salem, Habib Bourguiba, Islam, and the Creation of Tunisia, 1984.

ADEL ALLOUCHE

al-Turabi, Hasan (b. 1932)

Born in 1932 to a well-known family of religious notables in the town of Kassala in eastern Sudan, Hasan al-Turabi is one of the most intriguing figures among the Islamic thinkers and political activists of the 20th century. In his childhood and youth, he received a basic training in the traditional Islamic disciplines at the hands of his father, a judge (qadi), whose occupation kept the family constantly on the move. On the completion of his secondary school education in 1950, Turabi enrolled at the University of Khartoum, where he came in close contact with the Muslim Brotherhood, which had just started to set up local branches in the Sudan. In 1957, shortly after Sudan's national independence, Turabi left the country to continue his studies abroad, earning a master's degree from the University of London and a PhD in law from the Sorbonne, thus acquiring in-depth knowledge of Western legal systems and thought.

After his return to the Sudan in 1964, Turabi, now the dean of the Faculty of Law at the University of Khartoum, became immersed in Sudan's politics and continued to be politically active throughout his life. The political wing of the Sudanese Muslim Brotherhood at the time was the Islamic Charter Front (ICF), and Turabi emerged as one of its foremost activists, campaigning against the "Communist threat" and seeking support for the adoption of an Islamic constitution. Despite serious setbacks, such as the failure of the parliament to endorse the constitution proposed by the ICF in 1968 and the socialist and secular orientation of the military regime under Ja'far al-Numayri (1969–85), Turabi never gave up on his agenda of establishing an Islamic state in the Sudan.

After Numayri took power, Turabi was arrested on charges of treason and spent several years in prison. In the 1970s he emerged as the pioneer of what he and his fellow activists called the "Islamic movement." He authored more than ten books and numerous articles, outlining his ideas about "Islamic renewal" (tajdid), the key concept in Turabi's thought, and dealing with diverse topics such as the Islamic political system, Islam and art, Islam and women, humanism, and Islam and the West. What sets Turabi apart from many of his contemporaries within political Islam is his attempt to synthesize Islamic doctrine and some aspects of Western political thought, such as devolution of power, federalism, and democracy (though not a multiparty system). He aimed at creating a new model that reconciled religious principles with the changing realities of modern life. Turabi left considerable room for the reinterpretation of Islam, arguing that, with few exceptions reflecting the eternal components of the divine message, everything could be subject to revision. This position earned him the reputation of a liberal thinker within contemporary Islamism, as well as the enmity of the more conservative-minded leaders within the Islamist spectrum.

Although Turabi consistently emphasized that the path to the Islamic state was only through education and raising an Islamic awareness among all citizens, his political strategies revealed that he also had an acute concern for power. Many observers noted a pattern of mismatch between his proclamations, which emphasized that the Islamization of the individual has to precede the Islamization of the state, and his actions, which suggest that he sought to assume political power first and then impose an Islamic political system that would ultimately lead to the full Islamization of Sudanese society. This contradiction runs as a central thread throughout Turabi's political career. As many observers have noted, Turabi always gave the impression of being moderate and soft-spoken in his public announcements, but his name is intimately connected to the so-called September Laws that introduced a shari'a-based penal code under President Ja'far al-Numayri in September 1983, a move that rekindled the fire of the civil war between the Northern regime and the Sudanese Peoples' Liberation Army (SPLA).

During the democratic interlude from 1985 and 1989, Turabi became the leader of the National Islamic Front (NIF), a political party that propagated the establishment of an Islamic state in the Sudan. The party was moderately successful in the 1986 elections but was unable to prevent the rapprochement between the government and the SPLA through democratic means. Turabi was widely perceived as the driving force behind the military coup of 1989 led by General 'Umar al-Bashir, who was still in power as of 2011. Turabi appeared as the chief ideologue of the new Islamist order, although he served another term in prison immediately after the coup. During the 1990s he was the founder and secretary general of the Popular Arabic and Islamic Congress (PAIC), an international forum for well-known Muslim radicals with its headquarters in Khartoum. As the éminence grise behind the regime he was instrumental in declaring the civil war against the SPLA a jihad, a move accompanied by compulsory conscription for the so-called Peoples' Defense Forces. The enactment of new shari'a laws and the promulgation of a new, "Islamic" constitution completed the picture of "God's rule in the Sudan." Turabi was finally stripped of his political influence, imprisoned, and kept under house arrest after losing a power struggle against President 'Umar al-Bashir in 1999, whose regime subsequently displayed a more moderate orientation.

Turabi's legacy is ambiguous. Hailed as a liberal and innovative Islamist thinker by some, seen as a cynical power broker and pillar of the "NIF dictatorship" by others, accused of directing an international terrorist network by the United States during Bill Clinton's presidency, admired for his intellectual rigor and skillful pragmatism by his supporters, and disparaged as a secularist in Islamic garb by more conservative Islamists, he invariably caused a stir with his controversial pronouncements. In a series of public lectures after 2003, Turabi declared that the Muslims who died in the war against the SPLA could not be considered martyrs, thus denying that the war fulfilled the Islamic legal requirements for a jihad; he maintained that the consumption of alcohol should not be punishable under Islamic law; and he supported the idea that a woman could lead men in ritual prayer or become president in an Islamic state. Many Sudanese saw him as an enfant terrible whose "Islamic Project" has run its course. A definite assessment of his legacy, however, will depend on his reception by future generations of Islamic intellectuals.

See also revival and reform; Sudan

Further Reading

Abdelwahab El-Affendi, Turabi's Revolution: Islam and Power in Sudan, 1991; Millard J. Burr and Robert O. Collins, Revolutionary Sudan: Hasan al-Turabi and the Islamist State, 1989–2000, 2003; Abdullahi Ali Ibrahim, "A Theology of Modernity: Hasan al-Turabi and Islamic Renewal in Sudan," Africa Today 46 (3–4); Judith Miller, "Global Islamic Awakening or Sudanese Nightmare? The Curious Case of Hasan Turabi," in Spokesmen for the Despised: Fundamentalist Leaders of the Middle East, edited by R. Scott Appleby, 1997; John O. Voll, "Hasan al-Turabi: The Mahdi-Lawyer," in Makers of Contemporary Islam, edited by John L. Esposito and John O. Voll, 2001.

RÜDIGER SEESEMANN

Turkey

Turkey is a transcontinental state located mostly (291,773 sq. mi.) in Southwest Asia and partly (9,174 sq. mi.) in Europe. Bordered by three seas—the Black Sea to the north, the Aegean Sea to the west, and the Mediterranean to the south—Turkey serves as a geographic and cultural bridge between Asia and Europe. Its estimated population in 2007 was 73 million, of which 99.8 percent were Muslim. Although the Ottoman Empire ruled from Istanbul after 1453, Ankara became the capital of the Republic of Turkey in 1923.

The Ottoman state had been a multifaith, polyethnic empire up until World War I, but the mass deportation of Armenians in 1915 and the forcible population exchange between Greece and Turkey in 1923–26 produced a nation-state overwhelmingly inhabited by Muslims, most of whom consider themselves ethnically Turkish. Sunnis constitute a strong majority of the population, but there is also a sizable 'Alawi minority as well as pockets of Shi'is and Nusayris. Small Greek Orthodox, Armenian (Lusavorchakan and Catholic), and Jewish communities remain mainly in the big cities, while significant Kurdish populations inhabit the eastern and southeastern parts of Anatolia. Due to intensified internal migration after 1950, large numbers of Kurds now live in the major cities of western Turkey as well. The partition of the Ottoman Empire also turned small concentrations of Arabs and Turks into minorities on either side of Turkey's borders with Iraq and Syria.

Although Turkey is but one of the many successor states of the Ottoman Empire, it is commonly considered to be the heir of that historic polity. With one brief exception in the 1920s and 1930s, the Turkish establishment embraced this perception and viewed the republic as the legitimate successor to the empire and its former glory. In the aftermath of the Balkan wars of 1912–13, the empire that once straddled three continents and included such far-flung regions as Hungary, Yemen, Egypt, and Eritrea lost substantial territory to a number of breakaway nation-states and shrank to become a principally Asiatic country. The Ottoman defeat along with the Central Powers in 1918 brought about the final partition of the empire. The threat of further partition, embedded in the Sèvres Treaty of 1920, forced Turkish nationalists to fight for their independence in Anatolia between 1919 and 1922. The war, fought mainly against Greece, ended in a Turkish victory that yielded recognition of the boundaries of the new nation-state in the Lausanne Treaty of 1923. This treaty left the decision on the fate of the former Ottoman province of Mosul to the League of Nations, which awarded Mosul to Iraq in 1925. Since then, the single major change in Turkey's borders took place in 1939 when Turkey annexed the former Sanjak of Alexandretta (Hatay), which had been ceded to Syria under the French Mandate.

For centuries, the Ottoman Empire was the main Sunni power of the Muslim world. Following the conquest of the Arab provinces in the early 16th century, the Ottoman sultans formalized this position by assuming the title of caliph, which they used increasingly from the 19th century onward. Although Turkey inherited the caliphate, the republican leadership abolished the institution in March 1924, thereby bringing to an end a 1,300-year-old Muslim tradition. The abolition of the caliphate constituted a landmark event in the history of the Turkish Westernization movement. In contrast to the more cautious Ottoman tradition of reform, in which the ruling elite sought to Westernize the empire while keeping Islamic institutions intact, the republican leadership, led by Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, adopted a radical program aimed at sidelining Islam completely in the new Turkish society, which was to be governed by lay institutions guided by an intensely secular ideology. As part of their project, the republican elite strove to fashion a new Turkish identity based on ethnicity in place of religion. Turkey became the first officially secular Muslim country in 1937, although it had already been so in practice since at least 1928.

A central part of the republican agenda was the creation of new political institutions. In 1921, the Turkish Grand National Assembly adopted a new constitution. In November 1922, it abolished the sultanate. On October 29, 1923, the leaders of the nationalist movement proclaimed the Turkish Republic. In 1922, Mustafa Kemal had established the People's Party (later called the Republican People's Party, or RPP), which dominated the political scene until the end of World War II. No genuinely free elections were held until 1950. Since then, however, regularly contested elections precipitated the fall of the RPP from its erstwhile position of dominance, and Turkey enjoyed a pluralistic multiparty regime. The advent of electoral politics notwithstanding, the army and the civilian bureaucracy maintained a form of tutelage over the state. The military, which viewed itself as the guardian of Kemalist ideology, launched two major coups in 1960 and 1980, intervened directly in politics in 1971, and intervened less directly (the so-called postmodern coup) in 1997. More recently, the Turkish military threatened to intervene in the presidential elections in 2007. Although secular centrist parties traditionally have dominated Turkish politics, the elections of 2002 produced the first pro-Islamist government in modern Turkish history. The Justice and Development Party, a moderate Islamist party, won a second and more decisive election victory in 2007 and gained a majority in the Turkish Grand National Assembly, the legislative body, and full control over the executive branch of government.

Turkey is the 17th largest economy in the world, with a gross domestic product (GDP) of $361.1 billion (at official exchange rates), GDP per capita of $8,900, and a real growth rate in GDP of 6.1 percent for 2006. Despite measures toward economic liberalization following the switch to a multiparty system, the Turkish economy of the 1960s and 1970s remained protectionist, etatist, and still heavily dependent on agriculture. Extensive reforms carried out in the 1980s, however, brought about major structural change. In the early 21st century, the agricultural sector produced less than 10 percent of Turkish GDP, and Turkey had one of the world's freest market economies.

To date, Turkey is the only Muslim country to have joined major Western institutions and alliances. Turkey joined the European Council in 1949, the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development in 1961, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe in 1973, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in 1952. It became an associate member of the European Economic Community in 1963 and received full membership candidate status from the European Union in 1999. Negotiations on accession to the European Union began in 2005.

See also Central Asia; Ottomans (1299–1924)

Further Reading

Sibel Bozdogan and Resat Kasaba, eds., Rethinking Modernity and National Identity in Turkey, 1997; Andrew Mango, The Turks Today, 2004; Ziya Onis, State and Market: The Political Economy of Turkey in Comparative Perspective, 1993; Erik J. Zurcher, Turkey: A Modern History, 2004.

M. ŞÜKRÜ HANIOĞLU

al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

A philosopher, scientist, and major Shi'i theologian contributing to both the Isma'ili and Twelver traditions, Nasir al-Din al-Tusi wrote one of the most influential Persian medieval works on politics, ethics, and statecraft—namely, the Akhlaq-i Nasiri (Nasirean Ethics).

Abu Ja'far Muhammad al-Tusi was born into a scholarly Twelver Shi'i family in Tus in 1201. He began his studies in Arabic, the Qur'an, the hadith, and jurisprudence with his father and continued his education in Nishapur, Baghdad, and Mosul, studying with leading jurists and philosophers. In 1233, in pursuit of patronage, he accepted a commission to write a work on ethics and politics framed within Isma'ili theology for the governor of Kuhistan, Muhtasham Nasir al-Din. This work was the Akhlaq-i Muhtashami (Ethics for Muhtasham). Two years later, he wrote the Akhlaq-i Nasiri for Nasir al-Din. It drew on Abu 'Ali Ahmad b. Muhammad b. Miskawayh's (d. 1030) Tahdhib al-Akhlaq (The refinement of ethics), an Arabic naturalization of Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, and on the works of Ibn Sina (d. 1037) and Farabi (d. 950) on politics as well as Persian works of homiletics and statecraft. He spent more than 20 years with the Isma'ilis, acting as a missionary and benefiting from the excellent library in Alamut. This was his most productive period, in which he wrote major works in philosophy and mystical ethics such as the commentary on Ibn Sina's al-Isharat wa-l-Tanbihat (Pointers and reminders) and Aghaz-u Anjum (The origins and the final destinations).

After the fall of Alamut in 1256 and the siege of Baghdad two years later, both of which his detractors claimed he had connived, he joined the Mongol entourage of Hulagu, who provided him with a new observatory and academic complex in Maragha, Azerbaijan, making it a major center for philosophical and scientific learning. Toward the end of his life he returned to Baghdad and wrote some further works in Twelver Shi'i theology. He died in Baghdad in 1274 and was buried in the shrine complex of the seventh and ninth Shi'i imams in the Kazimiyya section of the city.

Tusi's contribution to politics and political thought lies not only in his Persian works and in his primary interest in both theoretical philosophy (metaphysics) and practical philosophy (ethics and politics) but also in his practice as a vizier to the Mongols. His works on politics fall within the Aristotelian tradition of virtue ethics being located in a polity that facilitates the production of flourishing happiness (sa'ãda). The Akhlaq-i Nasiri is divided into three discourses. The first is divided into two parts: one on moral psychology and the nature of the soul as the seat of moral will and agency and the other on virtue ethics that focuses upon the notion of the Aristotelian mean and justice as a primary virtue. This has clear implications for politics, as he makes clear later in the text. This first part is, broadly speaking, a Persian paraphrase of Miskawayh's Tahdhib al-Akhlaq. The second discourse concerns the regulation of household affairs (tadbir-i manzil) and includes important discussions on mutual rights within the family and household as the basic units of societies and polities. The third discourse addresses Platonic conceptions of politics with philosophers as political leaders and the need for hierarchy and a clear role for different strata in society in advising the ruler. This examination of statecraft is all the more remarkable not only for its insistence on justice as a central political virtue but also for its emphasis on Aristotelian notions of friendship and Neoplatonic ideas of love and sympathy as fundamental elements in the fostering of harmony within society. This akhlāq tradition of placing interpersonal virtue ethics within the context of political thought had an important impact, and imitations were written for various subsequent rulers such as the Akhlaq-i Jalali (The Jalalian ethics), written by Jalal al-Din Dawani (d. 1502) for the Turkoman Aq Quyunlu ruler Uzun Hasan, and the Akhlaq-i Muhsini (Ethics for Muhsin), written by Husayn al-Wa'iz al-Kashifi (d. 1504) for the son of the Timurid ruler of Herat, Sultan Husayn Bayqara. Later works were written for Mughal and Safavid rulers, and even the Jami' al-Sa'adat (Compendium of happiness), written by Mulla Mahdi Naraqi (d. 1794), shows the influence of Tusi's work.

See also al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (980–1037); philosophy

Further Reading

Ghulamhusayn Ibrahimi Dinani, Nasir al-Din Tusi: Faylasuf-i Guftagu, 2007; Nasrollah Pourjavady and Zhiva Vesel, eds., Dānishmand-i Tūs/Naṣīr al-Dīn Ṭūsī: Philosophe et savant du XIIe siècle, 1997; Nasir al-Din al-Tusi, The Nasirean Ethics, translated by G. M. Wickens, 1964; Idem, Paradise of Submission: A Medieval Treatise on Ismaili Thought, edited and translated by Sayyid Jalal Badakhchani, 2005.

SAJJAD H. RIZVI

tyranny

Tyranny is to act in a deeply unjust and cruel manner. Oppression (zulm), usually by someone in a position of state power, is the defining feature of tyranny. The Qur'an uses several words for tyranny, including 'uluww (Q. 17:4), as well as zulm, and refers to the tyrant or the tyrannical as zallām (Q. 3:182; 8:51; 22:10; 41:46; 50:29) and jabbār (Q. 11:59; 14:15; 50:45). A crucial aspect of the Qur'anic understanding of tyranny is that it is created wholly by humans: God does not commit injustice (Q. 4:40; 28:5–6, 45:22), but people perpetrate the oppression of others. Indeed, one of the 99 divine epithets is al-'adl (the Just). Moreover, because every soul is accountable before God on the Day of the Resurrection (Q. 7:8–9 3:30; 45:28–31), the oppressor not only commits injustice against others but also ultimately wrongs himself or herself. Despite the Qur'an's condemnation of tyranny, numerous Muslim rulers have appealed to Islamic principles, motifs, and propaganda to justify various forms of oppression, to prolong their rule, and to perpetuate the status quo. Sunni Islamic law and theology generally require obedience even to an oppressive and sinful ruler as long as he outwardly upholds the shari'a as the law of the land and Islam as his own religion. A major motivation behind this stance is the view that the lack of a strong central authority will lead to fitna, widespread public conflict or a general state of disorder and lawlessness in society, a principle encapsulated in the maxim, "Sixty years of tyranny are better than an hour of civil strife." In addition, in classical Islamic law and theology, the legitimacy of institutions of public welfare such as the treasury of the Muslim community, the judiciary, and the defense forces are dependent on the legitimacy of the ruler; there was thus a strong incentive for theorists of the Sunni majority such as Ghazali (d. 1111) to uphold the legitimacy of a tyrant, because the alternative would entail an admission that all institutions dependent on appointment by the ruler were null and void, and society would cease to function properly. The Umayyads and Abbasids even fabricated hadith reports that promoted obedience to the ruling monarch and branded any opposition as Islamically deviant. At the same time, though, Islamic political theory and the practical discourse on kingship stressed a social contract by the dictates of which rulers were obligated to uphold justice and eradicate injustices in the territory under their control. Medieval Islamic governments set up special courts to deal with "injustices" (maẓālim) that were not addressed by the courts of ordinary judges, including abuses of power by government officials.

Early Islamic discourse strongly associates tyranny with kingship, which is seen as entailing the subordination of public interest and of the Muslim community's material and religious welfare to the interests or whims of the ruler. In the early centuries, the title of "king" was opposed to the caliph or imam, defined as the legitimate leader of the Muslim community, who takes his duties toward the believers seriously and puts their interests before his own. Thus when the Abbasids and later Muslims described the Umayyads as kings, this was equivalent to denouncing them as illegitimate tyrants, even though the title "king" later became popular among Muslim rulers such as the Ayyubids (1171–1250). Similarly, the well-known hadith report in which the Prophet allegedly predicts that the caliphate will last 30 years, after which there will be kings, is to be understood as a condemnation of all the caliphs after the first four as tyrants.

Non-Sunni theologies and countless historical rebellions against the existing status quo, particularly on the part of Shi'i and Khariji groups, have been predicated on the idea that the current ruler is an illegitimate caliph or imam, a usurper whose rule is by definition tyrannical and who should be replaced with the legitimate imam. Sunni legal and theological doctrine stresses the obligation to criticize the oppressive ruler for unjust deeds or violations of Islamic law and to attempt to convince him to change his ways, though obedience to a tyrant is required when such critiques are impossible, dangerous, or ineffective. Most Sunni authorities held that rebels who have a plausible cause for rebellion, including those who are rebelling against a tyrannical ruler, should be treated with leniency or granted amnesty if possible.

Critiques of oppression and tyranny constitute a core theme of contemporary Islamic political thought. In the 20th century, tyranny for most Muslims manifested itself on two levels: foreign domination of the historic heartlands of Islam, first by European powers such as Britain and France and later by the United States, and domestic dictatorships, such as the governments of Egypt, Morocco, and Saudi Arabia. These twin tyrants—the external and the internal—have shaped contemporary Islamic discourse on injustice. The speeches of Osama bin Laden (d. 2011) effectively encapsulate this trend. Though his violent tactics do not represent the vast majority of Muslims, his grievances and sense of victimhood are widely shared by others. Bin Laden's concerns were essentially twofold: American policies in the Middle East, most notably support for the Israeli occupation of Palestine and sanctions imposed on the Iraqi people, and "un-Islamic" and deeply authoritarian Muslim regimes.

Contemporary readings of the Islamic heritage have become a powerful weapon of resistance against tyranny. Drawing on the Qur'an and early Islamic history for guidance, Muslim thinkers have sought to apply an understanding of episodes in Islam's salvation history to their own struggles in the present. Writing against the Nasserist regime in Egypt, the Islamic activist Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), building on the ideas of his South Asian contemporary Mawdudi (d. 1979), used the term jāhiliyya to refer to the state. Conventionally defined as "the age of ignorance," the Qur'anic term jāhiliyya refers to the paganism of pre-Islamic Arabia, characterized by false worship, sin, bloody warfare, and gross inequity. By equating the contemporary Egyptian government with the jāhiliyya, Qutb thus sought to delegitimate the regime as un-Islamic and to call for its overthrow. The assassination of the Egyptian president Anwar Sadat (d. 1981) by the militant group Jihad is another telling example. After shooting Sadat, one of the assassins cried out triumphantly, "I am Khaled al-Islambuli. I have killed Pharaoh, and I do not fear death." By connecting the rule of Sadat with that of Pharaoh—who embodied tyranny and corruption in the Qur'an (Q. 10:83; 28:4), as in the Hebrew Bible (Exodus 1:8–22)—Islambuli underscored the oppressive policies of the regime.

See also colonialism; equality; ethics; human rights; imperialism; justice; masses; rebellion; revolutions; solidarity; torture

Further Reading

Farid Esack, Qur'an, Liberation and Pluralism: An Islamic Perspective of Interreligious Solidarity against Oppression, 1997; Toshihiko Izutsu, Ethico-Religious Concepts in the Qur'an, 2002; Gilles Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt: Prophet and Pharaoh, 1985; Nizam al-Mulk, The Book of Government or Rules for Kings: The Siyar al-Muluk or Siyasat-Nama of Nizam al-Mulk, translated by Hubert Darke, 2001.

SHADAAB RAHEMTULLA

Uighurs

With a population of over nine million, the Uighurs (also spelled Uygurs or Uyghurs) are the second largest ethnic Muslim group in the People's Republic of China after the Hui. They are mainly concentrated in a northwest province of China (officially known as the Xinjiang Autonomous Region but called Eastern Turkistan by Uighur nationalists). Originating from Tiele-Turkic nomads in the steppes of the northwestern Mongolia Plateau around 300 BC, the Uighurs migrated to northwestern China around the mid-ninth century after the Uighur empire (774–840) was overthrown by the Kyrghiz tribe as a result of a famine and civil war; they settled mainly in contemporary Gansu, Xingjiang, and west of Tieshan Mountain. The Uighurs' Islamic identity began with the Qarakhanid Khanate (around 960–1209, also spelled Karakhanid), the West Turkic dynasty established by a group of those migrated Uighurs based in Transoxiana and Tarim Basin of Central Asia. From their conversion to Islam in 934 under the rule of Sultan Satuq Bughra Khan (920–56) until the later years of Mughal rule in Chinese Turkistan (late 15th century), Islam gradually replaced Shamanism, Buddhism, Manicheanism, and Nestorian Christianity and became the sole religion of the Uighurs living in Xinjiang.

The political thoughts of Uighur Muslims can be viewed in three historical stages: (1) Islamic statecraft and virtue politics during the Qarakhanid dynasty; (2) religious activism and quasi theocracy during the rule of the Eastern Chaghatay and Yarkand khanates (also known as Mughulistan) from the late 14th century to the late 17th century; and (3) modern ideologies of Pan-Islamism, pan-Turkism, and Uighur nationalism from the late 19th century into the early part of the 21st century. The first stage of the Islamization of Xinjiang under the Turkic and Mongol khans resulted in a blossoming of indigenous Uighur literature and culture by absorbing influences from Indo-Persian, Islamic, Chinese, and even ancient Greek traditions. Yusuf Khass Hajib's Wisdom of Royal Glory (Kutadgu Bilig), completed in 1069 in Kashgar and often acclaimed as a Mirror for Princes, is a long prose work on political virtues, statesmanship, religion, and the art of war and was first presented to the prince of Kashgar in the hope that it would guide his rulership. This masterpiece was originally written in the Uighur language (mid-Turkish) and contains the authentic folk cultures of the different Turkic peoples, with the ambition to reconcile the diverse traditions of the region, including Islamic, Indo-Persian influence. By featuring four major characters who represent four virtues or principles—the king Rising Sun (justice), the vizier Full Moon (fortune), the sage Highly Praised (wisdom), and the ascetic Wide Awake (piety)—in a poetic story of the king's search for the best way of life as he asks others how to rule, Kutadgu Bilig recommends Islam as the protector of law and grounds the institution of justice on virtues, fortune, and religious piety. The work emphasizes that piety and wisdom are keys to a good kingship and echoes the perennial debate between Islam and politics by asking whether it is better to withdraw into solitude for religious contemplation or actively engage in worldly affairs. Ultimately, the author advocates for a symbolic but not actual withdrawal from politics, or "solitude in the multitude," in order to live a fulfilling life and attain success in the hereafter.

The second stage is related to Sufi orders and the reform-minded Khojas (religious-political leaders) during the Eastern Chaghatay (13th to 16th century) and Yarkand (1514–1680) khanates. Xinjiang was fully Islamicized by the 15th century, and most of the population ruled by the Chaghatayid (the Turkic Mughals related to Chaghatay Khan, the second son of Chingiz Khan) converted to Islam as a result of their ruler Tughluq Temur's (1347–63) embrace of Islam and the mass da'wa (Islamic missionary activity) by the Sufi shaykhs and missionaries. During the Yarkand Khanate (established by Sultan Said Khan, a relative of the Chaghatay nobles), branches of the Naqshbandis, a Sufi order originating from Central and South Asia, were able to seize control of political affairs with their religious activism and revivalism. One important leader, Baha' al-Din, taught that Sufis need not seclude themselves from the political community in order to maintain a strong relationship with God. The Naqshbandis rejected religious quietism and accelerated their missionary efforts in search of political support to advance their religious influence among the Mongol nomads and Uighur oasis dwellers. Their teachings had a pronounced Sunni bent that combined political activism, adherence to the law, and propagation of the religion, and soon became a divisive banner in the political struggles between two powerful Naqshbandi groups, Aq Tagh and Kara Tagh, whose leaders, called Khojas in the Turkic language, wielded both spiritual and political power and pushed the Chaghatay and Yarkand khans to adopt their brands of Islam. One prominent doctrine of Naqshbandis among the Uighurs (developed by Khoja Taj ad-Din), especially in the Altishahari and Mawarannahr branches, is the emphasis on "miracles" (karāmāt) and the veneration of saints and their tombs. Those tendencies were banished and labeled heretic in the 18th century when neo-orthodox fundamentalists became one of the major ideological sources for Uighur resistance against the Zungaria Mongols' domination (1680–1756) and the Manchurian occupation from China (1756–1864).

The third stage witnesses the rise of modern Uighur nationalism in the context of pan-Islamism and pan-Turkism under the rule of a series of Chinese authorities: the late Manchurian Qing dynasty (1880–1911), Chinese warlords during the Republic era (1911–49), and Communists (1949–). In 1864, the Uighurs revolted against the rule of Manchurian officials, who mainly used begs (Turkic landlords) and Khojas to exercise indirect control, and they established a Kashgaria kingdom under Yaqub Beg (1820–77), who declared a holy war to expel Chinese-speaking Muslims and Han merchants from the region. Starting in the late 19th century, after the death of Yaqub Beg and the subsequent reconquering of the area by the Chinese, Uighur merchants and overseas students gradually introduced the ideas of pan-Turkism and Pan-Islamism, which nurtured widespread separatist sentiment. When Chinese warlords ruled Xinjiang (1911–49), progressive Uighur intellectuals adopted Islamic and Turkic modernism to promote enlightenment of Turkic peoples and national awareness through education, teaching Islam along with modern natural science. On November 12, 1933, a short-lived Eastern Turkestan Islamic Republic was established under the leadership of Khoja Niyaz, which became the important symbol of modern Uighur nationalism. Its constitution reflects its Islamic character with a modernizing and nationalizing ideology: its first clause announces governance in accordance with shari'a, whereas the second clause stresses democracy. The Second Eastern Turkestan Republic (founded in 1944 and led by Ahmatjan Qasimi), which also embodied both Islamic and secular political principles in its constitution, eventually collapsed after Chinese communists took control of Xinjiang in 1949. During communist rule, and especially during the Cultural Revolution, both Muslim and Uighur identities were suppressed, and class struggles became the dividing line among the Uighurs. Following the independence of the Central Asian countries in the early 1990s, Uighur nationalism, an umbrella identity to unite claims of an Islamic state, pan-Turkism, or simply Uighur independence, has revived and gained international concern. For example, according to documents released by the Chinese government and the U.S. Department of State, the East Turkistan Islamic Movement is a mujahidin organization of Uighur separatists whose ideology is to free Xinjiang from China and convert all Chinese to Islam. Although Islamic "extremism and fundamentalism" was sometimes blamed for the riots and bombings that have taken place in Xinjiang since the 1990s, it is those more secular and nationalistic claims that are gaining wider audience, thanks to Uighurs in exile, such as the successful businesswoman Rabiya Qadir, who has emerged as the main advocate of separatism in democratic terms.

See also China; Mongols

Further Reading

Joseph Fletcher, Studies on Chinese and Islamic Inner Asia, 1995; Yusuf Khass Hajib, Wisdom of Royal Glory (Kutadgu Bilig): A Turko-Islamic Mirror for Princes, translated by Robert Dankoff, 1982; Ho-dong Kim, Holy War in China: The Muslim Rebellion and State in Chinese Central Asia, 1864–1877, 2004; James A. Millward, Eurasian Crossroads: A History of Xinjiang, 2007; Justin Jon Rudelson, Oasis Identities: Uyghur Nationalism along China's Silk Road, 1997; Li Sheng, History and Current Situation of Chinese Xinjiang (Zhongguo xinjiang lishi yu xiangzhuang), 2006.

SHAOJIN CHAI

'ulama'

The Arabic term 'ulamā' (sing., 'ālim) refers to Muslim scholars specializing in the Islamic religious sciences. A number of other terms are often used to characterize the particular focus of a scholar's work, among them muḥaddith (concerned with the study of the hadith reports attributed to the Prophet Muhammad), mufassir (an exegete of the Qur'an), and faqīh and mufti (a scholar of Islamic law and a jurisconsult, respectively). The term "'ulama'" usually is understood to encompass these somewhat narrower categories. The boundaries between "religious" and "secular" learning were less clearly delineated in premodern Islam than they have been in the modern world, and those recognized as 'ulama' sometimes made significant contributions to fields of knowledge lying well beyond the aforementioned areas. Further, the same person might well be a scholar of Islamic law, a theologian, a philosopher, and a Sufi. In modern times some "new religious intellectuals"—that is, people who are educated not at institutions of traditional Islamic learning but rather at Western or Westernized colleges and universities and who are active contributors to religious discourse—have sometimes claimed that they, too, should be considered as 'ulama'. As the Sudanese Islamist Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932), who received a doctorate in law from the Sorbonne, put it, "Because all knowledge is divine and religious, a chemist, an engineer, an economist, or a jurist are all ulama." Despite occasionally blurred boundaries, The term "'ulama'" is usually understood as those who claim religious authority on the basis of their grounding in the Islamic religious sciences. This entry focuses on such traditionally educated religious scholars.

The 'Ulama' in Medieval History

The origins of the 'ulama' are to be traced to those figures of the first generations of Islam who had come to be seen by their contemporaries and successors as especially knowledgeable in matters relating to the Qur'an, as sources of information on the life and teachings of the Prophet Muhammad, and as jurists. By the early eighth century, scholarly circles had begun to emerge in several major Islamic towns in Arabia, Syria, Iraq, and elsewhere. Statements attributed to the Prophet and to his Companions also began to be collected with much vigor during the second century of Islam (roughly the eighth century), though it would take many generations of scholarly contestation before the authority of hadith reports attributed to the Prophet Muhammad (as distinguished from statements ascribed to his Companions and other early Muslims or the evolving juridical discourses of particular scholarly circles) would be recognized as a source of legal norms second to the Qur'an.

Many prominent scholars of early Islam worked under the patronage of the rulers. One notable example is Muhammad b. Shihab al-Zuhri (d. 742), who served several Umayyad caliphs and was instructed by the caliph 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (r. 717–20) to collect normative traditions (sunan, best understood here, as Wael Hallaq has observed, as reports relating to the teachings and practices not just of the Prophet but also of other early figures). Another example is Muhammad b. Ishaq (d. 767), the author of an early biography of the Prophet, which he composed at the behest of the second Abbasid caliph Mansur (r. 754–75) as part of a larger history of the world. Abu Yusuf (d. 798), a founding figure in the history of the Hanafi madhhab, or school of law (named after his teacher, Abu Hanifa [d. 767]), served as an influential judge in Baghdad and wrote a treatise on taxation for the Abbasid caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809). Medieval biographical dictionaries are replete with instances of scholars visiting caliphs and other notables, receiving their gifts, and benefiting in sundry other ways from royal patronage.

Yet the emergence of religious scholars also represented a multifaceted challenge to the ruling elite. For one thing, many scholars were willing to lend their support to trends and movements hostile to the political establishment. This was the case especially with those who came to be allied with various Shi'i groups in the late Umayyad and early Abbasid period. But even those not so allied were sometimes opposed to particular policies adopted by the caliphs and their officials, from unjust taxation to the failure to conform to the ideals and norms as they were being articulated in these scholarly circles. Quite apart from specific instances of scholarly disaffection, the fact that the scholars had come to represent an increasingly independent locus of authority in Muslim society was a cause of much apprehension on the part of the ruling elite. It was independent in the sense that, unlike the judges appointed by the state, the scholars did not need authorization from the caliph to do their work, for example, responding to people's queries on matters of law, interpreting the Qur'an, collecting hadith reports, and engaging in theological debates. From the mid-eighth century onward, the scholars also began defining the position of the caliph in such a way that it lacked any privileged authority in religious as opposed to political matters.

The most serious challenge to the increasing influence of the 'ulama', as represented by the scholars of hadith, came from the Abbasid caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33). Toward the end of his reign he instituted an "inquisition" (the mihna) requiring the scholars to affirm the "createdness" of the Qur'an. Though ostensibly intended to guard the cardinal Islamic doctrine of the oneness of God against any coeternal competitors, hence the caliph's insistence that the Qur'an be regarded as the created rather than uncreated (and, by implication, eternal) word of God, this ingenious test is better seen as an effort to put the increasingly assertive scholars in their place by affirming the caliph's prerogative to articulate correct beliefs. The mihna eventually was terminated during the reign of caliph Mutawakkil (r. 847–61), its end signaling caliphal recognition of the 'ulama' collectively as the authoritative guardians of the evolving religious tradition. The caliph was scarcely divested of "religious" functions with the end of the mihna, however. One of the primary functions, and justifications, of government was, after all, the upholding of the shari'a; several influential jurists writing on government stipulated that the caliph should be knowledgeable in matters of the law to the rank of a scholar capable of arriving at independent legal opinions (ijtihad). Irrespective of whether these jurists seriously expected the caliphs to have such legal expertise, stipulations of this sort suggest the degree to which the scholars had come to define what constituted legitimate political authority as well as the centrality of their own vocation to all Islamic matters.

The 'ulama' also wrote themselves into medieval constitutional theory by stipulating that they were the people responsible, either exclusively or together with other notables, for choosing the ruler. In practice, of course, the 'ulama' had little say in who ruled the polity and, in keeping with their generally quietist politics, the jurists studiously avoided discussing the mechanisms through which a corrupt, incompetent, or irreligious ruler should be removed from office. Yet this quietism did not quite extend to the degree where the ruler could necessarily take the 'ulama' for granted. The ruling elite needed political legitimacy, which came not from popular will or good governance but rather, in considerable measure, from the allegiance of the religious scholars. Moreover, as observed by Jonathan Berkey, given the fact that the medieval political and military ruling classes often had shallow roots in the societies over which they ruled, the 'ulama', with much deeper local roots, could serve as a constraint of sorts on the arbitrary exercise of power even as they helped mediate between the ruling elite and their subjects. Nor, by the same token, did the scholars' concern with political stability mean that they were necessarily wedded to a particular ruler: a successful challenger to an existing regime could very well receive the same endorsement from the scholars as had his predecessor. As Khaled Abou El Fadl has shown, many medieval jurists also argued that while it was wrong to rebel against constituted political authority, Muslim rebels did nonetheless have political rights. They were not to be treated by the rulers in the manner of mere brigands but rather as people with an "interpretation," albeit an incorrect one, that had led them to adopt a particular course of action. Such reasoning was not merely an effort to distinguish wrongheaded Muslim rebels from either the brigands or the non-Muslim foes; it was also an implicit warning to the rulers that the jurists' quietist worldview could nonetheless countenance an alternative to the existing political dispensation.

Inasmuch as they sought to exercise some degree of restraint on the political elite, the jurists, and the 'ulama' in general, remained vulnerable to political pressure and influence. This made for an often tense relationship between the religious and the political elite. The social institutions and the scholarly culture of the 'ulama' do nonetheless seem to have served them well in trying to safeguard the space they had been carving out for themselves since the ninth century. For instance, the institution of the waqf, or the charitable endowment, was understood as existing in perpetuity, so that, even when established by members of the ruling elite, it was expected to be rather more resistant to political interference than might have been the case otherwise. It was such waqf endowments that helped sustain Islamic institutions of learning, the madrasas, which had begun to appear in Muslim societies in the late 11th century.

Religious scholarship also made for a remarkable cosmopolitanism in the world of the 'ulama': for all their local roots, many among the 'ulama' traveled widely and, despite the limitations of a manuscript culture, their work could enjoy broad recognition. Among other things, this cosmopolitanism served again to limit the degree to which the ruling elite could regulate, even when so inclined, the activities and discourses of the 'ulama'. The very nature of the scholarly tradition of the 'ulama' was, furthermore, resistant to political encroachment. With the veritable canonization of particular collections of hadith reports and with the crystallization of their schools of law, complete with their agreed-upon methods and their authoritative norms, the scholars were keen not to leave the door ajar for political manipulation of their tradition. Contrary to how Muslim modernists as well as an earlier generation of Western observers viewed the medieval Islamic scholarly tradition, mechanisms for rethinking legal norms and adapting them to changing needs did continue to exist. For their part, the rulers were seldom at a loss in finding pliant scholars who would endorse this or that measure. Nonetheless, in constructing an elaborate scholarly tradition and anchoring their identity and authority in it, the 'ulama' sought to guard it from political and other vicissitudes. To the extent that the 'ulama' can be seen as a key component of a public sphere in medieval Islamic societies, their scholarly tradition and attendant sociореligious roles were crucial to it.

A significant exception to the pattern of 'ulama'-state relations discussed here is represented by their position in the Ottoman Empire. The Ottoman 'ulama' comprised a veritable religious establishment that was headed by the shaykh al-Islam (the grand mufti) who belonged, as did the sultans, to the Hanafi school of law. The close identification of the 'ulama' with the state carried important dividends: their leading madrasas were richly endowed, the Hanafis comprised the dominant school even in regions whose Muslim inhabitants belonged to other schools of law, and the shaykh al-Islam was one of the most powerful officials in the empire. The close relationship with the political elite also had very considerable costs, however: in the 17th and early 18th centuries, as Madeline Zilfi has noted, no fewer than three shaykhs al-Islam were executed, and others came close to that fate. And the demise of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century meant that the fate of the Ottoman religious establishment, too, was sealed.

The 'Ulama' in the Modern World

The 'ulama' have faced major challenges in all Muslim societies since the 19th century. Among the most significant was the onset of European colonial rule, which, in many cases, spelled the end of Muslim political authority. While many among the 'ulama' had maintained their distance from the governing elite, they depended on the government for the upholding of Islamic law. The sultan did not need to be virtuous for the 'ulama' to serve as judges in his administration or to attend to various aspects of intellectual and religious life in society. The advent of colonial rule jeopardized the practice of Islamic law as never before, however. With the establishment of British colonial rule in India, for instance, the scope of Islamic law was gradually reduced to matters of personal status (e.g., marriage, divorce, and inheritance), which is what the "shari'a" came to mean in British India. But even this limited body of Islamic law was administered by judges who were usually non-Muslim. The judges based their decisions on a small set of "authoritative" Islamic legal texts, but they did so while being guided by norms of English common law. The 'ulama' tended to see the resulting jurisprudence—the "Anglo-Muhammadan law"—as nothing but a travesty of the shari'a. Many among them considered it illegitimate for people to have recourse to colonial courts even for such routine matters as the dissolution of a marriage, which meant further restrictions on the practice of Islamic law even in areas that the colonial administration had officially recognized.

Colonialism brought new institutions not just in the judicial realm but also, among others, in that of education. Even as many madrasas and related institutions declined with the drying up of earlier forms of financial patronage, not the least the disintegration of what had once been substantial waqf endowments, a new generation of Muslims began to be educated in modern institutions of Western learning. Such institutions had only limited space for Islamic learning. In part, this was because their raison d'être was to provide Muslims with the sort of education that would help them succeed in the colonial economy, and in part, it had to do with the highly critical stance the founders of such institutions adopted toward the traditionalist 'ulama', holding them responsible for the cultural and intellectual decline of Islam. But it also had to do with the 'ulama''s own suspicion of such modern institutions, which they saw not merely as trespassing on their territory—in this instance, education—but as yet another instrument of a colonial enterprise bent on the very destruction of Islam.

Despite the lack of any sustained formal training in the Islamic sciences, those educated in such modern institutions have had a keen interest in Islamic matters. But their engagement with Islam—as Muslim modernists, Islamists, and other new religious intellectuals—has been of a decidedly different sort than the manner in which the 'ulama' have tended to understand and interpret their religious tradition. By the same token, the products of these modern institutions of learning have often taken a dim view of the intellectual tradition of the 'ulama' and of their relevance, thus representing a serious challenge to the authority and social influence of the 'ulama'.

A related challenge has come from the fact that print and information technologies, in tandem with the impact of mass education, have made the sources of religious knowledge far more accessible to larger groups of people than had ever been the case before the early 20th century. The 'ulama' have never been a cohesive social or religious group and, despite considerable overlaps between "religious" and other forms of learning in medieval Islam, their claims to authority were sometimes vigorously contested by the philosophers, the Sufis, members of the urban cultural elite, and popular preachers, just as scholars of hadith and law might contest the claims of, say, the theologians. The degree to which modern Islam has seen what Dale Eickelman and James Piscatori have characterized as the "fragmentation" of religious authority is nonetheless unparalleled. Also unprecedented is the power and reach of the modern state, which has been far less willing to allow the 'ulama' to have the sort of social and religious autonomy that they had so jealously guarded in many premodern Muslim societies.

It was common for observers of Muslim societies in the mid- and late 20th century to assume that the 'ulama' had fared altogether badly in the face of such challenges. Adherents of modernization and secularization theories had little doubt that the 'ulama' and their institutions were mere relics of the past waiting to be swept aside by the forces of Westernization. They were not entirely wrong in this view. In Turkey under Atatürk, the institution of the shaykh al-Islam had been abolished, as noted earlier, and the madrasas and Sufi orders were closed down. In Morocco and Tunisia, long-established madrasas such as the Qarawiyyin in Fez and the Zaytuna in Tunis underwent radical transformations at the behest of the ruling elite. So did Azhar University in Egypt: the reforms of 1961, representing a culmination of decades of governmental effort at regulation, sought simultaneously to transform this venerable seat of Sunni learning into a modern university (with faculties of Arabic and Islamic studies now part of a much broader educational mandate) and to make it more fully subservient to the government. Even in Iran, where the 'ulama' and their madrasas were considerably freer of state regulation than they were in many Sunni countries because of structures of religious authority peculiar to Shi'ism, the 'ulama"s institutions saw sharp decline under the Pahlavi dynasty.

The Iranian Revolution (1978–79) was a major corrective to conventional wisdom. A seemingly strong and Westernized regime was overthrown by a massive movement that was not merely suffused with a religious idiom but also led by traditionally educated religious scholars, who then proceeded to occupy a prominent place in the Islamic Republic. Together with developments in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan, Egypt, and elsewhere in the Muslim world, the Iranian Revolution helped draw the attention of scholars, policy analysts, and other observers to Islamism. Yet given that Sunni Islamists have tended to be drawn not from the ranks of the 'ulama' but rather from those of the college- and university-educated, a recognition of the limits of modernization theories did not immediately translate into attention to the 'ulama' and their institutions in Sunni societies. It has come to be increasingly recognized, however, that Sunni 'ulama' — and the 'ulama' in general — continue to be an important facet of Muslim politics and the public sphere and that it is difficult to understand contemporary Islam in all its complexity without serious attention to them.

Some of the very forces that posed severe challenges to the 'ulama' and, in many cases, marginalized them have, paradoxically, served to bring them back into prominence. The onset of colonial rule in India goaded the establishment not only of the Westernizing Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College (later Aligarh Muslim University) in 1875 but also, a few years earlier, of a new madrasa in the North Indian town of Deoband. While the founders of the Aligarh college wanted Muslims to effectively compete with their Hindu compatriots by learning the language and the ways of the new rulers, those of the Deoband madrasa sought to defend Muslim identity through a renewed focus on Islamic learning. Unlike earlier institutions of Islamic learning in India and elsewhere, the Deoband madrasa was sustained not by the support of rich and powerful patrons but rather by the donations of ordinary people. Though admitting of different permutations, this pattern was followed by other institutions throughout South Asia and beyond. "Deobandi" madrasas — so called because they adhere to a shared approach to Islam anchored in the study of hadith and Hanafi law — now number in the tens of thousands, though significant numbers of madrasas belonging to other doctrinal orientations also dot the religious landscape in South Asia.

While mass education and print and information technologies have made it possible for people to access normative religious texts on their own, unaided by the 'ulama', and to compete with the 'ulama' in the production of religious discourse, the very same developments have also enabled the 'ulama' to disseminate their writings in new ways and to reach new audiences. Though many among the 'ulama' have resisted governmental efforts to open up their madrasas and related institutions to modern, secular learning, they have come to benefit from such learning as well. At Azhar University in Cairo, as Malika Zeghal has shown, the opening of new faculties devoted to the modern sciences has contributed to the ability of at least some 'ulama' to interact with greater facility with college- and university-educated Islamists than would otherwise have been the case. Some of the most influential of the contemporary 'ulama' — for example, Muhammad Taqi 'Uthmani (b. 1943) of Pakistan and the Egyptian religious scholar Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), who moved to the oil-rich Persian Gulf emirate of Qatar in the early 1960s — have come to base their authority not only on a demonstrated mastery of the Islamic tradition but also on their putative ability to make it relevant to contemporary circumstances, which, in turn, is recognized as depending on their understanding of the modern world. The prominence Qaradawi enjoyed in the early years of the 21st century had to do, in considerable measure, with his dexterous use of the Internet and satellite television, together with the opportunities made available long ago by print, to reach multiple audiences well beyond the Arab Middle East.

Notwithstanding the challenges posed by the modern state to the autonomy of the 'ulama', the ability of individual governments to regulate their institutions has also varied significantly. There is a marked contrast, for instance, between successful governmental efforts toward integrating Islamic institutions of learning into the educational mainstream in Indonesia and the halting and far from effective attempts of successive Pakistani governments to do the same. In Egypt, for its part, the ability of an authoritarian regime to make Azhar University amenable to its will has come at the cost of having to cede oversight of the religious public sphere to it, sometimes at considerable international embarrassment to a regime keen to project a "liberal" image.

Fragmentation and Rearticulations of Authority

The discourses and practices of the 'ulama' have been subject to significant countervailing pressures in modern Islam, revealing—as might be expected for a still-active scholarly community with deep roots in history—elements of both continuity and change. In many cases, the most distinctive of their institutions, the madhhab, has tended to decline in terms of the authority it carries over the lives of the people, even as new institutions and practices have continued to emerge in efforts to standardize belief and practice in new ways. For a millennium since their beginnings in the ninth century, the *madhhab*s have provided the normative legal framework in which the Sunnis (and Shi'is) have led their lives. Since the late 19th century, the 'ulama' tied to particular schools of law have been fiercely challenged by those who seek to base all belief and practice squarely on the foundational texts—the Qur'an and the normative example of the Prophet—as well as the practices of Islam's first generations (the salaf), rather than on the agreed-upon doctrines of the medieval schools. The Salafis, as these putative adherents of the forebears style themselves, have differed much among themselves. They include those who have sought to rethink particular norms in the conviction that "true" Islam, as enshrined in the Qur'an and the practices of the first Muslims, can be shown to be in much greater accord with modern liberal sensibilities than it is with traditional religious practices. But the Salafis also include those who reject a good deal of the ideas, practices, and institutions characteristic of the modern world on grounds of their perceived incompatibility with the foundational texts. Either way, the Salafi view that Muslims should follow the unalloyed teachings of the foundational texts and the example of the pious forebears rather than the doctrines and hermeneutical approaches of the medieval schools of law has had considerable resonance in many Muslim circles, and it has done much to undermine the authority of the madhhab. So have the legislative initiatives of the modern state, given that modern Islamic legislation and codifications of the law have tended to draw on the resources of the schools of law as a whole rather than those limited to any particular madhhab.

It would nonetheless be an exaggeration to conclude that the schools of law have ceased to matter much in contemporary Islam. In some regions, notably South Asia, most Muslims still identify themselves as Hanafis—that is, as adherents of the Hanafi school of law; it is as Hanafi scholars that Deobandis, and many other Sunni scholars, articulate their claims to authority in this region. Even in contemporary Saudi Arabia, a Salafi orientation toward the foundational texts tends to be combined with a continuing reliance on the norms of the Hanbali school of law. Yet the schools of law carry less overarching authority than they did a century ago, even in regions whose inhabitants continue to adhere to them, with the result that the 'ulama', whose authority was long tied to the madhhab, have had to look for alternative loci of authority.

These alternatives have assumed many forms, but common to them is the tendency toward a new institutionalization of authority. Building on previous juridical hierarchies, the Dar al-Ifta' al-Misriyya (The Egyptian Organization for Granting Legal Opinions) was established in Egypt in 1895 as a way of both standardizing the issuing of juridical opinions and giving them an official imprimatur. In India, the Deoband madrasa had established its own Dar al-Ifta' two years prior to the Egyptian namesake. In more recent decades, a number of "fiqh academies" have been established to provide forums for collective deliberation on matters of Islamic law (fiqh). Some, notably the International Islamic Fiqh Academy in Jeddah, Saudi Arabia (established in 1983 under the auspices of the Organization of the Islamic Conference), brings together scholars from the Muslim world at large. Others, such as India's Islamic Fiqh Academy (founded in 1989), are limited to one country, though it, too, seeks to foster ties with scholars elsewhere. More recent institutional ventures include the European Council for Fatwa and Research, founded in 1997 under the leadership of Qaradawi with a view to providing legal guidance to increasingly substantial numbers of Muslims living in Europe, as well as the International Union of Muslim Scholars, founded in 2004 with Qaradawi again as its founding president.

Though such institutions do not necessarily seek to supplant the madhhab—the Dar al-Ifta' of Deoband is the juridical arm of the Hanafi madrasa, and even members of transnational fiqh academies are not required to relinquish their legal affiliations—they do occupy some of the space that the school of law would have inhabited, and often still does, for its adherents. They are equally a facet of the increasing standardization of religious norms and practices that have been witnessed not just in Islam but also, as C. A. Bayly has observed, in many other religious traditions in the modern world. In medieval Islam the madhhab—and the expectation that all but the most distinguished jurists would adhere strictly to its established norms and methods (a practice known as taqlīd)—had itself represented efforts toward standardization of doctrine. While standardization and institutionalization are not new to the culture of the 'ulama', they have come to assume distinctive forms in the modern world.

Another expression of this standardization is an increasing interest in the idea of collective fatwas and, indeed, of "collective ijtihād." While ijtihād has long been viewed as the exercise of an individual jurist's mental faculties and legal acumen to arrive at new rulings on matters not hitherto regulated by the foundational texts, the 20th century has seen increasing initiatives toward making this a collective venture. In part, this is an effort to answer rhetorical objections of those among the 'ulama' who have long opposed ijtihād on the grounds both that their abilities did not match those of their incomparably more learned predecessors and that encouraging possibilities of ijtihād would open the door to willful manipulation of the sacred law in an age of rampant intellectual and moral decline. Against such objections, still not without resonance in particular circles, collective ijtihād offers the possibility of pooling together the resources of scholars who would supposedly be inadequate on their own but are more credible as a collective. By the same token, it is also a very visible effort to bring together traditionally educated religious scholars and "experts" in modern, secular domains, underscoring the oft-repeated claim that Islam can provide guidance on all matters, including those that go well beyond the traditional religious expertise of the 'ulama'. In recent years, particular regimes have also sought to encourage collective, quasi-official venues of fatwas as a means of reining in the diverse voices in the public sphere and, increasingly, in cyberspace.

Yet modern initiatives toward standardization and institutionalization—sometimes as a way of facilitating state regulation of Islam and sometimes as a way of resisting it—often exist side by side with an increasing fragmentation of authority, with the 'ulama''s assertions and interpretations being questioned by ever-increasing numbers of educated men and women in light of their own access to the foundational texts and their diverse bodies of knowledge. The 'ulama' themselves are to be found on both sides, sometimes simultaneously. Thus even as many jurists among them are part of institutional forums of collective ijtihād and of collective fatwas, some of the very same scholars continue to issue fatwas on their own individual authority as well. Standardization and institutionalization, on the one hand, and individualization and fragmentation, on the other, have continued to shape the discourses, practices, and institutions of the 'ulama' as well as their claims to authority. As much as they would have liked it to be the case, the 'ulama' of medieval Muslim societies were scarcely unchallenged in their claims to authority. Such challenges have only grown in range and intensity in modern and contemporary Islam. Yet they have not necessarily marginalized the 'ulama', and, in local, regional, and global contexts, many among them have continued to lay claim to, and not unsuccessfully compete with others for, authority and influence within and outside the religious sphere.

See also authority: fundamentalism; jurisprudence; knowledge; shari'a; shaykh al-Islam

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; Aziz Ahmad, "The Role of Ulema in Indo-Muslim History," Studia Islamica 31 (1970); C. A. Bayly, The Birth of the Modern World, 1780–1914, 2004; Peri Bearman et al., eds., The Islamic School of Law, 2005; Jonathan Berkey, The Formation of Islam, 2003; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph: Religious Authority in the First Centuries of Islam, 1986; Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Muslim Politics, 1996; Wael B. Hallaq, The Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Sherman Jackson, Islamic Law and the State: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Shihab al-din al-Qarafi, 1996; George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges, 1981; Barbara D. Metcalf, Islamic Revival in British India: Deoband, 1860–1900, 1982; Stefan Reichmuth, The World of Murtada al-Zabidi (1732–91): Life, Networks and Writings, 2009; Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen, Defining Islam for the Egyptian State: Muftis and Fatwas of the Dār al-Iftā, 1997; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, "The Ulama and Contestations on Religious Authority," in Islam and Modernity: Key Issues and Debates, edited by M. K. Masud et al., 2009; Idem, The Ulama in Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change, 2002; Malika Zeghal, Gardiens de l'Islam: Les ulama d'al-Azhar dans l'Egypte contemporaine, 1995; Madeline C. Zilfi, The Politics of Piety: The Ottoman Ulema in the Post-Classical Age (1600–1800), 1988.

MUHAMMAD QASIM ZAMAN

'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (ca. 680–720)

Despite a very short caliphate (717–20), 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz ('Umar II) occupies a specific place in the Islamic tradition. Although the Umayyads were generally portrayed negatively in Abbasid historiography, 'Umar II is remembered as a moral exemplar and a truly pious caliph.

Prior to his caliphate, 'Umar served as governor of Medina for more than five years (706–12) during the caliphate of al-Walid b. 'Abd al-Malik (r. 705–15). Although he was eventually dismissed from office under the pressure of the powerful governor of Iraq, Hajjaj b. Yusuf (d. 714), 'Umar notably supervised the expansion of the Prophet's Mosque in Medina at the caliph's request and governed the city in close collaboration with the Medinan religious scholars and jurists (fuqahā'), with whom he developed strong links. He became the eighth Umayyad caliph under rather murky circumstances, as he was designated a successor by Sulayman b. 'Abd al-Malik (r. 715–17), perhaps under the influence of his éminence grise, Raja' b. Haywa (d. 730). Sulayman's decision generated profound discontent among the sons of 'Abd al-Malik, especially Hisham, who wanted to keep the caliphate in their father's lineage, thus revealing the intense competition between the various branches of the Umayyad family.

'Umar II's first decision as caliph was to recall from the field Maslama b. 'Abd al-Malik, who had embarked, at Sulayman's orders, on a disastrous siege of Constantinople. He also seems to have considered recalling other Muslim armies, as in the case of recently conquered Spain, for instance, before abandoning this project. This has often been interpreted in modern scholarship as an attempt by 'Umar II to end Muslim expansion. The picture, however, is more complicated. For although his caliphate witnessed an imperial contraction, 'Umar II sent troops against the Turks and the Khariji rebels in Iraq and continued the practice of annual summer campaigns against Byzantium.

'Umar II's fiscal policies are symptomatic of the main challenges faced by the Umayyad caliphate at the time—namely, finding new sources of income to compensate for the slowing down of the conquests and taking into account the expectations of new Muslim converts, who were eager to be placed on an equal footing with long-established Muslims. Particularly noteworthy from this perspective is a famous but obscure document attributed to 'Umar II, his so-called fiscal rescript, in the form it is preserved in Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam's (d. 815) later biography of the caliph. This text has generated varying interpretations, but its authenticity has not been questioned. It makes clear that 'Umar II tried to increase the state's resources, notably by reassessing the status of lands and the taxes due on them and by giving a moral dimension to the government. At the same time, the caliph was intent on improving the situation of new converts. He therefore decided to grant them the same fiscal status as that of their fellow Muslims, even though this could increase the incentive to conversion and lead to a reduction in state revenue. And, in fact, the *dhimmī*s who converted to Islam during 'Umar II's caliphate were no longer required to pay the head tax (jizya). This placed significant pressure on non-Muslim communities, and Christian sources usually complain about 'Umar II's anti-Christian policies, even if his piety is duly acknowledged. Such fiscal policies were short-lived, however, as they were largely abandoned by his successors. On his way to Aleppo, 'Umar II died in 720 in Dayr Sim'an, where he was buried. The ruins of his tomb, of uncertain date, are still visible today, and occasionally attract some pilgrims and visitors.

As 'Umar II's policies departed significantly from previous Umayyad practice, he has been portrayed by some modern scholars, such as M. A. Shaban, as a "radical reformer." His image in Muslim and non-Muslim sources overall is quite fascinating. In the Muslim sources, he is depicted as the fifth Rightly Guided Caliph, a new 'Umar b. al-Khattab, and the model caliph in terms of piety, generosity, asceticism, and sense of justice—one who ardently tried to follow the example of the Prophet and his Companions. Indeed, 'Umar II played a significant role in the promotion of the Prophet's sunna and the sunna of his successors. This attitude generated strong opposition from the Qadaris, with whom 'Umar II had serious theological disagreements. 'Umar II is furthermore credited with playing a role in the recording of the Prophet's traditions (hadith), and a musnad is even attributed to him, although it is considered unreliable by hadith critics. 'Umar II is also famous for the pseudo-correspondence that he supposedly had with the Byzantine emperor Leo III (r. 717–41). Moreover, a large body of letters attributed to the caliph is also preserved in Muslim and Christian sources, and some of these have serious claims to authenticity.

'Umar II is portrayed in some Muslim sources as the Mahdi (eschatological savior) or the mujaddid (renewer) of the Muslim community, and some evidence suggests that he indeed viewed himself as such. This messianic status is closely connected with the fact that he was the caliph during the year 100 of the hijra, a year of intense apocalyptic expectations in the Islamic tradition. The same was apparently true of his predecessor Sulayman, who was expected to be the caliph in 100 AH but died before that year. 'Umar II's eschatological dimension is echoed in his nickname, al-ashajj, "the scarred one": he had been scarred as a consequence of an accident in his childhood, but that was subsequently viewed as a herald to his function as a renewer who fills the Earth with justice.

It would appear that 'Umar II's image was largely elaborated in the context of emerging Malikism relatively early, as of the eighth century. This is clearly seen in the elevated place he occupies in Malik b. Anas' (d. 795) Muwatta', as well as in the Sirat 'Umar ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, compiled by Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam, one of the architects of Malikism in Egypt. His image as an almost "holy" caliph is also very early: he is remembered as a very special person in both Muslim (Sunni and Shi'i alike, as he is praised by the latter for having stopped the practice of cursing 'Ali b. Abi Talib in the Friday sermons) and non-Muslim sources. Such a highly positive image may explain why, in the troubled aftermath of the Abbasid revolution, his grave was spared by the Abbasids, in contrast to the tombs of his fellow Umayyads.

See also 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); apocalypse; Mahdi; Malik b. Anas (712–95); Muhammad (570–632); Qadaris; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); Shi'ism; sunna; Sunnism; 'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644); Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

W. W. Barthold, "Caliph 'Umar II and the conflicting reports on his personality," Islamic Quarterly 15 (1971); Antoine Borrut, "Entre tradition et histoire: genèse et diffusion de l'image de 'Umar II," Mélanges de l'Université Saint-Joseph 58 (2005); Hamilton A. R. Gibb, "The Fiscal Rescript of 'Umar II," Arabica 2 (1955); Gerald R. Hawting, The First Dynasty of Islam: The Umayyad Caliphate, 2002; Robert G. Hoyland, "The Correspondence of Leo III (717–741) and 'Umar II (717–720)," Aram 6 (1994); M. A. Shaban, Islamic History: A New Interpretation, Vol. I: A.D. 600–750 (A.H. 132), 1971.

ANTOINE BORRUT

'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644)

A towering personality of nearly unrivaled stature in Sunni Islam, 'Umar b. al-Khattab influenced the institutions and creation of the early Islamic polity—both as a caliph and a prominent Companion of the Prophet. He is popularly known as al-Fārūq, a title traditionally interpreted to mean "he who distinguishes right from wrong." Arguably, due to his oversight of the earliest phases of the Islamic conquests outside peninsular Arabia, 'Umar's practical influence on the early Islamic polity can be seen to surpass even that of Muhammad himself. For posterity, 'Umar's formative role secured him the status of the incarnation of the ideal caliph, causing the many political leaders who succeeded him to associate their own practices with those of 'Umar.

Virtually no major political institution of the early Islamic polity lacks the mark of 'Umar's acute political strategy. This applies equally to the minutiae of Islamic civil and criminal law and the larger features of the Islamic polity, such as the institution of Islamic judiciary and the marking of time by the hijrī calendar, beginning with Muhammad's emigration (hijra) from Mecca and Medina in 622. Even the idea of the caliphate itself—especially as a linchpin institution uniting the entirety of the Muslim community (umma) and occupied exclusively by a member of the Prophet's tribe, the Quraysh—emerges out of the united efforts of Abu Bakr (d. 634), Abu 'Ubayda b. al-Jarrah (d. 639), and 'Umar to maintain the political unity of Muhammad's community in the wake of his death. As caliph, a position to which Abu Bakr appointed him before his own death in 634, 'Umar imparted to the burgeoning Islamic polity its essential features and oversaw the transformation of the Medinan polity from one mainly preoccupied with the challenges of incorporating the inhabitants of the Arabian Peninsula into a single polity to a state that conquered Byzantine Egypt and Syria in the West and considerable Sasanian territories in the East.

'Umar organized this enterprise of conquest principally on a meritocratic basis, leaning heavily on the prominent and capable emigrants (muhājirūn) who undertook the hijra from Mecca to Medina in 622. Preferring that the early Muslims not intermingle with the conquered populations, 'Umar stipulated to the early Qurashi commanders that they establish their own garrison cities (amṣār) so as to avoid diluting the nascent, and thus still vulnerable, ethos of the Islamic conquest polity. From the amṣār, the early Arabian conquerors lived as the collective recipients, rather than the managers, of a massive tax base consisting of land taxes (kharāj) and poll taxes (jizya) culled from the local, conquered populations. 'Umar, ostensibly basing his policy on earlier Sasanian models, distributed the wealth of these conquered lands through a system of regularized salaried pay ('aṭā') distributed according to a registry of warriors known as the dīwān. Within 'Umar's polity, the greatest political virtue and merit was that of precedence (sābiqa) in converting to Islam, and accordingly, one's pay rate ideally corresponded with how early one converted to Islam and participated in the conquests. From these newly settled garrison cities—Kufa and Basra in Iraq in particular, but also Fustat in Egypt, as well as other settlements postdating 'Umar's caliphate—there swiftly emerged among the conquerors a new Islamic elite that rivaled in political and religious influence the historically more entrenched tribal elites. It was a dynamic system that propelled the conquests, but it was also one with acute contradictions that would eventually contribute to the undoing of the caliphate of 'Umar's successor, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (d. 656).

'Umar's leadership throughout the entirety of this process emanated from distant Medina, which he allegedly never left, except for one trip to Syria circa 636–38 in order to oversee the conquest of Jerusalem. Although traditions concerning this event are complex and often contradictory, focus often falls on the origins of an important political document known variously as "the Treaty of 'Umar" ('ahd 'Umar) or "the Stipulations of 'Umar" (al-shurūṭ al-'umariyya), of which there exist many versions, resulting from 'Umar's negotiations with the local Christian inhabitants. This document has often been seen by Muslim legists as distilling the stipulations and restrictions to be placed on Jews, Christians, and other religious communities coexisting with Muslims in an Islamic state.

All of these accomplishments were no mean feat for a figure, even if known for his sternness, incorruptibility, and overpowering will, who began in Mecca as a person of little real political power. Although not among the first converts in Mecca, 'Umar did join the ranks of the believers in Muhammad's message at an early date, despite his initially strident and even violent opposition to the early movement. Tradition relates that his conversion transpired thanks in large part to his sister Fatima's prior conversion and to Muhammad's own prayers that God should strengthen Islam with 'Umar's support. Little evidence exists, however, for 'Umar's prominence in the Meccan period prior to the hijra, perhaps due to his lineage from a minor clan of the Quraysh, the 'Adi b. Ka'b. Upon his arrival in Medina, 'Umar was swift to place himself in a good position politically with the city's inhabitants through marriage alliances with locally prominent families. Sunni tradition highlights instances in which 'Umar's opinion on a matter presaged or prompted the revelation of Qur'anic verses—even when his opinions ran contrary to those of the Prophet himself. (Q. 2:125; 33:5; and 66:6 are the most famous, but tradition lists more than 30 other instances known as muwāfaqāt 'Umar.)

'Umar was a consummate political tactician without whom much of the success of the early Islamic conquests would probably not have taken place. The process, though not entirely under his control, was marked by his bold direction and his appointment and dismissal of its leaders. This is perhaps most observable in his unilateral discharge of Khalid b. al-Walid from command, indisputably the most effective and successful of all the military commanders of the Islamic polity. However, this can also be seen as his effort to marginalize the role and leadership of the Prophet's clan, the Banu Hashim, and particularly his son-in-law 'Ali b. Abi Talib, one of the many reasons for which Shi'is have historically reviled him and sought to diminish the prominence of his persona.

Glorious as it was, the caliphate of 'Umar ended bloodily and abruptly at the end of an assassin's blade. Tradition alleges that 'Umar foresaw the troubles to arise from the increased visibility and strength of non-Arab clients (mawālī; sing. mawlā) among the ranks of the early Islamic elite, particularly in the caliphal capital, Medina; indeed, his assassin was one such mawlā. He did not appoint his successor as Abu Bakr had done but instead bequeathed to his community one further institution: he transformed the pre-Islamic, Arabian consultative assembly, or shūrā, into a method for choosing the next caliph by appointing a quorum of prominent Qurashi Companions of the Prophet to choose the next caliph from among their own ranks.

See also caliph, caliphate; Companions of the Prophet; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); succession

Further Reading

Sean Anthony, "Dionysius of Tell Maḥre's Syriac Account of the Assassination of 'Umar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 69, no. 2 (2010); Heribert Busse, "'Omar's Image as the Conqueror of Jerusalem," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 8 (1986); Mark R. Cohen, "What Was the Pact of 'Umar? A Literary-Historical Study," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 23 (1999); Avraham Hakim, "'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and the Title Khalīfat Allāh," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 30 (2005); Tayeb El-Hibri, Parable and Politics in Early Islamic History: The Rashidun Caliphs, 2010; M. J. Kister, "Notes on an Account of the Shūrā Appointed by 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb," Journal of Semitic Studies 9, no. 2 (1964); Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad, 1997.

SEAN W. ANTHONY

Umayyads (661–750)

The Umayyads were a dynasty of caliphs who ruled the Muslim empire between 661 and 750. They descended from a clan of the Quraysh that had led the opposition to Muhammad in Mecca under the leadership of Abu Sufyan.

The Umayyads ruled from Damascus in Syria, as it was difficult to manage the conquered lands from Medina, the original capital in Arabia. They had to cope with enormous changes wrought by the conquests, notably the massive influx of new non-Arab members into the Muslim community, the divergent aspirations of Arab populations settled in different regions, significant regional priorities, a variety of religious communities that had been established before the conquests, and the political and economic consequences of these phenomena and processes. They tried to cope by centralizing their power, refining their governmental system, and establishing a professional army. Their measures brought some short-term solutions, but in the process they enhanced the erosion of the positions of Arab tribal chiefs, the rivalries among tribal groups, and the emergence of religious leadership, all of which eventually contributed to their demise.

The beginning and the end of Umayyad rule were effected through civil wars. After the Prophet Muhammad had died in 632, four of his Companions succeeded one another as caliphs, assuming office through various mechanisms, including appointment and election (632–61). Three of these four caliphs, known as the Rightly Guided Caliphs, were assassinated, and a civil war (656–61) effectively brought Mu'awiya, the first Umayyad caliph, to power in 660. Hoping to prevent additional civil wars and eager to perpetuate Umayyad power, Mu'awiya introduced hereditary succession (from father to son, brother to brother, or between more distant relatives) that was put into practice by two branches of the Umayyad dynasty: first the Sufyanids (661–84) and then the Marwanids (684–750). This measure, as well as other policies carried out by Mu'awiya, raised opposition that challenged Umayyad authority. Upon the death of Mu'awiya (680), civil war broke out, first on a small scale on the accession of his son and then more generally in 684. The Marwanids assumed power, putting an end to the civil war in 692 yet not to the continued rivalry of Arab tribal groups (the Qays and Kalb in particular). In 750, the Abbasid revolution put an end to Umayyad rule and made hereditary succession the norm for their rule of the Muslim empire.

In spite of the enormous internal challenges, the Umayyads succeeded in expanding the Arab-Muslim empire they founded, westward and eastward, across North Africa into Spain and across the Iranian plateau into Central Asia and India. They established effective ways of administration for the vast empire by appointing enterprising governors in the heart of the newly conquered regions and managed to integrate whole blocks of newly attracted ethnic groups into its polity. The height of Umayyad power became symbolized by the magnificent and triumphal Dome of the Rock they had erected on the temple precinct of Jerusalem in 691.

The Abbasids portrayed their predecessors as oppressors of Muslims and transgressors against Islam. This propaganda influenced much of Muslim scholarship and subsequently many modern scholars, which characterizes the Umayyads as purely political, and even secular-minded, Arab rulers who turned khilāfa or imāma, the rule of the Rightly Guided Caliphs, into mulk, Arab kingship. However, whatever their personal piety or impiety, the Umayyads' position was not purely political but on the contrary conceived religiously as the deputyship of God. Speeches and letters by these caliphs, as well as panegyrics by their poets and officials, especially from the reigns of 'Abd al-Malik (r. 684–705) onward, show that the Umayyads saw history as revolving around obedience to God's authority based on the Qur'an and the leadership of the Prophet Muhammad. Drawing on the Qur'an, they envisaged God as having been known to humankind from the beginning of history through prophets and messengers He had sent to communicate His will. The first of these prophets was Adam, the very first man created by God, but humanity erred time and again. God repeatedly sent prophets to deliver His message and establish communities of believers, but these always erred in their turn. This cycle of error and amendment ended with Islam. Muhammad came to be seen as the seal of the prophets and his successors, the caliphs, as God's deputies, entrusted with interpreting, implementing, and protecting the religion as well as managing the affairs of God's community so that it would not err. Each caliph was seen as directly chosen by God to serve as His agent, though in practice he had received his office from his predecessor or through civil war.

At the same time the caliphs presented themselves as heirs to the Prophet Muhammad, upholding his legacy and following his tradition. The Umayyads thus saw themselves as both political and religious leaders, and although they carried no prophetic message, they conceived of themselves as the interpreters of the sacred law, laying down rules to meet new problems and situations. Obeying the Umayyads and their laws was tantamount to obeying God and became the only way to ensure the right implementation of God's religion on Earth. To explain why God should choose His deputies from among the Umayyads, the caliphs stressed their kinship with the Rightly Guided Caliph 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56), claiming that he had been a legitimate caliph and unjustly slain. Since the Rightly Guided Caliphs had derived their authority from their Companionship with the Prophet, the first Umayyads also stressed that they had been close to him, although their clan had in fact opposed him until the end of his life. The main sources of Umayyad legitimacy thus were their deputyship of God, their closeness to the Prophet, and their kinship with 'Uthman.

See also civil war; Mu'awiya (602–80); succession

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought [American title God's Rule], 2004; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph, 1986; Gerald Hawting, The First Dynasty of Islam: The Umayyad Caliphate AD 661–750, 1986; Wadad Kadi, "The Religious Foundation of Late Umayyad Ideology," in Saber Religioso y Poder Politico, edited by Manuela Marin and Mercedes Garcia-Arenal, 1994; Uri Rubin, "Caliphs and Prophets," in Method and Theory in the Study of Islamic Origin, edited by Herbert Berg, 2003; Moshe Sharon, "The Umayyads as ahl al-bayt," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 14 (1991).

ELLA LANDAU-TASSERON

usurper

"Usurper" is a Western term rendering a variety of Arabic expressions for an illegitimate ruler. In the first two centuries (ca. 650–850), the Arabic term was normally "king" (malik) as opposed to "imam," the latter being a ruler who conformed to the requirements of the law by being a member of Muhammad's tribe (or closer family, according to the Shi'is, or anyone, according to the Kharijis and others), distinguished by certain characteristics including greater virtue than anyone else, and who was the ruler of the entire Muslim world endowed with the titles of caliph and commander of the faithful. The usurper was a person or, more commonly, an entire dynasty that had wrongfully assumed the caliphal position or taken control of some part of the Muslim world without the caliph's consent. Thus the Umayyad caliphs (661–750), especially Mu'awiya (r. 661–80), the first Umayyad ruler, are said to have turned the imamate into mere kingship by having assumed a position to which they had never been entitled or by unjust and tyrannical behavior. "Kingship" conjured up arbitrary government in accordance with private interests (ahwā'), as opposed to faithful adhesion to God's law, representing the interests of the community at large, and it was considered to have been characteristic of the Byzantines and Persians before the rise of Islam whom the Muslims had come to replace.

In the Abbasid period (750–1258), the problem was more commonly rulers who had taken control of some part of the Muslim world by military might (ghalaba, qahr, istīlā'), such as the Buyids (945–1055) or Seljuqs, and who called themselves kings (in a flattering sense), amirs, or sultans. There was a fair amount of juristic agonizing over their constitutional position among the Sunnis, though it was clear that they had to be accepted as legitimate in the simple sense of falling within the purview of the shari'a so that they could be seen as bound by it. The rulers themselves often regularized their status by seeking, and usually receiving, recognition by the caliph.

The Imami Shi'is differed in that their doctrine of the imamate made it impossible for them, until recent times, to bestow technical legitimacy on any rulers other than their own imams, of whom only one ('Ali b. Abi Talib) had been caliph in actual fact and the last of whom was deemed to have gone into hiding in 874. But the significance (or even the truth) of this point is often disputed. The Imamis certainly did not have any doubt that actual rulers were required, however illegitimate they might be in strictly legal terms. How far rulers were considered legitimate, in the broader sense of their ability to uphold the ideals of the community, seems to have depended largely on their behavior, in the eyes of Sunnis and Imamis alike.

Rebels taking over by force from noncaliphal rulers were not normally seen as usurpers but simply as men raised up (and eventually deposed) by God as he wished. They might still be denounced as oppressors, but when, in a highly unusual case in 1095, an oppressive king of Samarqand was taken to court and executed, the charge was not of tyranny but rather of apostasy. The extreme solution to illegitimate government known in the Western political tradition as tyrannicide (i.e., killing a ruler whose behavior violated the common conception of the law) was endorsed only by the Kharijis, who identified their own ancestors as those Muslims who had killed the unrighteous (zālim) caliph 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56), and by some Mu'tazilis. A great many rulers met a violent end but not usually at the hands of subjects taking the law into their own hands.

See also authority; Shi'ism; succession; Sunnism

Further Reading

Norman Calder, "Legitimacy and Accommodation in Safavid Iran: The Juristic Theory of Muhammad Bāqir al-Sabzavārī (d. 1090/1679)," Iran 25 1987; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought [American title God's Rule], 2004; Tilman Nagel, Staat und Glaubengesellschaft im Islam, 1981.

PATRICIA CRONE

'Uthman b. 'Affan (ca. 579–656)

The third of the four Rightly Guided Caliphs, 'Uthman b. 'Affan's caliphate began after his election by a shūrā (consultative) council of six Qurashi Companions, whom his predecessor, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644), appointed as he lay dying. 'Uthman was an early Companion of the Prophet, and his personal wealth, meticulous dress, and graceful manner garnered him a reputation as a man of finesse rather than a man of hard-boiled military grit and religious austerity like his peers and rivals. 'Uthman's caliphate lasted 12 years (644–56) but ended traumatically when he was assassinated in Medina. His death marks both the first regicide of a Muslim leader at Muslim hands and the inauguration of the First Islamic Civil War (fitna). The civil war ensuing after his death was largely between the faction that considered 'Uthman a martyr killed unjustly (maẓlūm) and the faction that reviled 'Uthman as a lax ruler who had forfeited his right to the leadership of the community by his many misdeeds (aḥdāth) or as the usurper of 'Ali b. Abi Talib's (d. 661) right and, therefore, was justly killed as a wrongdoer (ẓālim). These two warring factions, the pro-'Uthmanis (represented by Mu'awiya [d. 680] in Syria and Talha b. 'Ubayd, Zubayr b. 'Awwam, and 'A'isha bt. Abi Bakr in the Hijaz) and the pro-'Alids/Hashimids, or Shi'at 'Ali (represented by 'Ali and his supporters in Iraq and Egypt), are the earliest ancestors of three major sectarian divisions of Islam: Sunnism, Shi'ism, and Kharijism/Ibadism. Mu'awiya's victory over the Hashimid party in 661 marked the dynastic ascendance of 'Uthman's clan, the Umayyads, who dominated the caliphate until 750.

Historians have often interpreted 'Uthman's election by the shūrā as rooted not so much in his proven capacity for leadership in relation to the other candidates—for in this quality he was lacking—but rather his status as the Prophet's son-in-law. 'Uthman had married two of the Prophet's daughters, Ruqayya and Umm Kulthum (hence his nickname Dhū al-Nūrayn, "the possessor of the two lights"). 'Uthman's marriages thus rendered him the most capable counterweight to 'Ali b. Abi Talib, the figurehead of Muhammad's clan, the Banu Hashim, whose influence the other participants in the shūrā sought to mitigate. His victory over 'Ali accorded him unparalleled status as the first caliph chosen by a consensus of his peers—Abu Bakr's so-called election was regarded as just but, nonetheless, an ad hoc maneuver (falta) hardly worth repeating—and this status seems to have instilled within him a profound sense of divine election as well. This notion comes to the fore in the subsequent attribution to him, almost certainly after his death, of the title of God's caliph (khalīfat Allāh) and his belief that the caliphate was a garment (qamīṣ) with which God had clothed him.

Commensurate with 'Uthman's high conception of his caliphal office were his numerous efforts to effectuate a modicum of centralized authority as the Medinan polity adapted to the postconquest phase of consolidating its holdings in the provinces in Iraq, Syria, and Egypt. The contradictions this entailed, balancing centralized authority and the Arab tribemen's desire for local autonomy in the provinces, embroiled his caliphate in conflict. Most emblematic of this was 'Uthman's codification of the Qur'anic text, from which all present-day Qur'ans ostensibly derive, whereby he established a Medinan codex (muṣḥaf) and ordered for rival codices, particularly those in Iraq, to be burned and eliminated. Although he did so at the cost of alienating the Qur'an readers (qurrā')—the new piety-minded Islamic elite who would later lead the call for his abdication—this achievement, if it is indeed to be accorded the historical weight given to it by the Muslim sources, certainly proved to be his most important contribution, inasmuch as it has provided the perennial basis for Muslim identity and faith across sectarian divides until this day.

Traditionally divided into two six-year divisions, one good and the other bad, 'Uthman's caliphate initially enjoyed prosperity and success in the first Muslim naval defeat of the Byzantines at the Battle of the Masts, the conquest of the final Sasanian province, and the execution of their last shah, Yazdegerd III (d. 651). However, the era of sweeping conquests came to an end, and the second half of 'Uthman's caliphate, rife with internal dissent, entered a downward spiral. Although tradition attributes this decline to certain legendary incidents (e.g., 'Uthman's loss of the Prophet's signet ring in the well of Aris and the feigned conversion of the Jew 'Abdallah b. Saba' who plotted his downfall), the actual causes of political dissent during 'Uthman's caliphate emerged from policies and actions that alienated nearly every sector of the early umma to some degree.

Although the list of 'Uthman's misdeeds is long, the most controversial among them is the allegation of nepotism. The provincials' main grievances were directed against what seems to be 'Uthman's reversal of 'Umar's Islamic meritocracy, which had fostered leadership on the basis of Islamic precedence (sābiqa). In contrast, 'Uthman used the strength of tribal notables and appointed unscrupulous Umayyad kinsmen to positions of power across the empire. Exacerbating this reversal of policy, 'Uthman instituted a land exchange in which prominent Qurashi landholders granted their ancestral Hijazi properties to 'Uthman for the conquered crown lands of Iraq. The provincials opposed these measures insofar as these crown lands had, under 'Umar, served as the basis of their salary—'Uthman's land policy effectively converted their communal property into the private estates of tribal sharifs to whose largesse and good graces the provincials would subsequently be beholden. The Medinans, already separated by rival groups among the Companions of the Prophet, aligned themselves with various factions of the disaffected, and their opposition to the caliph deepened as a result of what they perceived to be 'Uthman's squandering of monies of the treasury on his personal interests and kinsmen, his laxity in religious observances, his severe beating and exile of outspoken critics, and his appointment of an uncle exiled by the Prophet as overseer of the markets in Medina. When the provincials from Iraq and Egypt marched on Medina to call for 'Uthman's abdication, these factors combined to form the perfect storm. The Egyptian faction, led by the first caliph's son Muhammad b. Abi Bakr (631–58), besieged the caliph's house on Juñe 17, 656, and murdered him virtually unimpeded.

See also caliph, caliphate; Companions of the Prophet; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); succession

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, "Shūrā as an Elective Institution," Quaderni di Studi Arabi 19 (2001); G. R. Hawting, "The Significance of the Slogan 'lā ḥukma illā lillāh' and the Reference to the 'Ḥudūd' in the Traditions about the Fitna and the Murder of 'Uthmān," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 41, no. 3 (1978); Martin Hinds, "Kūfan Political Alignments and Their Background in the Mid-Seventh Century A.D.," International Journal of Middle East Studies 2, no. 4 (1971); Idem, "The Murder of the Caliph 'Uthmān," International Journal of Middle East Studies 3, no. 4 (1972); R. Stephen Humphreys, trans., The Crisis of the Early Caliphate (The History of al-Ṭabarī, vol. 15), 1990; Idem, "Qur'anic Myth and Structure in Early Islamic Historiography," in Tradition and Innovation in Late Antiquity, edited by R. M. Clover and R. S. Humphreys, 1989; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muḥammad, 1997; Harald Motzki, "The Collection of the Qur'an: A Reconsideration of the Western Views in Light of Recent Methodological Developments," Der Islam 78 (2001).

SEAN W. ANTHONY

utopia

A Latinate construct coined by Sir Thomas More (d. 1535) to signal an impossible, ideal community, utopia is a category of analysis external to Islamic discourses. Depending on the social theories on which the scholar draws in describing Islamic political thought as "utopian," this term might carry a positive or negative valence, linked either to the history of European totalitarianism or the possibility of progressive change. A number of social phenomena and intellectual projects in Islamic history may be profitably understood as utopian.

Like Sir Thomas More, the Muslim philosopher Farabi (ca. 878–950) drew on Plato's Republic to depict a program for an ideal community in al-Madina al-Fadila (The virtuous city) and other political works, including al-Siyasa al-Madaniyya (Perfect political rule). Farabi's ideal city is defined by human cooperation with the aim of becoming virtuous and attaining happiness through the perfection of reason. While all citizens have some commonality in their idea of the good life, only a few can fully perfect the virtuous self. Farabi's recovery of Platonic and Aristotelian philosophical approaches was not merely an Islamic replication of earlier Greek works but instead an attempt to harmonize Greek philosophy with Islamic theories of divine law. Farabi's writings therefore formed an influential source for much of later Islamic political thought, including middle-period works such as the Akhlaq-i Nasiri (The Nasirean Ethics) of Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (d. 1274) and, less directly, Ayatollah Khomeini's idea of the "rule of the jurist" (wilāyāt al-faqīh) in the 20th century.

While the majority of Muslims have drawn on the example of Muhammad and those following him as ethical exemplars, the Salafi reformists view the Sunni golden age as particularly exemplary. Drawing on the works of the Hanbali scholar Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), the Salafi movement of the 19th and 20th centuries called for a return to tradition, largely as represented by the first three generations of Muslims. In Islams and Modernities, Aziz al-Azmeh distinguishes between the historical utopia of the golden age as an exemplary model and the negation of history in utopian attempts to re-create that golden age. In Azmeh's reading, the utopianisms of radical Islamists or fundamentalists such as the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966) and the Pakistani Mawdudi (d. 1979) negate the passage of history entirely and impute the condition of jāhiliyya (the age of ignorance, preceding Muhammad's prophetic mission) to the present historical moment.

The final type of Islamic utopianism situates itself around the coming of the Islamic messiah or Mahdi. Though not solely attributable to Shi'i communities, scholars have focused on messianic utopianism in Shi'i Islam rather than in Sunni Islam. According to Twelver Shi'i doctrine, the Twelfth Imam disappeared in 874, and his occultation (ghayba) will last until the end of time, when he returns as the Mahdi. Throughout Shi'i history, both preceding the disappearance of the Twelfth Imam and following it, the death or disappearance of an imam has often been read as a sign of a coming apocalypse. As Said Amir Arjomand has argued, the assumption of authority by Shi'i jurists following the disappearance of the Twelfth Imam represents a rationalization of this cycle, though it was later disrupted with the rise of the Safavid dynasty. Shi'i Iranian movements of the 20th and 21st centuries have demonstrated messianic expectations as well, most notably in the identification of Ayatollah Khomeini as an imam but additionally in the Hujjatiyyeh movement and in Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's (2005–) chiliastic readings of his own presidency.

Messianic ideas appeared early in Islamic history in Sunni circles as well. While the term "Mahdi" does not appear in the Qur'an itself and signified a religiopolitical leader rather than messianic deliverer in the earliest period of Islam, movements during the Umayyad and Abbasid periods set the template for later discussions of the Mahdi. 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr's (d. 692) revolt against the Umayyads defined the typology of messianic figures for later Islam and became linked to the term "Mahdi" through pre-Abbasid Shi'i claims to rule, in particular those of Ibn al-Hanafiya (d. 700–701). Outside of specifically Shi'i theories of the imam's return, by the ninth century most Sunni Muslims had accepted the theory of a Mahdi as well. Although the figure never occupied a central place in Sunni scholastic discussions, numerous Sunni messianic movements appeared over the course of Islamic history. These Sunni movements generally emphasized the renewal of Islamic law—a notable contrast to claims for a new religious dispensation seen in Shi'i messianism. In the modern period, one Sunni messianic movement of particular importance was the 18th-century Sudanese Mahdis, led by Muhammad Ahmad al-Mahdi (d. 1885). The Sufi-inspired Mahdis fought off Turco-Eygptian rule and established a short-lived Islamic state from 1885 until the Anglo-Egyptian reconquest of 1898. Other significant Sunni movements of the late middle and modern periods include the Mahdi of Jawnpur (d. 1505) in India and Shehu Usman dan Fodio (d. 1817), along with numerous others, in West Africa.

See also Mahdi; messianism; revival and reform

Further Reading

Abbas Amanat, Apocalyptic Islam and Iranian Shi'ism, 2009; Said Amir Arjomand, The Shadow of God and the Hidden Imam: Religion, Political Order, and Societal Change in Shi'ite Iran, from the Beginning to 1890, 1984; Aziz al-Azmeh, Islams and Modernities, 2009; Muhsin Mahdi, Alfarabi and the Foundation of Islamic Political Philosophy, 2001; Vanessa Martin, Creating an Islamic State: Khomeini and the Making of a New Iran, 2003.

KATHLEEN FOODY

veil

The veil, also referred to as "hijab" or "purdah"—words that literally mean "curtain"—has various meanings in the Islamic context. In Sufism, for instance, it can refer to a barrier that interferes with a person's search for God. The terms are popularly used, however, to refer to women's seclusion in the private sphere or to a form of dress. This dress can take the form of a head scarf, but it can also cover other body parts through loose, enveloping garments worn on top of a woman's clothing. This entry focuses primarily on veiling as a form of dress.

Veiling and the seclusion of women have a pre-Islamic origin and a long history in the regions surrounding Arabia. These practices were institutionalized in Mesopotamia in order to make a distinction between "good women" and "bad women" in pre-Christian times and became a characteristic of the upper class in various cultures—such as the Hellenic, Christian, Persian, Byzantine—in the Mediterranean Middle East and beyond by the time of Islam's advent in Arabia. It also existed as a marker of social status in the urban areas of Arabia at this time.

Veiling initially was prescribed only for the Prophet Muhammad's wives, and later as a marker of all "believing women" in order to distinguish them from nonbelieving women so that they would not be harassed (Q. 33:59). The practice was largely limited to the Prophet's wives during his lifetime but became more widespread over time. Commonly suggested sociological reasons for veiling include the desire to emulate the Prophet's wives; the increased wealth of Arab families, who took pride in knowing that the women in their families no longer had to work outside the home; and Islam's spread into neighboring lands, where veiling already existed as a marker of social status.

For Muslims who see the veil as a religious symbol and a sign of piety, such sociological reasons are reductive and take attention away from the role religious faith plays in the adoption of this practice. A survey of ethnographic studies published between 1990 and 2010 strongly suggests, however, that to simply label the veil as a religious symbol simplifies a complex reality no less than arguments that draw solely upon sociological reasons. Paying attention to the sociopolitical context in which veiling occurs—both in a particular moment and across time—is essential to bring out the multiple meanings of veiling.

The veil and varying degrees of seclusion in the private sphere continue to be seen as a marker of economic status in many societies. Yet women of varying economic status also have been known to take it up as they enter the public sphere to pursue their education, go to work, or engage in other activities. The veil becomes a means of appeasing family concerns as the women venture out in public, for it marks them as respectable and moral individuals. The belief is that this sign of morality, which also hides their body, will protect them from sexual harassment in public and serve as a signal to men to not bother them. Veiling in this context becomes a ticket to increased participation in the public sphere and, as such, has the potential to lead to social, economic, or political empowerment. Some women also seem to take up the veil so as not to stand out among other veiled women, because it is a tradition to do so in their community, or as a way of holding on to "traditional" values when migrating to urban areas or whenever those values are felt to be under attack. Some women believe that it prevents them from being treated as sex objects. Others say that men have a low threshold of control when they see unveiled women, and it is women's responsibility to veil themselves in order to prevent "chaos" in society.

These reasons do not detract from the fact that veiling is sometimes also a manifestation of religious faith—a practice justified by the belief, among many Muslims in general and among religious revivalist movements around the world in particular, that veiling is an Islamic tenet. While some Muslim women do not feel the need to justify their wearing of the veil, others are vocal in highlighting religious reasons for it without, however, excluding social benefits of the sort mentioned earlier. Regardless of whether women veil primarily for religious reasons or not, a close association between the veil, Islam, and Muslim women has developed over time.

Non-Muslim observers have played a significant role in highlighting the connections between the veil, Islam, and Muslim women, but in particular ways. The Orientalist discourse, particularly during the Romantic Era, marked the veil as exotic, while the colonial discourse depicted it as a marker of women's oppression. For some women it is forced oppression. However, the veil's link with oppression in the colonial narrative, as well as non-Muslim attacks on the veil and what it symbolizes—a group's boundaries and tradition, both commonly mapped on the female body—have led some Muslims to use the veil as a symbol of resistance to imperialism, whether colonial or postcolonial. In the Algerian liberation struggle, for example, Algerians resisted the French colonists' desire to control the country by affirming the veil as a symbol of their culture and identity. The veil has also been used as a symbol of resistance to authoritarian regimes. In the course of the Iranian Islamic Revolution from 1978 to 1979, many women decided to don the veil as a way to challenge an autocratic establishment that had banned the veil many decades earlier. The banning of the head scarf in French public schools and the reaction of some Muslim women who deliberately began wearing it as a marker of their religious identity in response to this ban or in response to their belief that Islam and Muslims were being attacked in a post-September 11, 2001, world further illustrates the fraught relationship between the veil, Muslim identity, and politics.

See also women

Further Reading

Sadaf Ahmad, Transforming Faith: The Story of Al-Huda and Islamic Revivalism Among Urban Pakistani Women, 2009; Leila Ahmed, Women and Gender in Islam, 1992; John Bowen, Why the French Don't Like Headscarves, 2007; Fadwa El Guindi, "Veiling Resistance," in Feminist Postcolonial Theory: A Reader, edited by Reina Lewis and Sara Mills, 2003; Homa Hoodfar, "The Veil in Their Minds and on Our Heads: Veiling Practices and Muslim Women," in Women, Gender, Religion: A Reader, edited by Elizabeth Castelli, 1997; Saba Mahmood, Politics of Piety: The Islamic Revival and the Feminist Subject, 2005; Fatima Mernissi, "The Meaning of Spatial Boundaries," in Feminist Postcolonial Theory: A Reader, edited by Reina Lewis and Sara Mills, 2003.

SADAF AHMAD

violence

The question of violence (and, by implication, nonviolence) was one of the first major political issues confronted by the early Muslim umma, or community. Indeed, the consequences of the Muslim community's earliest and most traumatic ruptures—those occasioned by 'Ali b. Abi Talib and Mu'awiya's great fitna or civil war (the First Islamic Civil War, 656–61)—brought the problem of violent conflict and its alternatives to the attention of early Muslim theorists of communal integrity and provoked a series of intriguing responses. Meanwhile, the larger political universe into which Islam was born, and in which its earliest intellectuals recalled a primordial Islamic past upon which to base normative political ideals, had been one characterized by political violence in its many forms long before the birth of the Prophet Muhammad. The political landscape of Mesopotamia, the Middle East, and the Mediterranean had for more than a millennium constituted a single vast stage upon which successive empires and their subjects had pondered violence as both a destructive and productive force within the lives of human communities. Not surprisingly, the violence inherent in the politics of an empire left a profound impression upon the intellectual traditions of local Christianities and rabbinic Judaisms. As Islam evolved in dialogue with these communities, it would join an ongoing discussion concerning the role of violence—whether committed or forsaken, given or received—as a central component of religious, communal, and, inevitably, political legitimacy.

Among the first historical memories of the early Muslim community was the early seventh-century clash of superpowers that brought the Roman and Sasanian Persian empires to the battlefields of the Middle East one final time. Early works of Qur'anic exegesis, for example, recalled that Muhammad's besieged community of Abrahamic monotheists in the Arabian city of Mecca had cheered their "brothers the Romans" in this conflict, even as the polytheists of Mecca rooted for the Persians, whom, we are told, they looked upon as their own champions in the faraway war. What is significant about this and similar passages of very early Muslim texts is what they suggest about the ways in which the early Muslim umma—perhaps not the actual early seventh-century members of Muhammad's community, but their successors of a century or so later—imagined the intersection of empire, belief, and violence; the role of a polity based in religious truth was, in part, to wage war against unbelief and its champions. This was a model of an empire current in seventh-century Roman imperial ideology, as the court poetry and material culture of the time of the emperor Heraclius show, and it remained a compelling model of imperial piety among Christian communities scattered throughout Egypt and the Middle East long after the Muslim conquests.

But even if this had not been the case, the Qur'an itself—revealed, Muslim dogma insists, during Muhammad's time of trials and struggle against the unbelievers of Arabia—is (like the Torah) unflinching in its characterization of God's polity as one obliged to accept war as a means of defending God's truth in the face of God's enemies. In the Qur'an, however, the most frequently recurring analog for the English term "violence" is zulm and variants of the root z-l-m. The terms derived from this root signal the idea of "oppression" and "transgression." Perhaps inevitably, then, the idea of violence in Islamic legal theory features prominently a tension between violence as a means of resisting oppression and the necessity of mitigating the oppressive consequences of violence waged in the service of Islam and the Muslim umma.

Whatever the relation of the revelations recorded in the Qur'an to the spread of Muhammad's followers beyond the confines of Arabia—scholarly opinion is divided on this matter—the political realities confronted by Muslims living through the first Islamic centuries were shaped by the explosive Arab conquests that began in the years immediately following Muhammad's passing (632) and resulted in a vast territorial empire by the middle of the first century of the Islamic era. What in fact prompted the conquests is hotly debated and beyond the scope of this entry, but the fact of the conquests left the very early Muslim community with the task of narrating a history of its origins and with the task of so narrating the conquests' events as to understand them as evidence of God's divine plan. Accordingly, the realities of conquest—killing, destruction, enslavement, dispossession, and horror—were necessarily accommodated to a metanarrative of piety and godly virtue rewarded, and the evils of abusive and violent empires punished. This presented the early Muslim community with a host of moral, ethical, and theoretical difficulties as it looked upon its own evolving imperial power in the eighth and ninth centuries of the Common Era and sought to contain the violence inherent in projects of imperial expansion and domination.

Further complicating the question of violence and nonviolence in early Islamic political thought was the fact that political, religious, and social legitimacy within the Muslim umma and the Islamic imperial hierarchy often rested upon the perception that an individual or group of individuals had retained, as much as possible, the character of those men who were recalled as founders and champions of the early Muslim umma. These were men who were recollected by later Muslims to have been "like mounted raiders by day and monks by night." They were scrupulously pious, honest, and loving with their fellow Muslims, and with their enemies intransigent, uncompromising in matters of religious scruple, and violent in defense of God's one community. They were, after all, men who through their "strivings" had upended both the power hierarchies of Arabia and the ancient imperial systems of the Middle East and Iran and who had claimed by means of the sword and prayer the sprawling new domain bequeathed to their descendents. Living in the wake of revelation and godly conquest, Muslims in the centuries immediately after Muhammad's death now struggled to build a stable polity upon the example left by the Prophet and his Companions, who were understood as the primordial heroes of the new Muslim empire.

By the second century after the hijra (the period in which the earliest Muslim texts were compiled), a major theme regarding violence and nonviolence within the Muslim polity had begun to emerge. That theme was one of restraint and the moral importance of mitigating the violence that had permeated imperial politics for millennia before the birth of Muhammad. Works on the law of war, for example, emphasized the relative mercy to be shown to women, children, noncombatants, and captives. Families of captives, for example, were not to be split apart. The killing of children and women was absolutely forbidden. There was to be no compulsion of religion for those taken in war or those who had become protected subjects of the Muslims through surrender.

Elsewhere, in works of legal advice, this theme of restraint as the best part of justice emerges in practical advice given by scholars and jurists regarding the meting out of punishment or chastisement. In the Kitab al-Muharaba (The book of warfare) of the Maliki scholar 'Abdallah b. Wahb (743–812), for example, one encounters a series of questions concerning the ways in which one should handle captured Khariji rebels. The answers to these questions stress that the Harijis are only to be killed if they have killed and that it is best to try to reason with them, or to find someone to whom they will listen. Elsewhere, in Ahmad b. Hanbal's responses to legal queries, not only is a nonviolent approach to wrongdoers emphasized repeatedly, but also Muslims are encouraged to handle transgressions of Islam's normative strictures themselves, through nonviolent "commanding and forbidding," rather than risk exposing fellow Muslims, no matter how sinful, to the potential violence of the government.

In the Middle Ages, the violence undertaken by representatives of government power was beheld with a great deal of ambivalence; religious and legal scholars foresaw the damnation of policemen, government torturers, and even those sovereigns who ordered unjust violence against their subjects. As in earlier periods, however, perceptions of violence ran in close tandem with perceptions of the relative justice or injustice with which any given act was undertaken. Central to many Muslim's reservations about the role of rulers in the use of violence as a means of preserving civic order or redressing crime was the incertitude that these rulers, and, more specifically, their representatives, could be assumed to act in accordance with justice.

Similarly, in the first centuries after the advent of the Muslim community, consensus over the place of rulers as leaders of just or "holy" campaigns of warfare—jihad—was also frequently elusive. This did not hamper caliphal or dynastic leaders' ability to wage wars of succession or political rivalry, of course. Indeed, Muslim rulers from the seventh century on, just like their counterparts in Byzantium or Western Europe, waged war frequently and in some periods almost constantly. The violence inherent in these wars was not, however, considered "Islamic" by legal scholars and traditionalists unless they met certain relatively narrow criteria. Throughout the Middle Ages, in fact, the formulations of such early theorists of religiously appropriate violence as 'Abdallah b. al-Mubarak remained deeply influential. It was to such formulations, which took into account what were understood as specifically Islamic theories of violence and its alternatives, that Muslims turned at the outbreak of the Crusades as a means of mobilizing a mass response to the European invaders.

Muslim communities have struggled with questions of violence and nonviolence in the often radically changed political circumstances of modern times. One key example comes from the life and legacy of the Egyptian political theorist Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966). Thinking and writing during decades of postcolonial upheaval in Egypt, Qutb drew upon the Qur'anic concept of jāhiliyya, or the pre-Islamic time of idolatry and ignorance, to describe what he understood as contemporary Muslim society's decadence. Qutb prescribed a rigorous cleansing of modern Muslim society on the model of the Prophet's cleansing of pre-Islamic Arab society. Within this schema, however, some self-confessed Muslims were to be understood as having reverted to unbelief. A troubling question emerged: What role would violence play in the cleansing, Islamic reform of Egyptian society Qutb envisioned? After Qutb's execution by the regime of President Gamal Abdel Nasser in 1966, his followers struggled to answer precisely this question. For some, individuals who diverged from their own rigorist understanding of "proper Islam" (a group that constituted most of Egyptian society) were to be rejected as Muslims and punished with violence as unbelievers. For others, it was only the repressive Nasser regime itself against which violence was necessary. For still others, Qutb's call was understood to have been for a spiritual—and nonviolent—war against the temptations of contemporary society. In time, divergent interpretations of Qutb's belief resulted in multiple, diverse, and in some cases sharply opposed theories concerning violence and nonviolence in the politics of the present world. In all cases, such theories and their real-world consequences derived from the confluence of very early Islamic thought concerning violence and nonviolence necessarily interpreted in light of contemporary circumstances, events, and intellectual trends.

See also jihad; nonviolence; quietism and activism; rebellion; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; Michael Bonner, Aristocratic Violence and Holy War: Studies on the Jihad and the Arab-Byzantine Frontier, 1996; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2001; Giles Kepel, Jihad: The Trial of Political Islam, 2002; Christian Lange, Justice, Punishment and the Medieval Muslim Imagination, 2008; Thomas Sizgorich, Violence and Belief in Late Antiquity: Militant Devotion in Christianity and Islam, 2009.

THOMAS SIZGORICH

vizier

Having first entered the English lexicon in the 16th century, "vizier" derives from the Arabic wazīr (pl. wuzarā'), the conventional meaning of which translates roughly to "helper" or "aide." Such would appear to be the meaning intended in Qur'an 20:29 and 25:35, in which God makes Aaron a wazīr to Moses; a usage closer to the later, technical meaning of the word appears in a hadith of the Prophet that is found in the collections of Abu Dawud and Ahmad b. Hanbal. As a political term, the vizierate (wizāra) emerged during the Abbasid period as the highest political office beneath the caliph. In its technical sense, then, wazīr can be translated conveniently as "minister," capturing both its earliest institutional understanding and its contemporary usage by various governments throughout the Muslim world.

As has been demonstrated persuasively by S. D. Goitein in Studies in Islamic History and Institutions, the vizierate did not originate from an earlier Persian model, neither institutionally nor etymologically. Rather, the office traces its origins to an Arabian custom in which the emancipated slave of an Arab chieftain would serve as primary educator to his ex-master's child, remaining a critical advisor, protector, and confidant to the latter upon the chieftain's death. The personal nature of this relationship between freedman and the household of his lord helps to account for the institutional fluidity that the vizierate retained, particularly in its early history, as the relative power of the vizier shifted markedly from one caliphal reign to the next.

While use of the Arabic wazīr to denote "helper" can be found in pre-Islamic poetry, it was the Abbasid propagandist Abu Salama al-Khallal's (d. 750) assumption of the title "helper (wazīr) of the house of Muhammad" in the immediate aftermath of the Abbasid revolution that would set the stage for the official use of the term only a few decades later. The second Abbasid caliph Mansur (r. 754–75) had appointed Abu 'Ubaydallah al-Ash'ari (d. 786–87) as the personal scribe and steward to his young son and successor Mahdi (r. 775–85). When Mahdi ascended to the caliphate, Ash'ari served as de facto vizier under him, while it was this latter figure's successor Ya'qub b. Dawud (d. 803) who stands as the first person to receive the formal title of wazīr in the caliph's letters and official correspondences. From that point forward, the Abbasid vizier continued—albeit at times precariously—to serve in the highest civilian position beneath the caliph until the emergence of the office of amīr al-umarā' (supreme military commander) in the early tenth century.

In subsequent centuries, the vizierate reached a new apogee of institutional influence under Turkish and Mongol conquerors, as a new class of expatriate sultans depended on savvy viziers to assist in ruling lands that were otherwise unknowable to them. However, even the greatest Seljuq vizier Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092) acknowledged that a sultan's ruling entirely by proxy was unethical, and the image of the vizier serving as de facto ruler while the true sultan idled his days away is not a wholly accurate historical picture, as Goitein rightly concludes.

The Qawanin al-Wizara (Laws of the vizierate) and the celebrated Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (Ordinances of government) of Mawardi (d. 1058), in addition to the slightly earlier Tuhfat al-Wuzara' (Gift of the vizierate) of Abu Mansur al-Tha'alibi (d. 1039), present arguably the best theoretical treatment of the vizierate in premodern Islamic constitutional law. Following Mawardi's more refined categories, the vizierate in fact comprises two distinct offices—namely, the "vizierate of unrestricted delegation" (wizārat al-tafwīd) and the "vizierate of implementation" (wizārat al-tanfīdh). The vizier of unrestricted delegation, for his part, functions as the imam's (i.e., the principal ruler's) proxy in all but three capacities: he cannot appoint a successor to the imamate (i.e., the caliphate or sultanate, depending on the historical circumstances); he cannot request the imam's resignation; and he cannot relieve another of the imam's appointees of his post. Beyond these three restrictions, the vizier of unrestricted delegation enjoys comprehensive oversight of the Muslim commonwealth and may serve in any other capacity to which the imam himself has a right. Accordingly, multiple viziers of unrestricted delegation may not exist simultaneously, for pragmatic reasons, while the imam must stay informed of his vizier's decisions and must review them as necessary. Moreover, the imam must select such a vizier from among those subjects who are most knowledgeable of military and administrative affairs and who possess a general familiarity with the dictates of Islamic law (shari'a). Such breadth of knowledge is not a necessary qualification for the imamate itself.

The vizier of implementation, in contrast, serves merely as an aid in executing the decisions of the imam, and Mawardi acknowledges that only in those instances where this figure's opinion is sought by the imam does his service truly merit the title of vizier.

Therefore, the qualifications for the vizierate of implementation remain far less stringent than those for the vizierate of unrestricted delegation. Those qualifications that are expressly stipulated by the jurists function primarily to ensure a transparent line of communication from the imam to the vizier to the populace and vice versa. Because the vizer of implementation lacks administrative autonomy, there may be several such viziers at any given time, as this multiplicity does not undermine the functioning of government but rather enhances it.

While many Muslim-majority nations have appropriated the Arabic wazīr as a title for their various ministers, this "constitutional vizierate" shares little to no institutional continuity with its premodern counterpart for historical reasons that are beyond the scope of this article. Among Islamist thinkers, discussions of the vizierate as a cornerstone of the Islamic state have been largely abandoned in favor of an idealized scholar-caliph who seeks advice from a consultative assembly of experts (shūrā). That the Salafi intellectual backdrop to Islamism might find little to stake in an institution that traces its entire existence to the second Islamic century may help to explain Islamist reticence with regard to the vizierate. But perhaps a more obvious explanation is that in the absence of a single, unifying caliphate, discussions of the vizierate are effectively moot.

See also bureaucracy; caliph, caliphate; government; leadership; Mawardi (974–1058); Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92)

Further Reading

S. D. Goitein, "Appendix: On the Origin of the Term Vizier," in Studies in Islamic History and Institutions, 1968; Idem, "The Origin of the Vizierate and Its True Character," in Studies in Islamic History and Institutions, 1968; Ibn Khaldun, The Muqaddimah, translated by Franz Rosenthal, 1958; Abu 'l-Hasan al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 2000; Dominique Sourdel, Le vizirat 'abbāside de 479 à 936 (132 à 324 de l'hégire), 1959–60.

MATTHEW B. INGALLS

welfare state. See public interest

West, the

Although Muslims have resided in parts of Europe for centuries, and many slaves taken from Africa to North America were Muslims, the question of Islam in the West rose in importance after World War II. European countries encouraged workers from North and West Africa, South Asia, and Turkey to add their labor power to the postwar recovery, and most of those workers were Muslims. By the late 1960s, many of those workers had settled in Europe with their families. Immigration to the United States increased at about the same time, and Muslims, particularly from South Asia, were among those who settled there. Among the new arrivals were many Muslim scholars who offered opinions about how ordinary Muslims were to live religious lives in lands where they were minorities and where not all Islamic religious institutions were available. At the same time, many African American Muslims were turning from the specific teachings of the Nation of Islam toward a more broadly distributed Sunni Islam. Contemporary scholars of diverse origins increasingly provide opinions through broader networks that stretch across the Atlantic and include scholars from non-Western centers of learning.

Muslims have posed questions about (1) the legitimacy of participating in Western political institutions and (2) how best to adapt their individual, everyday behavior to their new, non-Islamic environments. One major response has been the call to develop "legal theory for Muslim minorities" (fiqh al-aqalliyyāt) or a distinct jurisprudence for Muslims living as minorities in non-Muslim societies. In Europe the idea has been most closely associated with Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a scholar born in 1926 in Egypt who was educated and taught at Azhar University before moving to Qatar, where he created a faculty of shari'a and became well-known through his books, his website, and his broadcasts on Aljazeera television. He played a major role on the popular website Islam Online and in the European Council for Fatwa and Research, an association of scholars mainly living in (although not originating from) European countries. Qaradawi also wrote of the "fiqh of balances" (fiqh al-muwāzanāt) to point to the need to balance minor evils against greater or longer-term benefits to Muslims. He drew on this imperative to argue (in 1999, through the European Council) that Muslims unable to find interest-free loans could borrow at interest for a first home. He drew on the arguments advanced by Ghazali (d. 1111) and Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi (d. 1388) that Muslims should above all advance the objectives (maqāṣid) of revelation. Qaradawi employed Shatibi's three-level hierarchy of necessities, needs, and improvements: "when interests (maṣāliḥ) conflict, a low-level interest is sacrificed for the sake of a higher-level interest." In the bank interest matter, it was the prohibition of ribā (interest) that was sacrificed for the sake of stable Muslim families and thus religious lives.

In North America, the idea of a "fiqh for minorities" has been promoted through the Islamic Society of North America (ISNA), and in particular by the Iraqi scholar Taha Jabir al-Alwani, although in later writings Alwani recommended that scholars should rebuild fiqh from values and rights in the Qur'an rather than through the idea of Muslim minorities, perpetuating the older distinction between the dār al-islām (abode of Islam) and the dār al-ḥarb (abode of war). Many contemporary Muslims express discomfort with this way of viewing the world; some refer to the protection given to religious minorities by international law and propose dār al-'ahd (abode of covenant), dār al-da'wa (abode of predication), or dār al-shahāda (abode of witness), emphasizing the possibilities open to Muslims in these lands.

Much of the debate among scholars living in the West concerns how to determine general principles or objectives, not whether such activity should take place. Whereas Qaradawi couched his fatwa (legal opinion) within the several schools of fiqh and ended by exempting some Muslims in the West from the rules of fiqh, other scholars argue that fiqh is and should be universal but that its universal dimensions are at the level of general principles. The Swiss scholar Tariq Ramadan, for example, together with many scholars active in England, France, and Belgium, argued that one could consider a civil marriage to already contain most or all of the elements of an Islamic marriage (consent, witnesses, a contract), and therefore it could constitute a marriage in Islamic terms. Tareq Oubrou, based in Bordeaux, emphasized the distinction between obligatory ritual ('ibādāt) and social norms (mu'āmalāt) and contended that the former does not change but the latter may be realized either as law or as ethics, depending on the political context within which one lives. In Western countries, Muslims must "ethicize" these norms.

Though touted as providing support for progressive views, this approach can lead to more prohibitive view of the law (e.g., a traditional view that all abortions are forbidden because of the need to protect life, one of the five necessities, as opposed to a juristic view that abortion is permissible until a certain point in gestation). But by seeking equivalents between Western and Islamic institutions, it can legitimate full political and social participation in Western countries.

This line of reasoning starts from general principle and seeks support in schools of fiqh only in a secondary fashion, and so it has been criticized by some fiqh scholars such as the Syrian Sa'id Ramadan al-Buti, for whom the call for a fiqh for minorities is part of the "plot aiming at dividing Islam." But he also distinguishes between what he sees as the false idea of special dispensations for those Muslims who live in Europe or North America and the idea that "whenever there is a hardship exceeding the moral limit, the legal permission which warrants canceling it persists." In other words, the easing of rules due to hardship has nothing to do with where a Muslim lives but rather depends on his or her specific circumstances. As this debate shows, Muslims in the West look for learned political and social opinions from a global array of scholars and institutions.

See also Europe; globalization; jurisprudence; North America; shari'a

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Islam and the Challenge of Democracy, 2004; Taha Jabir al-Alwani, Towards a Fiqh for Minorities: Some Basic Reflections, 2003; Andrew March, Islam and Liberal Citizenship: The Search for an Overlapping Consensus, 2009; Muhammad Khalid Masud, Islamic Legal Philosophy: A Study of Abu Ishaq al-Shatibi's Life and Thought, 1977; Tariq Ramadan, Radical Reform: Islamic Ethics and Liberation, 2009.

JOHN BOWEN

West Africa

The development of Islamic political thought in the bilād al-sūdān ("the lands of the blacks") of sub-Saharan West Africa was linked with the development of Islam as a legitimating factor in state development in this region. There were three major theological positions regarding the relationship with non-Muslims (or "bad Muslims"): accommodation and peaceful coexistence, withdrawal from political power, and jihad. They correspond roughly with three distinct historical periods.

In the age of "empires," from the 11th to the 18th centuries, Muslims constituted a minority of the population. Even when rulers acknowledged Islam as a religion of the court, they had to balance Islam and local religions. Muslim scholars were mostly confined to courts and a few centers of long-distance trade. The major issue was "how Islamic" the state was, which in turn depended on how Muslim rulers negotiated the role of Islam at their courts. A tradition of peaceful coexistence of Muslims and non-Muslims was represented by the Jakhanke, a group of scholars originally from Ja (Dia) or Jakha (Diakha) in Mali. The Jakhanke stressed the importance of Islamic learning—in particular, the memorization of the Qur'an and the teaching of tafsīr (long commentaries), based on the tafsīr al-jalālayn of Mahalli and Suyuti. An important feature of Jakhanke teachings was the rejection of proselytization and jihad. Muslims living among non-Muslims had an obligation to cultivate the pure teachings of Islam as individuals. A different and rather militant tradition of Islam was represented in the same period by North African Muslim scholar Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Karim al-Maghili (d. 1503), who visited the cities of Kano in 1492 and Katsina and Gao in 1498. In two texts, later titled Taj al-Din fi ma Yajib 'ala l-Muluk (The crown of religion: On the duties of kings) and As'ilat Asqiyya wa-Ajwibat al-Maghili (The questions of the Askia and Maghili's responses), which were to become important texts for Muslim reformers in the centuries to come, Maghili expounded on the principles of Islamic government. He also came to advise the emperor of Songhay, Askia Muhammad Turé (r. 1493–1528), on the principles of Islamic rule. Turé had invited Maghili to his court in order to get support for his claim that the deposition of the preceding Sunni dynasty had been legitimate on the grounds that the last Sunni emperor, Sonni 'Ali, had tolerated un-Islamic practices. Maghili supported Turé's position by arguing that Sonni 'Ali had to be regarded as an unbeliever due to his unorthodox religious practices. Maghili also argued that a ruler who oppressed his people and raised un-Islamic taxes could be fought by means of a jihad.

In a second epoch, from the late 17th century to the onset of colonial rule, Muslim scholars started to criticize the allegedly un-Islamic policies of the rulers of the Sudanic kingdoms, especially the enslavement of Muslims. Since most of these rulers were Muslims, opposition to their rule was often based on theological argumentation leading to their takfīr (excommunication). In a series of movements of jihad, religious scholars gained political power for the first time in the history of the bilād al-sūdān, and Islam became the only source of political legitimacy in the new "Islamic" states. While only a few texts on Islamic theology had been written by Sudanic scholars before the 18th century, the need to justify takfīr and jihad led to an explosion in the production of such texts. Also, a mass movement of conversion to Islam transformed Muslim minorities into majorities in major parts of the bilād al-sūdān in the 19th century. A paradigmatic religious scholar-cum-leader of a jihad in this period was Usman dan Fodio (1754–1817), who was born in Maratta in the kingdom of Gobir, the paramount Hausa state of the region. Around 1794 he became the leader of a small but growing jamā'a (religious community) in Degel/Gobir. Inspired by Maghili's writings, he identified a number of local religious practices as "un-Islamic innovations" (bida', sing. bid'a) in a series of texts such as Ihya' al-Sunna wa-Ikhmad al-Bid'a (The revival of the sunna and the elimination of innovation), Kitab al-Farq (The book of difference), and his major work, Bayan Wujub al-Hijra 'ala al-'Ibad wa-Bayan Wujub Nasb al-Imam wa-Iqamat al-Jihad (Clarifying the obligation for the believers to emigrate, to nominate the imam, and to lead the jihad; 1806). He came to the conclusion, however, that most local religious practices, though reprehensible (bid'a), did not constitute a basis for takfīr: Muslims guilty of them could still be regarded as mere "sinners" rather than infidels. Takfīr would be legitimate only if a Muslim intentionally violated the prescriptions of the faith and defended these practices in public. On the basis of his inclusive definition of faith and unbelief (īmān and kufr), dan Fodio was able to identify most Muslims in Hausaland as true Muslims. Only those rulers who tolerated the reprehensible practices of their populations had to be classified as unbelievers, against whom jihad was not only lawful but also a religious obligation.

In a third historical era, from the coming of colonial rule to postcolonial times, Muslims formed the majority of the population in many sub-Saharan states but had to find ways to accommodate secular colonial and postcolonial governments. In the colonial period, Islam was seen by many as a theology of resistance against the Christian colonizers. At the same time, reformist Muslim scholars began to blame the Sufi brotherhoods for the backwardness of Muslims and to advocate reform (iṣlāḥ), inspired by movements of reform in North Africa and Egypt. Thereafter Muslim societies in sub-Saharan West Africa saw the emergence of a spectrum of Muslim reformist orientations. The most prominent movements were those that combated Sufi concepts of the faith while advocating modernization of Muslim societies in an "Islamic" guise (e.g., the Jama'at Izalat al-Bid'a wa-Iqamat al-Sunna in Nigeria and Niger, the Jama'at Ibad al-Rahman in Senegal, and a number of Ansar al-Sunna movements in Ivory Coast and Mali). Far less important were activist movements that were less concerned with Islamic religious practices than with the advocacy of an "Islamic" revolution (e.g., the Islamic movement and the Muslim Students' Society in Nigeria) or quietist movements such as the Jama'at al-Tabligh in various West African countries. Criticisms of Sufi religious practices, such as those offered by Abubakar Gumi (d. 1992) or Cheikh Touré (d. 2005), remained a prominent feature of reformist discourse in the 20th century. Gumi's al-'Aqida al-Sahiha bi-Muwafaqat al-Shari'a (The right faith according to the prescriptions of the shari'a) was paradigmatic of these religious reform efforts. While attacking Sufi tenets of the faith, contemporary Muslim reformers have at the same time mostly accepted both colonial and postcolonial regimes, although demands for the reintroduction of aspects of the shari'a, such as "Islamic penal law," suspended during most of the colonial and postcolonial periods, have surfaced in Senegal and Nigeria.

See also Dan Fodio, Usman (1754–1817); jihad; shari'a; Sudan

ROMAN LOIMEIER

Westernization

Since the mid-19th century, Muslim political philosophers and social reformers have understood and debated Westernization in the context of colonial encounters. In various ways, they have pondered how to distinguish the experience of colonialism from modernity and Westernization. Many associated modernity, either in promoting or rejecting it, with Westernization, while others have emphasized the conceptual and practical distinctions between the two.

One of the early proponents of modernity as Westernization was the Indian Muslim educator and social reformer Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98). In 1875, he founded the Muhammedan Anglo-Oriental College with a mission to promote modern education brought to India by the British. He believed that Muslim Indians would eventually benefit from British Imperial rule and that, in the final instance, Westernization would bring modernity and prosperity to his fellow Muslims.

Mustafa Kemal Atatürk (1881–1938) left the most enduring legacy among those who regarded Westernization as an inevitable consequence of modernity. He advanced the most comprehensive project, known as Kemalism, for the modernization of Turkish society. He believed that nation building in Turkey required Westernization both in governance (i.e., secular republicanism) and in its foundational worldview, in science and the Enlightenment rationalism.

Those who remain skeptical of Westernization today have their intellectual roots in the Salafi movement of the mid-19th century. Despite their shared nostalgia for the departed earthly glory of pristine Islam, Salafists diverge radically on how to realize the revitalization of Islam under the condition of modernity. Those who espoused a literal reading of the Qur'an and the hadith, increasingly gravitated toward a Wahhabi puritanism and a total rejection of modernity as a Western conspiracy against Islam. Others who followed the teachings of Afghani (1838–97) believed that the Islamic Renaissance of the Middle Ages afforded the West the essential principles of the Enlightenment. By emphasizing the Islamic roots of modernity, Afghani put forward a critique of the traditionalist 'ulama', who regarded Westernization as the inevitable consequence of modernity and thereby condemned any attempt to rearticulate Islamic scriptures within the contemporary context. Concurrently, he chastised those who promoted modernity without emphasizing its Islamic distinctions. He particularly ridiculed Sir Ahmed Khan, whom the British championed as the intellectual force behind the modernization of India. Afghani thus argued that modernity was a Western project neither in its origin nor in its global implications. He believed that benefiting from Western science and technology must bring Muslims closer to, rather than alienate them from, their cultural identity. This assertion became a recurring theme in the Islamic movements of the 20th and 21st centuries.

While rejecting Westernization, Afghani's disciple Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905) and Hasan al-Banna (1906–49), the Egyptian founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, followed Afghani's anticolonial assertion of the congruity of Islam with modernity. Through a return to the wellsprings of Islam, Banna considered the mission of the Brotherhood to be enabling Muslims to restore their religion's power and stand firm against what he called "intrusive tendencies" such as secular liberalism and Marxism. However, after World War II, with the rise of postcolonial nationalisms and the establishment of the state of Israel, the Brotherhood and other Islamic movements gradually adopted a culturally protectionist ideology based on puritan renditions of Islam.

The South Asian Muslim scholar and political leader Mawdudi (1903–79) and the Egyptian teacher and political activist Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) for the first time theorized Westernization as a comprehensive ideology of jāhiliyya (pagan ignorance). Rather than a reference to the pre-Islamic Arabian Peninsula, they interpreted jāhiliyya as an omnihistorical state of being, now manifested in the West, that threatens Muslims' way of life. By characterizing Westernization as the expression of jāhiliyya, Mawdudi and Qutb situated Islam in a mutually exclusive relationship with the West. In contrast to Mawdudi, Qutb developed the critique of jāhiliyya into a revolutionary program against the ideological and political dominance of the West. He chastised the advocates of Westernization for their indiscriminate recognition of its unbounded rationalism, which he held responsible for depleting modern life of any ethical norms and spiritual values.

Whereas the concept of jāhiliyya gave rise to an Islamic critique of Westernization, the notion of gharbzādagī (Weststruckness, or plagued by the West), coined originally by an Iranian philosopher, Ahmad Fardid (1909–94), made this critique more readily available to a wider community, both Muslim and secular. Fardid traced the ontological roots of gharbzādagī to ancient Greece. He defined, in an ahistorical fashion, all of world history as the struggle between idolatrous impurity (tāghut) and the sanctity of the divine. From the moment human beings strove to place themselves in the position of God, they became alienated from themselves. The desire to act like God, Fardid opined, belongs solely to Western civilization. Godlike Westerners have spread their idolatrous ideas around the world, either in the form of ancient Greece's polytheism or modern humanism. Either way, Fardid insisted, the result was the same: the incessant Weststruckness of the world by blood and iron or words and ideas. It was another Iranian social critic and writer, Jalal Al-i Ahmad (1923–69), who transformed Weststruckness into a postcolonial critique. In order to address the particular predicament of colonialism and dependency, Al-i Ahmad historicized gharbzādagī rather than underscoring the essential differences between the East and the West. He considered Weststruckness to be a disease that infected the soul and the body of colonized people. Echoing a sentiment that was shared by many postcolonial revolutionaries such as Frantz Fanon and Aimé Césaire, Al-i Ahmad believed that Weststruckness had turned the colonized into strangers in their own land.

Ali Shari'ati (1933–77) and other key ideologues of the Iranian revolution further appropriated this revolutionary reinterpretation. Accordingly, Shari'ati considered the West to be neither an indivisible totality nor a degenerate essence beyond redemption. Rather, he developed a universal conception of Weststruckness as a plague that has infected all humanity, regardless of geographic locations or religious affiliations. For Shari'ati and Al-i Ahmad, gharbzādagī induced alienation both through the instrumental rationality of capitalism and by the violence of colonialism. They negated the imposition of Western modernity while they promoted a critical reengagement with, rather than an apologetic view of, Islam and Muslim traditions. They called Westernization the appropriation of Western social norms and institutions divorced from the historical consciousness and cultural particularities of Muslim societies.

See also al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938); Mawdudi, Abul al-A'la (1903–79); Muslim Brotherhood; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); West, the Jalal Al-i Ahmad, Occidentosis: A Plague from the West, translated by Hamid Algar, 1984; Mehrzad Boroujerdi, Iranian Intellectuals and the West: The Tormented Triumph of Nativism, 1996; Roxanne L. Euben, Enemy in the Mirror, 1999; Behrooz Ghamari-Tabrizi, Islam and Dissent in Postrevolutionary Iran: Abdolkarim Soroush, Religious Politics and Democratic Reform, 2008; Nikki Keddie, An Islamic Response to Imperialism: Political and Religious Writings of Sayyid Jamal ad-Din al-Afghani, 1983; Charles Kurzman, ed., Modernist Islam, 1840–1940: A Sourcebook, 2002.

Further Reading

BEHROOZ GHAMARI-TABRIZI

women

A look at Muslim historical sources illustrates that the role of gender in Islamic political thought has been varied and complicated. The complex relationship between gender and Islamic political thought will be considered here through a few snapshots: the Qur'an, female contemporaries of Muhammad, medieval Islamic scholarship, and modern Muslim women.

Women in the Qur'an

Several women are mentioned in the Qur'an, some of whom demonstrate a strong independent spirit. They are held responsible for their own salvation, apart from their husbands or male relatives. The stories of these women trump the patriarchal gender norms of a seventh-century Arabian context in which the Qur'an was purportedly revealed. Such women include Eve (Q. 20:117–23); the wives of Noah, Lot, and Pharaoh (Q. 66:10–12); Sarah, the wife of Abraham (Q. 11:71–73; 51:29–30); Moses' mother (Q. 28:7, 13) and sister (28:10–11); Potiphar's wife (Q. 12:23–32); and Mary, the mother of Jesus (Q. 19). All references to these women are made through their relations to the central male figures in their lives, be they husbands, fathers, sons, or brothers. Mary is the only woman who is mentioned by name in the Qur'an and has a chapter named after her.

The story of the Queen of Sheba is especially noteworthy, since she represents the only positive, nonmonotheistic model of political leadership in the Qur'an (27:15–44). Although the Queen of Sheba is never mentioned by name in the Qur'an, she is identified by her political role as a ruler whose power rivaled that of the prophet and king Solomon. She was the queen of a people called "Saba" (Sheba), a prosperous nation of sun worshipers. All descriptions of the Queen in the Qur'an are salutary; her wisdom and power are highlighted in the story through her pragmatic, diplomatic, and consultative leadership. In the Qur'anic story, the queen's encounter with Solomon occurs in the context of an aggressive unilateral threat delivered by Solomon's avian emissary, named Hudhud. In the missive, Solomon announced the oneness of God and called the queen to submit through Solomon to this God ("Do not exalt yourselves against me and come to me in submission," Q. 27:31). Contrary to her chieftains' counsel favoring military confrontation, the queen opted to pursue diplomatic negotiations with Solomon by offering him gifts. When Solomon rejected these gifts, seeing them as an insult, and then threatened war, the queen visited Solomon personally. After a series of interactions, in which she passed a test devised by Solomon, she successfully avoided war by submitting, not to Solomon as he had suggested, but with him, to the "Lord of the worlds" (Q. 27:44). While the story of the Queen of Sheba is powerful and meaningful for modern Muslim political thought, its meaning and significance was contested in medieval Qur'anic exegesis.

Although the Qur'an can be seen as challenging patriarchal gender norms through the example of the earlier-mentioned women, it also can be seen as confirming these norms through other stories (e.g., Q. 60) and through its legal dictates. Qur'anic legal verses dealing with marital discord (Q. 4:34), polygamy (Q. 4:3), the higher rank of men over women (Q. 2:228), and women's testimony (Q. 2:282) establish an asymmetrical relationship between men and women in both private and public spheres. Premodern Muslim scholars regularly cited such verses to limit women's participation in the public sphere and the political process. At the same time, the Qur'an speaks of the spiritual equality of believing men and women (Q. 33:35), promising them similar rewards in the hereafter. While some verses suggest that women become polluted during menstruation (Q. 2:222), other verses warn against devaluing the birth of a daughter over that of a son (Q. 16:58–59) and condemn female infanticide (Q. 81:8–9).

Another complex set of verses, which have become highly politicized in contemporary Muslim thought, revolve around the seclusion of women and the appropriate attire when they are in public spaces. One verse in the Qur'an commands Muhammad's wives to "stay in [their] homes" and not to make a "dazzling display" of themselves, a practice that the verse associates with the pre-Islamic "time of ignorance" (jāhiliyya; Q. 33:33). The believers are further instructed to speak to Muhammad's wives from behind a screen (hijāb; Q. 33:53). Muhammad's wives, daughters, and "believing women" are also instructed to "draw their outer garments [sing. jilbāb] over their person" when in public in order to be both "recognized" and to avoid being molested (Q. 33:59). The Qur'anic text also exhorts both men and women to observe modesty but further specifies that believing women should "draw their veils [sing. khimār] over their bosoms" and "not display their beauty except that which is apparent" (Q. 24:30–31). Although these verses do not provide specific instructions about what Muslim women should wear, or which parts of their body they should cover, medieval Muslim exegetes and jurists concluded that it was obligatory for a Muslim woman to cover her entire body, including, in most cases, her face. In practice, however, the dress code of Muslim women has varied significantly in different social, cultural, and historic moments, where social and economic factors have played a significant role in the determination of women's public attire.

Muhammad's Contemporaries: Wives and Companions

The independent personalities of women who appear in the Qur'an are reflected in the stories of early Muslim women as recorded in Islamic history. Muhammad's wives played key political roles during the lifetime of Muhammad and the early generations of Islam. His first wife, Khadija, was the first convert to Islam and helped launch his prophetic career through tangible social, economic, and political support. Muhammad was monogamous during his marriage to Khadija, though he was continuously polygamous after her death. Muhammad regularly consulted his wives about political affairs, most famously taking the advice of Umm Salama (d. ca. 680) about how to lead his community after concluding the treaty of Hudaybiyya (628). Muhammad's youngest wife, 'A'isha (d. 678), became intellectually and politically active after his death. She is responsible for the transmission of the second largest number of prophetic traditions in Sunni hadith literature. She publicly condemned the policies and person of the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (ca. 579–656), and fought against his successor, 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661). 'A'isha personally led an army of 3,000 against 'Ali but lost to him in the Battle of the Camel (656). She had a contentious relationship with Muhammad's daughter Fatima (d. 633), who was married to 'Ali. Fatima, the mother of Muhammad's grandsons Hasan (d. 669) and Husayn (d. 680), is highly venerated by both Sunnis and Shi'is, although Shi'is have a special reverence for her.

'A'isha's leadership of a military campaign was unique, though women were regularly present on the battlefield. Several female Companions of Muhammad fought alongside men, including Nusayba bt. Ka'b, who is credited with saving Muhammad's life several times during the Battle of Uhud (625). Women also played key roles in the transmission of the Qur'an. Hafsa (d. 665), Muhammad's widow and the daughter of the second caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644), was instrumental in the transmission of the text of the Qur'an. The Qur'anic text itself formalized the inclusion of women into the religious-political community of early Muslims by citing the specific words that women spoke when taking an oath of allegiance (bay'a) to Muhammad (Q. 60:12). Even though the words of the oath highlight the gendered responsibilities of women, focusing on the control of sexuality ("You will not commit adultery or kill your children"), it is nevertheless significant that women were required to state their independent fealty to Muhammad and the community of believers.

The role of women in the mosque was contested in the early Muslim community and reflected the tension surrounding women's political leadership. The mosque in the early Muslim community was more than a religious center. It was also a center of communal life, political administration, and adjudication. The fact that Muhammad appointed Abu Bakr to lead the prayer in the mosque as Muhammad lay on his deathbed was used by Abu Bakr's supporters to legitimate his political succession to Muhammad and reign as the first caliph. By the same token, it is significant that Muhammad appointed a person to chant the call for prayer (mu'adhdhin) for the household of Umm Waraqa, who, for her part, led her household in prayer. In the contemporary period, much has been made of whether this represents Muhammad's approval of women-led prayer. At the heart of the debate is whether Umm Waraqa was given a special dispensation to lead her specific mixed-gender household or if her example points to a general permission for women to lead men in prayer.

The debate in the early community about women's political participation was reflected in the imposition and removal of a physical gender barrier in the mosque. 'Umar instituted a gender-segregating barrier in the mosque in Medina and reportedly discouraged women from regularly attending the mosque for prayers. 'Uthman removed the barrier upon assuming power. Despite 'Umar's general attitude of discouraging women from participating in the mosque, women still played a public and political role during his reign. For instance, while delivering a Friday sermon, 'Umar proposed limiting the acceptable dower (mahr) that could be offered to wives in marriage, and a woman stood up to interrupt him. She challenged his proposition by citing a verse in the Qur'an that makes it acceptable to offer wives a "heap of gold" (Q. 4:20) as mahr. 'Umar responded to this by saying, "The woman is right and 'Umar is wrong." Despite 'Umar's strong desire for gender segregation, during his rule a woman was able to challenge and prevail against the caliph's proposition.

In modern conversations about women's political leadership, a particular tradition attributed to Muhammad has become especially controversial. Muhammad is reported to have said, "Never shall a folk prosper who delegate their affairs to a woman." Although this report seems to contradict the Qur'anic story of the Queen of Sheba, whose people were prosperous, it has been used in multiple ways to argue against women's political and religious leadership. It has also been used to caution against the use of overtly misogynistic prophetic reports when determining the role of women in contemporary Muslim society. The feminist scholar Fatima Mernissi used this prophetic report to advocate for increased text criticism of prophetic reports, while Mohammad Fadel, a professor at the University of Toronto, used this same report to promote "hermeneutical historicism" as the primary approach to deal with traditional texts that appear ethically problematic at first glance.

Women in Medieval Islam

Women's political and religious authority was restricted in the medieval period, especially as compared to their role in early Islam. Leila Ahmed, a pioneer in the field of gender studies in Islamic studies, has shown that scholars in the medieval period were almost entirely male and were products of their sociohistorical context. They produced Qur'anic exegesis and Islamic legal works that re-instituted existing patriarchal norms and, in many cases, expanded the patriarchy of the Qur'anic text to map onto their own patriarchal contexts. Consequently, discussions of female political authority assumed that women should not hold political positions due to what were seen as their physical and intellectual deficiencies. The discussion of essential gender differences often echoed and borrowed from the thought of Hellenistic philosophers and sometimes reflected Aristotelian understandings of gender as differentiated by temperatures of "hot" and "cold."

Women's position in the medieval public sphere was challenged in several ways. Their access to political leadership was disputed through the hadith, which warned against delegating the affairs of the community to a woman. The potential for women to serve as caliph was uniformly denied in Islamic law, though their role as judges was more contested. Karen Bauer's work on the debate regarding female judges illustrates the predominant thought on women's leadership in the medieval period. Most Sunni jurists prohibited women from being judges, although some Hanafi and Maliki jurists allowed women to adjudicate in civil cases. The opposition against female judges was based on four broad arguments. Two of the arguments were based on Qur'anic texts, one on a prophetic tradition, and one on a social argument. The Qur'anic text arguments used 4:34's assertion that "men are in authority (qawwāmān) over women because God has preferred (faḍḍala) some over others" to argue that women could not be in a position of authority over men because God preferred men to women and gave them authority over women. The second Qur'anic text used in these discussions was 2:282, which states that the testimony of one male is equivalent to that of two women, particularly in financial transactions. The text was interpreted to mean that because the testimony of two women was equivalent to the testimony of one man, women could not adequately judge the testimony of men. The prophetic report used to limit women's authority was the one warning against a woman leading a community. Finally, the social argument against female judges was that being a judge would allow women to interact with men, which could only result in social and sexual chaos.

These scholarly debates aside, there are some examples of female judges in the medieval period. One of them was the mother of the Abbasid caliph Muqtadir (d. 932), who held a weekly court in the tenth century. There are also some examples of female rulers of Muslim empires, such as Razia Sultana (d. 1240), ruler of the sultanate of Delhi in India, and the Mamluk queen Shajarat al-Durr (d. 1259) in Egypt. Additionally, despite the arguments regarding women's intellectual weaknesses, several Muslim women gained prominence as religious teachers and scholars in Muslim history. Some of them reached the highest level of spiritual authority, such as Rabi'a al-Basri and Ibn al-'Arabi's (d. 1240) female teacher Fatima bt. al-Muthanna. In the traditional sciences, Umm Hani (d. 1466) is an example of an acclaimed teacher who taught men multiple subjects including grammar, history, and hadith studies. Recent studies have detailed the lives of such female figures who appear in the written works of male scholars. One fecund genre for such study is biographical literature, where female figures appear as noteworthy scholarly figures. Research conducted by Ruth Roded, Marilyn Booth, and Devin J. Stewart shows that even though the number of these women is small, especially in comparison to the male scholars cited in the biographical literature, it is nevertheless important that female scholars were able to attain scholarly prominence in patriarchal contexts, where the education of women was not the norm.

Modern Muslim Women

The relationship between women and political authority in the modern period is embedded in the discourse of colonialism. Since the encounter of much of the Muslim world with modernity coincided with the economic and political project of Western colonialism, the two have become intertwined in popular Muslim imagination. To compound the issue, a major moral argument in support of colonialism was the emancipation of Muslim women from the oppression of Muslim men. Colonists such as Lord Cromer (d. 1917) in Egypt championed the cause of Muslim women by encouraging unveiling, while at the same time restricting their participation in the public sphere to roles he considered especially suited for women, such as midwifery as opposed to medicine. Such disingenuous rhetoric for female emancipation on the part of the colonists (Cromer having also headed the antisuffragist movement in Britain) tended to tie the feminist movement to the colonial enterprise such that advocating for feminist causes became tantamount to supporting colonialism. As a result, women's public and political participation in the modern world is fraught with postcolonial trauma.

Still, the 20th and 21st centuries have witnessed several feminist movements in the Muslim world. In Egypt women have been increasingly active members of society and politics; they played key roles in anticolonialist movements and participated in the public discourse regarding the creation of a postcolonial nationalist identity. Women began working in and contributing to newspapers in the late 19th century, and by the early 20th century, women's journals, such as Al-ʿAfaf (Honor) and Fatat al-Sharq (Women of the east), began to appear alongside feminist organizations such as the Society for the Advancement of Women, the Intellectual Association of Egyptian Women, and the Egyptian Feminist Union. Women collaborated with male politicians, and they participated in demonstrations and riots alongside men, though Egyptian women were not given the vote until 1957 when Rawya ʿAtiya (d. 1997), the first female member of parliament in the Arab world, was elected. Egyptian political and feminist movements were sometimes spearheaded by secular feminists such as Huda Shaʿrawi (d. 1947) and Saiza Nabarawi (d. 1985), who were comfortable using both Egyptian and Western ideas to fight for Egyptian women's rights. Other, more conservative feminists also emerged, such as Malak Hifni Nassef (d. 1918) and Zainab al-Ghazali (d. 2005), who were more interested in developing an Egyptian Islamic feminism that was independent of Western influence. ʿA'isha ʿAbd al-Rahman (d. 1996), who wrote under the pen name Bint Shati', became the first female to write a commentary on the Qur'an.

In the modern period, "Muslim women" as an abstract, essentialized entity has become a measuring stick for "progress" as well as an embodiment of "authentic" Islamic values. Western political rhetoric often cites the treatment of Muslim women to argue for the "progress" or "backwardness" of Muslim-majority countries. The view that Afghan women were oppressed and in need of saving played an important role in the moral rationale for the American invasion of Afghanistan in 2001. Muslim political movements and governments likewise use the concept of the "ideal" Muslim woman to evaluate the influence of either "Westernization" or "authentic" Islamic values. In Afghanistan, the Taliban used their treatment of Afghan women as the physical embodiment of their version of "authentic" Islam. In this way, Afghan women were used by both the Taliban and the U.S. government to project varied images of themselves; the Taliban used women's bodies to demonstrate their commitment to a pure, unadulterated Islam, while the U.S. government used the image of these same women to establish their commitment to human rights.

Simplified constructions of "the veil" offer a useful example of the politicization of Muslim women. Many governments have used the veil to demonstrate their own commitment to either Islamic piety or secular values. In Saudi Arabia, for instance, Islamic law is interpreted as requiring women in public to cover their entire bodies with a loose robe (ʿabāya), and women are usually expected to cover their faces by wearing a face veil (niqāb). In Iran, women must similarly cover their entire bodies, but the niqāb is not required. Whereas women are required to dress in a concealing manner in Saudi Arabia and Iran as a sign of the country's fidelity to Islamic law, France prohibits women from dressing in this manner, making the face veil a punishable offense, as a sign of that country's commitment to secular values. A similar debate took place in Canada's province of Quebec, where Bill 94 proposed to deny women who chose to wear the niqāb access to public services. In both cases, a key argument was that the niqāb, even when worn by choice, subjugated Muslim women, who needed to demonstrate their belief in gender equity, assimilation, and liberal democracy by renouncing certain types of dress. In Turkey the head scarf is officially banned in public settings, though the ban is not strictly enforced, and the head scarf is seen as a litmus test for one's religiosity and commitment to secularism. The method of gauging women's freedom and independence as directly proportional to how much they are covered was called into question by the mass demonstrations in 2011 in Egypt, Libya, Bahrain, and Yemen, wherein veiled and nonveiled women have played and continue to play key public roles.

Stereotypical images of women and gender in Muslim societies do little to capture their complexity or shed light on the meaning of women's increasing visibility in the public spheres for evolving understandings of Islam. Some Muslim women have become highly visible in the politics of postcolonial nation-states. The Muslim-majority countries of Indonesia, Pakistan, Bangladesh, and Turkey have democratically elected female presidents and prime ministers in the past three decades. Muslim women are also active in other political and public offices in many Muslim-majority countries. Some Muslim countries have designated a specific number of seats for women in their houses of parliament. Such countries include Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Morocco, Pakistan, and Syria.

Yet important as they are, such examples do not necessarily reflect an egalitarian shift in modern Islamic discourse. Just as patriarchal norms did not necessarily translate into the obliteration of the possibility of female leadership, observed female political and religious authority does not translate into egalitarian religious norms. However, the contrast between normative texts and social values in the modern period has led to a contestation of religious authority. In the case of gender, egalitarian social and political Muslim values are fundamentally at odds with inherited patriarchal norms. This discord gives rise to what can be called the egalitarian-authoritarian paradox. The paradox is that religious authority is gained by connecting oneself to the inherited tradition. This means that those who support a gender-egalitarian vision of Islam compromise their religious legitimacy if they break from the patriarchal tradition. However, if they root themselves in the inherited patriarchal tradition, they must compromise their commitment to gender egalitarianism and opt for the gender complementarity model at the expense of gender equality.

Muslim women are beginning to reclaim religious authority amid this dilemma by both breaking from the patriarchal tradition and simultaneously insisting on their religious legitimacy. An example of this was the 2005 mixed-gender Friday prayer led by Amina Wadud in New York City. Recognizing that leading men and women in prayer represents religious, political, and social authority, Wadud attempted to reclaim women's authority in Islam by leading men and women in ritual prayer. Although females had led the Friday prayer before, most notably in South Africa, the New York City prayer elicited responses from scholars and leaders across the globe. Most condemned the prayer, while others, such as Khaled Abou El Fadl and Abdennur Prado of the Catalonian Islamic Board, issued opinions of wholehearted support. Shaykh 'Ali Goma'a of Azhar University in Cairo issued a fatwa that appeared to support the prayer, but he later clarified that he was only recounting the positions of some historical scholars who approved of female-led prayer and that none sanctioned a woman leading the Friday prayer. Whatever the particular reactions to the prayer, the event changed the discourse of gender in Islam by forcing a conversation in liberal and conservative circles alike about female religious and political authority. Issues of women's leadership are at the heart of modern Muslim discourse in the contemporary period and will help determine the future direction of Muslim communities.

See also colonialism; fundamentalism; modernity; veil

Further Reading

N. Abbott, Two Queens of Baghdad: Mother and Wife of Harun al-Rashid, 1946; L. Ahmed, Women and Gender in Islam, 1992; K. Ali, Sexual Ethics and Islam, 2006; K. Bauer, "Debates on Women's Status as Judges and Witnesses in Post-formative Islamic Law," Journal of the American Oriental Society 130, no. 1 (2010): 1–21; J. P. Berkey, The Transmission of Knowledge in Medieval Cairo: A Social History of Islamic Education, 1992; M. Booth, May Her Likes Be Multiplied: Biography and Gender Politics in Egypt, 2001; A. Chaudhry, "The Ethics of Marital Discipline in Pre-Modern Qur'anic Exegesis," Journal of the Society of Christian Ethics 30, no. 2 (2010): 123–30; M. Fadel, "Is Historicism a Valid Strategy for Islamic Law Reform? The Case of 'Never Shall a Folk Prosper Who Have Appointed a Woman to Rule Them,'" Islamic Law and Society 18 (2011): 131–76; F. Malti-Douglas, Woman's Body, Woman's Word, 1991; F. Mernissi, Beyond the Veil: Male-Female Dynamics in Modern Muslim Society, 1987; Idem, The Forgotten Queens of Islam, 1993; R. Roded, Women and Islam in the Middle East, 2008; D. Stewart, "Women's Biographies in Islamic Societies: Mirza Abd Allah al-Isfahani's Riyad al-Ulama'," in Biography in the Middle East, edited by Louise Marlowe, forthcoming; A. Wadud, Inside the Gender Jihad: Women's Reform in Islam, 2006.

AYESHA S. CHAUDHRY

Y

Yemen

Until the republican revolution in 1962, the political history of Yemen was dominated by the Zaydi imamate. The imamate's doctrine posits a revolutionary vision of rule by any Fatimid descendant of the Prophet Muhammad who has the qualifications to become an imam and is able to rise militarily against an unjust ruler. The last Zaydi imams to rule Yemen were of the Hamid al-Din family, who adopted a monarchical form of government in the 1920s and established the Mutawakkili Kingdom of Yemen, a political order that stood in tension with traditional Zaydism that had, in theory if not always in practice, rejected dynastic kingship. Yemen's relative political isolation was broken in the first half of the 20th century when Yemenis were sent to study in Egypt and Iraq and thus were exposed to the political ideologies of Islamism and Arab nationalism, which they imported back home. In the 1940s an Algerian member of the Muslim Brotherhood, al-Fudayl al-Wartalani (d. 1959), arrived in Yemen at Hasan al-Banna's behest with the aim of spreading this movement's views. This appears to have had an effect on some Yemenis who in turn led the so-called Constitutional Revolution of 1948. Although Imam Yahya b. Muhammad Hamid al-Din was assassinated, this attempt at toppling the Hamid al-Din imams was quickly thwarted with the resumption of power by Imam Ahmad b. Yahya Hamid al-Din (d. 1962).

Nonetheless, the Muslim Brotherhood's influence and presence continued in Yemen, represented formally since 1990 by important elements within a political party called the Yemeni Congregation for Reform (al-Tajammu' al-Yamani li-l-Islah) and by ideologues such as Shaykh 'Abd al-Majid al-Zindani. The Yemeni Congregation for Reform has been in and out of power in the guise of a coalition partner in government or in opposition in parliament, and the influence of the Muslim Brotherhood on Yemen's politics has been nominal and symbolic, though it has been more significant with respect to the content of the school and university curricula.

The 1962 revolution in Yemen led to a civil war that ended in 1970 with the coming to power of a leadership (e.g., President 'Abd al-Rahman al-Iryani) that adhered to the teachings of an indigenous Salafi movement, similar in many respects, but not identical, to the teachings of the Wahhabi movement in central Arabia. Historically, the two most prominent scholars of this movement were Muhammad b. al-Amir al-San'ani (d. 1769) and Muhammad al-Shawkani (d. 1834), both of whose teachings are constitutive of the republican form of Salafism that was imposed in Yemen since the early 1970s. In terms of doctrine, this Sunni reformist movement advocated a literal interpretation and exclusive reliance on the Qur'an and sunna, shunning the taqlid (emulation) of the four established schools of law in favor of an absolute form of ijtihad (independent legal reasoning). As to theology, it rejected the Mu'tazili doctrines that the Zaydis uphold as well as their doctrine of the imamate.

By adhering to this version of Salafism, the republican leadership effectively ended their conflict with the Saudi Arabian authorities, who had supported the Hamid al-Din–led Zaydis throughout the civil war. Furthermore, this Salafism constituted an ideology that the Republicans claimed would unite Yemenis around indigenous reformist teachings that allegedly transcended sectarian identities as well as jurisprudential and legal differences. The result of this, however, was that traditional Zaydis ended up being marginalized and at times persecuted by this government-sanctioned form of Islam. The Saudi Arabian authorities welcomed this turn of events and, since the early 1970s, subsidized a parallel system of Islamic education in Yemen, the so-called Institutes of Knowledge (al-ma'ahid al-'ilmiyya), as well as sponsoring a Salafi revival in the country that had a transformative effect on the nature of religiosity and practice, in former South Yemen as well. A number of Salafi shaykhs emerged in the process, among whom Muqbil al-Wadi'i (d. 2001) was considered the most important.

The spread of Salafism, whether through Saudi Arabia's sponsorship or that of the central government in Sanaa, led to forms of resistance from some Zaydis as well as from certain Sufis from the Hadhramaut and other regions of South Yemen. While not claiming to revive the legacy and teachings of the imamate, some Zaydis engaged in political efforts to protect their heritage and identity by creating a political party called Hizb al-Haqq. Others, known as the Huthis, engaged in an armed rebellion against the central government. The Sufis, mainly of the Ba 'Alawi order, established educational institutions to preserve and spread their teachings. Among these was Habib 'Ali al-Jifri, who established an institution called the Tabah Foundation in Abu Dhabi and through which he hoped to propagate a version of Islam more ecumenical and "modern" than Salafism.

See also al-Shawkani, Muhammad b. 'Ali (1760–1834); Zaydis

Further Reading

Laurent Bonnefoy, "Salafism in Yemen: A 'Saudisation'?" in Kingdom Without Borders, edited by Madawi al-Rasheed, 2009; Paul Dresch, A History of Yemen, 2000; Bernard Haykel, Revival and Reform in Islam, 2003; Barak Salmoni, Bryce Loidolt, and Madeleine Wells, Regime and Periphery in Northern Yemen, 2010. Jillian Schwedler, Faith in Moderation, 2006.

BERNARD HAYKEL

Young Turks

The phrase "young Turks" was first used by Charles MacFarlane in 1828 to refer to the generation of young Ottomans being brought up under a Western educational system at the time. Over the ensuing 80 years, "young Turks" took on various meanings and was applied to quite diverse groups of people. In 1855, Abdolinimo Ubicini coined the phrases "jeune Turquie de Mahmoud" (young Turks of Mahmoud) and "jeune Turquie d'Abdul Medjid" (young Turks of Abdülmecid) in an attempt to describe the reforming Ottoman statesmen under Sultans Mahmud II (d. 1839) and Abdülmecid (d. 1861). Hippolyte Castile made the first use of the capitalized expression "Young Turks" in 1857, a concept that refers to a group of 19th-century Ottoman intellectuals and statesmen akin to the Giovani Italia of Mazzini. Various Ottoman sources register that several reform-minded young bureaucrats were called "jeunes" in 1861. When, in 1867, a number of leading Ottoman intellectuals fled the Ottoman capital to organize an opposition movement in Paris, the European press labeled them Young Turks.

The exiles themselves adopted this title as the name of their movement. The Egyptian prince Mustafa Fazıl, who financed the movement, used the phrase grand parti de la Jeune Turquie in his letter to the sultan inviting him to carry out extensive reforms. In their official program, these dissidents called themselves Jeune Turquie, as contrasted with the Vieux Turcs, a term they applied to the conservative statesmen of the time. In Turkish historiography, this first Ottoman opposition movement abroad is referred to as the "Young Ottoman movement."

In the 1870s, the terms "Young Turk" and "Young Turkey Party" were employed once again, especially in British and French diplomatic correspondence. This time, they referred to those statesmen and bureaucrats who promoted the constitutional regime. Following the end of the short-lived constitutional regime in 1878, the opponents of Sultan Abdülhamid II's regime came to be called Young Turks (Jön Türk in Turkish). The Ottoman Freemasons named their political branch "Committee of Young Turkey at Constantinople" in 1893. By 1895, the French publication of the main opposition organization, the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress, was published as organe de la Jeune Turquie. From this point on, the phrase "Young Turk" was used to denote Ottoman opposition organizations dominated by Muslim dissidents. Despite some confusion in the European press at the time, the term did not encompass the opposition groups formed by Armenians, Macedonians, and other non-Muslim minorities. The sultan issued an imperial decree in July 1901 banning use of the phrase "Young Turks" in official correspondence and in the press, on the grounds that it aggrandized individual opponents by according them the status of a social group. Henceforth, officials and journalists adopted the term "agitator" in place of Young Turk.

After 1908, the term fell out of use within the empire, with the exception of the names of several newspapers. However, European and American journalists and scholars continued to use the phrase to refer to the governments formed following the revolution of 1908, which reinstated the constitutional regime; this has created some confusion, since both adherents and opponents of the ruling Committee of Union and Progress had belonged to the Young Turk movement that came to an end in 1908.

The Young Turk Movement and Its Major Political Ideas

Although opposition to Abdülhamid II's (r. 1876–1909) regime started on the morrow of the dismissal of the Ottoman parliament in February 1878, for more than a decade the Young Turk movement did not go further than the publication of a few journals in Europe. In 1889, the main Young Turk organization, originally named the Ottoman Union Committee, was established in the Royal Medical Academy. The name was changed to the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress in 1895 after protracted negotiations between the original founders and Ahmed Rıza (1858–1930), a staunch positivist who proposed Auguste Comte's (1798–1857) famous dictum "Order and Progress."

Until 1902, the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress operated as an umbrella organization with various "activist" branches promoting revolutionary tactics and a branch in Cairo initially dominated by the 'ulama'. At the Congress of Ottoman Liberals, held in February 1902 in Paris, a major schism developed between the member organizations over the question of foreign intervention in the service of revolutionary change in the empire. The argument resulted in the dissolution of the Committee of Union and Progress as an alliance. The majority faction, led by the sultan's brother-in-law Mahmud Celaleddin Pasha (1843–1903), and his two sons, Sabahaddin (1879–1948) and Lutfullah Beys (1880–1973), allied itself with the Armenian and Albanian committees, and promoted the idea of a coup d'état to be carried out with British assistance. The minority splinter group, composed of the "activists" led by Ahmed Rıza, adopted a Turkist policy. They allocated a central role to ethnic Turks, as the dominant ethnic group, in the future of the empire, and categorically opposed any foreign intervention in Ottoman politics. The majority faction underwent reorganization in 1905 under the leadership of Sabahaddin Bey, who, influenced by the Science sociale movement and especially renowned French pedagogue and founder of L'École des Roches Edmond Demolins (1852–1907), advocated decentralization and private initiative. He founded the League of Private Initiative and Decentralization in that year and worked toward creating a mutual understanding with the non-Muslim organizations, especially the Armenian Revolutionary Federation (the Dashnaktsutiun).

The Turkist faction also underwent reorganization in 1905 under the leadership of Bahaeddin Şakir (1874–1922), who gave it the new name Ottoman Committee of Progress and Union (CPU). The CPU now adopted an even stronger activist agenda. In 1907, it merged with the Ottoman Freedom Society, established by army officers and bureaucrats in Salonica in 1906. This merger proved crucial for the effort to expand the influence of the movement within the Ottoman armies of European Turkey. In 1908, with the help of these armies, the Ottoman CPU carried out the constitutional revolution, which marked both the end of Abdülhamid II's regime and the terminus of the Young Turk movement.

Since members and sympathizers of organizations dominated by Muslim opponents of the sultan were all called Young Turks, the designation should not necessarily be taken to imply a shared pool of ideas. For instance, both Muslim clerics and ardent positivists worked side by side in various "Young Turk" organizations. However, many Young Turks, including the original founders of the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress, were adherents of mid-19th-century German materialism who admired the famous German popular materialist Ludwig Büchner (1824–1899). Darwinism and social Darwinism also deeply influenced many Young Turks. Several Young Turk leaders promoted positivism. Almost all members of the movement were influenced by French popular sociologist Gustave Le Bon (1841–1931) and his theories about the phenomenon of the crowd, which shaped the elitist outlook of the Young Turks.

Following the reorientation of the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress toward political activism in 1905, many of these ideas were shelved. Instead, the leaders of the movement promoted more popular ideas, such as a variant of the ideology of Ottomanism, which allocated a dominant role to the Turks in Ottoman politics and opposed European economic penetration and political intervention.

The Young Turk movement is mistakenly equated with the activities of the Committee of Union and Progress that carried out the Young Turk Revolution of 1908. European and American scholarship goes further, referring to the Ottoman Second Constitutional Period (1908–18) as the "Young Turk" era. According to the accepted view in Turkish scholarship, however, the Young Turk movement came to an end with the revolution of 1908.

See also Ottomans (1299–1924); Turkey

Further Reading

M. Şükrü Hanioğlu, Preparation for a Revolution: The Young Turks, 1902–1908, 2001; Idem, The Young Turks in Opposition, 1995; Şerif Mardin, The Genesis of Young Ottoman Thought: A Study in the Modernization of Turkish Political Ideas, 1962.

M. ŞÜKRÜ HANIOĞLU

Zahiris

The Zahiris (Ẓāhiriyya) were a literalist school of law established by Dawud b. ʿAli b. Khalaf al-Isfahani (d. 884) in Iraq. It claimed adherents among not only common believers but also a number of prominent theologians, jurists, hadith anthologists, and mystics such as Ibn al-ʿArabi (d. 1240). Its teachings spread into Central Asia, Iran, Sindh, Oman, and Andalusia, where an Almohad-championed movement against the Malikis brought the Zahiri school to its peak of influence during the 12th and 13th centuries. However, the school's influence in Andalus and elsewhere declined with the fall of the Almohads, and by the 16th century it had practically died out.

The prominent Andalusian scholar Ibn Hazm (d. 1064) codified Zahiri doctrines, and his surviving works represent our primary source of information for the school. Ibn Hazm categorically rejected the use of individual judgment (raʾy) and analogical reasoning (qiyās) in the juridical process and went so far as to favor a weak hadith over qiyās in his legal method. He considered the literal (ẓāhir) sense of the text to be legitimate only in determining whether an act fell under one of the five legal categories—namely, (1) obligatory, (2) recommendable, (3) permissible, (4) reprehensible, and (5) forbidden. In practice, Zahiri jurists did yield to practical pressure by applying qiyās, though overall their literalism gave rise to a relatively simpler jurisprudence.

Ibn Hazm's reasoning with regard to commodities that are subject to usury is emblematic of the Zahiri spirit. The analogical Maliki and Hanafi schools, for instance, understand the commodities subject to the practice of usury in hadith literature—gold, silver, wheat, barley, dates, and raisins—to represent larger classes of goods to which usury applies. Bearing in mind the legal cause (ʿilla) behind the prohibition of usury, and making use of qiyās, these schools extend the religious proscription of usury to include commodities that the Prophet did not originally stipulate. Ibn Hazm, acknowledging only the literal import of sacred texts, forbids the practice of usury only with regard to the six commodities mentioned by the Prophet and contends that the extrapolations of the other schools amount to speculative arbitrariness. Underlying this position is the understanding that juridical rulings are uniquely determined by God's unrestricted and unfathomable will and not some motive that we can grasp. Had it been divinely willed that usury should be forbidden with regard to other articles, the Qur'an or hadith would have made it explicit.

Zahiri hostility toward the prevailing schools of law, especially the Hanafi and Maliki ones, is evident in Ibn Hazm's uncompromising scripturalism. Moreover, in advocating the Zahiri cause, Ibn Hazm denounced uninformed imitation of a school or religious authority (taqlīd). He understood the legal principle of scholarly consensus (ijmāʿ) to mean the consensus of the Prophet's Companions (ṣaḥāba) only, and not that of later learned jurists in general. He argued that after the Companions' death, the jurists became so widespread and numerous that determining their consensus was impossible. Finally, it should be noted that Ibn Hazm applied Zahiri principles to Qur'anic sciences and theology as well, though he was unable to establish those domains as essential to the school.

See also Almohads (1130–1269); Ibn Hazm (994–1064); jurisprudence; shariʿa

Further Reading

Camilla Adang, Beginnings of the Zahiri Madhhab in al-Andalus, in P. Bearman, R. Peters, and F. Vogel, The Islamic Schools of Law, 2005; Ignaz Goldziher, The Ẓāhirīs: Their Doctrine and Their History, A Contribution to the History of Islamic Theology, translated by Wolfgang Behn, 1971; Abdel-Magid Turki, "al-Ẓāhiriyya," in Encyclopaedia of Islam, 2nd ed., edited by P. Bearman, T. Bianquis, C. E. Bosworth, E. van Donzel, and W. P. Heinrichs, 2010; Idem, Polémiques entre Ibn Ḥazm et Bâgî sur les principes de le loi musulmane, 1976.

YOUSEF CASEWIT

al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)

The radical Egyptian Islamist Ayman al-Zawahiri was born in Cairo on June 19, 1951, to Dr. Muhammad Rabie al-Zawahiri and Umayma ʿAzzam. The Zawahiri and ʿAzzam families enjoyed an aristocratic rank in Egyptian society that included physicians, university professors, and high-ranking religious and political notables. Zawahiri was raised in Maʿadi, an upper-class suburb south of Cairo, where he was exposed at an early age to a broad range of different political currents and ideologies. Throughout his life, he was an active member and chief ideologue of a number of different violent political organizations, including Egyptian Islamic Jihad and al-Qaeda.

Zawahiri was introduced to the ideas of Sayyid Qutb, the infamous ideologue of the Muslim Brotherhood whose work Milestones has been regarded as a blueprint for transnational Islamic militancy, through his maternal uncle Mahfouz 'Azzam, who himself served as Qutb's personal lawyer and trusted confidant. Qutb's assassination in 1966, which had a deep effect on Zawahiri, contributed in part to Zawahiri's active involvement, at the early age of 15, in a clandestine militant cell that sought to overthrow the Egyptian government and pursue a model of Islamic governance. The cell matured in 1974, as Zawahiri was finishing his medical education, when it converged with other similar militant networks that together later formed the Egyptian Islamic Jihad. Then named simply al-Jihad, the group was under the direct leadership of 'Abd al-Salam al-Faraj, who, along with Khaled Islambouli, was directly responsible for the assassination of Egyptian president Anwar al-Sadat in 1981.

Zawahiri was one of over three hundred defendants tried for conspiracy in the assassination. The trial lasted three years and resulted in Zawahiri's release, after he was charged and convicted of illegal weapons possession. He emerged from his prison experience as an articulate voice for the militants and eventually assumed leadership of the Egyptian Islamic Jihad. Zawahiri left Egypt for Saudi Arabia in 1985, where he practiced medicine in Jeddah. Shortly after, he arrived in Afghanistan in order to contribute to the jihad against the Soviet invasion taking place there. In fact, Zawahiri had already been exposed to the Afghan jihad effort through two trips to Pakistan in 1980 and 1981, where he had offered medical services to Afghan refugees under the auspices of the Red Crescent. The return to Afghanistan in 1986 provided the opportunity for Zawahiri to cultivate a relationship with Osama bin Laden.

As the Afghan-Soviet struggle subsided, Zawahiri, along with Bin Laden, sought refuge in Sudan under the patronage of Hasan al-Turabi and established operational bases between Khartoum and Yemen. However, in 1996 Zawahiri, members of Islamic Jihad, and Bin Laden's group were expelled from Sudan after the failed assassination attempt on the Egyptian president Husni Mubarak a year earlier. Zawahiri and Bin Laden both found refuge in Afghanistan, then under the control of the Taliban. The alliance between the two leaders strengthened, and they issued a joint fatwa (religious opinion) in 1998 under the auspices of the "World Islamic Front against Jews and Crusaders," which served as a virtual declaration of war against the United States and its allies. By this point Zawahiri's organization, Egyptian Islamic Jihad, had formally merged with Bin Laden's al-Qaeda. Zawahiri was tried in 1999 in absentia and sentenced to death by an Egyptian court in what has come to be known as the Returnees from Albania case.

Until Bin Laden's death in 2011, Zawahiri was seen as the strategic and operational commander of al-Qaeda by most global intelligence services. On June 16, 2011, Zawahiri was announced as the new head of al-Qaeda by the organization's consultative assembly. At the time of writing he was under worldwide sanctions by the United Nations, and there was a $25 million bounty for him from the United States. His whereabouts are unknown, but he is largely believed to be in hiding in Pakistan's Federally Administered Tribal Areas in the northwest of the country.

Zawahiri assumed the role of unofficial spokesman of radical political Islam since his imprisonment in the 1980s. His writings and proclamations are voluminous and extensive. One of the most important ideological statements he authored is a polemical history of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt titled The Bitter Harvest: The Brotherhood in Sixty Years (1991). Part history, part intra-Islamist critique, the text scorns the official policies and leadership of the Brotherhood since its founding up to the present. He condemns the Brotherhood's alleged collusion with Egypt's successive secular governments in the 20th century as well as its recognition of, and participation in, secular governing institutions such as representative parliament and elections. He praises Sayyid Qutb and other members of the Brotherhood who did not follow the official line of the Brotherhood as the true representatives of Islamic political action. In The Bitter Harvest, Zawahiri increasingly deploys, even if implicitly, the rhetoric of takfir (excommunication), which in his theological apparatus legitimates violent action.

In addition to hundreds of speeches, pamphlets, and short treatises, he wrote a memoir titled Knights under the Prophet's Banner (2001), which provides detail on the formation and development of Islamic Jihad in Egypt and its later convergence with al-Qaeda. At the same time it condemns other Islamist activists for not pursuing the path of violent action he advocates. One of his targets of criticism, Muntasir al-Zayyat, a prominent Islamist lawyer and former cell mate of Zawahiri's, wrote a critical biography of Zawahiri in 2002, Ayman al-Zawahiri as I Knew Him. Together, the two texts provide some of the most important primary material on the evolution of Egyptian Islamic radicalism.

In order to gain an appreciation of Zawahiri's rhetorical and theological appeal, it is important to read Zawahiri's writings in light of the classic Islamic exegetical and legal traditions. A cursory look at one example is revealing; consider the treatise "Loyalty and Enmity: An Inherited Doctrine and Lost Reality" (Al-Wala' wa-l-Bara': 'Aqida Manqula wa-Waqi' Mafqud), written in 2002.

In the first section of the text Zawahiri provides the theological and legal justification for the doctrine of loyalty and enmity, which mandates Muslims to commit socially and politically to the worldwide Muslim community (umma) over and against any association with non-Muslims. He begins with the Qur'anic verse, "Let not the believers take for friends or helpers unbelievers rather than believers: whoever does this shall have no relationship left with Allah—unless you but guard yourselves against them, taking precautions. But Allah cautions you to fear Himself. For the final goal is to Allah" (Q. 3:28). He invokes this verse in order to describe a permanent mode of tension between Muslims and non-Muslims, which may be marked by outright warfare (jihad), cordial demeanor, or dissimulation (taqiyya), depending on context. Zawahiri grounds the treatise in the Qur'an, hadith, and quotes from prominent scholars ('ulama') from the classical tradition, which together rhetorically function to promote a sense of undisputed orthodoxy. For example, he begins with the tenth-century Muslim polymath Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923), who is recognized by many Muslims as Sunni Muslim par excellence. He then draws upon Ibn Taymiyya's

(d. 1328) ideas, which have been used by modern radicals to justify their violent positions against secular Muslim rulers. However, throughout the text he weaves together statements and opinions of classical scholars across centuries of Islamic intellectual history. The cumulative rhetorical effect is to create the semblance of an undeniable historical consensus, to which only Zawahiri and his allies remain loyal.

In the second section of the text, Zawahiri discusses the relevance of the doctrine of loyalty and enmity to the contemporary political context and identifies those who have "deviated" from the mandate. His first target of criticism is the entire "clique" of Muslim rulers who "have placed their armies into the service of the new Crusading campaign against the Islamic umma" (Zawahiri, 2002, 101). He then identifies state-sponsored 'ulama' (scholars) and lay intellectuals as the "rulers' henchmen." He calls them the "Sultan's ulema" who "sign fatwas delivered from the palace, to legitimize this seizure, this pillaging, this Crusader overlordship" (106). He holds this class responsible for "distracting" the youth from their true religious duty of jihad.

The repeated reference to medieval images such as the Crusades or the invading Mongols paints a picture that the majority of contemporary Muslims are out of step with their "heritage." Zawahiri uses this trope effectively. At one point he asks rhetorically, "So, what would al-Tabari, Ibn Hazam, and Ibn Taymiyya say if they were made witness to American planes, troops, and their allies launching off from the [Arabian] Gulf to strike Muslims in Iraq?" (Zawahiri, 2002, 92). Zawahari's recourse to the imagery and symbolism of a mythical Islamic imperial past is one of the cornerstones of his rhetorical allure. Deeper analysis of Zawahiri's writings in the context of classical Islamic theological and legal traditions will likely reveal more about the ideological and aesthetic appeal of his message.

See also Egypt; fundamentalism; jihad; al-Qaeda

Further Reading

Nimrod Raphaeli, "Ayman Muhammad Rabi' al-Zawahiri: The Making of an Arch Terrorist," Terrorism and Political Violence 14, no. 4 (2002); Ibrahim Raymond, The Al-Qaeda Reader, 2007; Lawrence Wright, The Looming Tower: Al-Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, 2006; Ayman Zawahiri, "Loyalty and Enmity," in The Al-Qaeda Reader, translated by Raymond Ibrahim, 2002; Montasser al-Zayyat, The Road to al-Qaeda: The Story of Bin Laden's Right-Hand Man, 2004.

ABBAS BARZEGAR

Zaydis

The Zaydis, Twelvers, and Isma'ilis form the major contemporary Shi'i communities. In 2010 there were approximately 13 million Zaydis worldwide, with the greatest number in northern Yemen, which served as the bastion for a Zaydi state from 897 until the republican revolution of 1962. Shorter-lived Zaydi states also existed in Iran and North Africa. Zaydism goes back to the failed uprising in 740 of Zayd b. 'Ali, the great-great-grandson of the Prophet Muhammad. Zayd's revolt against the Umayyad regime set the pattern for further Zaydi insurgencies against the Umayyads and Abbasids, and Zayd became the symbol of the revolutionary movement within Shi'ism.

The Zaydis are commonly said to stand closest to Sunnism of all the Shi'i groups, and in some sense this is true, particularly with respect to the question, critical to Shi'ism, of the imamate, the succession to Muhammad. The qualifications of legal learning, masculine gender, physical integrity, moral character, and courage required of Zaydi imams mirror those set down by Sunni jurists for the caliph, with the important difference that the Zaydis require descent on the father's side from one of Muhammad's grandsons, Hasan and Husayn. Once in office, the Zaydi imams, like the Sunni caliphs, are regarded primarily as administrators rather than inspired religious teachers. (According to Zaydis, only 'Ali and his two sons, Hasan and Husayn, whom they regard as infallible, were directly appointed imams by Muhammad.) The path to office is another matter. While Sunni caliphs are elected by representatives of the umma (community of believers), the Zaydi imam elects himself, in the sense that a candidate for the imamate decides whether he is under a religious obligation to assert his claim, and political success or failure does not settle the matter. Rule does not make an unqualified candidate imam, and the rightful imam retains his office even when the people fail to support him as they are obligated to do. Some of the most highly respected Zaydi imams in fact have devoted far more time to scholarship than to governance.

Zaydi theorists generally regard the question of which rival claimant, if any, is the rightful imam as admitting of an unambiguous answer, known to God, but not necessarily to the rival claimants themselves, their contemporaries, or later Zaydis. It is thus not possible to draw up an uncontroversial list of Zaydi imams. In theory Zaydi imams, apart from their lineage, are self-made men, although de facto dynastic succession was not entirely foreign to Zaydi history, and in 1926 the Zaydi imamate in Yemen officially became a monarchy.

The Zaydi imam is invested with enormous authority. Unlike other legal scholars, he can at his discretion give his determinations the binding force of law, a principle that extends even to determining the framework of the imamate itself. Zaydi imams act as constitutional framers, legislators, judges of last resort, and commanders in chief. Among the prerogatives of the imam are the imposition of the hudūd punishments, the collection of Islamic taxes, and the use of coercive measures to insure compliance with affirmative religious duties such as prayer.

Although Zaydi doctrine holds that there will always be a qualified candidate for the imamate, circumstances may make a claim to office untimely. In such cases the community may find itself headed by a so-called muhtasib, who need not meet all the requirements of an imam such as prophetic descent. Like the imam, the muhtasib is charged with "commanding right and forbidding wrong" but outside of warfare is restricted in his use of force to averting wrongs, not to the enforcing of positive duties.

For some centuries Zaydism suffered significant erosion, as a number of influential thinkers abandoned Zaydism for Sunnism. The best known of these are Muhammad b. Isma'il al-San'ani (d. 1769), Muhammad b. 'Ali al-Shawkani (d. 1834), and more recently Muqbil al-Wadi'i (d. 2001). In addition to a scathing critique from within, Zaydism has suffered inroads from Wahhabism. After the 1962 Yemeni revolution, traditional Zaydis found themselves marginalized by the state, when not in armed opposition to it, as in the case of the so-called Huthi rebellion that began in 2004. Since the mid-1990s, there has been a noteworthy political and intellectual resurgence of Zaydism, including a lively debate on the future of the imamate.

See also imamate; al-Shawkani, Muhammad b. 'Ali (1760–1834); Shi'ism; Yemen

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Bernard Haykel, Revival and Reform in Islam: The Legacy of Muhammad al-Shawkani, 2003; Wilferd Madelung, Der Imam al-Qāsim ibn Ibrāhīm und die Glaubenslehre der Zaiditen, 1965.

ARON ZYSOW

Zia-ul-Haq (1924–88)

General Zia-ul-Haq (1924–88) was president of Pakistan from 1978 until his death under mysterious circumstances in a plane crash on August 17, 1988.

Born in 1924, Zia-ul-Haq fought in the Indian army during World War II and subsequently rose through the ranks of the Pakistani military, eventually being appointed Joint Services Chief of Staff under Prime Minister Zulfikar 'Ali Bhutto in 1976. On July 5, 1977, Zia-ul-Haq overthrew Bhutto in a coup code-named Operation Fair Play, exploiting widespread public sentiment that Bhutto's Pakistan People's Party (PPP) had rigged the March 1977 elections.

Zia wasted no time in promoting himself as an Islamically guided leader. He met publicly with Mawdudi and worked to garner the support of Mawdudi's party, the Jama'at-i Islami. Zia would later benefit politically from the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in December 1979. After that invasion Mawdudi preached a legitimate jihad against the Soviet state, and Zia threw his support behind the Afghani mujahidin (the loose array of fighters who went out for jihad against the Soviet armies).

The legal "Islamization" of Pakistan was already well under way before Zia took office. Islam was declared to be the "state religion" of Pakistan in the Constitution of 1973 and required, among other things, certain officials to take an oath affirming the finality of Muhammad's prophethood. The following year, Bhutto amended the constitution to declare the Ahmadis non-Muslims. In 1977 Bhutto also banned alcohol, gambling, and nightclubs, partly to appease the Jama'at-i Islami, who were critical of his administration.

While Bhutto likely sought to conciliate his critics, it is generally believed that Zia's efforts to integrate shari'a-based regulations into every aspect of Pakistani law and society were genuine rather than merely political calculations. Zia declared in 1978 that Pakistan's laws would be thereafter based on Niẓām-i Muṣṭafā, the "system of the Prophet." He set up a Federal Shari'at Court in 1978 and a special bench of the Supreme Court that could challenge the shari'a compliance of previous legislation. In 1979 he imposed Islamic laws for the punishment of crimes including drinking alcohol, theft, prostitution, adultery, and bearing false witness. In 1980 Zia began the Islamization of Pakistan's economy, introducing the government collection of zakat (alms tax) and 'ushr (the land tax).

On April 26, 1984, Zia amended the Pakistan Penal Code to forbid Ahmadis from calling themselves Muslims. Strong opposition to the Ahmadis had been a staple policy of Mawdudi's Jama'at-i Islami since its inception. However, tensions between Zia and the Jama'at arose in 1985, when Zia organized elections for national and provincial assemblies and sought the support of the Muslim League. The Jama'at then accused him of pressing Islam into the service of political ends. Elections proceeded smoothly, and 1988 saw Zia at the height of his power, when his support for the Afghan mujahidin paid off with the Soviet defeat in April. Then, in May 1988, Zia abruptly dissolved the National Assembly and his cabinet, accusing them of impeding the Islamization process; and on June 15, 1988, he promulgated the Enforcement of Shariat Ordinance to counteract what he perceived as impediments to implementing shari'a. This was one of the last acts in Zia's Islamization agenda before his death the following August.

See also Jama'at-i Islami; Pakistan

Further Reading

Khalid Mahmud 'Arif, Working with Zia: Pakistan's Power Politics, 1977–88, 1995; Shahid Javed Burki and Craig Baxter, eds., Pakistan under the Military: Eleven Years of Zia ul-Haq, 1991; Seyyed Vali Reza Nasr, The Vanguard of the Islamic Revolution: The Jama'at Islami of Pakistan, 1994; Lawrence Ziring, "Public Policy Dilemmas and Pakistan's Nationality Problem: The Legacy of Zia ul-Haq." Asian Survey 28, no. 8 (1988).

BRANNON INGRAM

Index

Main articles are indicated by bold page numbers.

A'azz ma Yutlab (The most precious that is sought after) (Ibn Tumart), 242
Abu Island, 323
'Abbas b. 'Abd al-Muttalib
  Abbasids and, 2
  Abu Bakr and, 13
  Muhammad and, 369
Abbas Hilmi II, 12
'Abbas I (Safavid ruler), 1. See also Iran; Safavids
  astrology and, 47
  Mir Damad and, 47, 348
  Safavids and, 47, 481
Abbasids, 1–2. See also Baghdad; Umayyads
  'Abd al-Hamid and, 2
  abdication and, 7–8
  Abu Yusuf and, 15–16
  administrative system of government and, 204
  authority and, 51–52
  Buyids and, 79
  caliphal succession and, 84 coinage and, 102
  commerce and, 553
  constitutionalism and, 112 courts and, 286
  genealogy and, 190
  Ghazali and, 191
  governance and, 197
  government and, 202
  holy places and, 221
  household and, 224
  human rights and, 226
  imamate and, 248
  international relations and, 258
  jihad and, 277
  jizya and, 283
  judges and, 285
  judicial function of government and, 203
  Kharijis and, 294
  libertarianism and, 317
  Mahdi and, 323
  Malik b. Anas and, 326
  Ma'mun and, 328–329
  Mawardi and, 331
  messianism and, 338
  monarchy and, 361
  Mu'tazilis and, 383
  oath of allegiance and, 401
  police and, 427
  propaganda and, 431
  revolution and, 471
  Shi'ism and, 511
  succession and, 525–526
  Sufism and, 528
  Syria and, 537
  trade and, 553
  Transoxiana and, 561
  'ulama' and, 575
  usurpation and, 583
'Abd al-'Aziz Al Sa'ud. See Ibn Sa'ud
'Abd al-'Aziz b. Baz, 486
'Abd al-Bari, Mawlana, Khilafat movement and, 295
'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib b. Yahya al-'Amiri, 2–3. See also Ibn al-Muqaffa'; Mirrors for Princes; Umayyads advice and, 16
  caliphate and, 85
'Abd al-Hamid b. Badis. See Ibn Badis
'Abd al-Jabbar on miracles, 433
al-Mughni fi Abwab al-Tawhid wa-l-'Adl (The chapters on God's oneness and justice), 176
  Sharh al-Usul al-Khamsa (Commentary on the five fundamental principles), 433
  Tathbit Dala'il al-Nubuwwa (Confirming the evidences of prophecy), 434
'Abd al-Jabbar, al-Qadi, 176
  al-Mughni fi Abwab al-Tawhid wa-l-'Adl (The chapters on God's oneness and justice), 176
'Abd al-Karim, Khalil, 469
'Abdallah b. 'Umar, 109
'Abdallah b. 'Abbas
  in Battle of the Camel, 109
  government and, 199
'Abdallah b. al-Hasan, 326
'Abdallah b. al-Mubarak. See Ibn al-Mubarak
'Abdallah b. al-Muqaffa'. See Ibn al-Muqaffa'
'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr. See Ibn al-Zubayr
'Abdallah b. Jahsh, 82
'Abdallah b. Mas'ud, 161
'Abdallah b. Qadi 'Abd al-Salam, 518
'Abdallah b. Saba', 584
'Abdallah b. Ubayy, hypocrisy and, 228
'Abdallah b. 'Umar al-Baydawi, 161
'Abdallah b. Wahb. See Ibn Wahb
'Abdallah b. Yasin al-Jazuli, 35
'Abdallah b. Yazid b. Hurmuz, 326
'Abdallah II (king of Jordan), 284
'Abd al-Mahalli, Dan Fodio and, 125
'Abd al-Majid II (Ottoman sultan), 82
'Abd al-Malik b. Marwan
  coinage and, 102
  Companions of the Prophet and, 109 in history of caliphates, 81 Mecca siege and, 100
  pilgrimage and, 417
  'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz and, 579
  Umayyads and, 582
'Abd al-Mu'min
  Almohads and, 34
  Ibn Tumart and, 242
'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri, 3–4. See also Algeria; North Africa colonialism in Algeria and, 103–104
  in North Africa, 397
'Abd al-Qahir al-Jurjani, masses and, 330–331
'Abd al-Rahman b. Muljam al-Muradi, 8, 365
'Abd al-Raziq, 'Ali, 5–7
  on caliphate, 85
  government and, 205
  international relations and, 259 al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm (Islam and the principles of governance), 5–6, 85, 243, 490 jurisprudence and, 290
  liberalism of, 315
  reform and, 469
  secularism and, 490
'Abd al-Razzaq b. Hammam al-San'ani, 402 abdication, 7–8

'Abd Shams, 365, 456
'Abduh, Muhammad, 8–9 authority in thought of, 55
  colonialism and, 104
  Constitution of Medina and, 116
  education and, 146
  government and, 199
  ideology of, 243
  ijtihād and, 245
  jāhiliyya and, 269
  jurisprudence and, 289
  modernity and, 358
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
  Rashid Rida and, 472
  reform and, 467
  republicanism and, 462
  revolution and, 471
  Risalat al-Tawhid (The Theology of Unity), 9, 467
  Salafis and, 484
  slavery and, 515
  Westernization and, 594
Abdülhamid II (Ottoman sultan), 9, 10–11
  Afghani and, 18
  astrology and, 46
  community and, 108
  nationalism and, 386
  Nursi and, 482
  Pan-Islamism and, 516
  solidarity and, 516
'Abdullahi (Dan Fodio's brother), 125
Abel, 396
ABIM. See Malaysian Islamic Youth Movement (ABIM) abodes, 11–12
abolition, 515 Abraham, 178, 370, 372
absolutism, 12–13
Abu 'Abdallah al-Qurtubi. See al-Qurtubi, Abu 'Abdallah
Abu 'Abdallah al-Shi'i, 172
Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. al-Abbar. See Ibn al-Abbar
Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. Battuta. See Ibn Battuta
Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. Karram. See Ibn Karram Abu 'Abd al-Rahman al-Sulami. See Sulami, Abu 'Abd al-Rahman
Abu al-Barakat b. al-Anbari, 394
  Asrar al-'Arabiyya (The secrets of Arabic), 394
  Tabaqat al-Udaba' (The classes of literary men), 394
Abu al-Fadl Muhammad b. Husayn al-Bayhaqi absolutism and, 12
  monarchy and, 361
Abu al-Hasan al-'Amiri
  monarchy and, 361
  religious knowledge and, 308
Abu al-Hasan 'Ali al-Mawardi. See Mawardi
Abu al-Hudhayl al-'Allaf, 176
Abu 'Ali al-Hasan b. 'Ali al-Tusi. See Nizam al-Mulk
Abu 'Ali al-Husayn b. Muhammad b. al-Farra'. See Ibn al-Farra' Abu 'Ali b. Sina. See Ibn Sina Abu al-Kalam Azad
  in India, 253
  Khilafat movement and, 295
Abu al-Majd, on elections, 148, 149
Abu al-Qasim 'Ali b. al-Husayn. See Ibn al-Muslima
Abu al-Qasim 'Ali b. al-Sayrafi. See Ibn al-Sayrafi
Abu al-Su'ud, 292, 509–510
Abu al-Tufayl 'Amir b. Wathila, Companions of the Prophet and, 109
Abu al-Walid Muhammad b. Rushd. See Ibn Rushd Abu 'Amir, 374
Abu Bakr, 13–14 caliphate and, 'Abd al-Raziq on, 5, 7 election of, 84, 148
  hadith and, 214
  in history of caliphate, 81, 82
  Muhammad and, 371
  nonviolence and, 396
  Rightly Guided Caliphate and, 473
  Shafi'i and, 491
  Shi'i Islam and, 110 title of, 82 treason and, 562
  'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Abu Bakr al-Shashi, 394
Abu Bakr b. al-'Arabi, 524
Abu Bakr b. Mas'ud al-Kashani, 430–431
Abu Bakr b. Mujahid, 450
Abu Bakr Mubarak b. Mubarak b. Sa'id al-Wajih b. al-Dahhan al-Wasiti, 394
Abu Bakr Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Muhammad b. Tufayl. See Ibn Tufayl
Abu Bakr Muhammad b. Bajja. See Ibn Bajja
Abu Bilal Mirdas b. Udayya, Ibadis and, 230 Abu Dawud
  hadith and, 211
  reform and, 465
Abu Dharr al-Ghifari, the God-Worshipping Socialist (Shari'ati), 505
Abu Dharr al-Ghifari, 110, 505
Abu Dharr Collective, 316
Abu Faris, 'Abd al-Qadir, 332
Abu Hamza al-Mukhtar b. 'Awf, freedom and, 175
Abu Hanifa, 14–15
  Abu Yusuf and, 15
  al-Fiqh al-Absat (The plainest law), 14
  Friday prayer and, 177
  Shaybani and, 507
  'ulama' and, 575
Abu Hashim al-Jubba'i, 176
Abu Hayyan. See al-Tawhidi, Abu Hayyan
Abu Ishaq Ahmad b. Muhammad b. Ibrahim al-Tha'labi, 161
Abu Ja'far b. Jarir al-Tabari. See Tabari Abu Ja'far Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Tusi. See al-Tusi, Muhammad b. al-Hasan Abu Lahab, 167, 369, 370–371
Abu Madyan, 524
Abu Mansur al-Jawaliqi al-Mu'arrab (Lexicon of Arabicized words), 394
  Nizamiyya and, 394
Abu Muhammad 'Ali b. Hazm. See Ibn Hazm
Abu Musa al-Ash'ari, 109
Abu Mus'ab al-Suri, 546
Abu Nasr al-Farabi. See al-Farabi, Abu Nasr
Abu Nasr b. al-Sabbagh
  Nizamiyya and, 394
  al-Shamil (The comprehensive work), 394
Abu Nuwas, 254
Abu Sa'id
  Dawani and, 126
  Ilkhanids and, 247
  Mongols and, 362
Abu Sayyaf, 546
Abu Sufyan
  Battle of the Camel and, 109
  Mu'awiya and, 365
Abu Talib, 167, 369
Abu Tammam, 394
Abu 'Ubayda b. al-Jarrah
  as companion of the Prophet, 109
  'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 109, 581

Abu 'Ubayd al-Qasim b. Sallam, consensus and, 110
Abu Ya'la b. al-Farra'. See Ibn al-Farra' Abu Ya'qub Yusuf b. Tashfin, Ibn Rushd and, 236 Abu Yusuf, 15–16
  caliphate and, 85
  on custom, 123
  government and, 199
  Ikhtilaf Abi Hanifa wa-Ibn Abi Layla (The disagreement of Abu Hanifa and Ibn Abi Layla), 15
  jihad and, 276
  judicial functions of government and, 203
  Kitab al-Athar (The book of traditions), 15
  Kitab al-Hiyal (Book of stratagems), 15
  Kitab al-Kharaj (The book of the land tax), 15 al-Radd 'ala Siyar al-Awza'i (Refutation of the moral teachings of al-Awza'i), 15
  Shaybani and, 507
Abu Yusuf Ya'qub al-Mansur
  Almohads and, 34
  Ibn Rushd and, 236
Abu Zahra, 456
Abu Zakariyya al-Tibrizi, 394
Abu Zayd, Nasr Hamid, 160, 469
Abyssinia, 370 academies, 145. See also education Academy of Damascus, 537
Aceh, 520, 521
Achaemenid, 492
Active Intellect, 378 activism, 446–447, 536 adab (belles lettres), 349
Adab al-Harb wa-l-Shaja'a (The manners of war and of fortitude) (Muhammad b. Mansur), 252
Adab al-Katib (Instruction for the secretary) (Ibn Qutaybu), 394
Adam, 371, 452
'Adawi order, 343
'Adi b. Ka'b, 'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
'Adi b. Musafir, 343 administrative system, 204
'Adud al-Dawla, 79, 492 adultery, 438 advice (nasiha), 16–17, 349 Advisory Council for Islamic Theology, 458 advocacy, legal, 207
Afdal b. Badr al-Jamali, Nizaris and, 395 al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din, 17–19
  'Abduh, Muhammad and, 8
  Abdülhamid II and, 10
  on colonialism, 104 community in, 108
  fundamentalism and, 182
  ideology of, 243
  in India, 252
  Iqbal and, 260
  liberation theology and, 316
  modernity and, 358
  nationalism and, 386
  republicanism and, 462
  revolution and, 471
  solidarity and, 516
  Westernization and, 594
Afghanistan, 19–21
  Barelwis in, 64
  Bin Laden in, 69, 442
  Ghaznavids and, 192
  insurgency in, 541–542
  jizya in, 283
  madrasas in, 321–322
  Mulla 'Umar and, 379–380
  propaganda in, 432
  al-Qaeda and, 442
  Safavids and, 481
  shari'a in, 379
  Taliban in, 541–542
  United States and, 380, 541
  Zawahiri and, 604
  Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Afghan Services Bureau, 442
'Aflaq, Michel, 21–22
  Fi Sabil al-Ba'th (For the cause of the Ba'th), 22
  nationalism and, 387
  socialism and, 515
Africa. See East Africa; North Africa; South Africa; West Africa; specific countries
African Americans
  Elijah Muhammad and, 376
  Malcolm X and, 325–326
  Mohammed, W. D. and, 360
  Nation of Islam and, 388–389, 398–399
African National Congress (ANC), 519
Afro-Descendant Upliftment Society, 360
Aga Khan, 22–23
Aga Khan II, 22
Aga Khan III, 22–23, 395
Aga Khan IV, Prince Karim, 22, 23, 395
Agha Muhammad, 443
Aghaz-u Anjam (The origins and the final destinations) (Ibn Sina), 570
Aghlabids, 172
Agra (place), 60
Agung of Mataram, 520 al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government) (Ibn al-Farra'), 332 al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government) (Mawardi), 85, 118, 198, 199, 313, 331–332, 460, 547
Ahl al-Sunna wa-l-Jama'a (The People of Tradition and the Community), 121
Ahmad, Dipti Nazir, 32
Ahmad, Israr, 23–24
  Islamic Renaissance: The Real Task Ahead, 23 Obligations Muslims Owe to the Qur'an, 23 Ahmad, Nizaris and, 395
Ahmad, Qazi Hussain, 272
Ahmad al-Rumi al-Aqhisari, Ibn Taymiyya and, 241 Ahmad b. Hanbal, 24–25
  Ash'aris and, 44
  Baghdad and, 61
  commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105 consensus and, 110
  dissent and, 134
  ijtihad and, 244
  Ikhtilaf al-Fuqaha' (The differing legal opinions of the jurists), 110–111
  inquisition and, 255
  jihad and, 278
  Kitab al-Zuhd (On renunciation), 24
  Ma'mun and, 328
  Musnad, 24, 211
  al-Qaeda and, 442
  as shaykh al-Islam, 509
Ahmad b. Ibrahim, Imam, 155
Ahmad b. Ibrahim b. al-Nahhas, Mashari' al-Ashwaq (The wellsprings of longing), 329 Ahmad b. Idris, 397
Ahmadis, 25–26
Ahmad Sirhindi, Shaykh, 26–27
  Maktubat-i Imam-i Rabbani (Letters of the divine guide), 26
Ahmadzai, President Najibullah, 379
Ahmed Bey, slavery and, 515
Ahmed b. Husam al-Din al-Amasi, 403
Ahmed Aşikpaşazade, 403
Ahmedinejad, Mahmoud, 309, 585

al-Ahsa'i, Shaykh Ahmad
Afghani and, 17
source of emulation and, 517
AIDS, 516–517
'A'isha, 27–28, 596
Battle of the Camel and, 100
Companions of the Prophet and, 109
freedom and, 175
'A'isha 'Abd al-Rahman, 598
Ait Atta, 108
Akbar the Great, 28
authority and, 54
Delhi and, 127
Delhi Sultanate and, 128
in history of caliphate, 81
Akhbaris, 517
Akhbari-Usuli conflict
ijtihād and, 245
source of emulation and, 517
al-Akhdi, Mirza 'Ali, 495
Akhis, 93, 209
Akhlaq-i Humayuni (The Humayunian ethics) (Husayni), 252
Akhlaq-i Jalali (The Jalalian ethics) (Dawani), 126
Akhlaq-i Muhsin (The ethics of Muhsin) (Kashifi), 254
Akhlaq-i Nasiri (The Nasirean Ethics) (Tusi), 126, 252, 570
Akhlaq/Mathalib al-Wazirayn (The slanders of the two viziers) (Tawhidi), 544
Akhtar, Shabbir, liberation theology and, 316
AK Party. See Justice and Development Party (AK Party)
Al al-Shaykh, Muhammad b. Ibrahim, 486
Alamut, 395
'Alawis, 29
in East Africa, 141
in Muslim demographics, 130
in Turkey, 569
Al Bu Sa'idi dynasty, 141 alcohol
Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214 punishment for, 438
Aleppo, 96, 537
Alevis conversion of, 119
heresy and, 218
Alfarabius. See Farabi
Alfieri, Vittorio, 12
Algeria, 29–30
'Abd al-Qadir and, 3
Berbers and, 68
colonialism in, 103–104
communism in, 106
Ibn Khaldun in, 236
Ali, A. Yusuf, jāhiliyya and, 269 Ali, Kecia, 317
'Ali, Sayyid Ameer
slavery and, 515
Spirit of Islam, 279
'Ali, Shaukat, 295
Al-i Ahmad, Jalal. See Jalal Al-i Ahmad
'Ali al-Rida, 12, 328
'Ali b. Abi Talib, 30–31 and abdication of Hasan b. 'Ali, 8
'Alawis and, 29
in arbitration, 134 friendship and, 178–179
government and, 201
guardianship of the jurist and, 208
guilds and, 209
Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214
hijra and, 219
Ibadis and, 230
Isma'ilis and, 265
jihad and, 275
Kharijis and, 294
Malik b. Anas and, 326
messianism and, 338
Mu'awiya and, 365
Murji'is and, 14, 380
Mu'tazilis and, 383
police and, 427
political ritual and, 428
Rightly Guided Caliphate and, 473
Safavids and, 481
Shi'ism and, 510–511
Sunnism and, 535
theocracy and, 547
'Uthman b. 'Affan and, 584
'Ali b. Ahmed b. 'Abd al-Mawla, 403
'Ali b. Buyah, 78
'Ali b. Musa. See 'Ali al-Rida
'Alids, 79
Aligarh, 32–33
Aligarh movement, 487
Aligarh Muslim University (AMU), 32–33, 271, 577
Aljazeera, 346–347
Allah. See God
Allahbadi, Akbar, MAO College and, 32
'Allal al-Fasi. See al-Fasi, Abu 'Imran
'Allama Hilli
commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105
ijtihād and, 245
Nahj al-Haqq wa-Kashf al-Sidq (The path of truth and the exposition of righteousness), 297 allegiance, 401 alliances, 33
All-India Muslim Educational Conference, 282
All-India Muslim League, 282–283, 382
All-Pakistan Muslim League, 383
Almohads, 34
Christians and, 345
Ibn Rushd and, 236
Ibn Tumart and, 242
Jews and, 345
Mahdi and, 323
pilgrimage and, 417
Zahiris and, 603
Almoravids, 34–35
censorship of Ghazali by, 87
heresy and, 218
pilgrimage and, 417
alms tax. See zakat Alshech, Eli, 430
Altishahari, 573
al-Alwani, Taha Jabir minority jurisprudence and, 347
Muslim minorities and, 159, 341
Amal, 35–36
al-Amali al-Shajariyya (al-Shajari's dictations) (Shajari), 394 Amanullah, King, 20
Amason, Johann P., 354
American Society of Muslims, 360 al-Amidi, Sayf al-Din, government and, 200
'Amili, Baha' al-Din
dissimulation and, 136
Mir Damad and, 348
al-Amin (Abbasid caliph), 100
Amin, Muhammad, 495
Amin, Qasim, 5, 146, 147, 469, 490 al-Amin, Sayyid Muhsin, Khomeini and, 296 al-Amir bi-Ahkam Allah (Fatimid caliph), 173
'āmma (masses), 330
'Ammar b. Yasir
in Battle of the Camel, 109
dissimulation and, 135
'Amr b. al-'As, Battle of the Camel and, 109 al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf wa-l-nahy 'an al-munkar (commanding right and forbidding wrong), 104–105
'Amr Khalid, globalization and, 194

AMU. See Aligarh Muslim University (AMU) Amu Darya, 560 analogy, legal, 110 anarchism, 36–37
Anatolia, 362, 490
ANC. See African National Congress (ANC) Andalus, 523–524
  authority in, 53
  Ibn Hazm and, 234
  Ibn Khaldun in, 235
  Muslim rule in, 158
  police and, 427
Anderson, Benedict, 41–42, 387
Anglo-Afghan Wars, 20
Anglo-Egyptian Treaty, 385
Anglo-Muhammadan legal system, 290
Anglo-Ottoman Commercial Treaty of 1838, 543
Anjuman Khuddam-ul-Qur'an Lahore, Israr Ahmad and, 23
Ankara, 569
An-Na'im, Abdullahi, 490
ansār (helpers), 109
Ansar al-Sunna al-Muhammadiyya, 527
Ansari, Abdul Haq, 333 al-Ansari, Farid, religious knowledge and, 301 al-Ansari, Murtada, 518
Answer to Renan (Afghani), 19 anthropology, culture and, 122 antimonianism, 265
Antioch, 537
Anwar al-Tanzil wa-Asrar al-Ta'wil (The lights of revelation and secrets of interpretation) (Baydawi), 161 apartheid, 37–38, 518–519 apocalypse, 38–39
  Mahdi and, 322
apostasy, 40–41
  Wars of, 100, 119
Apostolic Church, 543
AQAP. See al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP)
'aqd (contract), 117. See also contracts
AQIM. See al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) al-'Aqqad, 'Abbas Mahmud, 488
Aq Quyunlu, 126, 297, 564
'Aqraba', Battle of, 14, 373
Aqsa Mosque, 272
Aq Tagh, 573
Arab Barometer, 436
Arab Cooperation Council, 284
Arab Federation of Jordan and Iraq, 284
Arab Higher Committee, 405
Arab Human Rights Day, 540
Arab Human Rights Organization, 540
Arabian Nights and Days (Mahfouz), 550 Arab nationalism, 41–42
Arabness, 156
"Arab Spirit," 21
"Arab Spring"
  in Egypt, 147–148
  media and, 336
  nonviolence and, 397
  Syria and, 538
  Tunisia and, 567
al-'arab wa-l-mawālī (the Arab and non-Arab Muslims), 101. See also clients Arafat, Yasir, 42–43, 406 al-Araki, Muhammad 'Ali, 165 arbitration, 43–44
  diplomacy and, 133
Archaeological History of the Ruins of Delhi (Ahmad Khan), 487 aristocrat, 331
Aristotelianism, 170–171
Aristotle, 12, 142, 176, 237, 378, 413
Arjomand, Said, 585
Arkoun, Mohammed, 478
Armbrust, Walter, Mass Culture and Modernism in Egypt, 331 armed forces, 339–340 Armed Islamic Group, 546
Armée d'Afrique, 104
Armenia, 'Abbas I and, 1
Armenians, massacres of, 345 armies, 339–340
Army of the Pure (Lashkar-e-Taiba)
  fundamentalism and, 182
  terrorism and, 546
Arnold, Thomas, 333
Arslan (clan), 139
Arslan, Alp, 392, 490
Arslan, Shakib, 516 al-Arsuzi, Zaki, 65 artisans, 238 arts, patronage in, 411–412
'Arzname (Testament) (Dawani), 126
Asad, Muhammad, 410
Asad, Talal, 184, 355
Asadabadi, 136
As'ad b. al-Mammati, 58
  Qawanin al-Dawawin (Rules of administration), 58 Asbab-i Baghawat-i Hind (The causes of the Indian revolt) (Sayyid Ahmad Khan), 252 asceticism, 415–416
ashāb rasūl Allāh (companions of the Prophet), 109. See also Companions of the Prophet al-Ash'ari, Abu al-Hasan, 176 al-Luma' (Flashes of insight), 176 Maqalat al-Islamiyyin (The tenets of the faith of the followers of Islam), 176 al-Ash'ari, Abu 'Ubaydallah, 590 Ash'aris, 44
  free will and, 176
  heresiography and, 217
  Razi and, 458
al-'Ashmawi, Muhammad Sa'id, 420 al-Ashraf, al-Malik, 58
Ashraf Khalil, 327
Ashtiyani, Mirza Hasan, 19
'Ashura', 45
  Karbala and, 293
Asia. See Central Asia; Southeast Asia; specific countries
As'ilat Asqiyya wa-Ajwibat al-Maghili (The questions of the Askia and Maghili's responses) (Maghili), 593 al-Asl (The origin) (Shaybani), 15
Asma' bt. Abi Bakr, 175
Asrar al-'Arabiyya (The secrets of Arabic) (Anbari), 394 al-Assad, Hafez, 387, 538 Assembly of Experts, 297 Assyrians, 345
al-Astarabadi, Muhammad Amin al-Fawa'id al-Madaniyya (Medinan moral lessons), 245
  ijtihād and, 245
  Nizamiyya and, 394
astrology, 45–47
astronomy
  astrology and, 46
  Ibn Tufayl in, 241
Aswan Dam, 106, 385 asylum, 47–48
Asyut, 189
'Ata, Muhammad, fundamentalism of, 180
Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal, 48–50
  education and, 146
  secularism and, 489
  socialism and, 515
  Westernization and, 594
'Atiya, Rawya, 598

Atrash family, 139
Attainment of Happiness, The (Farabi), 145
'Attar, 528
Aurangzeb, 50
  dhimma system and, 343
  Mughals and, 366
  Sirhindi and, 27 authenticity, fundamentalism and, 183–185 authority, 50–56. See also governance justice and, 290
  libertarianism and, 317–318
  Mulla Sadra and, 378
  obedience and, 402
  police and, 427
  public opinion and, 435–436
  rebellion and, 459
  sunna and, 534
  'ulama' and, 578–579
Avempace. See Ibn Bajja
Avennasar. See Farabi
Averroes. See Ibn Rushd
Avicenna. See Ibn Sina
'Awa'id al-Ayyam (Expectations of the millennium) (Naraqi), 518
"Awakening Islamists." See Sahwis (Awakening Islamists)
Awang, Ustaz Hadi, 408
Awraba (Berber group), 68
Aws, 219, 368
al-'Awwa, Muhammad Salim, on elections, 148 Awza'i, 440 on diplomacy, 134
  Shaybani and, 507
Axumite kingdom, in Ethiopia, 154
Ayalon, Ami, 386
Ayasofya (Hagia Sophia), 266, 364 ayatollah, 56–57
Ayman al-Zawahiri as I Knew Him (Zayyat), 604
'Ayn Jalut, Battle of, 537
al-Ayyubi, Salah al-Din Yusuf. See Saladin Ayyubids, 58
  holy places and, 221
  military and, 339
  Saladin and, 482–483
  shaykh al-Islam and, 509
  Suhrawardi and, 530
  tyranny and, 571
Ayyuha al-Walad (Letter to a disciple) (Ghazali), 16
Azhar University, 58–59, 145
  'Abd al-Rahman at, 4
  'Abd al-Raziq at, 5
  'Abduh, Muhammad at, 9
  in Egypt, 147
  Malcolm X at, 325
al-Azmeh, Aziz on fundamentalism, 184
  Islams and Modernities, 184
  utopia and, 585
'Azzam, 'Abdallah
  propaganda and, 432
  terrorism and, 546
'Azzam, Mahfouz, 604
'Azzam, Umayma, 603

Baaklini, Abdo I., 409
Baath Party. See Ba'th Party babenu (our doorway), 223
Babism
  Afghani and, 17
  Mahdi and, 323
  messianism and, 323
Babur, Zahir al-Din, 60
  Baburnama, 366
  Delhi and, 127
  genealogy and, 190
  monarchy and, 361
  Mughals and, 366
Baburnama (Babur), 366
Badawi, Abdullah, 325
Badr, Battle of, 372, 375
Badr al-Din Muhammad b. Jama'a. See Ibn Jama'a al-Badr al-Tali (The rising moon) (Shawkani), 507 Baghdad, 60–61
  'Abbas I and, 1
  Abbasids and, 1
  Buyids and, 2
  Buyids in, 79
  education and, 144–145
  inquisition and, 255
  Mawardi in, 331
  Nizamiyya and, 394
  shari'a and, 498
  trade and, 553
al-Baghdadi, 'Abd al-Qahir, government and, 199
Baghdadi, Khatib al-, education and, 146 Baha'i
  apocalypse and, 39
  Burujirdi and, 57
  messianism and, 323, 338
  as minority, 343, 345
  source of emulation and, 136, 517
  as syncretic, 119
Bahira, 369
Bahrain, 446
Bairam Khan, 28
Baki, 254
Baku Conference of the Peoples of the East, 106 al-Baladhuri, 78
Bali, 521
Balkan wars
  Atatürk in, 49
  Turkey and, 569
Baluchistan, 78, 131, 193, 404
Bamiyan, 193, 379
Bandung conference, 408
Banerjee, Surendranath, 487 Bangladesh, 61–62
  Bengali language and, 157
  Jama'at-i Islami and, 271–272
Bangladesh Liberation War, 62 banking. See also finance capitalism and, 86
  Mawdudi on, 142–143
al-Banna, Hasan, 62–64
  fundamentalism and, 182, 184
  ideology of, 243
  jihad and, 279
  Mudhakkirat al-Da'wa wa-l-Da'iya, 62
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
  Palestine and, 405
  Sunnism and, 536
  theocracy and, 547
  Westernization and, 594
Banque Misr, 86
Banu 'Awf, 115
Banu Ghaniya, 34
Banu Hamdan, 30
Banu Hashim, 368
Banu Hilal
  Almohads and, 34
  tribalism and, 564
Banu Jama'a, 234–235
Banu Nadir, 116, 371, 372
Banu Qaynuqa', 116, 371, 373
Banu Qurayza, 116, 371, 372
Banu Sa'ida, 13, 374
Banu Sulaym, Almohads and, 34
Baqillani
  governance and, 198
  government and, 199
  oath of allegiance and, 401

Barani, Ziya' al-Din, Fatawa-yi Jahandari (The imperial fatwas), 252
Barbahari, 105
Barelwi, Ahmad Raza Khan, 64
Barelwis, 64–65
  Deobandis and, 131
  knowledge and, 303
Barghawata, heresy and, 218
Bariqat al-Suyuf al-Daghistaniyya fi ba'd al-Ghazawat al-Shamiliyya (The glitter of Daghestani swords in some of Shamil's raids) (Qarakhi), 495
Barjawan, 214
Baron, Salo, 562
Barquq, Zahir, 328
al-Basa'ir wa-l-Dhakha'ir (Insights and treasures) (Tawhidi), 544 al-Bashir, General 'Umar Hasan Ahmad, 526, 568 Basij, 429
Basra, Iraq, 95
al-Basri, Hasan
  Mu'tazilis and, 383, 384
  Qadaris and, 440
al-Basri, Ma'bad al-Juhani, Qadaris and, 440 Ba'th Party, 65–66
  coup d'état and, 120
  in Iraq, 262
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
  nationalism and, 387
  socialism and, 516
  Syria and, 537
Battal, Sayyid, 192
Battle of 'Aqraba', 373
Battle of 'Ayn Jalut, 537
Battle of Badr, 372, 375
Battle of Buhayra, 242
Battle of Chaldiran, 481
Battle of Karbala, 220, 228, 446 Battle of Manzikert, 490 Battle of Panipat, 494
Battle of Qadisiyya, 175
Battle of Siffin, 100, 306, 365, 383
Battle of the Camel, 100, 383 Battle of the Masts, 584 Battle of the Trench, 372
Battle of Uhud, 329
Battle of Zallaqa, 35
bay'a (oath of allegiance/loyalty), 101, 401, 313
Bayan Wujub al-Hijra 'ala al-'Ibad wa-Bayan Wujub Nasb al-Imam wa-Iqamat al-Jihad (Clarifying the obligation for the believers to emigrate, to nominate the imam, and to lead the jihad) (Dan Fodio), 593
Bayazid I, 403
Bayazid II, Dawani and, 126
Baybars
  Malik al-Zahir, coinage and, 102
  Mamluks and, 327
Baybars, Zahir, 102, 235
Baydaba, 550
Bayhaqi. See Abu al-Fadl Muhammad b. Husayn al-Bayhaqi Bayqara, Husayn, 60
Bayt al-Hikma. See House of Wisdom bazaar, 66
al-Bazdawi, Fakhr al-Islam, 111 Bedouin honor and, 222
  tribalism and, 563
Beg, Tursun, 403
Beg, Yaqub, 574
Beg b. Hamza Beg, 403
Begum, Mahmuda, 333
Behbudi, Mahmud, 468
Beirut, 67
Bek, Hamza, 495
Bektash, Hajji, 528
Bektashis, 119
Belgian Constitution of 1831, 478
Belgium, 158
Belgrade, 532
belles lettres (adab), 349
Bello, Muhammad, 125
Ben Ali, Zine El-Abidine, 567
Bencheikh, Soheib, 159
Bengal, Bangladesh and, 61
Bengali language, 61–62, 157
Bengalis, 404
Bennabi, Malek, 467
Berbers, 67–69, 242
Berlin, Treaty of, 408
Berri, Nabih, 36
Bertelsmann Transformation Index, 128
Bey, Cemal, 49
Bey, Tugril, Mawardi and, 331
Beyle, Marie-Henri. See Stendhal
Beylerbeyi Palace, 11
Bhutto, Benazir, 404
Bhutto, Zulfiqar Ali
  Mawdudi and, 334
  Pakistan and, 404
  Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Bibi, Aasia, 73
Bible apocalypse in, 38
  God in, 196
  Muhammad and, 369
  People of the Book and, 412
  Qur'an and, 369–370, 452
  racism and, 457
Bidayat al-Mujtahid (Primer for jurists) (Ibn Rushd), 134
Bidpai, 550
Bihbihani, 'Abdallah, 56
al-Bihbihani, Muhammad Baqir Risalat al-Akhbar wa-l-Ijtihad (Treatise on traditions and legal reasoning), 245
  source of emulation and, 517
Bihishti, Ayatollah Muhammad, 57
Bihzad, 254
Bilal b. Rabah, 154
Bin Bayyah, 'Abdallah, Sina'at al-Fatwa wa-Fiqh al-Aqalliyyat (The derivation of legal opinions and the Islamic law of minorities), 347 Bin Laden, Osama, 69–71
  in Afghanistan, 442
  colonialism and, 104
  on Crusades, 121
  death of, 443
  fatwa of, 174
  as fundamentalist, 180
  as Islamist, 184
  Khomeini and, 297
  Mulla 'Umar and, 379–380
  Palestine and, 405
  al-Qaeda and, 441–443
  Qutb and, 442
  Saudi Arabia and, 486
  in Sudan, 442
  Taliban and, 541
  tyranny and, 571
  United States and, 442
  women and, 185
  World Islamic Front Declaration and, 280–281
  Zawahiri and, 604
Bint al-Huda, Amina, 480
Bint Jubayl, 164
Bi'r al-'Abd quarter, 164
Birgivi Mehmed Efendi, Ibn Taymiyya and, 241 al-Bishri, Tariq, on elections, 148
Bishr Matta b. Yunus, 170
Biskra, 236
al-Bistami, Abu Yazid, 74

al-Bitar, Salah al-Din, 21, 65
'Aflaq and, 21
Ba'th Party and, 65
al-Bitruji, Nur al-Din
Ibn Tufayl and, 241
Principles of Astronomy, 241
Bitter Harvest, The: The Brotherhood in Sixty Years (Zawahiri), 604
"black legends," 432
Black Saturday, 385
Black September, 284
Black Stone, 367, 369. See also Ka'ba blasphemy, 71–73
Blue Horde, 362
Blunt, Wilfrid Scawen, 257 bodyguards, 339 body parts, 430
Bolshevik revolution, 443
Bolshevism, 106 bombings, suicide. See also terrorism debate over, 531
fundamentalism and, 181
Hamas and, 215
jihad and, 280
as martyrdom, 330
Qaradawi and, 444
Shi'ism and, 531
Sunnis and, 531
Bonan, in China, 91
Book of Forty Questions (Razi), 459
Bosnia, 341, 408
Bosporus, the, 266
Bougie, 236
Bourdieu, Pierre, 223
Bourguiba, Habib, 397, 567
Branch Davidian, 181 Brethren of Purity (Ikhwan al Safa'), 73–74, 97
human nature and, 225
philosopher-king and, 413
brigandage, 475, 545–546
Britain. See United Kingdom British Mandate for Palestine, 272, 405, 406 brotherhoods, 74–77, 397 al-Budur al-Bazigha (Full moon appearing on the horizon) (Shah Waliullah), 493 Bughra Khan, 573
Buhayra, Battle of, 242
Buhl, F., 368
Bukhara, 561
Bukhari
hadith and, 211
natural law in, 390
Bulgaria, 11, 407 bureaucracy, 77–78
Burhan al-Din Ibrahim b. 'Abd al-Rahim, 235
Burhan al-Din Sa'd Allah b. Jama'a, 235 Burma, 520
Bursa, 3
Burujirdi, Ayatollah Hossein, 57
al-Bustani, Butrus, 36–37 al-Buti, Sa'id Ramadan, 593
Buyids, 78–79
Ayyubids and, 58
monarchy and, 360
political ritual and, 428
Samanids and, 485
Shi'is and, 344
usurpation and, 583
Byron of Arabia, 257
Byzantium
Fatimids and, 172–173
Ghassan and, 115–116
Ottomans and, 402–403
Seljuqs and, 490
Syria and, 537

Cabinet Mission, 283
Caesar, 555
Cain, 396
CAIR. See Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) Cairo, 80
in Arab Spring, 147
Ibn Khaldun in, 236
old city in, 96 origin of name of, 46
Cairo Conference, 284
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam, 478 Cairo University, 385 caliphate, 81–86. See also imamate; monarchy Abbasid, 81 (See also Abbasids)
'Abd al-Hamid on, 3
'Abd al-Raziq and, 5–7, 6
abdication and, 7–8
of Abu Bakr, 13–14
Abu Yusuf and, 16
authority and, 52–53
constitutionalism and, 112, 113–114
contract and, 117, 118 Córdoba, 81 doctrine of rightful claims to, 112 ethnicity and, 155–156
family and, 169
Fatimid, 81 (See also Fatimids)
governance and, 197
government and, 202–203
Ibn Taymiyya and, 240
justice and, 290
leadership and, 313
Ma'mun and, 328–329
military and, 339
monarchy vs., 361
Muhammad and, 6
oath of allegiance and, 401
police and, 427
political ritual and, 428
Quraysh and, 456
Rightly Guided, 81, 116, 148, 149, 201–202, 473–474
Seljuqs and, 52–53
separation of powers in, 203
Shah Waliullah and, 493–494
shari'a and, 500–501
Sunnism and, 535
traditional political thought and, 555–556
in Turkey, 5
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz, 579–580
Umayyad, 81 (See also Umayyads)
Umayyads and, 582–583
'Uthman b. 'Affan and, 584–585
Caliphate Congress of Cairo, 257
Call of Islam, 519
Cambodia, 520
Campaign of the Two Iraqis, 532
Canaan, 457
Canada, Muslim population in, 398 capitalism, 86–87 capital punishment, 71, 401, 475 caravans, 553 cartoons, of Muhammad, 336
Casablanca, 364
Casanova, Paul, 38
Castile, Hippolyte, 601
Catherine the Great, 500
Catholic Church. See also Christianity
'Abbas I and, 1
censorship and, 87
liberation theology and, 316
Causes of the Indian Revolt, The (Ahmad Khan), 487 caution, 135–136
Cedar Rapids, Iowa, 398

Çelebi, Mustafa b. Abdullah Hajji Khalifa Ḳatib, 403 censorship, 87
Center for the Propagation of Islamic Truths (Qanun-i Nashr-i Haqa'iq-i Islami), 505 Central Asia, 88–89. See also specific countries
  ethnic groups in, 157
Central Asian Muslim Ecclesiastical Administration (Srednеaziatskoe dukhovnoe upravlenie musul'man), 88
Central Institute of Islamic Research, 458 Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 165, 442
Ceydet, Abdullah, 12
Chaghatay, 362, 542, 561
  Babur and, 60
Chaldiran, Battle of, 481 charity, 89–90
Charter of Hamas, 280
Charter of Medina, 547 chastisement, 552
chauvinisms, hadith and, 212
Chawhan, 126, 194
Chechnya, 495, 546
Child from the Village, A (Sayyid Qutb), 488 Children of Gebelawi (Mahfuz), 555 China, 90–91
  Cultural Revolution in, 574
  Indonesia and, 254
  Malaysia and, 324
  Mongols in, 362
  Muslim minority in, 90, 91, 340
  Tamerlane and, 542
  Uighurs in, 573–574
Chingiz Khan
  Babur and, 60
  Delhi and, 126
  genealogy and, 190
  Ilkhanids and, 246
  Mongols and, 362
  Tamerlane and, 542
  Timurids and, 551
Chishti, Mu'in al-Din, Delhi Sultanate and, 128 Chishti order, 75, 508 chivalry, 91–94
Christian Aristotelianism, 170–171
Christian Base Communities, 316 Christianity. See also Catholic Church; Coptic Christians apartheid and, 37
  Crusades and, 121
  Druze and, 139
  Ethiopian conversion to, 154–155
  fundamentalism in, 179
  Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214–215
  Ibn Taymiyya, 239
  international relations and, 258
  liberation theology and, 316
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
  Muslim minorities and, 340
  Mutawakkil and, 345
  Nestorian, 362, 537, 573
  Palestine and, 405
  public sphere and, 436
Christian missionaries, 'Abbas I and, 1
Christian-Muslim relations, 94
Christians
  Almohads and, 345
  jizya and, 283
  as minority, 342
  Muhammad and, 369
  as People of the Book, 412–413
  Saladin and, 483
Churchill, Winston, Jordan and, 284
CIA. See Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) citizenship, 94–95 of clients, 101
  jizya and, 283–284
  in perfect city, 97 in Saudi Arabia, 345 city(ies), 95–97 division of labor in, 137 in Farabi, 171
  holy, 221–222 city (philosophical), 97–98 civil codes, 288
civilians, in war, 281
"civilizational Islam," 325
Civilization Project, 527 Civil Lines, 32 civil obligations, 103 civil society, 98–99. See also community
  modernity and, 358
  public sphere and, 436–437
  transnational Islam and, 358–359 civil war, 99–101. See also First Islamic Civil War Companions of the Prophet and, 109
  Murji'is and, 380
  Umayyads and, 582
claim rights, 474, 475 clients, 101–102
  family and, 168
Clinton, Bill, 360, 569 clothing, hajj and, 417 Cohen, Mark, 562 coinage, 102
collective action, 355–357 collective obligations, 103 colleges, 145. See also education colonialism, 103–104. See also imperialism in Algeria, 29–30
  Berbers and, 67–68
  civil society and, 98
  Crusades and, 121
  in Indonesia, 254
  Shu'ubis and, 513
  'ulama' and, 576
Comintern, 106 command, 103
Commander of the Faithful, 82, 102, 166, 247, 473 commanding right and forbidding wrong, 104–105. See also justice as government duty, 114
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 239, 240
Commentary on Plato's Republic (Ibn Rushd), 176 commerce, 552–554
Committee for the Defense of Legitimate Rights, 478 Committee of Union and Progress (CUP), 11, 472
"common good," 357 common people, 330–331 communism, 106–107
Communist International, 106 Communist Party
  in Afghanistan, 21
  Al-i Ahmad in, 270
  in Indonesia, 106
  in Iraq, 480
  in Turkey, 391
community, 107–108. See also umma (community) in Constitution of Medina, 116
  contracts and, 118 culture and, 122
  friendship and, 179
  nation-state and, 389 protected, 134
  in Qur'an, 107
  representation and, 460–461
  tolerance and, 420–421
  unity of, 420–421, 460–461 validation of, 114 Companions of the Prophet, 109–110
  dissimulation and, 136

jihad and, 274
Khunji and, 297
mosques and, 364
Murji'is and, 380
Sufism and, 528
sunna and, 534
Tablighi Jama'at and, 539
'ulama' and, 574
'Uthman b. 'Affan and, 584
Zahiris and, 603
comparative law, 290
Compendium (Razi), 459
Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA), 527 concubinage, 156, 224, 515
"Condition of Labour" (Pope Leo XIII), 316
confiscation, 552
Conseil Français du Culte Musulman, 158 consensus, 110–111
custom and, 123, 124
parliament and, 410
shari'a and, 497–498
Shawkani and, 506–507
Constantinople. See also Istanbul in history of Istanbul, 266
Ottoman Empire and, 250
Syria and, 537
constitutionalism, 112–115. See also modernism consultation and, 116–117
government and, 199
Islam and, 116–117
modernism and, 351
Constitutional Revolution, 57, 315
Constitution of Medina, 115–116
community in, 107
equality and, 152
Muhammad and, 372
People of the Book and, 412–413
Quraysh and, 456
Constitution of the French Fifth Republic, 548 consultation, 116–117. See also shūrā
government and, 200
parliament and, 409
Consultative Council of Indonesian Muslims, 521 Contactorgaan Moslims en Overheid, 158 contextualization, 420 contracts, 117–118
equality and, 151
Convention against Torture, 129 Convention on Elimination of Discrimination against Women, 129 conversion, 119 chance for, before attack, 134 in Ethiopia, to Christianity, 154–155
Islamization and, 263–264
Qur'an and, 453
converts
Abu Hanifa and, 14
as clients, 101–102 tax on, 118 cooperation, 33
Coptic Christians
communism and, 106
in Egypt, 148
corporal punishment, 475 corruption, finance and, 143–144
Coşan, Esad, 305
Cossack Brigade, 443
Council of Fifty, 242
Council of Guardians, 297
Council of Ten, 242
Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), 341 counselor, 204 coup d'état, 120, 120–121, 404, 412 court(s) after Ottoman era, 288
Aq Quyunlu, 297
impartiality of, 286 judicial, 286–288 jurisdiction of, 287
mazālim, 286 religious dimension of decisions of, 287–288 royal, 479
shari'a and, 287
Tanzimat and, 543
Uzbek, 297 court chamberlain, 204 Court of Grievances, 204 cousins, 168 covenant, 401
CPA. See Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) credit, 142. See also interest (financial) Crimea, 341
Crimean War, 495
Crone, Patricia, 513, 552–553 crucifixion, 551
Crusades, 121
ethnic groups and, 157
Istanbul and, 266
Palestine and, 405
Syria and, 537
Cultural Revolution, 574 culture, 121–123
custom, 123–124
Cyprus, 407–408
Cyrenaica, 104

Da Afghanistan da Talibano Tahrik (Islamic Movement of Taliban of Afghanistan), 541. See also Taliban
Dabashi, Hamid, liberation theology and, 316–317
Daghestan, 495
al-Dahab, 'Abd al-Rahman Siwar, abdication of, 8 Dahl, Robert A., 409
al-Da'im, Muhammad Sharif Nur, 323
Dala'il al-Sidq li-Nahj al-Haqq (Proof of the correctness of the path of truth) (Muzaffar), 297
Dan Fodio, Usman, 125
Bayan Wujub al-Hijra 'ala al-'Ibad wa-Bayan Wujub Nasb al-Imam wa-Iqamat al-Jihad (Clarifying the obligation for the believers to emigrate, to nominate the imam, and to lead the jihad), 593
hijra, 219
Ihya' al-Sunna wa-Ikhmad al-Bida' (The revival of the sunna and the elimination of innovation), 593
Kitab al-Farq bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Islam wa-bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Kufr (The difference between Muslim governance and governance by unbelievers), 392, 593
Masa'il Muhimma (Important matters), 125
messianism and, 338
Nigeria and, 392
Sokoto caliphate and, 85
utopia and, 586
Daoud, President, 20
Dar al-Da'wa wa-l-Irshad, 472 dār al-ḥarb (abode of war), 11–12
Dar al-Ifta', 578
Dar al-'Ilm (House of Learning), 145 dār al-islām (abode of Islam), 11–12
dār al-ṣulḥ (abode of truce), 11–12
Dar' al-Ta'arrud (Rejecting contradictions between reason and tradition) (Ibn Taymiyya), 239
Dār al-'Ulūm. See Darul Uloom

al-Darazi, Muhammad b. Isma'il
  Druze and, 139
  minorities and, 343
Darfur, 190
Dark Ages, 9
Darqawi (Sufi brotherhood), 397
Dars-i Nizami (Indian madrasa curriculum), 321
Darul Islam, 521
Darul Uloom, 146
  Banna at, 62
  Deobandis and, 131, 132
  Mawdudi and, 333
darūra (necessity or dire need), 124
Dashtaki, Mir Ghiyath al-Din, Dawani and, 126
Das Leben Muhammeds (Buhl), 368 "daughters of Allah," 370
David, 452
Dawani, Jalal al-Din, 126
  Akhlaq-i Jalali (The Jalalian ethics), 126
  'Arznama (Testament), 126
  Lawami' al-Ishraq fi Makarim al-Akhlaq (Flashes of illumination on excellent conduct), 126
  Nur al-Hidaya (The light of guidance), 126
Da'wa Party, 57, 262
Da'wat-e Islami (Islamic Mission), 65
Dawi Mani' (tribe), 108
Dawud b. 'Ali b. Khalaf al-Isfahani, 244, 603
Daylamis
  Buyids and, 78
  military and, 339
  shāhānshāh and, 492
Day of Judgment, 367 debate, 436–437
Deccan War, Aurangzeb and, 50 decision making, religious knowledge and, 299 Declaration Concerning Armed Struggle against Jews and Crusaders (Word Islamic Front), 280
Déclaration des Droits de l'homme et du Citoyen, 543
"Declaration of War against the American Occupying the Land of the Two Holy Places" (Bin Laden), 185
Defoe, Daniel, Robinson Crusoe, 241
Delhi, 126–127
Delhi Sultanate, 127–128, 251–252, 361 democracy, 128–130. See also elections
  authority and, 54–55
  conceptions of, 128
  consultation and, 116–117
  Indonesia and, 254
  Iqbal on, 54–55, 259–260 justifications for, 351
  Mawdudi and, 334
  in Muslim world, 129 output of, 128–129
  parliament and, 409–410
  philosophy and, 414–415 popularity of, 351
  in Qur'an, 351
  religion and, 129
  shari'a and, 129–130
  South African and, 519–520
  sovereignty and, 522
Democratic Party, 482 Democratic Unionist Party, 540 demographics, 130–131
Deng Xiaoping, 90
Denmark, Muhammad cartoons in, 336
Denoeux, Guilain, 409
Deoband, 131
Deobandis, 131–132
  Barelwis and, 64
  madrasas and, 321–322
  mawlid and, 335
  Muslim League and, 383
  Pakistan and, 404
  reform and, 468
  Tablighi Jama'at and, 539
  'ulama' and, 578
Deobandism, 303
Description of Chancery Practice (Ibn al-Sayrafi), 256 despotism, absolutism and, 12 Destourian Party, 567 determinism, 175–176 de Tocqueville, Alexis, 98
Dewan Dakwah Islamiyah Indonesia (Indonesian Council of Islamic Appeal), 255
Deys of Algiers, the, 397
Dhahabi, 537
al-Dhakhira (The treasure) (Qarafi), 444 dhimma (superintendence), 274, 342 diet, Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214 difference of opinion, 132–133
al-Dimashqi, Ghaylan, 440 dīnār (gold coin), 102. See also coinage Dipanagara, Prince, 521 diplomacy, 133–134. See also international relations Dirar b. 'Amr, 176
Dirasa fi Tabi'at al-Mujtama' al-'Iraqi (A treatise on the nature of Iraqi society) (Wardi), 566 dirham (monetary unit; silver coin), 102 disadvantaged, rights of, 476–477 discipline, 430 discrimination, 156 dissent, 134–135
dissimulation, 135–136, 446 diversity politics, religious, 308–309 division of labor, 137–138
dīwān, bureaucracy and, 77–78
Diwan-i Khata'i (Book of the sinner) (Isma'il I), 264 Dome of the Rock, 272, 364, 371, 417, 582
Dongxiang, 91
Druze(s), 139–140
  'Abd al-Qadir and, 4
  conversion of, 119
  Isma'ilis and, 266
  as minority, 343
Duban, 550
Dumat al-Jandal, 370
"Durand Line," 20
Durkheim, Émile, 354
Dutch East India Company, 520
Dutch East Indies, 119. See also Indonesia Dutch Reformed Church, 37 duty, 103
  justice and, 290
dynastic model of government, 202

East Africa, 141–142
East Bengal, 61, 404
Eastern Bantu language, 141
Eastern Rumelia, 11
Eastern Turkestan Republic, 574
East Pakistan, 404
Ebu al-Huda, 46
Ebu's-su'ud. See Abu al-Su'ud
ECFR. See European Council for Fatwa and Research (ECFR) ecology, 150–151
economic theory, 142–144
Edict of Sincere Repentance, 431
Edip, Halide, 333 education, 144–146
  Abdülhamid II and, 10
  Aligarh Muslim University (AMU), 32–33

Azhar University, 58–59, 145
Darul Uloom, 62
in early Islam, 320 legal, 499
madrasas, 320–322
Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental (MAO) College, 32
Nizamiyya and, 393–395
Sayyid Ahmad Khan and, 32 of women, 186
Egypt, 147
'Abd al-Raziq and, 5–6 agricultural reform in, 385
Ayyubids and, 58
Azhar University in, 58–59 civil war in Fatimid, 100
communism in, 106
coup d'état in, 120
Fatimids in, 172–173
first parliament in, 409
al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group) in, 189 Islamic Jihad in, 262–263
Israel and, 385
jamā'a in, 108
liberalism in, 314
military in, 340
modernism in, 351
Muhammad 'Ali in, 376–377
Muslim Brotherhood in, 381
Nasser in, 385–386
Pan-Islamism in, 407
Salafis and, 484
Sayyid Qutb in, 488
Shafi'i and, 491–492
shari'a in, 133
Shi'is in, 344
slavery in, 515
Suez Canal and, 385
theocracy and, 548
'ulama' and, 577
Zawahiri and, 603–605
Egyptian Civil Code, 302
Egyptian High Council for Islamic Affairs, 257
Egyptian Islamic Jihad (Jihad al-Islami al-Misri, EIJ), 262–263, 604 Egyptian University in Cairo, 5
Eickelman, Dale, 577
EIJ. See Egyptian Islamic Jihad (Jihad al-Islami al-Misri, EIJ)
El-Affendi, Abdelwahab, 523 elections, 148–149. See also democracy
in Indonesia, 255
Jama'at-i Islami and, 271–272
leadership and, 313
in Malaysia, 408
in Pakistan, 404
representation and, 461
Sayyid Qutb on, 410 in South Africa, 519
Elias, Abbas, 408
Elias, Norbert, 357 elite, 330 emancipation of slaves, 514
Emergence of the Modern Middle East, The (Hourani), 399 emigrants, the (category of Companions), 109, 219 emigration. See hijra Emirate of Transjordan, 284 emulation, source of, 517–518 enantiodromia, 39
Enderwitz, Susanne, 513 endowment, 149–150
Enforcement of Shariat Ordinance, 606
Engineer, Asghar Ali, liberation theology and, 316
England. See United Kingdom
English East India Company, 366 Enveri, 403
environment, 150–151
Environmental Dimensions of Islam, The (Izzi Dien), 150 epithets, for God, 196 equality, 151–152
authority and, 55
capitalism and, 129
democracy and, 129
government and, 200
in Ottoman Empire, 343
in Qur'an, 457
Shu'ubis and, 513
socialism and, 515
Erbakan, Necmettin, 305
Erdoğan, Recep Tayyip, 305
Eritrea, 154–155
Eritrean Liberation Front, 155
Ershad, Husseiniye-ye, 506
Esack, Farid
justice and, 291
liberation theology and, 316
solidarity and, 517
ethics, 152–154 commanding right and forbidding wrong, 104–105 in Dawani, 126 economic theory and, 143 in Fadlallah, 164
Ibn Rushd and, 237
leadership and, 313
Ethiopia, 154–155
Ethiopian Federation, 155 ethnic groups
in Afghanistan, 20
alliances between, 33
apartheid and, 37–38
division of labor and, 138
family and, 167
racism and, 457
ethnicity, 155–158
ethnocentrism, 457 eugenics, 376
Euphrates River, 553
Europe, 158–159. See also specific countries
European Council for Fatwa and Research (ECFR), 347, 444, 578
European imperialism, 250–251
European Union, Turkey in, 158, 315, 570
Evangelicals, 179
Eve, 595
excommunication, 159–161
Excommunication and Withdrawal (Takfir wa-l-Hijra) (group), 220, 441, 489 Exécutif des Musulmans de Belgique, 158 exegesis, 161–163
Ibn Taymiyya and, 239
martyrdom and, 329
racism and, 457
Razi and, 458
violence and, 588
Expediency Council, 297, 549

Fada'ih al-Batiniyya (The Infamies of the Batinites) (Ghazali), 191 Fadlallah, 'Abd al-Ra'uf, 164 al-Islam wa-Mantiq al-Quwwa (Islam and the logic of power), 164 Fadlallah, Muhammad Hussein, 57, 164–165
fundamentalism and, 181
Hizbullah and, 221
liberation theology and, 316
Faisal b. 'Abd al-'Aziz Al Sa'ud, 486 faith, 166
Fakhr al-Din II (Druze leader), 139
Fakhr al-Mulk, Ghazali and, 191

Falsafatuna (Our philosophy) (Sadr), 262, 480 Falwell, Jerry, 180 family, 167–170
genealogy and, 189–190
household and, 223–224
justice and, 290
kinship and, 298–299
law and, 503
shari'a and, 503
family planning, 567
Fanon, Frantz, 270, 387, 506 al-Farabi, Abu Nasr, 73, 170–171
education and, 145
ethics and, 153
human nature and, 225
Kitab al-Milla (The book of religion), 434
monarchy and, 361
on perfect city, 97
philosopher-king and, 413
philosophy and, 414
Principles of the Opinions of the Inhabitants of Excellent City (Mabadi' Ara' Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila), 97, 378
prophecy and, 434
religious knowledge and, 308
Syria and, 537
Tusi and, 570
utopia and, 585
Virtuous City, The, 73
Faraizi, Bangladesh and, 62
Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam, 71, 172, 262 al-Farida al-Gha'iba (The Neglected Duty), 172, 262, 280, 460
fundamentalism and, 184
jihad and, 187
rebellion and, 460
Salafis and, 484
Zawahiri and, 604
Farangi Mahall, 321
Fard, Mohammed, 360, 376, 388
"Farewell Pilgrimage," 109–110 Farghana, 560
al-Farida al-Gha'iba (The Neglected Duty) (Faraj), 262, 280, 460
Farouk I, King. See Faruq, King Farrakhan, Louis, 388
Faruq, King, 8, 385
al-Fasi, Abu 'Imran, 35 al-Fasi, Muhammad 'Allal, 117, 398 al-Fasl fi al-Milal wa-l-Ahwa' wa-l- Nihal (The decision concerning religions, heresies, and sects) (Ibn Hazm), 234 fasting, 418
Fatah
Arafat and, 42–43
Hamas and, 215
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406, 407
Fatawa-yi Jahandari (The imperial fatwas) (Barani), 252
Fatehpuri, Niaz, 333
Fath 'Ali Shah
Aga Khan and, 22
Qajars and, 443
al-Fath al-Qadir (Victory of the almighty) (Shawkani), 507
Fatiha (the first chapter of the Qur'an), 103
Fatima (Muhammad's daughter), 190 Fatimids, 172–173 civil war among, 100 coinage and, 102
commerce and, 553
East Africa and, 141
genealogy and, 190
Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214
holy places and, 221
Isma'ilis and, 265
Mahdi and, 323
mawlid and, 335
Mecca and, 336
Medina and, 336
messianism and, 338
police and, 427
political ritual and, 428
propaganda and, 431–432
Saladin and, 483
Samanids and, 485
Syria and, 537
trade and, 553
fatwa, 173–174
Ibn Taymiyya and, 239
judges and, 285
mufti and, 365–366
propaganda and, 432
shari'a and, 497
'ulama' and, 578–579
al-Fawa'id al-Madaniyya (Medinan moral lessons) (Astarabadi), 245 al-Fawzan, Salih, 315
Faysal b. al-Husayn, 6
Fayyum oasis, 172
Fazu'il-i A'mal (Merits of Righteous Deeds) (Kandhalawi), 539
Fazul, Mustafa, 601
Fazul Ahmed, Kadızade and, 292
FCNA. See Fiqh Council of North America (FCNA) Feast of Sacrifice, 343
Federal National Council, 409
Federation of Islamic Associations in the United States and Canada, 399 Federation of Islamic Organizations in Europe, 159
Feldman, Noah, 477
Fertile Crescent, 563–564
Fez, Morocco, 96, 236, 553
Fi Fiqh al-Aqalliyyat al-Muslima: Hayat al-Muslimin fi al-Mujtama'at al-Ukhra (On the law of Muslim minorities: The lives of Muslims in other societies) (Qaradawi), 346 finance coinage in, 102
corruption and, 143–144 economic theory, 142–144
interest in, 86
Mawdudi in, 142–143
in shari'a (divine law), 114–115
fiqh (Islamic jurisprudence; law), 288–290. See also jurisprudence al-Fiqh al-Absat (The plainest law) (Abu Hanifa), 14
Fiqh al-Jihad (The legal rulings of jihad) (Qaradawi), 444
Fiqh Council of North America (FCNA), 347 Firdawsi, Abu al-Qasim
monarchy and, 361
royal court and, 479
Shahnama (Book of Kings), 479, 492–493, 561
Transoxiana and, 561
First Arab Summit, 406
First Intifada, 396
First Islamic Civil War
anarchism and, 36
apostasy and, 40
excommunication and, 160
Hasan b. 'Ali and, 8
Kharijis and, 294
Murji'is and, 380
Firuzkuh, 193
FIS. See Front Islamique du Salut (FIS); Islamic Salvation Front (FIS)
Fi Sabil al-Ba'th (For the cause of the Ba'th) (Aflaq), 22

fitna (affliction, trial; civil strife, war, or discord; dissent), 100. See also civil war
Five Pillars of Islam, 103, 139, 218, 545
Five Principles. See Pancasila (Five Principles), 243, 254
Fiver Shi'ism. See Zaydi (Fiver) Shi'ism
Fi Zilal al-Qur'an (In the shade of the Qur'an) (Qutb), 121, 162, 229, 488
Fleischer, Cornell, 349 flogging, 552 food laws, 214 forbidding wrong. See commanding right and forbidding wrong fornication, 438
"Fourteen Points," 282, 382–383
France
  'Abd al-Qadir and, 3–4
  Afghani in, 18
  Algeria and, 29–30, 103–104
  Berbers and, 67–68
  colonialism of, 103–104
  imperialism of, 251
  Lebanon and, 314
  Maronites and, 139
  Morocco and, 363
  mosques in, 341
  Muslim minorities in, 341
  Muslims in, 158
  in North Africa, 397
  revolution in, 477
  Syria and, 537
freedom, 174–175, 514, 557–558, 558–559 Freedom Charter of 1955, 519 Freedom House, 128 freedom of speech, 436 Freemasons, 601
Free Officers, 385
Free Officers coup, 104, 488 free will, 44, 175–176
  Ash'aris and, 44
  prophecy and, 434
  Qadaris and, 440
  theology and, 549
French Charter, 350
French Mandate
  Druze and, 139
  Lebanon and, 314
Friday Mosque of Herat, Ghurids and, 194 Friday prayer, 177–178, 364, 372, 429, 438 friendship, 178–179
Front de Libération National, 30 Front Islamique du Salut (FIS), 290 Fruit of Islam, 360, 376
Fu'ad, King, 5, 6
Fu'ad II, King, 8 fundamentalism, 179–188 authenticity politics and, 183–185 of al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group), 189
  gender and, 185–187
  general characteristics of, 182–183
  ideology and, 243
  Islamism and, 180–182
  modernity and, 179–180
  origins of, 182–183
  Saudi Arabia and, 486
  terminology of, 180–182
  terrorism and, 546
  violence and, 187–188
  women and, 185–187
furu' al-fiqh (branches of law), 288–289
Fustat, 80, 498, 553
Fusus al-Hikam (Bezels of Wisdom) (Ibn al-'Arabi), 225, 434 Future of Culture in Egypt, The (Hussein), 488 futuwwa (chivalric; manliness), 92, 209
Fuyud al-Haramayn (Visions received in the Two Holy Cities) (Shah Waliullah), 494

Gabriel, 178, 371
Gaddafi, Mu'ammar. See Qaddafi, Mu'ammar Galiyev, Sultan, 471 al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group), 189
  'Abd al-Rahman and, 4
  Bangladesh and, 62
  fundamentalism and, 182
  Islamic Jihad and, 263
  as jama'a, 108
Gandhi, Indira, 253
Gandhi, Mohandas
  Deobandis and, 131
  Jama'at-i Islami and, 271
  Jinnah and, 282
  Mawdudi and, 333
Gangohi, Rashid Ahmad, Deobandis and, 131
Garden of Eden, 222
Garvey, Marcus, 325
Gaza
  Hamas and, 216
  Palestine and, 405
Gaza Strip, 43, 165, 215, 405, 406. See also Palestine
Geertz, Clifford, 355
Gellner, Ernest, 41–42, 99, 387
Gelvin, James, 387
Gemayel, Pierre, 165
Gemeinschaft (community), 99 gender. See also women democracy and, 129
  division of labor and, 138
  Islamism and, 185–187
genealogy, 189–190. See also kinship honor and, 223
  leadership and, 313
  political ritual and, 428
Genebrard, Gilbert, 488
General Islamic Congress of Jerusalem, 257
General Union of Egyptian Students, 189
Geneva Accord, 281
Geneva Conventions, 276, 552
Geneva Protocol I, 281
Genghis Khan. See Chingiz Khan
Georgia, 'Abbas I and, 1
German Campaign, 532
Germany
  Abdülhamid II and, 11
  mosques in, 341
  Muslim minorities in, 341
  Muslims in, 158
  Yazidis in, 343
Ghadir Khumm, 109–110, 344, 374
Ghalib, 254
Ghannam, Farha, Remaking the Modern, 264 al-Gannouchi, Rachid
  government and, 206
  Public Freedoms in the Islamic State, 206
  representation and, 461
Gharbzadigi (Weststruckness) (Ali-i Ahmad), 270
Ghassan, 115–116
Ghaylan, 440 al-Ghazali, Muhammad, 516 on capitalism, 86
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
al-Ghazali, Zaynab, 186, 598 Ghazali al-Tusi, Abu Hamid, 191–192 advice literature of, 16
  apostasy and, 40
  Ayyuha al-Walad (Letter to a disciple), 16
  Banna and, 64
  on caliphate, 85
  censorship of, 87
  constitutionalism and, 113 on contracts, 118
  economic theory in, 142

on education, 146
* Fada'ih al-Batiniyya (The Infamies of the Batinites), 191
government and, 199, 200
holy places and, 222
human nature and, 224
Ibn Sina and, 415
Ibn Tufayl and, 241
Ibn Tumart and, 242
Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din (The revival of the religious sciences), 64, 146, 191, 298, 309, 472
imamate and, 248
al-Iqtisad fi al-I'tiqad (The Golden Mean in Belief), 191
as Islamist, 184
Khunji and, 298
Kimiya-yi Sa'adat (The Alchemy of Happiness), 192 Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs (The ladder to God in the plains of self-religious knowledge), 224, 225, 434 masses and, 330
monarchy and, 361
al-Munqidh min al-Dalal (The Deliverer from Error), 191 al-Mustasfa min 'Ilm al-Usul (Methods of jurisprudence), 289 Nasihat al-Muluk (The counsel for kings), 16, 192, 392 natural law and, 390
philosophy and, 415
prophecy and, 434
public interest and, 435
reform and, 465
religious knowledge and, 307, 308–309
Rida and, 472
on role of government, 114
Seljuqs and, 491
Sufism and, 528
tyranny and, 571
Ghazan Khan conversion of, 341
Ibn Taymiyya and, 239
Ilkhanids and, 246
Mongols and, 362
ghāzī (border warrior for the faith), 192
Ghazi, al-Malik al-Zahir, 58, 93
Ghaznavids, 192–193, 321
military and, 339
monarchy and, 361
patrimonial state and, 411
Seljuqs and, 490
shahānshāh and, 492
Ghazzali. See Ghazali al-Tusi, Abu Hamid Ghilzai, 481
Ghiyas al-Din Balban (1266–87), Delhi Sultanate and, 127
Ghiyath al-Din, Ghurids and, 193
Ghulam Ahmad
Ahmadis and, 25
Mahdi and, 323
messianism and, 338
Ghumari, 'Abdullah, 468
Ghumari, Ahmad, 468
Ghurids, 193–194, 458
GIA. See Groupe Islamique Armé (GIA)
Gibb, H.A.R., 332, 513
Gilan province, Iran, 106
Global Islamic Media Front (GIMF), 432 globalization, 194–195
Gobir, 125
God, 196–197. See also Islam equality and, 200
governance and, 197
jāhiliyya and, 269
loyalty to, 318–319
Muhammad and, 367, 368
Mu'tazilis and, 383
obedience to, 402
prophecy and, 433
Qadaris and, 440
as sovereignty, 522
Tablighi Jama'at and, 539
Golan Heights, 538
Goldberg, Ellis, 184
Golden Age of Islam, 474, 553
Golden Horde, 362, 542
Goldziher, Ignaz, 212, 513
Gomaa, Shaykh 'Ali, 366
Goteborg Quality of Government Index, 128 governance, 197–198. See also authority Governance of the Solitary (Ibn Bajja), 233 government, 198–207
Abu Hanifa and, 14–15
administrative system of, 204 anarchism and, 36–37
caliphate and, 202–203
constitutionalism and, 112–115, 199
Constitution of Medina and, 115–116
consultation and, 200
coup d'état and, 120–121
dynastic model of, 202
equality and, 200 execution of law by, 114
in Farabi, 171
functions of, 114–115 grievance with, 207–208
Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214
Ibn Taymiyya and, 240
institutions of, 202
Jama'at-i Islami and, 271
judicial functions of, 203–204
justice and, 199–200, 290
legislative functions of, 203
libertarianism and, 317–318
Malik b. Anas and, 326–327 modern functions of, 204–207
mosques and, 364 necessity of, 201
obedience and, 402
parliament in, 409–410 political rights and, 477 principles of, 199–201
propaganda and, 431–432
Prophet's model of, 201
public interest and, 435 public worship and, 114 punishment by, 114
representation and, 460–461
republicanism and, 462
Rightly Guided Caliphate and, 201–202
Samanids and, 485
secularism and, 489
separation of powers and, 203
in shari'a (divine law), 114–115 socialist, 515–516 structures of, 202 governors, 238
Gowa, South Sulawesi, 520
Graduates Congress, 540
Grameen Bank, 62
Gran, Peter, 353, 356
Grand Mosque, 417
grand mufti, 365–366
Grand National Assembly, in history of caliphate, 82
Great Calcutta Killing, 283
Great Depression of 1873–96, 11
Great Mosque of Samarra, 364 Greece, 159, 377
Greek Orthodox, 543
Green Book, The (Qaddafi), 441, 516
"Green Revolution," 396 grievance, 207–208
Groupe Islamique Armé (GIA), 546 growth rate, 130 guardians, 238

Guardianship of the Jurist (Khomeini), 291 guardianship of the jurist (wilāyat al-faqīh), 208–209 actīvism and, 447
  Hizbullah and, 220
  imamate and, 250
  Iran and, 260
  Khomeini and, 296
  nationalism and, 387
  rebellion and, 460
  Shari'ati and, 506
  source of emulation and, 518
guidance, religious knowledge as, 310–312 Guiding Jihad Action in Egypt and in the World Today (Sharif), 443 guilds, 209–210
Guinea-Bissau, 157
Gujarat, 520
Gujarat Sultanate, Delhi Sultanate and, 128 Gülen, Fethullah
  modernity and, 357
  religious knowledge and, 304, 305
Gulpayegani, Rida, 165
Gumi, Sheikh Abubakar, 392
"gunpowder empires," 356
Gutiérrez, Gustavo, 316

Habermas, Jürgen, 436
Hadhramaut, 141, 520
Hadi ila al-Haqq, commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105 hadith, 211–214
  asceticism and, 415
  dissimulation in, 135
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 238–239
  Imami Shi'i tradition, 213 intercession and, 256
  jamā'a in, 108
  journalism and, 337
  Khunji and, 297
  Malik b. Anas and, 326
  Muslim criticism of, 211–212
  nonviolence and, 396
  piety and, 415
  privacy in, 430
  propaganda and, 212
  Qadaris and, 440
  religious knowledge and, 300 in Shi'i political thought, 214
  sunna and, 534
  in Sunni tradition, 211, 213–214, 536 Western academic criticism of, 212–213 al-Hadiya, Muhammad Hashim, 527 hafiza (guardians), 238
Hafizis, 173
Hafsa, 169
Hafsids, in history of caliphate, 81
Hagia Sophia Cathedral, 266
hagiographies, 529
Hague Conventions, 281
Ha'iri, Ayatollah 'Abd al-Karim, Khomeini and, 296 hajj, 416–417
Hakam II al-Mustansir, Ibn Hazm and, 234
Hakim bi-Amr Allah, 214–215. See also Druze(s); Isma'ilis
  Druze and, 139
  Fatimids and, 173
  Isma'ilis and, 266
Hakki, Mustafa Kemal Kiliçzâde, 49 al-Halal wa-l-Haram fi al-Islam (The lawful and prohibited in Islam) (Qaradawi), 444
Hali, Altaf Husain, MAO College and, 32
Hallaj, 39
Hallaq, Wael B., 477
Halpern, Manfred, 353
Ham, 457
Hama, 58
Hamas, 215–216
  Arafat and, 43
  Charter of, 280
  fundamentalism and, 182
  nationalism and, 387
  Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 407
  al-Qaeda and, 405
  revolution and, 471
Hamasa (Poems on bravery) (Abu Tamman), 394
Hamdanid, 537
Hamdan Qarmat, 445
al-Hamdawi, Muhammad, 302
Hamdi 'Abd al-Rahman and nucleus of Islamic Group, 263
Hamidian regime, 10
Ha-Mim, 119
Hamza, Sidi, 306
Hamza b. 'Ali al-Labbad, Druze and, 139
Hanafi, Hasam, 469
Hanafi school
  Abu Hanifa and, 14–15
  apostasy in, 40
  arbitration in, 43–44
  Ash'aris and, 44
  custom in, 124
  difference of opinion and, 132–133
  Friday prayer and, 177
  heresy and, 218
  judges in, 287
  madrasas and, 321
  as one of the four Sunni legal schools, 244
  reform and, 465
  Shaybani and, 507–508
  'ulama' and, 578
  Zahiris and, 603
Hanbali school
  Karramis and, 294
  as one of the four Sunni legal schools, 244
  Salafis and, 483
  'ulama' and, 578
happiness, in Farabi, 171–172
Hapsburg Empire, 341
Haqa'iq al-Tafsir (Realities of interpretation) (Sulami), 161 haqq, 30, 310, 474, 476, 478 al-Haqq, Jad al-Haqq 'Ali Jad, 172 al-Haqq, Talib, Ibadis and, 230 Haqqani, Jalal al-Din, 541
al-Harakani, Sa'id, 495
Harakat al-Mahrumin (the Movement of the Deprived), 35
Harakat al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya (Palestinian Islamic Resistance Movement). See Hamas Harakat al-Tadamun al-Islami, 486 Harakat al-Tawhid wa-l-Islah (Monotheism and Reform) movement, 302 al-Harawi, 'Ali
  Ayyubids and, 58
  Tadhkira Harawiyya fi al-Hiyal al-Harbiyya (On the ruses of war), 58
  Wasiyya Harawiyya (Last counsels), 58
Harb, Talaat, 86
Hargas, 242
Harkat-ul-Jihad-i-Islami, 62
Haron, Imam Abdullah, 37, 518 al-Harrasi, 'Ali al-Tabari al-Kiya, 394
Harun al-Rashid
  Abu Yusuf and, 15
  judges and, 285–286
  judicial function of government and, 203
  Malik b. Anas and, 326
  Mu'tazilis and, 384
  Shafi'i and, 491
  Shaybani and, 507–508
  Thousand and One Nights and, 550 Hasan, Ahmad, Mawdudi and, 333 al-Hasan, In'am, 539

Hasan ʿala dhikrihi al-salam, 338
Hafan ʿAli Shah, 22, 395
Hasan b. ʿAli, 216–217
  abdication of, 8
  in Battle of the Camel, 109
  Muʿawiya and, 365
Hasan b. ʿAli al-Barbahari, commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105 al-Hasan b. Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya, 440 Hasan II, 395
Hasan III, 395
Hasan II Mosque, charity and, 90
Hasan-i Sabbah, 395
Hashim (clan), 156
Hassan, Haji Fuad, 408
al-Hassan, Khalid, 406 Hassan, Riffat, democracy in, 129
Hassan II Mosque, 364
Hatta, Mohammad, Indonesia and, 254
Hatt-ı Sherif of Gülhane, 343
Hausa, Dan Fodio and, 125
Hausa Bakwai, 391
Hausaland, 125, 391
Hayat al-Sahaba (The lives of the Companions) (Kandhalawi), 539
Haykal, Muhammad Husayn ʿAbd al-Raziq and, 5
  absolutism and, 12
Hayy b. Yaqzan, "Alive son of Awake," 241
Hazara, in Afghanistan, 20
Heidegger, Martin, 270
Hekmatyar, Gulbuddin, 541, 542 hell, 438
al-Helmy, Burhanuddin, 408 helpers, the (category of Companions), 109 Herat, 60
heresiography, 217
heresy, 218
Herzegovina, 341, 408
Hezbollah. See Hizbullah
Hibat Allah b. ʿAli b. al-Shajari, 394 al-Hidaya (The guidance) (Marghinani), 15, 123 Hidden Imam, 265. See also Twelfth Imam Highland Park, 398 highway robbery, 438 hijab (veil), 587–588
Hijaz, 102, 221, 479
hijra (emigration; obligation to emigrate), 219–220, 367–368, 371, 375
al-Hilli, Muhaqqiq
  jihad and, 278–279
  Minhaj al-Karama (The way of charisma), 239
Hindus, under Taliban, 379
Hintata Berbers, Ibn Tumart and, 242 hisba, 204, 208
al-Hisba fi al-Islam (The Hisba in Islam) (Ibn Taymiyya), 239
Hisham b. Abd al-Malik, ʿAbd al-Hamid and, 2
Hisham II, 523
HIV, 516–517
Hizb al-la Markaziyya al-ʿUthmaniyya (Party for Ottoman Decentralization), 472
Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami (Islamic Liberation Party)
  ideology of, 243
  libertarianism and, 318
Hizb-i Islami, 541, 542
Hizb-i Mardim-i Iran (Iranian People's Party), 505
Hizbullah
  Amal and, 36
  Fadlallah and, 165
  fundamentalism and, 181
  nationalism and, 387
  propaganda and, 432
  revolution and, 471
  Syria and, 538
  terrorism and, 546
Hobbes, Thomas, 554
Hodgson, Marshall, 354, 356 holy places, 221–222, 335–336 honor, 222–223
  family and, 169
hospitality, asylum and, 47
Hourani, Albert, 399 household, 223–224, 514
House of Justice, 509
House of Learning, 145
House of the Prophet, 297
House of Wisdom, 52, 96, 145
Hubal, 367
Hudaybiyya, treaty of, 133, 134, 396
Hudhud, 596
hudud punishments, 114
Hui, 91. See also Uighurs
Hujjat Allah al-Baligha (The Conclusive Argument from God) (Shah Waliullah), 493 Hukumat-i Islami (Islamic government) (Khomeini), 460 Hulagu, 246, 362 human nature, 224–226 human rights, 226–227
  globalization and, 195
  rights and, 478
Humayun, Nasir al-Din (Mughal ruler)
  Delhi and, 127
  Mughals and, 366
Hume, David, 353
hums, 456
Hunayn b. Ishaq al-ʿIbadi, 537
Hurufis, 551
Husayn, ʿAla' al-Din, Ghurids and, 193
Husayn, Shah Sultan, 481
Husayn, Taha, 469
Husayn al-Jisr, 472
Husayn al-Khusaybi, 29
Husayn b. ʿAbd al-Samad, Mir Damad and, 348
Husayn b. al-Hajjaj, censorship of, 87
Husayn b. ʿAli, 227–228
  ʿAshura' and, 45
  in Battle of the Camel, 109
  holy places and, 222
  police and, 427
  Shiʿism and, 511
Husayn b. Muhammad al-Najjar, 176 al-Husayni, al-Hajj Amin, 366, 405 al-Husayni, Ikhtiyar al-Din, Akhlaq-i Hamayuni (The Humayunian ethics), 252 al-Husri, Sati', 41
Hussein, Saddam
  nationalism and, 387
  Sadr and, 480
Hussein, Taha, 147, 488 hypocrisy, 228–229

Ibadis, 230
  heresiography and, 217
  Syria and, 537
Ibn ʿAbbas. See ʿAbdallah b. ʿAbbas
Ibn ʿAbd al-Hakam, 580
Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, 231–232
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 241
  jahiliyya and, 269
  Kashf al-Shubuhat ʿan al-Tawhid (Dispelling doubts about divine unity), 231
  Kitab al-Tawhid (The book of divine unity), 231
  Salafis and, 484
Ibn Abi al-Rabiʿ, government and, 199
Ibn ʿAbidin
  on custom, 124
  Nashr al-ʿArf fi Bina' Ba'd al-Ahkam ʿala al-ʿUrf (The wafting of perfume, on some legal rulings based on custom), 124

Ibn Abi Hatim al-Razi, 492
Ibn al-Abbar, Ibn Tufayl and, 241
Ibn al-'Arabi, 524
  Fusus al-Hikam (Bezels of Wisdom), 225, 434
  human nature and, 225
  prophecy and, 434
Ibn al-'Arif, 524
Ibn al-Ash'ath, 440
Ibn al-Azraq, 524
Ibn al-Farra', 332
  Baghdad and sultanate in thought of, 61
  dissent and, 134
  Kitab Rusul al-Muluk (Book of envoys of kings), 134
Ibn al-Hanfiya, 585
Ibn al-Khatib, 241, 524
Ibn al-Marzuban, 178
  Kitab Fadl al-Kilab 'ala Kathir min man Labisa al-Thiyab (The superiority of Dogs over Many of Those Who Wear Clothes), 178
Ibn al-Mubarak, 329
Ibn al-Muqaffa', 232 advice literature of, 16
  governance and, 197
  Kitab al-Adab al-Kabir (The greater essay on right conduct), 232 on obedience to caliph, 51–52 philosopher-king and, 413
  rights and, 477
  Risala fi al-Sahaba (Epistle on the caliph's entourage), 15, 232, 287
Ibn al-Muslima, Mawardi and, 331
Ibn al-Qayyim, 506
Ibn al-Sayrafi
  Description of Chancery Practice, 256
  intercession and, 256
Ibn al-Surayj, 465
Ibn al-Zubayr
  Companions of the Prophet and, 109
  imamate and, 247
  Jerusalem and, 272
  Mecca and, 336
  Medina and, 336
  pilgrimage and, 417
  in second fitna, 100
  utopia and, 585
Ibn Anas. See Malik b. Anas Ibn 'Asakir, 394, 537
Ibn Babuya, 79, 213, 344
  Man la Yahduruhu al-Faqih (He who has no legal scholar at hand), 213 Ibn Badis
  education and, 146
  government and, 205
Ibn Bajja, 233
  Andalus and, 524
Ibn Battuta, Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad, 141, 254
Ibn Fudi. See Dan Fodio, Usman
Ibn Furak, Karramis and, 294
Ibn Hafsun, 175
Ibn Hajar al-Asqalani, 147, 506, 509
Ibn Hamdun, privacy and, 430
Ibn Hanbal. See Ahmad b. Hanbal Ibn Hazm, 234
  Almohads and, 34
  Andalus and, 523
  al-Fasl fi al-Milal wa-l-Ahwa' wa-l-Nihal (The decision concerning religions, heresies, and sects), 234 al-Muhalla bi-l-Athar (The book adorned with traditions), 234 al-Radd 'ala Ibn al-Naghrila al-Yahudi (The refutation of Ibn al-Naghrila the Jew), 234
  Tawq al-Hamama (The Ring of the Dove), 234
  Zahiris and, 603
Ibn Hisham, Ibn Ishaq and, 368
Ibn Hud, 523
Ibn Ishaq, 133, 176
  hypocrisy and, 228
  Muhammad biography and, 368
  Sirat Rasul Allah (Life of the Messenger of God), 133, 368
Ibn Ishaq al-Rawandi, 176
Ibn Jama'a, 234–235
  Khunji and, 298
  Mawardi and, 332
  Tahrir al-Ahkam fi Tadbir Ahl al-Islam (Summary of the rules to govern the people of Islam), 235
Ibn Jubayr
  mawlid and, 335
  Nizamiyya and, 394
  Rihla (Travels), 34
Ibn Karram, Karramis and, 293–294
Ibn Kathir, 161, 537
Ibn Khaldun, 235–236
  'Abd al-Raziq and, 5
  absolutism and, 12
  Ash'aris and, 44
  authority and, 53–54
  Berbers and, 68
  economic theory in, 142
  on education, 146
  governance and, 198
  government and, 198
  kinship and, 299
  Kitab al-'Ibar (The book of advice), 68, 236
  Muqaddima (Prolegomena), 44, 53, 146, 236, 524
  philosophy and, 415
  reform and, 464–465
  on religious knowledge, 146
  Tamerlane and, 542
  tribalism and, 563
Ibn Majah, hadith and, 211
Ibn Manzur, on contracts, 117
Ibn Nujaym, on custom, 124
Ibn Qasi, 524
Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya
  Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab and, 231
  public interest and, 435
  Salafis and, 484
Ibn Qutayba, 394, 513
Ibn Rushd, 236–237
  Almohads and, 34
  Andalus and, 524
  authority and, 53
  Bidayat al-Mujtahid (Primer for jurists), 134 claim rights and, 475 Commentary on Plato's Republic, 176
  diplomacy and, 134
  ethics and, 153
  free will and, 176
  human nature and, 225
  individualism in, 254
  as judge, 285
  Manahij al-Adilla fi 'Aqa'id al-Milla (The methods of proof on the articles of faith), 176
  philosophy and, 414
Ibn Sa'dan, 544
Ibn Sa'ud
  Caliphate Congress of Cairo and, 257
  commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105
  Saudi Arabia and, 485
Ibn Shihab al-Zuhri
  hadith and, 211
  'ulama' and, 574
Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali, 237–238
  Aghaz-u Anjam (The origins and the final destinations) (Ibn Sina), 570

authority in thought of, 55
free will and, 176
Ghazali and, 415
human nature in, 225
Ibn Tufayl and, 241
individualism in, 254
al-Isharat wa-l-Tanbihat (Pointers and reminders), 570
Kitab al-Najat (Book of salvation), 458
Kitab al-Shifa' (The book of the cure), 237–238
Mabhath 'an al-Quwwa al-Nafsaniyya (Compendium on the Faculties of the Soul), 225
philosophy and, 414
Razi and, 459
Risala fi Sirr al-Qadar (Epistle on the secret of destiny), 176
Tusi and, 570
Ibn Tashfin. See Yusuf b. Tashfin
Ibn Taymiyya, 16, 238–241
Dar' al-Ta'arrud (Rejecting contradictions between reason and tradition), 239 economic theory in, 142
Faraj and, 172
fundamentalism and, 182
governance and, 198
government and, 203
al-Hilli and, 239
al-Hisba fi al-Islam (The Hisba in Islam), 239
hypocrisy and, 229
Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab and, 231
jahiliyya in, 269
al-Jawab al-Sahih (The correct response), 239
jihad and, 278, 280
Minhaj al-Sunna (The way of the Prophet's Sunna), 239 natural law and, 390
public interest and, 435
al-Qaeda and, 442
al-Radd 'ala al-Mantiqiyyin (The refutation of the logicians), 239
reform and, 466
Salafis and, 484
al-Sarim al-Maslul 'ala Shatim al-Rasul (The sword drawn against the insulter of the messenger), 72
Shawkani and, 506
as shaykh al-Islam, 509
al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (Political administration by the rules of religion), 16, 239
Sufism and, 528
Syria and, 537
violence and, 187
Zawahiri and, 604–605
Ibn Tufayl, 241
Almohads and, 34
Andalus and, 524
Ibn Rushd and, 236
Risalat Hayy ibn Yaqzan (Epistle of Hayy b. Yaqzan), 241
Ibn Tumart, 242–243
A'azz ma Yutlab (The most precious that is sought after), 242
Almohads and, 34
messianism and, 338
Ibn Wahb, 589
Ibn Yasin. See 'Abdallah b. Yasin al-Jazuli Ibrahim (biblical figure). See Abraham
Ibrahim, Anwar, 324–325
Ibrahim, Najih, 263
Ibrahim b. 'Abdallah, Abu Hanifa and, 14
ICF. See Islamic Charter Front (ICF)
Idalat al-'Iyan 'ala al-Burhan (Directing the sight toward decisive proof) (Suhrawardi), 530
IDB. See Islamic Development Bank (IDB)
"Idea of an Anthropology of Islam, The" (Asad), 184 ideology, 243–244
IFEES. See Islamic Foundation for Ecology and Environmental Sciences (IFEES) Ifriqiya, 172 ignorance, 183 age of, 269–270, 369
Ihya' al-Sunna wa-Ikhmad al-Bid'a (The revival of the sunna and the elimination of innovation) (Dan Fodio), 593
Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din (The revival of the religious sciences) (Ghazali), 64, 146, 191, 298, 309, 472 ijma' (consensus), 110–111 ijtihad, 244–246, 578–579 Ikhshidids, 173
ikhtilaf (difference of opinion), 132–133
Ikhtilaf Abi Hanifa wa-Ibn Abi Layla (The disagreement of Abu Hanifa and Ibn Abi Layla) (Abu Yusuf), 15
Ikhtilaf al-Fuqaha' (The differing legal opinions of the jurists) (Ahmad b. Hanbal), 110–111
Ikhwan, 432, 486
Ikhwan al Safa'. See Brethren of Purity (Ikhwan al Safa')
Ilkhanids, 246–247, 362, 402, 411
Iltutmish (sultan of Delhi), 127, 509
Ilyas, Muhammad, 539 imagery, on coins, 102 Imagined Communities (Anderson), 387 imama (religious leadership), 313
Imam al-Haramayn. See al-Juwayni, Abu al-Ma'ali imamate, 247–250. See also caliphate appointing imam to, 248
contracts and, 117–118
duties of imam in, 250 emergence of debate on, 248–249
Isma'ilis and, 265
kingship vs., 249 multiple imams vs. one imam in, 249–250
necessity of, 248
qualification of imam to, 248–249
Razi and, 459
religious authority of, vs. temporal authority of, 249
religious knowledge and, 307
Shi'ism and, 511
traditional political thought and, 555–556
'Imara, Muhammad, 469
IMF. See International Monetary Fund (IMF) impartiality, 286 imperialism, 250–251. See also colonialism
modernism and, 350
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
Sayyid Qutb and, 488
imperial model of government, 202 al-Imta' wa-l-Mu'anasa (Pleasure and enjoyment) (Tawhidi), 544
IMU. See Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan (IMU)
INC. See Indian National Congress (INC)
India, 251–253. See also Delhi
Afghanistan and, 20
Aligarh and, 32–33
All-India Muslim League in, 282–283
Babur and, 60
Delhi Sultanate in, 127–128
Deobandis in, 131
ethnic groups in, 157
Ghaznavids and, 192, 193
Ghurids in, 193
Iqbal and, 260

Jama'at-i Islami in, 271
Jam'iyyat Ahl-e Hadith in, 484 Jinnah in, 282–283
jizya in, 283
Khilafat movement and, 295–296
madrasas in, 321
Muslim demographics in, 130
Muslim homeland in, 260
Muslim League in, 382–383
Pakistan and, 404
Salafis and, 484
Sayyid Ahmad Khan and, 487
Sikhs in, 343
Sirhindi in, 26–27
Tablighi Jama'at and, 539
Tamerlane and, 542
Indian National Congress (INC), 282, 382
Indian Rebellion of 1857, 18
India Union Muslim League, 382 individualism, 253–254
Indonesia, 254–255
communism in, 106
liberalism in, 315
modernism in, 351
mufti and, 366
Muslim demographics in, 130
public opinion in, 436
Indonesian Council of Islamic Appeal (Dewan Dakwah Islamiyah Indonesia), 255 Indraprastha, 126 infallibility, prophetic, 240 inheritance
family and, 168
kinship and, 299
Inland Commercial Company, 392 innovation, 218, 463 inquisition, 255
Ibn Hanbal in, 24, 25
Institute for Muslim Minority Affairs, 346 insurance, 86
"intentions of religion" (maqāṣid al-dīn), 307 intercession, 256 interest (financial), 86, 142–143. See also credit Interim Transitional Council, 409
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 129 International Islamic Fiqh Academy, 578
International Islamic Fiqh Council, 347 International Islamic News Agency, 257 international Islamic organizations, 257–258
International Monetary Fund (IMF), 359 international relations, 258–259. See also diplomacy International Security Assistance Force, 542 International Union of Muslim Scholars, 578 Internet, 432
Internet Archive, 432
interpretation, religious (ta'wīl), 113
Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI), 379, 404 Intifada, the Hamas and, 215
nonviolence and, 396
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406
inviolability, 430–431
Iowa, 398
Iqbal, Muhammad Shah, 259–260
Ahmad, Israr and, 23
authority in thought of, 54–55 on democracy, 54–55
ethnic groups and, 157
ideology of, 243
in India, 252
modernism and, 350
Muslim League and, 383
Reconstruction of Religious Thought, The, 467 Secrets of the Self (Asrar-i-Khudi), 54–55 al-Iqna' (The conviction) (Mawardi), 331 al-Iqtisad fi al-I'tiqad (The Golden Mean in Belief) (Ghazali), 191 Iqtisaduna (Our economy) (Sadr), 262, 480 Iran, 260–261
'Abbas I and, 1
Abbasids and, 2
absolutism and, 13
Afghani and, 18
American hostage crisis with, 134 censorship in, 87
communism in, 106
Constitutional Revolution in, 57, 315 constitution of, 206
coup d'état in, 120
first parliament in, 409
fundamentalism in, 185
genealogy in, 190
Ghaznavids and, 192
government of, 206
"Green Revolution" in, 396
Hizbullah and, 220
Isma'ilis in, 266
Karramis in, 293–294
Khomeini and, 296–297
modernism in, 351
Movement of God-Worshipping Socialists (Nahdat-i Khoda Parastan-i Socialist) in, 505
Muslim demographics in, 130
Mu'tazilis in, 384
nationalism in, 387
political ritual and, 429
Qajars and, 443–444
Shari'ati and, 505–506
Tamerlane and, 542
theocracy and, 548
Tobacco Protests in, 18, 396
torture and, 552
'ulama' and, 577
Iranian Constitution, 478
Iranian Constitutional Revolution, 261, 443, 522
Iranian People's Party (Hizb-i Mardim-i Iran), 505
Iranian Revolution, 39, 55, 57, 66, 88, 209, 246, 260–261, 296
Iraq, 261–262. See also Baghdad
Ba'th Party in, 65
Buyids in, 79
colonialism in, 104
communism in, 106
coup d'état in, 120
first parliament in, 409
jizya in, 283
Jordan and, 284
Karbala, 293
Kurds in, 158
Kuwait and, 284, 442
military in, 340
al-Qaeda in, 380
Sadr in, 480
Saladin in, 483
Shi'is in, 344
Tamerlane and, 542
US occupation of, 104
Yazidis in, 343
Iraqi Communist Party, 480 Iraq War, 104
ethnic groups and, 157
Iraq and, 262
al-Qaeda and, 443
Irshad al-Fuhul (Guidance to the luminaries) (Shawkani), 507
Isawi, Charles, 566 Isfahan, 'Abbas I and, 1 al-Isfahani, Abu al-Faraj, 537 al-Isfahani, 'Imad al-Din al-Katib, 394 al-Isharat al-Ilahiyya (Divine intimations) (Tawhidi), 544 al-Isharat wa-l-Tanbihat (Pointers and reminders) (Ibn Sina), 570

ISI. See Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) Iskandar Muda, 520
Iskandar Sultan, 46
Islam
  Abbasids and, 1
  'Abd al-Raziq on, 6–7
  abodes of, 11–12
  in Afghanistan, 20–21
  Ahmadis and, 25–26
  in Algeria, 30
  'Ali b. Abi Talib and, 30–31
  apocalypse in, 38–39
  apostasy and, 40–41
  asylum in, 48
  Azhar University and, 59
  Ba'thism and, 65–66 in Bin Laden's view, 69–70 blasphemy and, 71–73
  charity in, 89–90
  in China, 90–91
  citizenship in, 95
  "civilizational," 325
  constitutionalism and, 116–117
  conversion to, 119 democracy and, 129–130
  Deobandis and, 131–132
  Druze and, 139
  in Ethiopia, 154–155
  excommunication from, 159–161 faith in, 166
  Five Pillars of, 103
  free will and, 175–176
  fundamentalist, 179–188 globalization and, 195
  God in, 196–197
  holy places in, 221–222
  human rights and, 226
  ideology and, 243–244
  individualism and, 253 international organizations of, 257–258 master of, 509–510 miracle of, 433–434
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381–382
  nationalism and, 21–22
  nation-state and, 389
  "political," 503–504
  "public," 437
  Qaddafi and, 441
  Quraysh and, 456
  secularism and, 489–490
  shari'a and, 496–505
  socialism and, 515
  transnational, 358–359
  tribalism and, 563
  warfare and norms of, 276–278
Islam, Yakob, 37
Islam and the Bases of Governance (al-Raziq), 243 al-Islambuli, Khalid, 263, 604 al-Islambuli, Muhammad, 263
Islamic Association (Sarikat Islam), 254
Islamic Awakening between Rejection and Extremism (Qaradawi), 444 Islamic Broadcasting Union, 257
Islamic Call Society, 257
Islamic Charter Front (ICF), 568 Islamic Collective
  Hamas and, 215–216
  Palestine and, 405
Islamic Development Bank (IDB), 257–258
"Islamic Fatah," 42
Islamic Foundation for Ecology and Environmental Sciences (IFEES), 150–151 Islamic Jihad (Jama'at al-Jihad al-Islami)
  ideology of, 243
  libertarianism and, 318
  Salafis and, 484
  Zawahiri and, 604
Islamic Legal Institute, 164 Islamic Liberation Party (Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami)
  ideology of, 243
  libertarianism and, 318
Islamic Mission, 65
Islamic Movement of Taliban of Afghanistan (Da Afghanistan da Talibano Tahrik), 541. See also Taliban Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan (IMU), 88–89
Islamic Renaissance Party, 88
Islamic Renaissance: The Real Task Ahead (Ahmad), 23
Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), 182
Islamic Society of North America (ISNA), 341, 399, 592 Islamic Solidarity Movement (Harakat al-Tadamun al-Islami), 486 Islamic Union, 407
Islamic Unity, 407
Islamic University in Medina, 486
Islamic World Congress (IWC), 257
Islamiyyat al-Ma'rifa (The Islamization of knowledge) (journal), 346, 347
Islamization, 263–264
Islam Online, 185, 347
Islams and Modernities (Azmeh), 184
Islamshinasi (Shari'ati), 506 al-Islam wa-Mantiq al-Quwwa (Islam and the logic of power) (Fadlallah), 164 al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm (Islam and the principles of governance) ('Abd al-Raziq), 5–6, 85, 243, 490 al-Islam Yaqud al-Hayah (Islam leads life) (Sadr), 262
Isma'il, Malik al-Salih, 483
Isma'il I (Safavid ruler), 264–265
  Diwan-i Khata'i (Book of the sinner), 264
  Khunji and, 297
  Qajars and, 44
  Safavids and, 480
Isma'il b. Ahmad
  patrimonial state and, 410–411
  Samanids and, 485
Isma'ilis, 265–266
  Druze and, 139
  Ghazali and, 191
  in Muslim demographics, 130
  Nizaris and, 139
  philosophy and, 415
  Qarmatians and, 445
ISNA. See Islamic Society of North America (ISNA) isnad (chain of transmitters; transmissions [of a hadith]), 211
Israel
  Arafat and, 42–43
  Beirut and, 67
  colonialism and, 104
  Egypt and, 385
  Hamas and, 215–216
  Hizbullah and, 220
  Jerusalem, 272–273
  Lebanon and, 165, 314
  Nasser and, 385
  Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406
  Rida and, 472
Istanbul, 266–267
al-Istibsar fi ma Ikhtulaf min al-Akhbar (Clarifying the differences in the prophetic traditions) (Tusi), 213
Italian-Turkish War, 408
Italy, Libyan invasion by, 104

Ivory Coast, ethnic groups in, 157
IWC. See Islamic World Congress (IWC)
Izala, 392
Izalat al-Khafa' 'an Khilafat al-Khulafa' (Removing rancor in issues concerning the caliphate) (Shah Waliullah), 493
'Izz al-Din 'Abd al-'Aziz, 235
Izzi Dien, Mawil
Environmental Dimensions of Islam, The, 150 environment and, 150

Jabarti
freedom and, 175
Ta'rikh Muddat al-Faransis bi-Misr (The history of the French presence in Egypt), 175
Jabiri, 'Abid al-, consultation and, 117 jabriyya (determinists), 175–176
Jackson, Jesse, 388
Jadids, reform and, 468
Ja'far al-Barmaki, 550
Ja'far al-Sadiq, 268–269
Fatimids and, 172
genealogy and, 190
Isma'ilis and, 266
Shafi'i and, 491
Shi'ism and, 511
Jafna, 115
Jahangir (Mughal ruler)
Delhi and, 127
Sikhs and, 343
jahiliyya (age of ignorance), 183, 269–270, 369 al-Jahiz
caliphate and, 85
government and, 199
Mu'tazilis and, 384
royal court and, 479
Jahm b. Safwan, free will and, 176 al-Jahshiyari bureaucracy and, 78
Kitab al-Wuzara' wa-l-Kuttab (The book of ministers and secretaries), 78
Jakarta, 521
Jakarta charter, 254–255
Jakhanke, 593
Jalal al-Din Akbar. See Akbar the Great Jalal Al-i Ahmad, 270–271
Gharbzadigi (Weststruckness), 270 Lost in the Crowd, 270
On the Services and Treasons of the Intellectuals, 270
Jalayirids, 362
Al-Jalis al-Salih wa-l-Anis al-Nasih (The good counselor) (Sibt b. al-Jawzi), 58 jama'a (religious community) in concept of community, 107 in hadith, 108
umma vs., 108
Jama'a al-Salafiyya al-Muhtasiba, 484
Jama'at al-Jihad al-Islami (Islamic Jihad)
ideology of, 243
libertarianism and, 318
Salafis and, 484
Zawahiri and, 604
Jama'at al-Muslimin, as community, 108
Jama'at al-Sayyidat al-Muslimat (Muslim Women's Association, MWA), 186
Jama'at Ansar al-Sunna al-Muhammadiyya, 484 Jama'at-i Islami, 271–272. See also al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group)
libertarianism and, 318
Mawdudi and, 334
Salafis and, 484
Jama'atul Mujahideen Bangladesh, 62
Jamal al-Din al-Ghazi-Ghumuqi, 495
Jama Masjid (in Delhi), 364
Jami, 528
Jami' al-Bayan 'an Ta'wil ay al-Qur'an (Clarifying the interpretation of the Qur'anic verses) (Tabari), 161
Jam'iat-e 'Ulama'-e Pakistan (JUP, Party of Religious Scholars of Pakistan), 64
Jamiat-Ulama-i Hind (JUH)
Deobandis and, 131
Mawardi and, 333
Jamiat-Ulama-i Islam (JUI)
Deobandis and, 131
Taliban and, 541
al-Jami' li-Ahkam al-Qur'an (Compendium of the rules of the Qur'an) (Qurtubi), 161
Jam'iyyat Ahl-e Hadith, 484
Jam'iyyat al-Shubban al-Muslimin, 472 Janissaries, 80, 508
al-Jannabi, Abu Sa'id, 446
Japan, 521
Jaunpur, 128
Jaunpuri, Sayyid Muhammad, Mahdi and, 323
Java War, 520 al-Jawab al-Sahih (The correct response) (Ibn Taymiyya), 239 Jawhar, 80
Jaxartes River, 560
Jemaah Islamiyah, 521
Jerusalem, 272–273
Jordan and, 284
Palestine and, 405
Saladin and, 483
Jesus, 372
Jews
Almohads and, 345
of the Banu 'Awf, 115
in Constitution of Medina, 115–116
Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214–215
international relations and, 258
jizya and, 283
marriage between Jewish women and Muslim men, 342 in Medina, 116, 371–372
as minority, 342
Muhammad and, 369, 372
Palestine and, 405
as People of the Book, 412–413
Tanzimat and, 543
Treaty of, 115–116
in Yemen, 345
Jibril b. 'Umar, Dan Fodio and, 125 al-Jifri, Habib 'Ali, 600
jihad, 273–282
'Abd al-Rahman and, 4–5 alternative views of, 278–281 civilians and, 281 foundational motifs, 273–274
fundamentalism and, 187
historical development of, 274–276
martyrdom and, 330
Muhammad and, 273–274
norms of Islam and, 276–278 obligation of, 103
in Qur'an, 187, 454
rebellion and, 459
terrorism and, 546
"Jihad against Jews and Crusaders" (Bin Laden), 121 al-Jihad al-Islami, 'Abd al-Rahman and, 4 Jinnah, Mohammad 'Ali, 54–55, 157, 282–283
Khilafat movement and, 295
Muslim League and, 382
Pakistan and, 404
jizya (tribute; poll tax; head tax on converts), 114, 118, 119, 283–284, 413, 545
Jochi, 362
John Paul II, Pope, 360

Jordan, 284
  Mu'awiya and, 365
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 382
  torture and, 552
Joseph b. Ephraim Karo, 497 journalism
  'Abduh, Muhammad in, 8–9
  hadith and, 337
  media and, 336–337
JSA. See Justice and Spirituality Association (JSA) Judaism. See Jews judge(s), 285–286
  'Abd al-Raziq as, 5
  government and, 203–204
  Ibn Rushd as, 236
  impartiality of, 286 jurisdiction of, 287
  Mawardi as, 331–332 proof as binding for, in lawsuit, 207 religious dimension of decisions of, 287–288
  shari'a and, 287, 501–502
  Shawkani as, 506
  torture and, 552
judging, ideals of, 286–287 judicial courts, 286–288. See also court(s) judicial functions of government, 203–204
JUH. See Jamiat-Ulama-i Hind (JUH)
JUI. See Jamiat-Ulama-i Islam (JUI) jumhūr (masses), 330
Junayd (Sufi shaykh)
  free will and, 176
  human nature and, 225
Junbalat, Kamal, 139
al-Jundi, Anwar, 469
JUP. See Jam'iat-e 'Ulama'-e Pakistan (JUP, Party of Religious Scholars of Pakistan) jurisdiction, 287 jurisprudence, 288–290. See also law
  Abu Yusuf and, 15
  consultation and, 117
  custom and, 123, 124
  difference of opinion and, 132–133
  dissimulation and, 135–136
  globalization and, 194
  guardianship of the jurist and, 208–209
  individualism and, 253
  of minorities, 346–348
  privacy and, 430
justice, 290–291. See also commanding right and forbidding wrong arbitration and, 43–44
  government and, 199–200
  in Ibn Sina, 238 in Ibn Taymiyya, 240
  intercession and, 256
  in Qur'an, 199–200
  socialism and, 515–516
Justice and Development Party (AK Party) (Turkey), 244, 305, 410, 570 Justice and Spirituality Association (JSA), 186, 187 al-Juwayni, Abu al-Ma'ali
  constitutionalism and, 113
  free will and, 176
  Ghazali and, 191
  governance and, 198
  Ilkhanids and, 246
  Nizam al-Mulk and, 393
  reform and, 465
  religious knowledge and, 307

Ka'ba Abraham and, 372 asylum and, 47 charity and, 90
  hajj rituals with, 417
  holy places and, 47
  Malik b. Anas and, 326
  Mecca and, 336
  Muhammad and, 369
  pilgrimage and, 416
  Qarmatians and, 446
  Quraysh and, 456
Kabul, 379, 553
Kadivar, Mohsen, Khomeini and, 261
Kadızadeli, 292
Kadızade Mehmed, 292
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 241
al-Kashifi, Husayn al-Wa'iz
  Akhlaq-i Muhsin (The ethics of Muhsin), 254
  Rawdat al-Shuhada' (The garden of the martyrs), 293
  Tusi and, 571
kalām (dialectical reasoning; theology), 549–550 Kalb, 582
Kalila and Dimna, 550
Kandahar. See Qandahar al-Kandhalawi, Muhammad Yusuf, 539 al-Kandhalawi, Muhammad Zakariyya, 539 al-Karaki, 'Ali
  on education, 146
  Mir Damad and, 348
Kara Tagh, 573
Karbala, Battle of, 220, 222, 228, 293, 446
Karramis, 293–294
  Ghurids and, 193, 194
Karts, 362
Karzai, Hamid, Mulla 'Umar and, 380
Kashf al-Shubuhat 'an al-Tawhid (Dispelling doubts about divine unity) (Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab), 231 al-Kashf wa-l-Bayan 'an Tafsir al-Qur'an (The unveiling and clarification of the interpretation of the Qur'an) (Tha'labi), 161
Kashmir, 404
Kashmir, Deobandis and, 131–132
Kashmiri, Anwar Shah, 468 al-Kashshaf 'an Haqa'iq Ghawamid al-Tanzil wa-'Uyun al-Aqawil fi Wujuh al-Ta'wil (The unveiler of the hidden realities of revelation and choicest opinions on interpretation) (Zamakshari), 161 al-Kawakibi, 'Abd al-Rahman
  'Abd al-Raziq and, 5
  absolutism and, 12
  Tabayi' al-Istibdad (Characteristics of despotism), 12, 13
Kayamids, 493
Kay Ka'us, 349
Kayqubad, 'Ala' al-Din, 530
Kazakh, in China, 91
Kedah, 408
Keddie, Nikki, 387
Kemal, Namik absolutism in, 12
  liberalism of, 314
  modernism and, 351
  republicanism and, 462
Kemalists
  government and, 205
  religious knowledge and, 304
Kenya, Zanzibar Sultanate and, 141
Keshk, Muhammad Galal, 147
Khadija, 369
Khairi, Abdul Sattar, 333
Khalaf, Salah, 406
Khalafallah, Muhammad Ahmad, 469
Khalaji, Ala al-Din, Delhi Sultanate and, 127
Khalid, 'Amr, 195
Khalid, Fazlun, environment and, 150
Khalid, Khalid Muhammad, consultation and, 117
Khalid b. al-Walid
  Abu Bakr and, 14
  Muhammad and, 373

Rightly Guided Caliphate and, 473
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Khalid b. Sinan, 34
Khalidis, 496
khalifa (vicegerent), 238, 453
khalifat Allāh (God's vicegerent, God's caliph), 83–84 Khalil (Uzun Hasan's son), Dawani and, 126
Khalil Allah, Shah, 22
Khalji dynasty, 127
al-Khallal, Abu Salama, 590
Khalwatis, 528
Khan, Akbar, 20
Khan, Ayub, 334, 404, 458
Khan, Khan Abdul Ghaffar, 396
Khan, Malkum
Afghani and, 19
modernism and, 350
Khan, Muhammad Shaybani, Khunji and, 298
Khan, 'Ubaydallah, Khunji and, 298 al-Khargushi, Abu Sa'd 'Abd al-Malik, 509 Kharijis, 294–295
activism and, 447
anarchism and, 36
Battle of Siffin and, 100
Berbers and, 68
Bin Laden and, 71
constitutionalism and, 112
consultation and, 116
ethnic groups and, 156
government and, 202
heresiography and, 217
hijra and, 219
hypocrisy and, 228
Ibadis and, 230
Murji'is and, 380–381
al-Qaeda and, 442
Quraysh and, 456
religious knowledge and, 306
Saudi Arabia and, 486
Sunnism and, 535
tyranny and, 571
Kharsa, 'Abd al-Hadi, 312
Khatami, Mohammad, Iran and, 261
Khatami sect, 540
al-Khatibi, 'Ali b. 'Ubaydallah, Nizamiyya and, 393 Khatmi order, 527
Khatun, Zumurrud, 530
Khatunabadi, Muhammad Baqir, 510 Khazraj, 219, 368
khilāfa (leadership, caliph), 313 al-Khilafa aw al-Imama al-'Uzma (The caliphate or the supreme leadership) (Rida), 85 Khilafat movement, 295–296
Deobandis and, 131
Mawdudi and, 333
Pan-Islamism and, 408
al-Kho'i, Abu al-Qasim, 57, 164, 165, 480
Khojas, 573
Khoja Taj, 573
al-Kholi, Amin, 163
Khomeini, Ayatollah Ruhollah, 296–297
Al-i Ahmad and, 270
authority in thought of, 56
Fadlallah and, 165
fatwa of, 174
fundamentalism and, 184–185
government and, 206
guardianship of the jurist and, 208
Hizbullah and, 220
Hukumat-i Islami (Islamic government), 460
ijtihād and, 246
jihad and, 279
justice and, 291
Kadivar and, 261
nationalism and, 387
nonviolence and, 396
rebellion and, 460
religious knowledge and, 301
revolution and, 471
Rushdie and, 174
Sadr and, 480
Saudi Arabia and, 486
Sistani and, 262
source of emulation and, 518
sovereignty and, 522
theocracy and, 547
utopia and, 585
Vilayat-i Faqih (Guardianship of the Jurist), 260, 291
Khoury, Dina Rizk, 400
Khrushchev, Nikita, 106
Khudabanda, Shah Muhammad, 'Abbas I as son of, 1 Khudai Khidmatgars, 396
khums (religious tax), 89–90
Khunji, Fazl Allah b. Ruzbihan, 297–298
Refutation, 297
Suluk al-Muluk (Conduct of Kings), 297–298
Khurasan, 78, 191, 193, 293, 322, 360, 380
khutba (sermon), 102, 178
Khwarazm, 560
Khwarazmshahs, 458
Ghurids and, 194
Mongols and, 362
Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Province, 396
Kilwa, 141
Kimiya-yi Sa'adat (The Alchemy of Happiness) (Ghazali), 192
Kinalizade, 402
Kinana, 456
King, Jr., Martin Luther, 376
King 'Abd al-'Aziz University, 346 Kingdom of Jordan. See Jordan Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. See Saudi Arabia
"king of kings," 492 kinship, 298–299. See also family; genealogy al-Kirmani, Hamid al-Din
Druze and, 139
Isma'ilis and, 266
Kisakürek, Necip Fazil, knowledge and, 304
Kitab al-Adab al-Kabir (The greater essay on right conduct) (Ibn al-Muqaffa'), 232
Kitab al-Athar (The book of traditions) (Abu Yusuf), 15
Kitab al-Farq bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Islam wa-bayn Wilayat Ahl al-Kufr (The difference between Muslim governance and governance by unbelievers) (Dan Fodio), 392, 593
Kitab al-Hiyal (Book of stratagems) (Abu Yusuf), 15
Kitab al-'Ibar (The book of advice) (Ibn Khaldun), 68, 236
Kitab al-Ihkam fi Tamyiz al-Fatawa 'an al-Ahkam wa-Tasarrufat al-Qadi wa-l-Imam (Distinguishing legal opinions from binding decrees and discretionary actions of judges and caliphs) (Qarafi), 444
Kitab al-Jihad (The book of warfare) (Ibn al-Mubarak), 329
Kitab al-Kharaj (The book of the land tax) (Abu Yusuf), 15
Kitab al-Kharaj wa-Sina' at al-Kitaba (The book of the land tax and art of administrative writing) (Ibn Qudama), 15–16
Kitab al-Maghazi (Book of military expeditions) (Waqidi), 133
Kitab al-Milla (The book of religion) (Farabi), 434
Kitab al-Muharaba (The book of warfare) (Wahb), 589
Kitab al-Najat (Book of salvation) (Ibn Sina), 458

Kitab al-Sadaqa wa-l-Sadiq (On friendship and friends) (Tawhidi), 178, 544
Kitab al-Siyar (Book of the rules of war) (Shaybani), 134, 277
Kitab al-Siyar al-Kabir (The great book on the rules of war) (Shaybani), 508
Kitab al-Umm (The exemplar of law) (Shafi'i), 491
Kitab al-Wuzara' wa-l-Kuttab (The book of ministers and secretaries) (al-Jahshiyari), 78
Kitab al-Zuhd (On renunciation) (Ibn Hanbal), 24
Kitab Fadl al-Kilab 'ala Kathir min man Labisa al-Thiyab (The superiority of Dogs over Many of Those Who Wear Clothes) (Ibn al-Marzuban), 178
Kitab Rusul al-Muluk (Book of envoys of kings) (Ibn al-Farra'), 134 Kitchener, Lord, 104 knighthood, 92
Knights under the Prophet's Honor (Zawahiri), 604 knowledge, religious, 299–312
  defined, 299
  as guidance for society, 310–312
  limitations of, 301–302
  modern state and, 309–310
  Mulla Sadra and, 378
  political remands of, 305–308
  religious diversity politics and, 308–309
  scope of religious, 300–302 secular reality and, 302–305
  Sunnism and, 535–536
  Tablighi Jama'at and, 303–304
  'ulama' and, 574–579
  value of, 300
Knysh, Alexander, 218
Kokand Khanate, 561
Koordinierungsrat der Muslime, 158
Köprülü Mehmed Pasha, Kadızade and, 292
Koresh, David, 181
Korkud (Ottoman prince), 403
Kotku, Mehmet Zahit, 305
Kufa, 95, 380
al-Kulayni, Muhammad, Usul al-Kafi (The sufficient foundations), 213 Kumiyya tribe, 68
Kunduri, 393
Kurdistan, 158
Kurds
  communism and, 106
  massacre of, 345 persecution of, 158
  in Turkey, 315, 344–345
Kutama tribe, 156
Kuwait
  Iraq and, 284, 442
  Jordan and, 284
  oath of allegiance in, 401
Kyrgyz, in China, 91
Kyrgyzstan, 88, 91

labor, division of, 137–138
Lahore Resolution, 383
Lamu, 141 land grants, 75, 239, 331 land tax, 114 language
  censorship and, 87
  ethnic groups and, 156, 157
  nationalism and, 387
  propaganda and, 432–433
  of Qur'an, 449
Language Movement of 1952, Bangladesh and, 61–62
Lapidus, Ira M., 330
Lashkar-e Janghvi, 546
Lashkar-e-Taiba (Army of the Pure)
  fundamentalism and, 182
  terrorism and, 546
Laskar Jihad, 521
law. See also jurisprudence; shari'a (divine law)
  Abu Yusuf and, 15–16
  Anglo-Muhammadan, 290
  apostasy and, 40
  arbitration and, 43–44
  asylum in, 48
  blasphemy and, 72–73 branches of, 288–289
  civil codes, 288
  clients in, 101–102 collective obligations in, 103 comparative, 290 consensus in, 110–111
  constitutionalism, 112–115
  Constitution of Medina and, 115–116
  contracts, 117–118
  custom and, 123–124
  difference of opinion and, 132–133
  diplomacy and, 134
  dissimulation and, 135–136
  execution of, 114
  family and, 169, 503
  fatwa in, 173–174
  governance and, 197–198
  grievance in, 207–208
  guardianship of the jurist and, 208–209
  Hakim bi-Amr Allah and, 214
  Hanafi school of Abu Hanifa and, 14–15
    apostasy in, 40
    arbitration in, 43–44
    Ash'aris and, 44
    custom in, 124
    difference of opinion and, 132–133
    Friday prayer and, 177
    heresy and, 218
    judges in, 287
    madrasas and, 321
    reform and, 465
    Shaybani and, 507–508
    'ulama' and, 578
    Zahiris and, 603
  human rights and, 227
  Ibn Hanbal and, 24–25
  Ibn Khaldun in, 236
  ijtihad and, 244–246
  impartiality in, 286
  Ja'far al-Sadiq and, 268
  in Jordan, 284
  judges and, 285–286
  jurisprudence and, 288–290 legal rights and, 474–476
  madrasas and, 321
  Malik b. Anas and, 326
  Malikism and judges in, 287
    madrasas and, 321
    Malik b. Anas and, 326–327
    Nigeria and, 391–392
    reform and, 465
    Zahiris and, 603
  marriage and, 170 minorities and, 346–348
  Mongols and, 362
  mufti and, 365–366
  Muslim minorities and, 341–342 natural, 390
  Nizamiyya and, 393–395
  obedience and, 402
  privacy and, 430–431
  public interest and, 435 punishment and, 438–439
  Qarafi and, 444–445
  rebellion and, 459–460
  reform and, 465

rights and, 474–476
rights of those disadvantaged by, 476–477
Salafis and, 484
sales, 474
Shafi'i and, 491
shari'a, 496–505
Shawkani and, 506
Shaybani and, 507–508
slavery and, 514
source of emulation and, 517
sources of, 497–498
Tanzimat and, 543
taqlīd and, 244–246
theocracy and, 547
tort, 475–476
torture and, 551–552
tribal, 284
Zahiris and, 603
Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Lawami' al-Ishraq fi Makarim al-Akhlaq (Flashes of illumination on the excellence of conduct) (Dawani), 126 lawsuit, 207–208 al-Layth b. Sa'd, 147
leadership, 313
League of Arab States, 363
Lebanese Civil War
Fadlallah and, 164
Syria and, 538
Lebanon, 314. See also Beirut
Amal in, 35–36
Druze in, 139
ethnic groups in, 157
Fadlallah and, 164
Hizbullah in, 220
Israel and, 165
nationalism in, 387
Syria and, 537, 538
Le Bon, Gustave, 602
legal rights, 474–476
legislative functions of government, 203
Lenin, Vladimir, 106
Leo XIII, Pope, 316
"Lesser Despotism," 13
Lesser Occultation, 446 letters of 'Abd al-Hamid, 2–3 of Sirhindi, 26
Lewis, Bernard, 352, 562 Liberal Constitutionalists Party, 5
liberalism, 314–315
minority jurisprudence and, 347
liberation theology, 315–317, 471
libertarianism, 317–318
Libya
Italian invasion of, 104 parliament in, 409
public opinion in, 436
Qaddafi in, 441
revolution in, 148
Libyan Free Unionist Officers, 441
Libyan Islamic Group, 441 Life of Mohammad (Ahmad Khan), 487 Lincoln, Abraham, 4 lineage
family and, 169
political ritual and, 428 literature
'Abd al-Hamid in, 2–3 advice, 17
Al-i Ahmad in, 270–271 apocalyptic, 39
censorship and, 87
chivalry in, 92 exegetical, 161–162 heresiographic, 217
individualism in, 254
Karbala and, 293
Mirrors for Princes, 348–349 patronage and, 411–412
Qur'an as, 448
Tawhidi in, 544
Thousand and One Nights, 550
Locke, John, 187
Lodi, Ibrahim, 366
Lodis
Babur and, 60
Delhi and, 127
Delhi Sultanate and, 127
Lord of the Auspicious Conjunction. See sāhib-qirān
Lord Tennyson, 550
Lost in the Crowd (Al-i Ahmad), 270 Lot, 167
lottery concession, 443
Loyal Mohammedans of India, The (Ahmad Khan), 487 loyalty, 268, 313, 318–319, 401, 412
Lugard, F. D., 392
al-Luma' (Flashes of insight) (Ash'ari), 176 Lurs, 564
Lusavorchakan, 569
Lutfi Paşa, 403
Lutfullah Beys, 601
Luther, Martin, 488
Lutheranism, 488

Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Signposts along the Road) (Sayyid Qutb), 187, 279, 291, 460, 489, 522
Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs (The ladder to God in the plains of knowing one's own soul) (Ghazali), 224, 225, 434 al-Ma'arri, Abu al-'Ala', 254
Mabadi' Ara' Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila (Principles of the Opinions of the Inhabitants of the Excellent City) (Farabi), 97, 378
Mabhath 'an al-Quwwa al-Nafsaniyya (A Compendium on the Soul) (Ibn Sina), 225 al-Mabsut (The extensive treatise on law) (Sarakhsi), 123 Madani, Husain Ahmad, Deobandis and, 131 madhhab (school of law), 110, 498–499 Madjid, Nurcholish democracy in, 130
Indonesia and, 255
Madrasa Fawqaniyya Mashriqiyya, 333 madrasas, 320–322. See also education education and, 145
endowments of, 150
mufti and, 366
shari'a and, 498–499
Madrid Conference, 284 al-Maghili, Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Karim, 593 Maghrib
Almoravids and, 34–35
Berbers in, 67–68
Morocco and, 363
North Africa and, 397–398
Mahabarata, 126
Mahal, Mumtaz, 50
al-Mahalli, Jalal al-Din, 161
Mahathir, Mohamed, 324–325
Mahdawiyya, 323
Mahdi, 103, 322–323
al-Mahdi, 'Abdallah, 172 al-Mahdi, Muhammad (Abbasid caliph), Malik b. Anas and, 326 al-Mahdi, Muhammad. See Twelfth Imam al-Mahdi, Sadiq, 8, 527 al-Mahdi, Muhammad Ahmad. See Mahdi of the Sudan Mahdi of Jawnpur, 586
Mahdi of the Sudan, 323–324
Mahdist Revolt, 324

Mahfouz, Naguib, 550, 555
Mahmood, Saba, 186
  Politics of Piety, The, 186
Mahmud al-Hasan, Shaykh al-Hind, 131, 295 Rahman and, 458
Mahmud b. Sebuktigin
  Ghaznavids and, 192
  military and, 340
Mahmud b. 'Umar al-Zamakhshari, 161
Mahmud II, 543
Mahmud I of Gujarat, Dawani and, 126
Mahmud of Ghazna, 431
Maimonides, 415
Majallat al-Adab (Journal of literature) (journal), 164
Majlis al-Shura (Saudi Consultative Council), 410
MAK. See Maktab Khadamat al-Mujahidin al-'Arab (MAK)
Maknasa (Berber group), 68
Maktab-i Wasita-i Islam (Median School of Islam, The), 506
Maktab Khadamat al-Mujahidin al-'Arab (MAK), 442
Maktubat-i Imam-i Rabbani (Letters of the divine guide) (Sirhindi), 26
Malalai, 20
Malan, D. F., 37
Malaysia, 324–325
  Islamic identity in, 157
  monarchy in, 361
  Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party in, 408
Malaysian Islamic Youth Movement (ABIM), 408
Malcolm X, 325–326
  Dabashi and, 317
  Elijah Muhammad and, 376
  hajj and, 417
  justice and, 291
  liberation theology and, 317
  Nation of Islam and, 388–389
malik (king), 82
al-Malik al-Zahir, Mirrors for Princes and, 58 Malik b. Anas, 326–327
  apostasy and, 40
  hadith and, 211
  ijtihad and, 244
  al-Muwatta' (Well-Trodden Path), 211, 580
  Shafi'i and, 491
  Shaybani and, 507
  as shaykh al-Islam, 509
  'Umar II and, 580
Maliki school
  Ibn Khaldun and, 236
  Ibn Rushd and, 236
  judges in, 287
  madrasas and, 321
  Malik b. Anas and, 326–327
  Nigeria and, 391–392
  as one of the four Sunni legal schools, 244
  reform and, 465
  Zahiris and, 603
Malikshah
  civil war and, 100
  Nizamiyya and, 393
Malwa Sultanate, Delhi Sultanate and, 128
Mamluks, 327–328
  Ayyubids and, 58
  Azhar University and, 59
  Beirut and, 67
  Cairo and, 80
  and Delhi Sultanate, 127
  family and, 169
  holy places and, 221
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 239, 240
  madrasas and, 320
  Mecca and, 336
  Medina and, 336
  military and, 339
  monarchy and, 361
  patrimonial state and, 410–411
  shaykh al-Islam and, 509
  succession and, 526
  trade and, 553
al-Ma'mun (Abbasid caliph), 328–329
  Abbasids and, 2
  Baghdad and, 61
  censorship and, 87
  education and, 145
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 240
  inquisition and, 255
  jihad and, 275
  Mu'tazilis and, 384
  'ulama' and, 575
Manahij al-Adilla fi 'Aqa'id al-Milla (The methods of proof on the articles of faith) (Ibn Rushd), 176
Manakdim, Sayyid, commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105
Man and Nature: The Spiritual Crisis of Modern Man (Nasr), 150
Al-Manar, 432 (television station) al-Manar (The lighthouse) (journal), 472 Manat, 370
Manchuria, 574
Mandate of Palestine, 405, 406
Ma'n dynasty, 139
Mani, 372
Manicheanism, Qur'an and, 369
Manila, 520
Man la Yahduruhu al-Faqih (He who has no legal scholar at hand) (Ibn Babawayh), 213 manliness, 92
mansaibdari system, 367 al-Mansur, Abu Ja'far (Abbasid caliph), 2
  Baghdad and, 60–61
  Ja'far al-Sadiq and, 268
  Malik b. Anas and, 326
  messianism and, 338
  royal court and, 479
  'ulama' and, 575
"manufactories," 377
Manzikert, Battle of, 490
MAO College. See Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental (MAO) College Maqalat al-Islamiyyin (The tenets of faith of the followers of Islam) (Ash'ari), 176 maqasid al-din (goals of religion), 307 al-Maqassari, Shaykh Yusuf, 417 Maqbili, Zaydi, 456 al-Maqrizi, Taqi al-Din, economic theory in, 142 Marco Polo, 270
al-Marghinani, 'Abd al-Malik, 123, 509 al-Marghinani, Burhan al-Din, on custom, 123
Marinids, in history of caliphate, 81
Marjani, Shihabuddin, 350 market, 66
Marlow, Louise, 513
Maronites
  Druze and, 139
  Lebanon and, 314
al-Marrakushi, 'Abd al-Wahid, Ibn Tufayl and, 241 Ma'arri, 537 marriage
  family and, 168–169 between Jewish women and Muslim men, 342 kinship and, 298–299
  law and, 170
  between Muslim men and non-Muslim women, 342
  slavery and, 514
  suitability and, 170
martyrdom, 329–330
  fundamentalism and, 181 suicide bombings and, 181

Marwa, 417
Marwan b. al-Hakam, 84, 491
  Jerusalem and, 272
  judicial function of government and, 204
  Shafi'i and, 491
Marwan b. Muhammad, 2, 82, 84
Marwanids caliphate succession and, 84
  in second fitna, 100
  Umayyads and, 582
Marwan II, 'Abd al-Hamid and, 2, 3 al-Marwazi, Husayn, 123
Marx, Karl, 354, 387, 480
Mary (mother of Jesus), 595
Masa'il Muhimma (Important matters) (Dan Fodio), 125
Mashari' al-Ashwaq (The wellsprings of longing) (Nahhas), 329
Mashhad University, 505
Mashriq, Morocco and, 363
maslaha (public welfare), 124
Maslama b. 'Abd al-Malik, 579
Masons, 'Abd al-Qadir and, 4
Masruq b. al-Ajda', 329
Mass Culture and Modernism in Egypt (Armbrust), 331 masses, 330–331
master of Islam, 509–510
Mas'ud, Ghaznavids and, 193
Masyumi (Consultative Council of Indonesian Muslims), 521 Mat, Nik Aziz Nik, 408 materialism, 183
matn (text part of a hadith), 211
Maturidis, heresiography and, 217 Mauritania, 397, 548
mawali. See clients
Mawarannahr, 573
Mawardi, Abu al-Hasan 'Ali, 331–332
  al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government), 85, 118, 198, 199, 313, 331–332, 460, 547
  Baghdad and, 61
  on caliphate, 85
  constitutionalism and, 113
  contracts in, 118 governance in, 198
  government in, 199
  al-Iqna' (The conviction), 331
  jihad and, 277
  on justice, 290
  Khunji and, 298
  leadership and, 313
  Nasihat al-Muluk (Advice to Kings), 332
  Qawanin al-Wizara wa-Siyasat al-Mulk (The laws of the vizierate and the management of rule), 332, 590
  reform and, 463
  religious knowledge and, 301
  representation and, 461
  rights and, 476
  Tashil al-Nazar wa-Ta'jil al-Zafar (Aiding examination and quickening success), 332
  theocracy and, 547
  al-Tuhfa al-Mulukiyya fi al-Adab al-Siyasiyya (The royal gem regarding political decorum), 332 Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la, 332–334
  apartheid and, 38
  apostasy and, 40–41
  authority in thought of, 55
  citizenship and, 95
  early life of, 333 in economics, 142–143
  Faraj and, 172
  freedom in, 175
  fundamentalism and, 182
  government and, 206
  international relations and, 259
  jahiliyya and, 269
  Jama'at-i Islami and, 271
  martyrdom and, 330
  response of Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr to, 480
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
  natural law and, 390
  religious knowledge and, 301
  representation and, 461
  revolution and, 471
  socialism and, 515
  sovereignty and, 522
  Tafhimul Qur'an, 334
  tyranny and, 571
  utopia and, 585
  Westernization and, 595
mawlid (celebration of the Prophet's birthday), 335
mazalim court, 286
Mazru'i dynasty, 141
MB. See Muslim Brotherhood (MB) Mecca, 335–336
  hijra and, 219–220
  as holy place, 221
  Ibadis and, 230
  mosques and, 364
  Muhammad and, 367, 370–371
  pilgrimage and, 416
  'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Meccan Muslims, Abu Bakr and, 13 Mecelle (Ottoman legal code)
  custom in, 124
  Syria and, 537
Medellin Conference, 316 media, 336–337
  of Hizbullah, 432
  propaganda and, 432
  Qaradawi in, 444
Median School of Islam, The (Maktab-i Wasita-i Islam), 506
Medina, 335–336
  community of, 107
  Constitution of, 115–116, 372
  hijra and, 219–220
  Ibadis and, 230
  Jews in, 116, 371–372
  Malik b. Anas in, 326
  as model city, 95
  Muhammad and, 367–368, 371–374
  pilgrimage and, 416
Medinan Muslims, Abu Bakr and, 13
al-Megrahi, Abdel Basset 'Ali, 441 Mehmed, Birgili
  Kadizade and, 292
  al-Tariqa al-Muhammadiyya (The Muhammadan path), 292
Mehmed, Kadizade. See Kadizade Mehmed
Mehmed, Qadizadeh. See Kadizade Mehmed
Mehmed, Vani, Kadizade and, 292
Mehmed Emin Ali Pasha, 543
Mehmed I, 403
Mehmed II, 403
  authority and, 54
  Istanbul and, 266
  mufti and, 366
Mehmed III, Sultan, Kadizade and, 292
Mehmed Neşri, 403
Memissi, Fatima, democracy in, 130 messenger, prophet vs., 433 messianic figure, 322–323
messianism, 337–338, 585
metaethics, 153–154
metaphors, for God, 196
"Metaphysical Philosophy," 378 metaphysics, in Farabi, 171–172
Michigan, 398
Midian, 167

al-Mihani, As'ad, 394
mihda, 255 military, 339–340. See also war Ayyubid, 58
  coup d'état and, 120
  in Pakistan, 404
  slaves, 514
Milli Görüş, 305
"Million Man March," 388
Milli Yakjehti Council, 64
Mina, 417
minbar (mosque pulpit), 438
Minhaj al-Karama (The way of charisma) (al-Hilli), 239 Minhaj al-Sunna (The way of the Prophet's Sunna) (Ibn Taymiyya), 239 ministry, 204
minorities, 340–348
  jurisprudence of, 346–348 Muslim, under non-Muslim rule, 340–342 non-Muslim, under Muslim rule, 342–344
  Shi'is as, 344
Minya, Egypt, 189
al-Miqdad b. al- Aswad, 110 miracles, 433–434, 529
Mir Damad, 348
  al-Sahifa al-Sajjadiyya (The scroll of Sajjad), 348
Mir Dard, 254
Mirrors for Princes, 348–349. See also advice (nasiha)
  Andalus and, 523–524
  diplomacy and, 134
  Ghazali and, 192
  Harawi and, 58
  Khunji and, 298
  military and, 339–340
  philosopher-king and, 413
  Samanids and, 485
  Sibt b. al-Jawzi and, 58
  Uighurs and, 573
Mir Sadr al-Din, Dawani and, 126
Miskawayh, 570
Misr Insurance, 86
Misr Textiles, 86 missionaries. See Christian missionaries
MJC. See Muslim Judicial Council (MJC)
ML. See Muslim League (ML) modernism, 350–351. See also constitutionalism
  in Egypt, 147
  endowments and, 150
  fundamentalism and, 179–180
  liberalism and, 314–315
modernity, 352–359
  nationalism and, 387–388
  reform and, 466–468
  shari'a and, 502–503
  theocracy and, 547–548
  'ulama' and, 576–578
  women in, 598–599
Mohammadan Education Conference, 32
Mohammed, W. D., 360, 376, 388
monarchism, 317 monarchy, 360–361. See also caliphate caliphate vs., 361 pre-Islamic Arabian, 82 money, coinage, 102
Mongke, Great Khan, 246
Mongols, 362
  Baghdad and, 61
  as dominant group, 156
  Ibn Taymiyya and, 240
  Ottomans and, 402
  Tamerlane and, 542
  Transoxiana and, 561
  tribalism and, 564–565
Monotheism and Reform (Harakat al-Tawhid wa-l-Islah) movement, 302
Montazeri, Hosein-Ali, Iran and, 261
Montenegro, 407
Montesquieu, 12
More, Sir Thomas, 585
Morocco, 363
  Berbers and, 68
  Harakat al-Tawhid wa-l-Islah (Monotheism and Reform) movement in, 302
  Ibn Khaldun in, 236
  jama'a in, 108
  Justice and Spirituality Association in, 186, 187
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 382
  oath of allegiance in, 401
  political ritual and, 429
Moros, 157
Moses, 370
mosque, 363–365
"mosque of dissension," 459
Mossadegh, Mohammad coup d'état and, 120
  Shari'ati and, 505
Mottahedeh, Roy, 513
Mount Lebanon, 314
Mount Moriah, 272
Movement of God-Worshipping Socialists (Nahdat-i Khoda Parastan-i Socialist), 505
MPAC. See Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC)
Mr. Yakub, 376
MSA. See Muslim Students Association (MSA)
al-Mu'arrab (Lexicon of Arabicized words) (Jawaliqi), 394 Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan, 365
  'Ali and, 84
  Battle of Camel and, 109
  Battle of Siffin and, 43, 100
  Hasan b. 'Ali and, 8, 216
  Umayyads and, 582
Mu'awiya II, 8
Mubarak, Husni, 8
  Egyptian revolution and, 148
  Islamic Jihad and, 262
Muda, Asri, 408
mudabbir (administrator, governor), 238 al-Mudawwana (The compendium), 326 Mudejars, 523
Mudhakkirat al-Da'wa wa-l-Da'iya (Banna), 62
Mufaddaliyat (Poems collected by al-Mufaddal), 394 Mufid, 344
mufti, 365–366
  fatwas and, 173–174
  shari'a and, 501–502
Mughal Empire, 366–367
  Akbar the Great and, 28
  Aurangzeb and, 50
  Babur and, 60
  civil war in, 100
  Delhi in, 127
  human rights and, 226
  monarchy and, 361
  shaykh al-Islam and, 509
Mughulistan, 573
al-Muhadhdhab (The neatly arranged compendium) (Shirazi), 394 muhajirun (emigrant companions of the Prophet), 109
Muhammad, 367–375
  Abu Bakr and, 13–14
  achievements of, 367–368
  'A'isha and, 27–28
  'Alawis and, 29
  apocalypse and, 38
  appearance of, 374

ascension of, 371 biographies of, 133 birthday of, 335 from ca. 570 to 610, life of, 368–370
caliphate and, 6
career of, 367–368 cartoons of, 336
Companions of, 109–110
Constitution of Medina and, 115, 116
Constitution of Medina in biography of, 115 diplomacy of, 133 family of, 167
Friday prayer and, 177
genealogy of, 190 ghāzīs and, 192 government model of, 201
hadith and, 211–214
hypocrisy and, 228
Jews and, 372
jihad and, 273–274
Mecca and, 335–336, 370–371
Meccan opposition to, 370
Medina and, 336, 371–374
as messianic figure, 337
nation-state and, 389
nonviolence and, 396
oath of allegiance and, 401
obedience and, 402
philosopher-king and, 413
pilgrimage and, 416
as political leader, 374–375 preaching and, 429
Qur'an and, 447–455, 452–453
Quraysh and, 456
reform and, 463–464
renewal and, 462–463
revolution and, 470–471
shari'a and, 497
Shi'ism and, 510
Shu'ubis and, 513
succession after, 84–85
Sufism and, 529
Sunnism and, 535
wives of, 168, 596–597
women and, 596–597
Muhammad, Elijah, 360, 375–376
messianism and, 338
on Nation of Islam as social reform, 388
Muhammad, Ghazi, 495
Muhammad, Khalid Shaikh, fundamentalism and, 180
Muhammad, Shafi', 495
Muhammad, Zulkiflee, 408
Muhammad Ahmad b. 'Abdallah, colonialism and, 104
Muhammad al-Baqir, 268, 511
Muhammad 'Ali (1769–1849), 327, 376–377, 495
Muhammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya. See al-Nafs al-Zakiyya, Muhammad Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College of Aligarh, 32, 382, 487, 577
Muhammad at Mecca (Watt), 368
Muhammad at Medina (Watt), 368
Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya, 322
Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Shaybani. See Shaybani, Muhammad b. al-Hasan Muhammad b. Fadl Allah al-Burhanpuri, 520
Muhammad b. Ibrahim al-Wazir, 506
Muhammad b. Ibrahim Qawami Shirazi. See Mulla Sadra
Muhammad b. Idris al-Shafi'i. See Shafi'i Muhammad b. Ishaq, 575
Muhammad b. Isma'il, 265
Muhammad b. Isma'il al-Bukhari, martyrdom and, 329
Muhammad b. Isma'il al-Darazi. See al-Darazi, Muhammad b. Isma'il Muhammad b. Mansur "Fakhr-i Mudabbir," Adab al-Harb wa-l-Shaja'a (The manners of war and of fortitude), 252
Muhammad b. Sa'ud, Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab and, 231
Muhammad b. Wahb al-Qurashi, Druze and, 139
Muhammadiyah, 521
Muhammad Sayyid Muhammad, 338
Muhammad V (king of Morocco), 363, 397 al-Muhasibi, al-Harith, 16
human nature and, 225
al-Wasaya wa-l-Nasa'ih (Testimonies and advices), 16
Muir, William, 212
Mu'izz al-Dawla, Buyids and, 79
Mu'izz al-Din Ghuri
Delhi Sultanate and, 128
Ghurids and, 193, 194
al-Mu'izz li-Din Allah (Fatimid caliph), 173
Isma'ilis and, 266
mujāhid (warrior for the faith), 92–93 Mujahid, 'Umar, 541
mujahidin. See jihad
Mujibur Rahman, 62
mujtahids (legists; authoritative jurists; renewers), 244–245 al-Mukhtar, 'Umar
in North Africa, 397
propaganda and, 431
al-Mukhtar b. Abi 'Ubayd al-Thaqafi, 322
Mullah 'Ali, 457
Mulla Sadra, 378–379
Afghani and, 17
on education, 146
Mir Damad and, 348
Mulla 'Umar, 379–380, 541
mu'min (believer), 115 al-Munqidh min al-Dalal (The Deliverer from Error) (Ghazali), 191 al-Muqabasat (Acquisitions) (Tawhidi), 544
Muqaddima (Prolegomena) (Ibn Khaldun), 44, 53, 146, 236, 377, 464, 524
Muqanna', 119
Muqatil b. Sulayman, 161
Muqattam, 80
al-Muqtana, Baha' al-Din, Druze and, 139 al-Muqtataf (The selected) (journal), 472 al-Muradi, Rabi' b. Sulayman, 492
Murad IV (Ottoman sultan), 292
Murad V (Ottoman sultan), 10 murder, 438, 475 al-Murghim (The compulsory) (Uradi), 495 Murji'is, 14–15, 380
Murtada, 344
Musa (Moses), 370
Musa, Salama, 515
Musa al-Kazim, 190
Musaylima b. Thumama
Abu Bakr and, 14
Muhammad and, 373
Musharraf, Pervez, 404
music, patronage and, 412 Muslim(s) (people) Christians and, relations between, 94
as clients, 101
conversion as at hands of, 119
Crusades and, 121
demographics of, 130–131 excommunication of, 159–161 faith of, 166
as family, 167–168 non-Arab, 101 and non-Islamic states, 118 population growth of, 130 Muslim (person)
hadith and, 211
propaganda and, 431

Muslim Brotherhood (MB), 381–382
* Azhar University and, 59
Banna and, 62–64
consultation and, 117
Egypt and, 147
Egyptian revolution and, 148
fundamentalism and, 182
libertarianism and, 318
Mubarak and, 148
nationalism and, 387
nation-state and, 389
Palestine and, 405
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406
propaganda and, 432
religious knowledge and, 308
Salafis and, 148
Saudi Arabia and, 486
Sayyid Qutb and, 488
sovereignty and, 522
Syria and, 537
terrorism and, 546
in Yemen, 600
Zawahiri and, 604
Muslim Council of Britain, 158, 341
Muslim Judicial Council (MJC), 519 Muslim League (ML), 260, 282, 334, 382–383
Muslim Peace Fellowship, 316
"Muslim peril," 407
Muslim Public Affairs Council (MPAC), 341
"Muslims in Europe Charter," 159
Muslim Students Association (MSA), 399, 519 Muslim Women's Association (MWA), 186
Muslim World League (MWL), 159, 257, 486 Muslim Youth Movement (MYM), 518–519 musnad (hadith collections organized by Companion), 211
Musnad (Ibn Hanbal), 24, 211
Mustafa Reşid Pasha, 543
Mustafa Riyad Pasha, 'Abudh, Muhammad and, 8–9 al-Musta'in (Abbasid caliph), 8, 100 al-Mustakfi (Abbasid caliph), 85 al-Musta'li (Fatimid caliph), 173 al-Mustansir (penultimate Abbasid caliph)
madrasas and, 321
Mustansiriyya College, 394
Nizamiyya and, 394
Suhrawardi and, 530
al-Mustansir bi-llah (Fatmid caliph), Nizaris and, 173 al-Mustasfa min 'Ilm al-Usul (Methods of jurisprudence) (Ghazali), 289 al-Musta'sim (last Abbasid caliph), and Mongols, 362 al-Mustazhir (Abbasid caliph), Ghazali and, 191 Mutaharri, Ayatollah Murtada, 503 al-Mu'tamid, Abu al-Abbas (Abbasid caliph), 61 Mutanabbi, 394, 537
al-Mu'tasim, Abu Ishaq (Abbasid caliph)
Abbasids and, 2
Baghdad and, 61
coinage and, 102
inquisition and, 255
al-Ma'mun and, 328
al-Mutawakkil, Abu al-Fadl (Abbasid caliph)
Abbasids and, 2
Christians under, 345
inquisition and, 255, 328
'ulama' and, 575
Mu'tazilis, 2, 383–384
anarchism and, 36
Ash'aris and, 44
commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105
ethics and, 153
free will and, 176
government and, 201
heresiography and, 217
Razi and, 459
al-Mu'tazz (Abbasid caliph), 8, 100 al-Muthanna, al-Hasan, 164 al-Muttaqi (Abbasid caliph), 85 al-Muwatta' (Well-Trodden Path) (Malik b. Anas), 211, 326, 580 al-Muzaffar, Imam al-Hasan Dala'il al-Sidq li-Nahj al-Haqq (Proof of the correctness of the path of truth), 297
Khunji and, 297
al-Muzaffar, Muhammad Reza, 480
Muzaffarids, 362
Muzdalifah, 417
MWA. See Muslim Women's Association (MWA)
MWL. See Muslim World League (MWL)
MYM. See Muslim Youth Movement (MYM)

Nabarawi, Saiza, 598
Nabataean (language), 83 al-Nabhani, Taqiuddin, 86 nadb (supererogatory command), 103 al-Nadim, 'Abdallah, 358
Nadir (Afghan king), 20
Nadir (tribe), Constitution of Medina and, 116
Nadir Shah, 443, 561
Nadwi, Abul Hasan
fundamentalism and, 183
jahiliyya and, 269
Nafa'is al-Usul fi Sharh al-Mahsul (The precious principles in Razi's compendium on legal theory) (Qarafi), 444
Nafi', 450
al-Nafs al-Zakiyya, Muhammad, 14
Ja'far al-Sadiq and, 268
Malik b. Anas and, 326
Mu'tazilis and, 383–384
Shi'ism and, 511
Naguib, Muhammad, 385
Nahdat-i Khoda Parastan-i Socialist (Movement of God-Worshipping Socialists), 505
Nahdat-i Muqawamat-i Milli (National Resistance Movement), 505
Nahdatul Ulama, 255, 521
Nahj al-Haqq wa-Kashf al-Sidq (The path of truth and the exposition of righteousness) (Hilli), 297
Na'ini, Muhammad Husayn
absolutism and, 13
Iraq and, 262
modernism and, 351
Tanbih al-Umma wa-Tanzih al-Milla (The awakening of the community and the purification of religion), 13, 262
al-Najafi, Muhammad Hasan guardianship of the jurist and, 208
ijtihad and, 246
source of emulation and, 517
Najdis, anarchism and, 36
Najib, Sayyid, 164
Nakhla, 373 names, of God, 196
Nanak, 343
Nanotawi, Muhammad Qasim, Deobandis and, 131
Napoleon Bonaparte, 80, 386
"Napoleon's theorem," 354
Naqshbandis
'Abd al-Qadir and, 3
modernity and, 357
religious knowledge and, 304–305
Shamil and, 495

Sufism and, 528
Transoxiana and, 561
Uighurs and, 573
al-Naraqi, Mulla Ahmad
'Awa'id al-Ayyam (Expectations of the millennium), 518 guardianship of the jurist, 208
source of emulation and, 518 nasab (pedigree; genealogy), 189
Nasa'i, hadith and, 211
Nashr al-'Arf fi Bina' Ba'd al-Ahkam 'ala al-'Urf (The wafting of perfume, on some legal rulings based on custom) (Ibn 'Abidin), 124
Nasihat al-Muluk (Advice to Kings) (Mawardi), 332
Nasihat al-Muluk (The Counsel for Kings) (Ghazali), 16, 192 Nasir (Abbasid caliph)
chivalry and, 92
Ghurids and, 194
guilds and, 209
Mamluks and, 327
Nasir al-Din Shah modernism of, 350
Qajars and, 343
Nasir al-Din Tusi. See al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din Nasr, Seyyed Hossein
environment and, 150
Man and Nature: The Spiritual Crisis of Modern Man, 150
Nasrallah, Sayyid Hasan, 36
Nassef, Malak Hifni, 598
Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 385–386
'Abd al-Rahman and, 4
Arab nationalism and, 41
Azhar University and, 59
colonialism and, 103
coup d'état and, 120
Egypt and, 147
Khrushchev and, 106
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406
Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party and, 408
Philosophy of the Revolution, 385–386
Saudi Arabia and, 486
Sayyid Qutb and, 488
socialism and, 516
"Nasserism," 385
Nastur, 369
Nasution, Harum, 384
National Islamic Front (NIF), 526, 568 nationalism, 386–388
Arab, 41–42
citizenship and, 95
elitism and, 331 as idea, 386–387
in Indonesia, 254
Islam and, 21–22
Khilafat movement and, 295–296
modernity and, 387–388
Nursi and, 482
as political practice, 387
Qaddafi and, 441
Saudi Arabia and, 486
Syria and, 537
Tanzimat and, 543
Third-World, 387
National Pact, 314
National Party in South Africa, 37
National Reconciliation Council (Milli Yakjehti Council), 64
National Resistance Movement (Nahdat-i Muqawamat-i Milli), 505 Nation of Islam (NOI), 388–389
Elijah Muhammad and, 376
Fruit of Islam and, 360, 376
justice and, 291
Malcolm X and, 325
Mohammed, W. D. and, 360
in North America, 398–399 Nations and Nationalism (Gellner), 387
nation-state, 389, 422
NATO. See North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) Natsir, Mohammed, Indonesia and, 254
natural law, 390
al-Nawawi, Hasuna, 337, 539
Nayl al-Awtar fi Sharh Muntaqa al-Akhbar (Attaining the aims in commenting on the choicest traditions) (Shawkani), 507
Nazim Hikmet, 391
Nazzam, 176
consensus and, 110
free will and, 176
political freedom and, 557
"near enemy," 263
Neglected Duty, The (Faraj), 7, 172
Nehru, Jawaharlal, 283
Nehru Report, 282
Neo-Assyrian Empire, households and, 223 Neo-Destour, 567
Neoplatonism
human nature and, 225
masses and, 330
neo-Taliban, 541
NEPA. See Northern Elements Progressive Union (NEPA)
Nestorian Christianity, 573
Mongols and, 362
Syria and, 537
Netherlands, Muslims in, 158
New Islamic Mission, 540
New Order, 255, 543 newsworthiness, 337
New Testament, 412
Nicomachean Ethics (Aristotle), 413
Nietzsche, Friedrich, 164, 353
NIF. See National Islamic Front (NIF)
Nigeria, 391–392
Dan Fodio in, 125
ethnic groups in, 157
modernism in, 351
night patrol, 427
Nile River
Cairo and, 80
in Egypt, 147
ni'ma (divine benefaction, favor), 319 9/11
fundamentalism and, 180, 182
Mulla 'Umar and, 380
Muslim minorities and, 341
Pakistan and, 404
Saudi Arabia and, 486
Taliban and, 541
World Islamic Front Declaration and, 280–281
Nishapur, 553
Nizam al-Mulk, 392–393
advice and, 16
constitutionalism and, 113
education and, 145
Ghazali and, 191
jihad and, 273
madrasas and, 320
Nizamiyya and, 394
Seljuqs and, 491
Siyar al-Muluk (Conduct of kings), 349, 393
Siyasatnama (Book of governance), 16, 349
Nizamiyya, 320, 393–395
Nizar b. al-Mustansir, 395
Nizaris, 173, 395, 431
Noah, 167–168, 370, 457
Noble Edict of the Rose Chamber, 543
NOI. See Nation of Islam (NOI)
Nomani, Manzoor, 333

Nomani, Shibli, Mawdudi and, 333
Non-Cooperation movement, 333 non-Muslims contracts and, 118
  conversion of, 119
nonviolence, 396–397
Noor, Ustaz Fadzil, 408
normativeness, 252
North Africa, 397–398. See also specific countries
  Berbers in, 67–69
  colonialism in, 103–104
  ethnic groups in, 158
  in Muslim demographics, 130
North America, 398–399. See also Canada; United States
North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), 570
North Dakota, 398
Northern Elements Progressive Union (NEPA), 392
Northern People's Congress, 351 North-West Frontier Province, 404
notables, 399–400
Noth, Albrecht, 562
Nuh (Noah). See Noah al-Numayri, Ja'far, 548
  abdication of, 8
  Sudan and, 526
  Taha and, 540
Nur al-Din b. Zangi
  madrasas and, 320
  propaganda and, 432
  Saladin and, 483
Nur al-Hidaya (The light of guidance) (Dawani), 126
Nurbakhshis, 551
Nursi, Sa'id. See Sa'id Nursi
Nusayba bt. Ka'b, 596
Nusayris, 29, 569

oath of allegiance (bay'a), 313, 401
Obama, Barack, 443
Obasanjo, Olusegun, 392
obedience, 402
Objectives Resolution, 334 obligation, 103
Obligations Muslims Owe to the Qur'an (Ahmad), 23
Occultation of the Twelfth Imam, 446 occupations, division of labor and, 137
October War, 538
OIC. See Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC)
Oman, Ibadis in, 230
Omanis, in East Africa, 141
Omar, Irfan, liberation theology and, 316
On Islam (website), 347
"Open Letter to the Downtrodden in Lebanon and the World," 220
"Operation Cast Lead," 216 opinion, difference of, 132–133 opposition, 134–135 oppression, 571 oral petitions, 256
oral tradition, 211
Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), 436 Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, 570 Organization of Afro-American Unity, 325 Organization of Islamic States (OIS), 436 Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), 257, 259, 578 blasphemy and, 73
  ethnic groups and, 157
organizations, international Islamic, 257–258
"Oriental despotism," 357
Oriental High School, 333
orthodoxies, 549–550
Oruj b. 'Adil, 403
Oslo Peace Process, 406–407
otherness, 352–353
Ottoman Chamber of Deputies, 49
Ottoman Committee of Progress and Union (CPU), 49, 601
Ottoman Freedom Society, 49, 602
Ottoman Law of Nationality of 1869, 543
Ottoman Public Debt Organization, 11
Ottomans, 402–403. See also Turkey
  'Abbas I and, 1
  commerce and, 553
  communism and, 106
  courts after, 288 equality in, 343 in Europe, 158 guilds in, 209
  holy places and, 221
  households and, 224
  imperialism of, 250
  Isma'il I and, 265
  Istanbul and, 267
  jizya and, 283–284
  Khilafat movement and, 295
  kinship and, 299
  lawsuits and, 208
  Lebanon and, 314
  liberalism in, 314
  military and, 339
  minorities in, 342–343
  modernism in, 351
  modernity and, 358
  monarchy and, 361
  mufti and, 366
  Muhammad 'Ali and, 377
  Nursi and, 481–482
  Pan-Islamism and, 407
  Portuguese and, 141
  propaganda and, 432
  rights and, 477
  Safavids and, 481
  Second Constitutional Revolution in, 315
  Shamil and, 495
  shaykh al-Islam and, 509, 510
  socialism in, 515
  Süleiman the Magnificent and, 531–532
  Syria and, 537
  Tanzimat and, 543
  trade and, 553
  Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca and, 341
  'ulama' and, 576
Ottoman Society for Consultation (Jam'iyyat al-Shura al-'Uthmaniyya), 472 Oubrou, Tareq, 592
Oxus River, 560
Özal, Turgut, 305

PAC. See Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC) Padri War, 520
paganism, 193, 369
Pahlavi, Muhammad Reza Shah, 8
  Khomeini and, 296
  nonviolence and, 396
  Qajars and, 443
  revolution and, 471
Pahlavi dynasty, 296
Pakatan Rakyat, 408
Pakistan, 404
  Ahmadis and, 25–26
  Aligarh and, 32–33
  Barelwis and, 64
  ethnic groups in, 157
  Jama'at-i Islami and, 271, 272
  Jinnah and, 282
  jizya in, 283
  language in, 157
  Mawdudi and, 334

military in, 340
Mulla 'Umar and, 379
Muslim demographics in, 130
Muslim League and, 382
Rahman, Fazlur and, 458
republicanism and, 462
Sayyid Ahmad Khan and, 487
Taliban and, 541
Taliban in, 541
theocracy and, 548
Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Pakistani Muslim League, 382
Pakistan Resolution, 383
Palembang, 520
Palestine, 405
Jerusalem and, 272
Jordan and, 284
Lebanon and, 314
Mu'awiya and, 365
Muslim minorities in, 340
nonviolence and, 396–397
Syria and, 537
Palestinian Islamic Resistance Movement. See Hamas
Palestinian Legislative Council, 407, 409
Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO), 406–407
Arafat and, 42–43
Jordan and, 284
Palestine and, 405
Palestinian National Authority (PNA)
Arafat and, 42–43
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406–407
Palestinian National Council (PNC), Arafat and, 42
Palmyrene (language), 83
Pan-Africanist Congress (PAC), 519
Pan Am flight 103, 441 Pan-Arabism
ethnic groups and, 157
Morocco and, 363
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406
Pancasila (Five Principles), 243, 254
Pandavas, 126
Pangkor Treaty, 324, 521
Panipat, Battle of, 494
Pan-Islamism, 407–408
Abdülhamid II and, 10
Afghani and, 17–19, 516
ethnic groups and, 157
international relations and, 258–259
Iqbal and, 260
Khilafat movement and, 295
Morocco and, 363
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
republicanism and, 462
Salafis and, 484
Saudi Arabia and, 486
solidarity and, 516
Uighurs and, 574
Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS), 324, 389, 408, 521
Paris, 96
Paris Commune of 1871, the, 106
Paris Treaty of 1856, 10
parliament, 409–410
Partai Keadilan Sejahtera (PKS), 521
Parthian, 492
Parti Islam Se-Malaysia (PAS). See Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS) Party of Justice and Development (PJD) (Morocco), 302 Party for Ottoman Decentralization (Hizb al-la Markaziyya al-'Uthmaniyya), 472
PAS. See Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS)
Pasban, 272
Pasha, Glubb, 284
Pasha, Mahmud Celaleddin, 601
Pashtun, 541
Pate, 141
Pathans, 251 patience, 396 patriarchy, 169
patrilineality, 298–299
patrimonial state, 410–411
patronage, 411–412
Peacock Angel, 343
Pearl, Daniel, 546 pedigree, 189
Pemba, 141
Penjdeh crisis of 1885, the, 10–11
"People of Paradise," Kharijis as, 294, 295 people of postponement, 307
People of the Book, 412–413
citizenship and, 95
jizya and, 283
non-Muslim minorities as, 342 pillars of Islam and, 418 taxes and, 283
People's Alliance, 408
Peoples' Defense Forces, 568
People's Party (Syria), 537
People's Party (Turkey), 49
Perak, 408
Perang Salib (The War of the Cross), 121 perfection, 306–307
Perfect Man, 56
Perfect State, The (Farabi), 145
Peripatetics, free will and, 176 perjury, 401
Persian Cossacks, 443
Persian Gulf, 'Abbas I and, 1
Peter the Great, 10
Peter the Venerable, 163
Petit, Rattanbai, 282
Phalangists, 164
Philadelphia temple, of Nation of Islam, 360 Philippines, 520, 521 philosopher-king, 184, 413–414 philosophical city, 97–98
philosophy, 414–415
Al-i Ahmad in, 270
Dawani in, 126 ethical, 152–154
Farabi in, 145, 170–171
free will and, 176
human nature in, 224–226
Ibn Bajja in, 233
Ibn Khaldun in, 235–236
Ibn Rushd in, 236
Ibn Sina in, 237–238
Ibn Taymiyya in, 240
individualism in, 254
Mir Damad in, 348
natural law in, 390
of rights, 476
Philosophy of the Revolution, The (Nasser), 385–386 piety, 415–416, 514
pilgrimage, 416–417
Pillars of Islam, 418–419
pillory, 430
Pious Predecessors, 472
pīr, 508–509
Piscatori, James, 577
PJD. See Party of Justice and Development (PJD)
PKS. See Partai Keadilan Sejahtera (PKS)
Plato, 184, 233, 237, 296, 378, 413
Pledge of War, 219
PLO. See Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) Plotinus, 225 pluralism, 419–426
plurality, 422–424
PM. See Positive Muslims (PM)

PNA. See Palestinian National Authority (PNA)
PNC. See Palestinian National Council (PNC) poetry censorship of, 87
  of Nazim Hikmet, 391 Sayyid Ahmad Khan and, 487
  of Isma'il I, 264
  Sufism and, 528
police, 427–428
Polisario Front, 409 political fatwa, 174
"political Islam," 503–504
Political Regime, The (Farabi), 145 political rights, 477
political ritual, 428–429
Politics (Aristotle), 414
Politics of Piety, The (Mahmood), 186
Polity IV, 128 polls, public opinion, 436 poll tax. See jizya polygyny, 245
Poole, Elijah. See Muhammad, Elijah
Pope John Paul II, 360
Pope Leo XIII, 316
Popular Arabic and Islamic Congress (PAIC), 568 population growth, in Muslim demographics, 130
Portico of the Banu Sa'ida, 374
Portugal, 141, 523–524. See also Andalus Positive Muslims (PM), 517 postponement, 307 pragmatics, 252 prayer
  Friday, 177–178, 364, 372, 429, 438
  mosques and, 364
preaching, 429
Principles of Astronomy (Bitruji), 241
Principles of State and Government in Islam, The (Asad), 410 Printing Houses and Publications Act (Ottoman Empire), 87 prisoners of war, 546
privacy, 430–431
procedural rights, 474
prognostication, 45–46
Prolegomena (Ibn Khaldun). See Muqaddima (Prolegomena) (Ibn Khaldun) proof burden, 207
propaganda, 431–433
  charity and, 90
  Friday prayer and, 178
  fundamentalism and, 180
  hadith and, 212
  jihad and, 278
  messianism and, 322
  Palestine and, 405
property, endowed, 149–150 prophecy, 433–434
  Afghani on, 19
  caliphate and, 84
  education and, 145–146
  family and, 167
  Ibn Rushd and, 236
  monarchy and, 361
  Muhammad and, 374
  Mulla Sadra and, 378
  Razi and, 459
Prophet. See Muhammad prophet, messenger vs., 433 Prophetic Order, 334
Prophet Muhammad. See Muhammad
Prophet's Mosque, 336, 579
Protestant Evangelicals, 179 Protestant Reformation, 353
Psalms, 412
Public Freedoms in the Islamic State (Gannouchi), 206 public interest, 435
"public Islam," 437
public opinion, 435–436
public sphere, 436–437
public welfare, 124 public worship, 114
punishment, 438–439
  capital, 71, 401, 475 corporal, 475
  as government duty, 114
  privacy and, 430
  rights and, 475
  torture and, 551–552
Punjab University, 458 purdah (veil), 587–588
Pure Brethren. See Brethren of Purity (Ikhwan al Safa')

Qabbani, Muhammad Rashid, 366
Qabusnama, 349
Qadaris, 440
  Ahmad b. Hanbal and, 25 innovation and, 218
Qaddafi, Mu'ammar, 441
  Green Book, The, 441, 516 Libyan revolution and, 148, 409
  socialism and, 516
  World Islamic Call Society and, 257 qadi (judge), 285–286. See also judge Qadi al-Fadil, 483
Qadir, Rabiya, 574
Qadir bi-Ilah
  Mawardi and, 331
  shari'a and, 500
Qadiri Creed, 160, 550
Qadiris as brotherhood, 75
  Dan Fodio and, 125
  in East Africa, 141
  in Ethiopia, 155
  in North Africa, 397
  Sufism and, 529
Qadisiyya, Battle of, 175
al-Qaeda, 441–443
  Bin Laden and, 69–71
  fundamentalism and, 180, 182
  Hamas and, 405
  ideology of, 442
  Islamic Jihad and, 262
  Mulla 'Umar and, 380
  nationalism and, 388
  Palestine and, 405
  propaganda and, 432
  religious knowledge and, 306
  Saudi Arabia and, 486
  Sayyid Qutb and, 489
  structure of, 442–443
  Taliban and, 541
  terrorism and, 546
  World Islamic Front Declaration and, 281
  Zawahiri and, 604
al-Qaeda in Iraq, 380 al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), 432 al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM), 432 al-Qahir (Abbasid caliph), 85 al-Qahtani, 'Abdallah, 417
Qa'im
  Druze and, 139
  Mawardi and, 331
Qajars, 443–444
  holy places and, 222
  reforms and, 56
  source of emulation and, 517
Qalandars, 415
Qalawun, Mansur, 327
Qalawunids, 327, 328

al-Qamari, 'Isam, 262–263
Qandahar, 379, 553
  'Abbas I and, 1
Qanun-i Nashr-i Haqa'iq-i Islami (Center for the Propagation of Islamic Truths), 505
Qawanin al-Dawawin (Rules of administration) (As'ad b. al-Mammati), 58
Qarachar Barlas, 551 al-Qaradawi, Yusuf, 444
  diplomacy and, 133
  Egypt and, 147, 148
  excommunication and, 159
  Fi Fiqh al-Aqalliyyat al-Muslima: Hayat al-Muslimin fi al-Mujtama'at al-Ukhra (On the law of Muslim minorities: The lives of Muslims in other societies), 346
  Fiqh al-Jihad (The legal rulings of jihad), 444
  globalization and, 195
  al-Halal wa-l-Haram fi al-Islam (The lawful and prohibited in Islam), 444 Islamic Awakening between Rejection and Extremism, 444
  Islamism and, 185
  Muslim minorities and, 341
  pluralism and, 420
  religious knowledge and, 302, 307
  representation and, 461
  Sunnism and, 536
  tolerance and, 420
  'ulama' and, 577
al-Qarafi, Shihab al-Din, 444–445 court rulings and, 288 al-Dhakhira (The treasure), 444 difference of opinion and, 132
  governance and, 198
  Kitab al-Ihkam fi Tamyiz al-Fatawa 'an al-Ahkam wa-Tasarrufat al-Qadi wa-l-Imam (Distinguishing legal opinions from binding decrees and discretionary actions of judges and caliphs) (Qarafi), 444
  Nafa'is al-Usul fi Sharh al-Mahsul (The precious principles in Razi's compendium on legal theory), 444
  Sharh Tanqih al-Fusul (Examining Razi's chapters on legal theory), 444
Qarakhanid kingdom, 411, 561, 573
Qarakhanids, 192, 340 al-Qarakhi, Muhammad Tahir, 495
Qara Khitay, 340–341
Qara Quyunlu
  Dawani and, 126
  tribalism and, 564
Qarawiyyin Library, 241, 577
Qari, Munawwar, 468
Qarmatians, 445–446
  apocalypse and, 39
  Fatimids and, 173
  tribalism and, 564
Qasim b. Ibrahim, 52
Qasimi, Ahmatjan, 574
Qatada b. Di'ama, 161
Qatar, 341, 444, 548, 577
Qavanlu, 443
Qawanin al-Wizara wa-Siyasat al-Mulk (The laws of the vizierate and the management of rule) (Mawardi), 332, 590
Qaynuqa', Constitution of Medina and, 116
Qayrawan, 553
Qays, 582
Qaytbay, 328
Qazvin, 481
Qibla movement, 519
Qing dynasty, 91, 574
Qipchaq steppe, 362
qiyās (legal analogy), 110
Qizilbash (Redheads), 264, 297, 443, 481
Qubilay Khan, 246
Qudama b. Ja'far, 15, 16
  Kitab al-Kharaj wa-Sina' at al-Kitaba (The book of the land tax and art of administrative writing), 15–16
  religious knowledge and, 301–302
Quebec, 598
Queen of Sheba, 595–596
Quetta Shura Taliban, 541 quietism, 268–269, 446–447, 461
Qur'an, 447–455
  in 'Abd al-Hamid, 3
  apocalypse in, 38–39
  apostasy in, 40
  asceticism in, 415
  asylum in, 47–48
  authority in, 51
  Bible and, 369–370
  biography of Muhammad and, 368 blasphemy in, 71
  caliphate and, 6 capital punishment in, 475 charity in, 89
  civil war in, 101
  commanding right and forbidding wrong in, 104–105 consultation in, 116
  contracts in, 117
  conversion and, 453 courts in, 286 credit in, 142
  democracy in, 351 development of, 448–449
  dissimulation in, 135
  economic theory in, 142
  education in, 144
  elections in, 149 emancipation of slaves in, 514 equality in, 152, 457 ethics in, 152–153 ethnicity in, 156
  excommunication and, 160
  exegesis and, 162–163 family in, 167–168
  fatwas and, 174
  freedom in, 175
  Friday prayer in, 177 friendship in, 178 genealogy in, 190
  God in, 196–197
  governance in, 197
  government and, 199
  government in, 198
  hadith and, 213
  hijra in, 219 historical origin of, 448–449
  human nature and, 225
  hypocrisy in, 228 in Ibn Rushd, 236–237 inequality in, 152 innovation and, 218
  intercession in, 256
  international relations and, 258
  jāhiliyya in, 269
  Jesus in, 372 jihad in, 187, 273–274, 276–277
  jizya in, 283
  justice in, 199–200, 290 language of, 449 legacy of, 454–455 legal rights in, 474–475
  liberalism in, 314
  libertarianism in, 317 loyalty in, 318–319 malik in, 82
  Manicheanism and, 369 marriage in, 514 martyrdom in, 329 messianism in, 337

monarchy in, 361
nation-state in, 389
natural law in, 390
nonviolence in, 396 normative guidance in, 420
Nursi and, 482
oath of allegiance in, 401 obedience in, 402 obligation to know, 103
parliament and, 410
People of the Book in, 412–413 piety in, 415 pilgrimage in, 416 pluralism in, 420
police and, 427
political elements in, 451–454 preaching in, 429 privacy in, 430
prophecy in, 433 punishment in, 438
Qadaris and, 440
Quraysh in, 456 rebellion in, 459
reform and, 467
religious knowledge and, 300–301
republicanism and, 462
revolution and, 470
scholarly analysis of, 449–451 Shabestari on, 261
shari'a and, 497
Shu'ubis and, 513
socialism in, 516
solidarity in, 516 sovereignty in, 522
Sufism and, 528
suicide in, 530
sunna and, 534
Sunnism and, 536
Taha and, 540
terrorism in, 545 tolerance in, 420 tyranny in, 571
'ulama' and, 575
Umayyads and, 582
umma in, 107
'Uthmanic codex of, 449
veils in, 587 violence in, 588
women in, 595–596
al-Qurashi b. al-Zayn, Mahdi of the Sudan and, 323
Quraysh, 456
Abu Bakr and, 13
civil war and, 100
Constitution of Medina and, 116
diplomacy of, 133
Kharijis and, 294
Muhammad and, 368, 373–374
nonviolence, 396
ridda and, 7
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Qurayza, Constitution of Medina and, 116 al-Qurtubi, Abu 'Abdallah
government and, 200
al-Jami' li-Ahkam al-Qur'an (Compendium of the rules of the Qur'an), 161
martyrdom and, 329
Qusayy b. Kilab, 456
Qushayri, free will and, 176–177
Qutayba b. Muslim, 561
Qutb, Muhammad, 442, 488
Qutb, Sayyid. See Sayyid Qutb
Qutb al-Din Aybak, Delhi Sultanate and, 127
Qutuz, Mamluks and, 327

Rabi' b. Sulayman al-Muradi. See al-Muradi, Rabi' b. Sulayman Rabbani, Burhan al-Din, 541 racism, 457, 513. See also apartheid; ethnic groups al-Radd 'ala al-Mantiqiyyin (The refutation of the logicians) (Ibn Taymiyya), 239 al-Radd 'ala Ibn al-Naghrila al-Yahudi (The refutation of Ibn al-Naghrila the Jew) (Ibn Hazm), 234 al-Radd 'ala Siyar al-Awza'i (Refutation of the moral teachings of al-Awza'i) (Abu Yusuf), 15
Rafiq al-Hariri, 67, 314, 538
Rahman, Fazlur, 458
equality and, 152
ideology of, 243
Mu'tazilis and, 384
Raiza Sultana, 597
Raja' b. Haywa, 579
Rajput, 128, 194
Ramadan, 418
Ramadan, Tariq, 159 al-Raniri, Nur al-Din, 520 rape, 222
Rasa'il Ikhwan al-Safa' (Epistles of the sincere or true brethren), 415
Rasool, Ebrahim, 519
Rawa, Yusof, 408
Rawdat al-Shuhada' (Garden of the martyrs) (Kashifi), 293 al-Raysuni, Ahmad, 302 al-Razi, Abu Bakr, 414 al-Razi, Abu Hatim, 413
al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din, 458–459
Book of Forty Questions, 459
Compendium, 459
government and, 199
Karramis and, 294
Khunji and, 298
al-Tafsir al-Kabir (Mafatih al-Ghayb; The major commentary, known as The keys of the unseen), 161
Razi, Najm al-Din, 457
al-Razzaz, Abu al-Mansur
Nizamiyya and, 394
socialism and, 515
al-Razzaz, Munif, 515 reality, secular, 302–305 reasoning, dialectical, 44 rebellion, 459–460. See also revolution rebels (bughāt), 113
Rechtsstaat, 10
Reconquista, 158
Reconstruction of Religious Thought, The (Iqbal), 467
Red Crescent, 604
Redheads. See Qizilbash reform, 462–480
in Afghanistan, 20
Atatürk and, 49
Bourguiba and, 567
community and, 107–108
consultation and, 116–117 contemporary debates on, 468–469
fundamentalism and, 184
government and, 205
modernism and, 350–351
modernity and, 357–358, 466–468
Muhammad and, 463–464
premodern imaginaries of, 465–466 tradition and, 463–464
in Tunisia, 567
under 'Umar II, 580 Refutation (Khunji), 297 religion. See Baha'i; Catholic Church; Christianity; Coptic Christians; Druze(s); Islam; Jews; shari'a (divine law)
religious freedom, 558–559 religious knowledge, 299–312
defined, 299
as guidance for society, 310–312
limitations of, 301–302
modern state and, 309–310

Mulla Sadra and, 378
political remands of, 305–308
religious diversity politics and, 308–309
scope of religious, 300–302
secular reality and, 302–305
Sunnism and, 535–536
Tablighi Jama'at and, 303–304
'ulama' and, 574–579
value of, 300
Remaking the Modern (Ghannam), 264
Reminding the Rational Man and Alerting the Neglectful Man ('Abd al-Qadir), 4 Renan, Ernest, 18, 19 renewal, 462
representation, 460–461
Republic, The (Plato), 184, 296, 378, 413
Ibn Rushd and, 237
utopia and, 585
Republican Brotherhood, 527, 540 Republican Brothers and Sisters, 540 republicanism, 462
Republican Party (Sudan), 540
Republican People's Party (RPP), 49, 570
Reshad, Mehmet, 482 resistance, 134–135
res publica, 437 restitution, 439 retribution, 439
Reuter concession, 443 revival, 462–480 revolution, 470–471. See also "Arab spring"; rebellion Bolshevik, 443 coup d'état vs., 120–121
dissent and, 134–135
in Egypt, 147–148
in Ethiopia, 155
Iranian, 39, 55, 57, 66, 88, 209, 246, 260–261, 296 in Libya, 148
Russian, 315
in Tunisia, 147
Revolutionary Command Council, 385
Revolution of National Salvation, 526, 527 Reza Khan. See Pahlavi, Muhammad Reza Shah Rhodes, 532
ribā (interest), 86
Ribat al-Ma'muniyya, 530
Richard the Lionheart, 58, 483
Rida, Muhammad Rashid, 472–473
'Abd al-Raziq and, 5
absolutism and, 12, 13
caliphate and, 85
Egypt and, 147
government and, 198, 205
ijtihād and, 245
international relations and, 259
jāhiliyya and, 269
jurisprudence and, 289
al-Khilafa aw al-Imama al-'Uzma (The caliphate or the supreme leadership), 85
mawlid and, 335
modernism and, 350
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
republicanism and, 462
slavery and, 515
ridda (apostasy)
'Abd al-Raziq on, 7
caliphate and, 7
Riesebrodt, Martin, 185 right, commanding, 104–105
Rightly Guided Caliphate, 81, 116, 148, 149, 201–202, 473–474, 582
rights, 474–478
contemporary notions of, 477–478
legal, 474–476
political, 477
of those disadvantaged by law, 476–477
Rih al-Jannah (Wind of paradise) (video series), 432
Rihla (Travels) (Ibn Jubayr), 34
Rinfa, Mohammed, 391
Risala (Treatise on Islamic law) (Shafi'i), 289, 491
Risala fi al-Hijra (Treatise on emigration) (Uradi), 495
Risala fi al-Sahaba (Epistle on the caliph's entourage) (Ibn al-Muqaffa'), 15, 232, 287
Risala fi Sirr al-Qadar (Epistle on the secret of destiny) (Ibn Sina), 176
Risalat al-Akhbar wa-l-Ijtihad (Epistle on prophetic traditions and legal reasoning) (Bihbihani), 245
Risalat al-Tawhid (The Theology of Unity) ('Abduh Muhammad), 9, 467
Risalat Hayy ibn Yaqzan (Epistle of Hayy b. Yaqzan) (Ibn Tufayl), 241 Risale-yi Nur (Epistle of light) (Sa'id Nursi), 305, 482 ritual, political, 428–429
Riyad al-Salihin (The gardens of the pious) (Nawawi), 539
Robinson Crusoe (Defoe), 241
Rock of Jerusalem, 272
Romania, 407
Ross, North Dakota, 398
Rover Scouts, 63
Royal Asiatic Society, 487
royal court, 479
RPP. See Republican People's Party (RPP)
Rukn al-Din Khurshah, 395
Rum, 490
Rumi, Jalal al-Din, 528
Ruqayya, 169, 584
Rushdie, Salman, 174
Russell, Thomas, 566
Russia, Muslim minorities in, 341
Russian Empire
Central Asia and, 88
jihad and, 279
revolution in, 315
Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca and, 341
Russo-Ottoman War of 1768–74, 250
Russo-Turkish War, 10, 407, 495
Rustamid dynasty, 156
Rusum Dar al-Khilafah (The Rules and Regulations of the Abbasid Court) (al-Sabi'), 479 al-Sa'ati, Shaykh Ahmad al-Banna, 62

Sabaeans, 369
Sabu, Muhammad, 408
Sabzavari, Muhammad, on education, 146
Sachedina, Abdulaziz, 135 Sadat, Anwar, 147
'Abd al-Rahman and, 4
Azhar University and, 59
communism and, 106
Faraj and, 172
al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya and, 189
Islamic Jihad and, 263
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
piety and, 416
Sa'd b. Abi Waqqas, as companion of the Prophet, 109
Sa'di dynasty, 68, 254
al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir, 57, 480
economic theory in, 143
Falsafatuna (Our philosophy), 262, 480
Iqtisaduna (Our economy), 262, 480
in Iraq, 262
al-Islam Yaqud al-Hayah (Islam leads life), 262
religious knowledge and, 309–310
al-Sadr, Muhammad Sadiq. See Sadr II

al-Sadr, Muqtada, 262
al-Sâdr, Musa
  Amal and, 35–36
  Fadlallah and, 164
  Hizbullah and, 220
  in Iraq, 57, 157
Sadra, Mulla. See Mulla Sadra
Sadr II, 262
Safa, 417
Safadi, 537
Safavids, 480–481
  'Abbas I as ruler of, 1
  Dashtaki family and, 126
  Dawani and, 126
  Friday prayer and, 178
  genealogy and, 190
  human rights and, 226
  imperialism of, 250
  "Iranization" of, 265
  Isma'il I and, 264, 265
  jihad and, 276
  Khunji and, 297–298
  messianism and, 338
  Mir Damad and, 348
  propaganda and, 432
  shaykh al-Islam and, 509, 510
  "Shi'ification" of, 265
  source of emulation and, 517
al-Saffah, Abu al-'Abbas (Abbasid caliph), Abbasids and, 2 Saffarid dynasty, Ghaznavids and, 193
Safi, Shah, 348
Safi al-Din (Sufi shaykh), 480 sahâba (companions), 109 al-Sahab Foundation for Media Production, 432, 443 al-Sahhar, 'Abdul-Hamid Jawdat, 505 sâhib-qirân (Lord of the Auspicious Conjunction), 47, 54, 338, 532 sahîfa (early private collection of hadiths), 211 al-Sahifa al-Sajjadiyya (The scroll of Sajjad) (Mir Damad), 348 al-Sahihayn (Two Authentic Collections [of hadith]), 211 Sahnun, Malik b. Anas and, 326
Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic, 409
Sahwis (Awakening Islamists), 484, 486
Sa'id al-Andalusi, 457
Sa'id b. Sultan, 141
Sa'id Nursi, 481–482
  Gülen and, 305
  modernity and, 357
  Risale-yi Nur (Epistle of light), 305, 482
Sa'idzadeh, Hojatoleslam Seyyed Mohsen, democracy in, 129 al-Sakhawi, Shams al-Din, 147
Şakir, Bahaeddin, 601–602
Saladin, 482–483
  Ayyubids and, 58
  Crusades and, 121
  Jerusalem and, 272
  jihad and, 278
  madrasas and, 320
  Syria and, 537
Salafis, 483–484
  authority and, 55
  Egyptian Revolution and, 148
  Muslim Brotherhood and, 148
  al-Qaeda and, 442
  reform and, 467
  Saudi Arabia and, 486
  'ulama' and, 578
  in Yemen, 600
Salah al-Din. See Saladin
Salama (castle), 236
Salama b. 'Abd al-Wahhab, Druze and, 139 Salar, in China, 91
salat (ritual prayer), 418 sales law, 474
Salih, 167
Salih b. Suwayd, Qadaris and, 440
Salisbury, Lord Robert, 11
Salman al-Farisi, 110
Samanids, 485
  Ghaznavids and, 193
  military and, 339
  patrimonial state and, 410, 411
  Transoxiana and, 561
Samarqand, 553, 561
Sami Frasheri, Shemseddin, 350
Sammani brotherhood, 77, 520
Samura b. Jundub, martyrdom and, 329 al-San'ani, Muhammad b. al-Amir, 600, 606 al-Sanhuri, 'Abd al-Razzaq
  government and, 198, 205
  religious knowledge and, 302
Sanjar b. Malikshah, 191, 490
Sanusis
  colonialism and, 104
  in North Africa, 397
Sarah, 595
Sarakhsi, 123
Sarbidarids, 362
Sarekat Islam, 351, 521
Sarikat Islam, 254
al-Sarim al-Maslul 'ala Shatim al-Rasul (The sword drawn against the insulter of the messenger) (Ibn Taymiyya), 72
Sarkis, Elias, 36
Sarraj, Abu Nasr, 528
Sasanids
  administrative system of government and, 204
  Buyids and, 79
  shâhânshâh and, 492
  tribalism and, 563–564
Satan, 178
Satanic Verses, The (Rushdie), 174 Saudi Arabia, 485–486
  citizenship in, 345
  coinage in, 102
  ethnic groups in, 157–158
  holy places and, 221–222
  Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab and, 231
  Mecca and, 336
  Medina and, 336
  parliament in, 410
  pilgrimage and, 417
  Salafis and, 484
  Sufism and, 529
  Taliban and, 541
  theocracy and, 548
  torture and, 552
Saudi Consultative Council, 410
Sayf al-Dawla, 432
al-Sayl al-Jarrar (The raging torrent) (Shawkani), 507 Sayyid, 'Abdallah, 263
al-Sayyid, Ahmad Lutfi, Egypt and, 5, 147 Sayyid Ahmad Khan, Sir, 487–488
  Archaeological History of the Ruins of Delhi, 487 Asbab-i Baghawat-i Hind (The causes of the Indian revolt), 252, 487 authority in thought of, 54
  in India, 252
  Life of Mohammad, 487
  Loyal Mohammedans of India, The, 487
  Mawdudi and, 333
  modernism and, 350
  Mohammedan Anglo-Oriental College and, 32 Muslim League and, 382
  slavery and, 515
  Westernization and, 594
Sayyid dynasty, 127
Sayyid Qutb, 488–489

'Abd al-Rahman and, 4
Bin Laden and, 71
Child from the Village, A, 488
citizenship and, 95
community and, 108
consultation and, 117
on Crusades, 121
economic theory in, 143
exegesis and, 162
Fi Zilal al-Qur'an (In the shade of the Qur'an), 121, 162, 229, 488
freedom and, 175
fundamentalism and, 182
hypocrisy and, 229
ideology and, 243
jāhiliyya and, 270
jihad and, 279
on justice, 290–291
Khomeini and, 297
Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Signposts along the Road), 187, 279, 291, 460, 489, 522
martyrdom and, 330
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
natural law and, 390
on parliament, 410
al-Qaeda and, 442
rebellion and, 460
religious knowledge and, 300–301
revolution and, 471
Salafis and, 484
socialism and, 515
Social Justice in Islam, 279, 291, 489
sovereignty and, 522
Sunnism and, 536
Tafsir Surat al-Shura (Interpretation of sura 42, The Consultation), 410
theocracy and, 547
tyranny and, 571
utopia and, 585
violence and, 589
Zawahiri and, 603–604
Schacht, Joseph, 212 school. See education; madrasas School of Islamic Social Sciences, 341 school of law, 110
Schulze, Reinhard, 353, 356 science, exegesis and, 162 scolding, 105
Scottish Enlightenment, 98 scribe, 204
Sebuktegin b. Qara Bechkem, Ghaznavids and, 192 seclusion, 587
Second Constitutional Revolution, 315
Second Eastern Turkestan Republic, 574 Second Message of Islam, The (Taha), 540 secretary, 204, 513
secularism, 489–490
gender and, 185
government and, 205
Jama'at-i Islami and, 271
jizya and, 283–284
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381–382
Muslims in Europe and, 159 notables and, 399
subjectivity and, 354–355 secular reality, religious value of, 302–305 sedition, 561–562 self-flagellation, 293
Selim, 531
Selim III, 409
Seljuqs, 490–491
Almoravids and, 35
authority and, 52–53
caliphate and, 52–53
Ghazali and, 191
Ghaznavids and, 193
military and, 339
monarchy and, 361
Nizaris and, 395
Ottomans and, 402
patrimonial state and, 411
propaganda and, 431
shāhānshāh and, 492
sultan and, 533
Tamerlane and, 542
Transoxiana and, 561
separation of powers, in government, 203, 205
Sepoy Mutiny, 279
September 11. See 9/11
September Laws, 568
Serbia, 407 service, Delhi Sultanate and, 128 Service Bureau for Arab Mujahidin, 432 service sector, 137–138
Seven Hausa States, 391
Sèvres Treaty of 1920, 569 sexual assault, 222 sexual mores, 475
sha'b (masses), 330
Shabestari, Mohammed Mojtahed
religious knowledge and, 301
on secularism, 261 Shadhilis
in East Africa, 141
Sufism and, 528
shafā'a (intercession), 256
al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris, 491–492
consensus and, 110
diplomacy and, 134
hypocrisy and, 229
innovation and, 218
jihad and, 277
Kitab al-Umm (The exemplar of law), 491
reform and, 465
Risala (Treatise on law), 289
Shaybani and, 508
sunna and, 534
Shafi'i b. 'Abd al-Salam, innovation and, 218
Shafi'i school
East Africa and, 141
in Indonesia, 254
madrasas and, 321
Nizam al-Mulk and, 393
as one of the four Sunni legal schools, 244
Shah, Reza. See Pahlavi, Muhammad Reza Shah
Shahabadi, Mirza Muhammad 'Ali, Khomeini and, 296 Shah 'Alam II (Mughal ruler), 81 shāhānshāh (king of kings), 492
Shahid, Sayyid Ahmad, Deobandis and, 131
Shahid, Shah Isma'il, 468
Shah Jahan (Mughal ruler), 50
Delhi and, 127
Mughals and, 366
Shahjahanabad, 127. See also Delhi
Shahnama (Book of kings) (Firdawsi), 479, 492–493, 561 al-Shahrastani, Abu al-Fath, 176, 525 al-Shahrazuri, Muhyi al-Din, 394 Shahrkush, 551
Shahrudi, Mahmud, 164
Shahrzad, 550
Shah Tahmasp. See Tahmasp I Shah Wali Allah ki Siyasi Maktubat (Political letters of Shah Wali Allah) (Nizami), 494 Shah Walliullah, 493–494 al-Budur al-Bazigha (Full Moon Appearing on the Horizon), 493 on caliphate, 85
Deobandis and, 131
Fuyud al-Haramayn (Visions received in the Two Holy Cities), 494
Hujjat Allah al-Baligha (The Conclusive Argument from God), 493

Izalat al-Khafa' 'an Khilafat al-Khulafa' (Removing rancor in issues concerning the caliphate), 493
reform and, 468
al-Tafhimat al-Ilahiyya (Divine instructions), 494 Shaikhism, Afghani and, 17, 19
Shaltut, Mahmud, 279 shame, zone of, 430
Shamil, Imam, 494–495
Shamil, Sait, 495 al-Shamil (The comprehensive work) (Abu Nasr b. al-Sabbagh), 394 Shanga, 141
Sha'rawi, Huda, 598
Sha'rawi, Shaykh Muhammad Mutawalli, 516
Sharh al-Usul al-Khamsa (Commentary on the five fundamental principles) (pseudo-'Abd al-Jabbar), 433
Sharh Tanqih al-Fusul (Examining Razi's chapters on legal theory) (Qarafi), 444 shari'a (divine law), 496–505
absolutism and, 12
Abu Yusuf and, 15
in books, 497
caliphate and, 500–501 courts and, 287
democracy and, 129–130
difference of opinion and, 133
education in, 499 elections and, 149
excommunication and, 160
family and, 170, 503 finance in, 114–115
Friday prayer and, 177
governance and, 197
government and, 200–201
government duties in, 114–115
Ibn Rushd and, 236
ideology and, 243
international relations and, 258
judges and, 287
jurisprudence and, 288
madhhabs and, 498–499
madrasas and, 498–499
modernity and, 502–503
muftis and, 501–502
Mulla 'Umar and, 379
natural law and, 390
Nigeria and, 392
Pakistan and, 404
political Islam and, 503–504
public interest and, 435 public worship in, 114 punishment in, 114
Qarafi and, 445
religious knowledge and, 302 rival authorities in, 499–500
Sadr and, 480
slavery in, 514
sources of, 497–498
in Sudan, 540
taxes in, 114–115
theocracy and, 547
torture and, 552
'ulama' and, 576
vicegerents and, 238
Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Shari'ati, 'Ali, 505–506
Abu Dharr al-Ghifari, the God-worshipping Socialist, 505
Al-i Ahmad and, 270–271
authority in thought of, 55–56
Khomeini and, 297
liberation theology and, 316 literature of, 293
rebellion and, 460
revolution and, 471
Shari'ati, Muhammad Taqi Mazinani, 55–56, 505, 506
Shari'atmadari, Ayatollah, 57
Al-Shari'a wa-l-Hayat (Islamic law and life) (television program), 346–347 Sharif, Nawaz, 404, 548 al-Sharif, Sayyid Imam, 70, 262, 263, 442, 443 al-Shatibi, Abu Ishaq
religious knowledge and, 308
Rida and, 472
al-Shatibi, Ibrahim, 465 al-Shawkani, Muhammad, 472, 506–507, 600
al-Badr al-Tali (The rising moon) (Shawkani), 507
al-Fath al-Qadir (Victory of the Almighty) (Shawkani), 507
Nayl al-Awtar fi Sharh Muntaqa al-Akhbar (Attaining the aims in commenting on the choicest traditions) (Shawkani), 507
al-Sayl al-Jarrar (The raging torrent) (Shawkani), 507
Zaydis and, 606
al-Shaybani, Muhammad b. al-Hasan, 507–508
Abu Yusuf and, 15
al-Asl (The origin), 15 diplomacy in, 134
jihad and, 276
Kitab al-Siyar (Book of the rules of war), 134, 277, 508 Shaybanids, 481
shaykh, 508–509
shaykh al-Islam, 509–510
Shaykh Junayd, 264
Shelter Now International, 379
Shihab al-Din, Mawlana, 458
Shi'ism, 510–512
Abbasids and, 2
Abu Bakr and, 13–14, 110
in Afghanistan, 20
'A'isha and, 27–28
'Ali b. Abi Talib and, 30
Amal and, 35–36
asceticism and, 416
'Ashura' and, 45
authority and, 52, 55–56
Buyids and, 79
Companions of the Prophet and, 109–110
dissimulation and, 136
in Egypt, 344
Fiver. See Zaydi (Fiver) Shi'ism
Friday prayer and, 177–178
friendship and, 178–179
fundamentalism and, 184–185
government and, 201, 202
guardianship of the jurist and, 208
hadith and, 212, 213, 214
Hasan b. 'Ali and, 8, 216–217
heresiography and, 217
Hizbullah and, 220
Ibn Hanbal and, 25
imamate and, 511
inquisition and, 255
intercession and, 256
in Iraq, 261–262, 344
Isma'ilis and, 265
jihad and, 275–276
Karbala and, 293
Khunji and, 297–298
martyrdom and, 329–330
messianism among, 338
as minority, 344
in Muslim demographics, 130
Mu'tazilis and, 384
Nizaris and, 395
oath of allegiance and, 401
philosophy and, 415
piety and, 416

pillars of, 418–419
prophecy and, 433
quietism and, 446
Qur'an and, 452
Razi and, 459
rebellion and, 460
Sadr and, 480
Safavids and, 481
Salafis and, 484
Shari'ati and, 460
source of emulation in, 517–518
sovereignty and, 522
Sufism and, 529
suicide bombings and, 531
sunna and, 534–535
Sunnism and, 535
Twelver. See Twelver Shi'ism
tyranny and, 571
'ulama' and, 575
Wahhabis and, 486
al-Shirazi, Abu Ishaq al-Muhadhdhab (The neatly arranged compendium), 394
Nizamiyya and, 394
al-Tanbih (The call to attention), 394 al-Shirazi, Muhammad Hasan, 19, 56, 518 Shirazi, Muhammad Taqi, in Iraq, 262
al-Shirazi, Sadr al-Din. See Mulla Sadra Shirazi, Sayyid 'Ali Muhammad, 338, 517 Shrine of Abu Hanifa, 394 al-Shu'aybi, Hamud, 546
Shuja', Shah, 20
Shumayyil, Shibli, 515
shūrā (mutual consultation), 116, 117, 200, 462 Shurkah, Asad al-Din, 483 shurta, 427
Shushtari, Qazi Nur Allah, Khunji and, 297
Shutayba, 115
Shu'ubis, 156, 513
al-Siba'i, Mustafa
capitalism and, 86
Muslim Brotherhood and, 381
socialism and, 515
Siberia, 362
Sibt b. al-Jawzi
Al-Jalis al-Salih wa-l-Anis al-Nasih (The good counselor), 58
Mirrors for Princes and, 58
Siddiq, Ahmad, democracy in, 130
Siffin, Battle of, 43, 100, 306, 365, 383 Sikhs, as minority, 343
sikka (coins), 102
Silk Letter Conspiracy of 1916, 131
Simjurids, military and, 339
Sina'at al-Fatwa wa-Fiqh al-Aqalliyyat (The derivation of legal opinions and the Islamic law of minorities) (Bin Bayyah), 347
Sindh, 404
Sindhi, 'Ubaydallah
Deobandis and, 131
Shah Waliullah and, 494
al-Sinkili, 'Abd al-Ra'uf, 520
Sinla Conference, 283
Sinnar, 527
Sirat Rasul Allah (Life of the Messenger of God) (Ibn Ishaq), 133, 368
Sirat 'Umar ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz (Hakam), 580
Sir Darya, 560
SIS. See Sisters in Islam (SIS)
al-Sistani, 'Ali, Khomeini and, 262, 297 Sisters in Islam (SIS), 516
Sivasi, Shaykh Abdülmecid, 292
Siwa (oasis), 67
"Six Books," 211
Six Day War
Arafat and, 42
Hamas and, 215
Jerusalem and, 272
Palestinian Liberation Organization and, 406
Syria and, 538
siyar (law governing war with non-Muslim powers), 116 Siyar al-Muluk (Conduct of kings) (Nizam al-Mulk), 349, 393 siyāsa (governance), 197 al-Siyasa (journal), 5 al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (Political administration by the rules of religion) (Ibn Taymiyya), 16, 239
siyāsa shar'iyya (shari'a-oriented governance), 536
Siyasatnama (Book of governance) (Nizam al-Mulk), 16, 349
Skinner, Quentin, 464 slaves and slavery, 514–515
Delhi Sultanate and, 127, 128, 252
equality and, 151
family and, 168
freedom and, 174–175
Mamluks and, 327
military and, 339
non-Arab Muslims as, 101
racism and, 457
Tanzimat and, 543
Smith, Wilfred Cantwell, 458
socialism, 515–516
in Egypt, 385
equality and, 151–152
Shari'ati and, 505
Socialist Destourian Party, 567
Social Justice in Islam (Sayyid Qutb), 279, 291, 489 social science, 352 social solidarity, 354–355 society. See civil society; community Society for Arab Union (Jam'iyyat al-Jami'a al-'Arabiyya), 472 Society of the Muslim Brothers (Jam'iyyat al-Ikhwan al-Muslimin), 182, 381. See also Muslim Brotherhood (MB)
Sociology of Islam, The (Shari'ati), 55–56
Sohag, 189
Sokoto Caliphate, 85, 125, 392
solidarity, 516–517
in Constitution of Medina, 116
contracts and, 118
social, 354–355
Solomon, 596
Songhay Empire, 471
Soroush, Abdolkarim
authority in thought of, 56 democracy in thought of, 129 government in thought of, 206 on Islam, 261 liberalism in thought of, 315
on religious knowledge, 300
secularism and, 490
source of emulation, 517–518
Sourdel, Dominique, 428
South Africa, 518–520
apartheid in, 37–38
HIV in, 517
Positive Muslims in, 517
South Asia
Barelwis in, 64
Muslim demographics in, 130
Southeast Asia, 520–521. See also specific countries
South Epirus, 408
Southern Cushitic language, 141
South Sudan, 527
South Sulawesi, 520
South Yemen, communism in, 106 sovereignty, 522–523
Soviet-Afghan War
Afghanistan and, 20, 21
Bin Laden and, 69

Deobandis and, 131
al-Qaeda and, 442
Soviet Union
Central Asia and, 88
communism and, 106
propaganda and, 432
al-Qaeda and, 442
Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Spain, 523–524. See also Andalus
Morocco and, 363
in North Africa, 397
Spanish Inquisition, 255, 436 speech, freedom of, 436 spies, 339–340
Spirit of Islam ('Ali, Sayyid Ameer), 279
SPLA. See Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA)
SPLM. See Sudan People's Liberation Movement
Springborg, Robert, 409
Stalin, Joseph, 106
Stendhal, 259
Stillman, Norman, 562
Stipulations of 'Umar. See Treaty of 'Umar Stoddard, Lotrop, 353 stoning, 551 subjectivity, secular, 354–355 Sublime Porte, 10 succession, 84–85, 524–526
Sudan, 526–527
Bin Laden in, 442
Mahdi of the Sudan and, 323–324
Muhammad 'Ali and, 377
Muslim Brotherhood and, 382
Sufi groups in, 76
Taha in, 540
Turabi in, 568–569
Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA), 568
Sudanic language, 141
Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM), 527
Suez Canal, 385, 521
Sufism, 528–529
asceticism and, 415
brotherhoods and, 74–77
collective action and, 355–357
commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105 conversion to Islam and, 119
free will and, 177
guilds and, 209
heresy and, 218
human nature in, 225
individualism and, 253–254
messianism and, 338
modernity and, 355–357
in Nigeria, 392
philosophy and, 415
piety and, 415
Salafis and, 484
shari'a and, 500
shaykhs and, 508
Suhrawardi and, 530
in Turkey, 357
'ulama' and, 577
Wahhabis and, 486
Sufyan al-Thawri, 507
Sufyan b. Harb. See Abu Sufyan
Sufyanids, 582
Suharto, 255, 521
al-Suhrawardi, Abu al-Najib, 530
guilds and, 209
Idalat al-'Iyan 'ala al-Burhan (Directing the sight toward decisive proof), 530
Mulla Sadra and, 378
Nizamiyya and, 394
as shaykh al-Islam, 509
Sufism and, 528
suicide, 530–531
suicide bombings. See also terrorism debate over, 531
fundamentalism and, 181
Hamas and, 215
jihad and, 280
as martyrdom, 330
Qaradawi and, 444
Shi'ism and, 531
Sunnis and, 531
suitability, 170
Sukarno, 254, 408
al-Sulami, 'Abd al-Rahman, 161, 528
Sulami of Damascus, 277
Sulawesi, 521
Sulayman, 481
Süleiman the Magnificent, 531–532
authority and, 54
Istanbul and, 266–267
Ottomans and, 402
Süleymaniye Mosque, 479
sultan, 532–534
Suluk al-Muluk (The conduct of kings) (Khunji), 298
Sumatra, 520
Sumayya bt. Khabbat, dissimulation and, 135 sunan (collection of hadiths from the Prophet), 211 Sun Language Theory, 49–50
sunna, 534–535
şunnā' (artisans), 238
Sunnism, 535–536
Abu Bakr and, 13–14
activism and, 536
anarchism and, 36
Ash'aris and, 44
Azhar University and, 145
Barelwis and, 64–65
Companions of the Prophet and, 109
consensus and, 110
constitutional rules of, 113–114
dissimulation and, 136
Friday prayer and, 177–178
fundamentalism and, 184
and role of hadith in politics, 213–214 hadith tradition of, 211 Hasan b. 'Ali and, 216
in Indonesia, 254
inquisition and, 255
in Iraq, 262
Iraq War and, 262
jihad and, 275–276, 279
Khunji and, 297–298
Mahdi and, 322
mawlid and, 335
messianism among, 338
pillars of, 418
quietism and, 446, 461
Quraysh and, 456
Qutb and, 536
religious knowledge and, 307
representation and, 460–461
Safavids and, 480
Seljuqs and, 490–491
sovereignty and, 522 suicide bombing and, 531
sunna and, 534–535
Tablighi Jama'at and, 539
in Turkey, 569
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 580–582
utopia and, 585–586
superintendence, 274
Supreme Muslim Council, 405
suras, 450–451
al-Suyuti, Jalal al-Din, 161, 245
Swaqa prison, 552
Sykes Picot Treaty, 106
Syria, 537–548
'Alawis in, 29

Ayyubids in, 58
Ba'th Party in, 65
colonialism in, 104
communism in, 106
coup d'état in, 120
Druze in, 139
ethnic groups in, 157
Ibn Taymiyya in, 239
Isma'ilis in, 265
Lebanon and, 314
military in, 340
Mu'awiya and, 365
Muslim demographics in, 130
public opinion in, 436
religious knowledge and, 310
Tamerlane and, 542
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Yazidis in, 343

Tabah Foundation, 600
Tabaqat al-Udaba' (The classes of literary men) (Anbari), 394 al-Tabarani, Sulayman, Friday prayer and, 177 Tabari
biography of Muhammad and, 368
dissimulation and, 135
hypocrisy and, 229
ijtihad and, 244
Jami' al-Bayan 'an Ta'wil ay al-Qur'an (Clarifying the interpretation of the Qur'anic verses), 161
Zawahiri and, 604
Tabatabai, Muhammad, 56
Tabayi' al-Istibdad (Characteristics of despotism) (Kawakibi), 12, 13
Tablighi Jama'at (The Party of Preaching and Proselytizing) (TJ), 539
Deobandis and, 132
religious knowledge and, 303–304
Tabriz, 481
Tadhkira Harawiyya fi al-Hiyal al-Harbiyya (On the ruses of war) (Harawi), 58 al-Tafhimat al-Ilahiyya (Divine instructions) (Shah Waliullah), 494 Tafhimul Qur'an (Mawdudi), 334 tafsir (Qur'anic exegesis), 161. See also exegesis Tafsir al-Jalalayn (Commentary of the two [scholars named] Jalal) (Mahalli & Suyuti), 161 al-Tafsir al-Kabir: Mafatih al-Ghayb (The major commentary entitled The keys of the unseen) (Razi), 161
Tafsir al-Qur'an (Exegesis of the Qur'an) (Sulayman), 161
Tafsir al-Qur'an al-'Azim (Commentary on the mighty Qur'an) (Ibn Kathir), 161
Tafsir Surat al-Shura (Sayyid Qutb), 410
Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed, 160, 540
Tahdhib al-Ahkam (Refining the legal rulings) (Tusi), 213
Tahdhib al-Akhlaq (The refinement of ethics) (Miskawayh), 570
Tahert, 230
Tahir b. Ahmad, 'Abd al-Qadir and, 3
Tahmasp I, 265, 366, 431, 481
Tahmasp Shahnama, 479
Tahrik-i Taliban Pakistan, 541
Tahrir al-Ahkam fi Tadbir Ahl al-Islam (Summary of the rules to govern the people of Islam) (Ibn Jama'a), 235 Tahrir Square, 147
al-Tahtawi, Rifa'a Rafi'
fundamentalism and, 182
modernism and, 350
Takhlis al-Ibriz fi Talkhis Bariz (The Extraction of Gold in the Abridgment of Paris), 386
Ta'if Accords, 314, 370, 538
Taj al-Din fi ma Yajib 'ala l-Muluk (The crown of religion: On the duties of kings) (Maghili), 593 al-Tajammu' al-Yamani li-l-Islah (Yemeni Congregation for Reform), 600 Tajik Civil War, 157
Tajikistan
Afghanistan and, 20
Transoxiana and, 560
Tajiks
in Afghanistan, 20
in China, 91
Tajiyya law college, 394
Taj Mahal, 479
takfir, Kharijis and, 294–295
Takfir wa-l-Hijra (Excommunication and Withdrawal) (group), 220, 441, 442, 489
Takhlis al-Ibriz fi Talkhis Bariz (The Extraction of Gold in the Abridgment of Paris) (Tahtawi), 386
Talal b. 'Abdallah, 8
Talbi, Mohamed, consultation and, 117
Taleqani, Sayyid Mahmud, 13
Talha b. 'Ubaydallah, as companion of the Prophet, 109
Taliban, 541–542
Bin Laden and, 69, 380
Deobandis and, 132
Mulla 'Umar and, 379–380
neo-, 541
shari'a and, 379
Zawahiri and, 604
Tamerlane, 542
Babur and, 60
descendants of, 190
Ibn Khaldun and, 236
madrasas and, 320
messianism and, 338
Timurids and, 551
Transoxiana and, 561
Uighurs and, 573
Tamim (tribe), ridda and, 7
al-Tanbih (The call to attention) (Shirazi), 394
Tanbih al-Umma wa-Tanzih al-Milla (The awakening of the community and the purification of religion) (Na'ini), 262
Tang dynasty, 340
Tanzania early Muslim settlement at, 141
ethnic groups and, 157
Tanzeem-e-Islami (the Islamic Organization), Ahmad, Israr and, 23
Tanzimat, 543
Abdülhamid II and, 10
households and, 224
jurisdiction and, 287
minorities and, 343
modernity and, 357, 358
mufti and, 366
socialism and, 515
Sudan and, 527
Taqi al-Din Ahmad b. Taymiyya. See Ibn Taymiyya taqiyya (precautionary dissimulation), 135–136, 395 taqlid, 244–246
Ta'rikh Muddat al-Faransis bi-Misr (The history of the French presence in Egypt) (Jabarti), 175
Tarim Basin, 573
al-Tariqa al-Muhammadiyya (The Muhammadan path) (Birgili), 292
Tariqah-i-Muhammadiya, Bangladesh and, 62

Tarjumanul Qur'an (journal), 333
Tarzī, Mahmud, 20
tashhīr (ignominious parading), 430
Tashil al-Nazar wa-Ta'jil al-Zafar (Aiding examination and quickening success) (Mawardi), 332 Tashkent, 553
Tatars, in China, 91
Tathbit Dala'il al-Nubuwwa (Confirming the evidence of prophecy) (Jabbar), 434 al-Tawhidi, Abu Hayyan, 544
Akhlaq/Mathalib al-Wazirayn (The slanders of the two viziers), 544 al-Basa'ir wa-l-Dhakha'ir (Insights and treasures), 544
friendship and, 178
al-Imta' wa-l-Mu'anasa (Pleasure and enjoyment), 544 al-Isharat al-Ilahiyya (Divine intimations), 544 Kitab al-Sadaqa wa-l-Sadiq (On friendship and friends), 178, 544 al-Muqabasat (Acquisitions), 544
Tawq al-Hamama (The Ring of the Dove) (Ibn Hazm), 234 taxes, 544–545
alms, 90, 327, 544, 545
charity and, 89–90
contracts and, 118
conversion and, 119
land, 114 on non-Muslims, 118
People of the Book and, 283, 413 poll, 114, 118, 119, 283–284, 413, 545
rights and, 476
in shari'a (divine law), 114–115
Tanzimat and, 543
torture and, 552
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
Tayyab, Qari Muhammad, 468
Tehreek-e-Khilafat, Israr Ahmad and, 23
Temple Mount, 364
Temüjin. See Chingiz Khan
Temur. See Tamerlane terrorism, 545–546. See also 9/11; suicide bombings
'Abd al-Rahman and, 4
fundamentalism and, 180, 182
Mulla 'Umar and, 380
Pakistan and, 404
Qaddafi and, 441
al-Qaeda and, 441–443
Saudi Arabia and, 486
World Islamic Front Declaration and, 280–281
"Testament to the Crown Prince" ('Abd al-Hamid), 3 textile industry, 137 al-Tha'alibi, Abu Mansur, 590
Thailand, 520, 521
Tha'laba, 115
al-Thaqafi, Muhammad b. Qasim, India and, 251 thawra (coup d'état), 120 theft, 438, 475
theocracy, 547–549
theology, 549–550
Thessaly, 408
Third International, 106
Third Universal Theory, 441
Third-World nationalism, 387
Thousand and One Nights, 550
Thrace, 159
"Three Wars," 20
al-Tibyan fi Tafsir al-Qur'an (Exposition of the interpretation of the Qur'an) (Tusi), 161
Tigris River, 553
Timbuktu, 108
Timur. See Tamerlane
Timurids, 551
Babur and, 60
Dawani and, 126
individualism and, 254
modernity and, 356
Mongols and, 362
patrimonial state and, 411
Tamerlane and, 542
Transoxiana and, 561
Timur Lang. See Tamerlane
Tirmidhi
dissimulation and, 136
hadith and, 211
tithe, 114
titulature of early Muslim sovereigns up to 750, 82–83 of pre-Islamic Arabian monarchs, 82
TJ. See Tablighi Jama'at (The Party of Preaching and Proselytizing) (TJ)
TKP. See Turkish Communist Party (TKP) tobacco concession, 443
Tobacco Protests
Afghani and, 18, 19
nonviolence and, 396
tolerance, 419–426
Tomara, 126
Topkapi Saray, 479
Torodbe, 125
torts, 475–476
torture, 551–552
trade, 552–554 trade guilds, 209–210 trades, division of labor and, 137 traditional political thought, 554–560
transcendence, of God, 196 Transjordan, 284 transnational Islam, 358–359
Transoxiana, 560–561
Al-i Ahmad and, 270
Babur and, 60
chivalry and, 92
Delhi and, 126
Isma'ilis and, 266
Khunji and, 297, 298
Mongols and, 362
Persianate polity in, 360, 410
Qarmatians and, 446
Samanids and, 485
shaykh al-Islam and, 510
Tamerlane and, 542
Uighurs in, 573
treason, 561–562
Treaty of Berlin, 408
Treaty of Hudaybiyya, 133, 134, 396
Treaty of Küçük Kaynarca, 341
Treaty of Lausanne, 49, 158
Treaty of London, 106
Treaty of Sèvres, 158
Treaty of the Jews, 115–116
Treaty of the Mu'minūn, 115
Treaty of Turkmanchay, 443
Treaty of 'Umar, 562–563, 581
Treaty of Zuhab, 481
tribalism, 563–566
tribal law, in Jordan, 284 tribute, 283–284
Tritton, Arthur Stanley, 562 truce, abodes of, 11–12
Tuan Guru. See 'Abdallah b. Qadi 'Abd al-Salam
Tudeh Party, 270, 505
Tughluq, Firuz, Delhi Sultanate and, 128
Tughluq, Muhammad, Delhi Sultanate and, 127
Tughluq dynasty, 127

al-Tuhfa al-Mulukiyya fi al-Adab al-Siyasiyya (The royal gem regarding political decorum) (Mawardi), 332, 590
Tuhfat al-Wuzara' (Gift of the vizierate) (Tha'alibi), 590
Tukulor Empire, 125
Tunis, 235, 553
al-Tunisi, Khayr al-Din
  absolutism and, 12
  elections and, 148
  rights and, 477–478
Tunisia, 567
  Almohads in, 34
  communism in, 106
  Egypt and, 172
  Fatimids in, 172
  Ibn Khaldun in, 236
  ijtihad in, 245
  imperialism in, 251
  liberalism in, 314
  modernism in, 351
  public opinion in, 436
  revolution in, 147
  'ulama' and, 577
al-Turabi, Hasan, 568–569
  government and, 206
  pluralism and, 420
  representation and, 461
  Sudan and, 526, 527
  'ulama' and, 574
Turé, Askia Muhammad, 593 Turkestan, 260
Turkey, 569–570. See also entries at Ottoman
  Abdülhamid II and, 10–11
  Atatürk and, 48–50
  caliphate in, abolishment of, 5
  Communist Party in, 391, 515 Democratic Party in, 482 in European Union, 315
  European Union membership of, 158
  Gülen and, 304–305
  Istanbul, 266–267
  Italy and, 408
  Justice and Development Party in, 410
  Kotku in, 304
  Kurds in, 158, 344–345
  liberalism in, 315
  media in, 337
  military in, 340
  Milli Görüş in, 305
  Nazim Hikmet in, 391
  parliament in, 410
  public opinion in, 436
  republicanism and, 462
  in Russo-Turkish War, 10
  secularism and, 489
  socialism in, 515
  Sufism in, 357
  Welfare Party in, 315
  Yazidis in, 343
Turkish Communist Party (TKP), 391, 515 Turkish Grand National Assembly, 569–570
Turkish language, 49–50
Turkish Presidency of Religious Affairs, 159 Turkish War of Liberation, 49
Turkmanchay, Treaty of, 443
Turks, 156, 362
al-Turtushi, Muhammad b. al-Walid, Ibn Tumart and, 242, 523–524 al-Tusi, Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Istibsar fi ma Ikhtalaf min al-Akhbar (Clarifying the differences in the prophetic traditions), 213
  masses and, 330
  Tahdhib al-Ahkam (Refining the legal rulings), 213 al-Tibyan fi Tafsir al-Qur'an (Exposition of the interpretation of the Qur'an), 161
al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din, 570–571
  Dawani and, 126
  Ilkhanids and, 246
  monarchy and, 361
  Nasirean Ethics (Akhlaq-i Nasiri), 126, 252, 361, 570
  philosophy and, 415
  Rida and, 472
  utopia and, 585
al-Tustari, Sahl, 528
Twelfth Imam, 208, 338, 446
Twelver Shi'i ayatollah and, 56
  Ba'th and, 66
  brotherhoods and, 77
  Buyids and, 79
  charity and, 89–90
  collective obligations and, 103
  commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105
  Companions of the Prophet and, 109
  consensus and, 110, 111
  dissimulation and, 135, 136
  education and, 145, 146
  Fadlallah and, 164–165
  family and, 169
  fatwa and, 174
  guardianship of the jurist and, 208
  ijtihad and, 245–246
  imamate and, 249
  individualism and, 253
  Isma'ilis and, 266
  jihad and, 276, 278
  Mahdi and, 322
  martyrdom and, 329
  messianism and, 338
  minorities and, 344
  Nizaris and, 395
  pillars of, 395–396
  pluralism and, 421
  quietism and, 446
  Razi and, 459
  reform and, 463
  rules and, 511
  Safavids and, 481
  source of emulation in, 517–518
  Tusi and, 570
  utopia and, 585
"Two Authentic Collections," 211
Two-Nation Theory, 487
tyranny, 571–572

UAE. See United Arab Emirates (UAE)
UAR. See United Arab Republic (UAR)
'Ubaydallah b. Ziyad, 45
Ubicini, Abdolimino, 601
UDF. See United Democratic Front (UDF)
Uganda, Zanzibar Sultanate and, 141
Uhud, Battle of, 329, 373
Uighuristan, 91
Uighur language, 573
Uighurs, 573–574
  in China, 90, 91
  propaganda and, 433
'ulama', 574–579
Ulama Council, 315, 366
Ulaywah, Muhammad Mustafa, 262
Ulaywah, Ulwi Mustafa, 262
Ulus Chaghatay, 542
'Umar 'Abd al-Rahman, 4–5
  Faraj and, 172
  fundamentalism and, 185
'Umar II. See 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz
'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz, 579–580
  Qadaris and, 440
  Treaty of 'Umar and, 562
  'ulama' and, 575
'Umar b. al-Khattab, 580–582
  Abu Bakr and, 14, 84

Abu Yusuf and, 14, 16
bureaucracy and, 78
as companion of the Prophet, 109
conversion of, 119
ethnic groups and, 156
freedom and, 175
hadith and, 214
in history of caliphate, 82
holy places and, 221
imamate and, 247
jihad and, 274
Muhammad and, 371
Murji'is and, 380
police and, 427
public interest and, 435
Qur'an and, 449
Rightly Guided Caliphate and, 473
Shafi'i and, 491
shari'a and, 497
succession of, 84, 100
Sunnism and, 535
Treaty of 'Umar and, 562
'Umar II and, 580
Umayyad Mosque, 3, 364, 537
Umayyads, 582–583
Abbasids and, 1, 2
'Abd al-Hamid and, 2, 3
abdication and, 7
administrative system of government and, 204
Andalus and, 523
authority and, 51–52
coinage and, 102
commerce and, 553
constitutionalism and, 112
genealogy and, 190
governance and, 197
government and, 202
hadith and, 211, 212
hijra and, 219
holy places and, 221
Husayn b. 'Ali and, 227
Ibn al-Muqaffa' and, 232
imamate and, 247–248
India and, 251
intercession and, 256
Ja'far al-Sadiq and, 268
Jerusalem and, 272
judges and, 285
Kharijis and, 294
Medina and, 336
Murji'is and, 380
oath of allegiance and, 401
police and, 427
propaganda and, 431
Qadaris and, 440
revolution and, 471
in second fitna, 100
Shaybani and, 507
Shi'ism and, 511
in third fitna, 100
trade and, 553
Transoxiana and, 561
'ulama' and, 575
usurpation and, 583
Al-'Umdo fi I'dad al-'Udda [li-l-Jihad] (The Essentials of Making Ready [for Jihad]) (Sharif), 442 umma (community). See also community caliphate and, 6 concept of, 107
friendship and, 179
jihad and, 187
loyalty and, 318
nation-state and, 389
Umma Party, 540
UMNO. See United Malays National Organisation (UMNO)
'umra (peaceful pilgrimage), 416–417
UNC. See United National Command (UNC)
Undang-undang Melaka (The laws of Malacca), 520
Union des Organizations Islamiques de France, 341 Union of Iranian Students, 506
Union of Islam, 407
Union of Soviet Social Republics. See Soviet Union United Arab Emirates (UAE) media in, 337
parliament in, 409
Taliban and, 541
United Arab Republic (UAR), 399, 538
United Democratic Front (UDF), 519 United Kingdom
imperialism of, 250–251
Jerusalem and, 272
Khilafat movement and, 295
Malaysia and, 324
mosques in, 341
Mughals and, 366
Muslim minorities in, 341
Nigeria and, 392
Syria and, 537
United Malays National Organisation (UMNO), 324, 408, 521
United National Command (UNC), 215
United National Council of the Intifada, 406 United States
Afghanistan and, 380, 541
Bin Laden and, 442
Iranian coup d'état and, 120
Iranian hostage crisis with, 134
in Iraq, 104, 262
mosques in, 398
Mulla 'Umar and, 380
Muslim population in, 398 revolution in, 477
Saudi Arabia and, 486
September 11 attacks in, 180, 182, 280–281, 341, 380, 404
Taliban and, 541
World Islamic Front Declaration and, 281
unity, 420–421, 460–461
Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights, 478 al-Uradi, Murtada 'Ali, 495 al-Murghim (The compulsory), 495
Risala fi al-Hijra (Treatise on emigration), 495
Urban Social History of the Middle East, 1750–1950, The (Khoury), 400
Urdu, in Pakistan, 157
al-'Urwa al-Wuthqa (The firmest bond; journal), 8–9, 18, 350 Usama b. Zayd, Abu Bakr and, 14
Ushayqir, 231
'Usman dan Fodio. See Dan Fodio, Usman al-Usturwani, Muhammad, Kadızade and, 292 Usul al-Kafi (The sufficient bases) (Kulayni), 213 Usuli school
ijtihad and, 245
source of emulation and, 517, 518
usurpation, constitutionalism and, 113
usurper, 583
al-'Utaybi, Juhayman, 484
'Uthman b. 'Affan, 584–585
as companion of the Prophet, 109
holy places and, 221
Ibadis and, 230
imamate and, 247
jihad and, 275
Kharijis and, 294
Muhammad and, 373
Murji'is and, 380
nonviolence and, 396
religious knowledge and, 306

succession of, 84, 116
Sunnism and, 535
'Umar b. al-Khattab and, 581
Umayyads and, 583
'Uthman b. Fudi. See Dan Fodio, Usman
'Uthman b. Muhammad b. 'Uthman b. Salih b. See Dan Fodio, Usman
'Uthmani, Muhammad Taqi, 577 utopia, 97, 413–414, 585–586
Uzbek court, 297
Uzbekistan
Babur and, 60
Islamic Movement of, 88–89
Transoxiana and, 560, 561
Uzbeks
'Abbas I and, 1
in China, 91
propaganda and, 432
shaykh al-Islam and, 509
Uzun Hasan, 126, 571

Vahdeti, Derviş, 315
Valediction for the Arab Prophet, 65
Vatican II, 316
veil, 587–588, 598
Venture of Islam, The (Hodgson), 354 verbal extortion, 105 vicegerent, 238
Vienna, Ottoman siege of, 532, 553
Vienna Conference, 391
Vilayat-i Faqih (Guardianship of the Jurist) (Khomeini), 260
violence, 588–590
fundamentalism and, 187–188
al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group) and, 189
nonviolence and, 396–397
Virginia Bill of Rights of 1776, 543 virtue, leadership and, 313 Virtuous City, The (Farabi), 73
Vivaldus, Martinus Alphonous, 488
vizier, 204, 590–591
Voll, John O., 356
Voltaire, 353
von Grunebaum, Gustave E., 353 Vorontsov, Count, 495

al-Wadi'i, Muqbil, 606
Wadud, Amina
Friday prayer led by, 599
justice and, 291
liberation theology and, 317
Wahhabis
Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab and, 231
mawlid and, 335
al-Qaeda and, 442
rebellion and, 460
reform and, 468
Salafis and, 484
Saudi Arabia and, 485–486
Sufism and, 529
tribalism and, 564
Wahid, Abdurrahman, 130, 255
democracy in, 130
downfall of, 521
Al-Wala' wa-l-Bara': 'Aqida Manqula wa-Waqi' Mafqud ("Loyalty and Enmity: An Inherited Doctrine and Lost Reality") (Zawahiri), 604
walāya (allegiance), 178, 318. See also loyalty
Wali Allah, Shah. See Shah Walliullah Walid (son of Kamal Junbalat), 139 al-Walid b. 'Abd al-Malik, 579 Waliullah, Shah Dihlawi. See Shah Walliullah al-Waqa'i al-Misriyya (Egyptian events), 9 Waqidi, 133
biography of Muhammad and, 368
Kitab al-Maghazi (Book of military expeditions), 133 war. See also civil war; fitna; jihad; specific wars
abodes of, 11–12
in Constitution of Medina, 116
imperialism and, 250–251
terrorism and, 545
Waraqa b. Nawfal, Muhammad and, 370 Wardi, 566
wariness, 135–136
War of the Cross, 121
Warsh, 450
Wars of Apostasy (hurūb al-ridda), 100, 119 al-Wasaya wa-l-Nasa'ih (Testimonies and advices) (Muhasibi), 16 Wasil b. 'Ata,' 383
Wasit, 61
Wasiyya Harawiyya (Last counsels) (Harawi), 58 al-Wathiq (Abbasid caliph) inquisition of Mu'tazilis and, 384, 492
al-Ma'mun and, 328
Watt, W. M., 368, 552 al-Wazir, Khalil, 406
Wazzani-Tayyibi, 397
Weber, Max, 353, 410
Weizmann, Chaim, 472 Welfare Party, 315 welfare state. See public interest
West, the, 592–593
West Africa, 593–594
Dan Fodio in, 125
West Bank
Jordan and, 284
Palestine and, 405
West Bengal, 61
Westernization, 594–595
Weststruckness (gharbzādagī), 270, 595
West Punjab, 404
White Horde, 362 wine, 438
Wingate, Francis, 527 wisdom, in Ibn Sina, 237–238
Wisdom of Royal Glory (Hajib), 573 Witty, Cathie, 566
women, 595–598
'A'isha and, 28
Banna and, 64
Ba'th Party and, 66
chivalry and, 92, 93
as concubines, 156, 224, 515
democracy and, 129
division of labor and, 138
in family structure, 168
fundamentalism and, 185–187
genealogy and, 189–190
honor and, 169, 222
households and, 224 increasing participation of, 186 inequality of, 151
Jama'at-i Islami and, 271 masculinity and, 186 in medieval Islam, 597–598 modern, 598–599
Muhammad and, 596–597
Muslim men marrying non-Muslim, 342 privacy and, 430
in Qur'an, 595–596
rape of, 222 as rewards, 185 shame and, 430 as silent, 185
Sisters in Islam and, 517
Taliban and, 379
in Tunisia, 567
veils and, 587–588
World Assembly of Muslim Youth, 257

World Bank, 359
World Bank Government Indicators, 128
World Council of Peace, 391
World Islamic Call Society, 257
"World Islamic Front Against Jews and Crusaders," 604 World Islamic Front Declaration, 280–281 World Muslim Congress, 257
World Social Forum, 359
World Trade Center bombing (1993), 'Abd al-Rahman and, 4
World War I
  Atatürk in, 49
  colonialism and, 104
  imperialism and, 251
  Istanbul in, 267
  Lebanon and, 314
  Syria and, 537
World War II
  imperialism and, 251
  Jinnah and, 282–283
  Southeast Asia and, 521
  Syria and, 537
  Zia-ul-Haq and, 606
World Years, 46
worship, vicegerents and, 238 Wretched of the Earth, The (Fanon), 506 wrong, forbidding, 104–105 xenophobia, 457

Xinjiang, 91, 573

Yahud Bani 'Awf (the Jews of Banu 'Awf), 115, 116
Yahya b. 'Adi, 170
Yaji, Sarki, 391
al-Yakhsawi, Yusuf, 495
Yakub Beg rebellion, 91
Ya'qub (Timurid sultan), 126
Ya'qub b. Dawud, 590
al-Yaraghi, Muhammad, 495
Yarkand, 573
Yasa (Mongol tribal law), 182, 362
Yasin, 'Abd al-Salam, 306
Yasin, Ahmad, 405
Yassine, Nadia, 186, 187
Yathrib
  Constitution of Medina and, 116
  hijra and, 219
  in history of Medina, 336
  as model city, 95
Yazdegerd III, 584
Yazid I, 8
  Hasan b. 'Ali and, 216
  quietism and, 446
Yazid III, 14, 85, 440
Yazidis, as minority, 343
Year of the Elephant, 368
Yemen, 600
  communism in, 106
  Jews in, 345
  Shawkani in, 506
  Zaydis in, 605–606
Yemeni Congregation for Reform (al-Tajammu' al-Yamani li-l-Islah), 600
Yerima, Ahmed Sani, 392
Yoginipura. See Delhi
Yo'ldoshev, Tohir, 89
Young Ottomans, 462
Young Turk Constitutional Revolution, 261, 403, 472
Young Turks, 601–602
YouTube, 432
Yuan dynasty, 362
Yugoslavia, 158
Yuhanna b. Haylan, 170
Yunan, 550
Yunus, Muhammad, 62, 541
Yusuf, Shaykh, 518
Yusuf b. Tashfin, 35
Yusuf Khass Hajib, 573

Zada, Muslih al-Din Nur al-Din, 76
Zaghlul, Sa'd, Egypt and, 147
Zahir (king)
  in Afghanistan, 20
  Druze and, 139
Zahir Baybars, 235
Zahiris, 603
zakat (alms tax), 90, 327, 544, 545 al-Zakiyya, Muhammad al-Nafs. See al-Nafs al-Zakiyya Zallaqa, Battle of, 35
Zaman, Muhammad Qasim, 184 zandaqa (clandestine apostasy), 218
Zanzibar, early Muslim settlement at, 141
Zanzibar Sultanate, 141
Zardari, Asif Ali, 404
al-Zarkashi, Badr al-Din, 147
al-Zarqawi, Abu Mus'ab, 380 Zaryab Khuyi, 'Abbas, Khomeini and, 296 al-Zawahiri, Ayman, 603–605
  Bitter Harvest, The: The Brotherhood in Sixty Years, 604
  capitalism and, 86
  on elections, 149
  Islamic Jihad and, 262
  Knights under the Prophet's Honor, 604
  Qaddafi and, 441
  al-Qaeda and, 442
  Sayyid Qutb and, 489
  Al-Wala' wa-l-Bara': 'Aqida Manqula wa-Waqi' Mafqud ("Loyalty and Enmity: An Inherited Doctrine and Lost Reality"), 604–605
al-Zawahiri, Muhammad, 262 al-Zawahiri, Muhammad Rabie, 603 Zayd b. 'Ali
  Abu Hanifa and, 14
  Ja'far al-Sadiq and, 268
  Zaydis and, 605
Zayd b. Haritha, 370
Zayd b. Thabit, 449
Zaydi (Fiver) Shi'ism, 605–606
  commanding right and forbidding wrong and, 105
  hadith and, 213
  Shawkani and, 507
Zayn al-'Abidin, 'Ali
  Mir Damad and, 348
  Shi'ism and, 511
Zaynab (Muhammad's daughter), 45, 222
Zayyat, Habib, 562
al-Zayyat, Muntasir, 604
Zeghal, Malika, 185
Zengids
  propaganda and, 432
  shaykh al-Islam and, 509
  Syria and, 537
Zentralrat der Muslime, 159, 341
Zia-ul-Haq, General, 131, 606
  Ahamdis and, 25
  Mawdudi and, 334
  Pakistan and, 404
  theocracy and, 548
Zilfi, Madeline, 576
Zionism
  Abdülhamid II and, 11
  communism and, 106
Ziya' al-Din Barani. See Barani
Ziyad b. Abih, Mu'awiya and, 365 Ziyad b. Sufyan, 427 ziyara (visitation to a tomb or shrine), 417 zodiac, 46–47
"zone of shame," 430 Zoroastrians
  as minority, 342
  philosophy and, 414
  Shahnama (Book of kings) and, 493

Zubaida, Sami, 387
Zubayr b. ʿAwwam, as companion of the Prophet, 109
Zubayr Rahma Mansur (conqueror of Darfur), 190 Zuhab, Treaty of, 481 al-Zuhayli, Wahba, 311 Zuhdi, Karam
al-Gamaʿa al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group) and, 189
Islamic Jihad and, 263
al-Zuhri, Shihab al-Din. See Ibn Shihab al-Zuhri al-Zumur, ʿAbbud, 263
Zungaria Mongols, 574